 Take it to heart? Fie! 'tis a fault to heaven,
 A fault against the dead, a fault to nature,
 To reason most absurd; whose common theme
 Is death of fathers, and who still hath cried,
 From the first corse<sup>o</sup> till he that died to-day, 105
 "This must be so." We pray you, throw to earth
 This unprevailing<sup>o</sup> woe, and think of us
 As of a father: for let the world take note,
 You are the most immediate<sup>o</sup> to our throne;
 And with no less nobility<sup>o</sup> of love 110
 Than that which dearest father bears his son,
 Do I impart<sup>o</sup> toward you. For your intent
 In going back to school in Wittenberg,<sup>o</sup>
 It is most retrograde<sup>o</sup> to our desire:
 And we beseech you, bend you<sup>o</sup> to remain 115
 Here, in the cheer and comfort of our eye,
 Our chiefest courtier, cousin, and our son.
 QUEEN: Let not thy mother lose her prayers, Hamlet:
 I pray thee, stay with us; go not to Wittenberg.
 HAMLET: I shall in all my best obey you, madam. 120
 KING: Why, 'tis a loving and a fair reply:
 Be as ourself in Denmark. Madam, come;
 This gentle and unforc'd accord of Hamlet
 Sits smiling to my heart: in grace whereof,
 No jocund health that Denmark drinks to-day, 125
 But the great cannon to the clouds shall tell,

92 obsequious: Dutiful. 93 condolement: Sorrowing. 95 incorrect: Untrained, uncorrected. 99 vulgar thing: Common experience. 105 corse: Corpse. 107 unprevailing: Unavailing. 109 most immediate: Next in succession. 110 nobility: High degree. 112 impart: The object is apparently love (l. 110). 113 Wittenberg: Famous German university founded in 1502. 114 retrograde: Contrary. 115 bend you: Incline yourself (imperative).

And the king's rouse<sup>o</sup> the heaven shall bruit again,<sup>o</sup>
 Re-speaking earthly thunder. Come away. Flourish. Exeunt all but HAMLET.
 HAMLET: O, that this too too solid flesh would melt,
 Thaw and resolve itself into a dew! 130
 Or that the Everlasting had not fix'd
 His canon 'gainst self-slaughter! O God! God!
 How weary, stale, flat and unprofitable,
 Seem to me all the uses of this world!
 Fie on't! ah fie! 'tis an unweeded garden, 135
 That grows to seed; things rank and gross in nature
 Possess it merely.<sup>o</sup> That it should come to this!
 But two months dead: nay, not so much, not two:
 So excellent a king; that was, to this,
 Hyperion<sup>o</sup> to a satyr; so loving to my mother 140
 That he might not beteem<sup>o</sup> the winds of heaven
 Visit her face too roughly. Heaven and earth!
 Must I remember? why, she would hang on him,
 As if increase of appetite had grown
 By what it fed on: and yet, within a month — 145
 Let me not think on't — Frailty, thy name is woman! —
 A little month, or ere those shoes were old
 With which she followed my poor father's body,
 Like Niobe,<sup>o</sup> all tears: — why she, even she —
 O God! a beast, that wants discourse of reason,<sup>o</sup> 150
 Would have mourn'd longer — married with my uncle,
 My father's brother, but no more like my father
 Than I to Hercules: within a month:
 Ere yet the salt of most unrighteous tears
 Had left the flushing in her galled<sup>o</sup> eyes, 155
 She married. O, most wicked speed, to post
 With such dexterity<sup>o</sup> to incestuous sheets!
 It is not nor it cannot come to good:
 But break, my heart; for I must hold my tongue.

Enter HORATIO, MARCELLUS, and BERNARDO.

HORATIO: Hail to your lordship!

127 rouse: Draft of liquor. bruit again: Echo. 137 merely: Completely, entirely. 140 Hyperion: God of the sun in the older regime of ancient gods. 141 beteem: Allow. 149 Niobe: Tantalus's daughter, who boasted that she had more sons and daughters than Leto; for this, Apollo and Artemis slew her children. She was turned into stone by Zeus on Mount Sipylus. 150 discourse of reason: Process or faculty of reason. 155 galled: Irritated. 157 dexterity: Facility.

- HAMLET: I am glad to see you well: 160
 Horatio!—or I do forget myself.
- HORATIO: The same, my lord, and your poor servant ever.
- HAMLET: Sir, my good friend; I'll change that name with you:<sup>o</sup>
 And what make you from Wittenberg, Horatio?
 Marcellus? 165
- MARCELLUS: My good lord—
- HAMLET: I am very glad to see you. Good even, sir.
 But what, in faith, make you from Wittenberg?
- HORATIO: A truant disposition, good my lord.
- HAMLET: I would not hear your enemy say so, 170
 Nor shall you do my ear that violence,
 To make it truster of your own report
 Against yourself: I know you are no truant.
 But what is your affair in Elsinore?
 We'll teach you to drink deep ere you depart. 175
- HORATIO: My lord, I came to see your father's funeral.
- HAMLET: I prithee, do not mock me, fellow-student;
 I think it was to see my mother's wedding.
- HORATIO: Indeed, my lord, it follow'd hard<sup>o</sup> upon.
- HAMLET: Thrift, thrift, Horatio! the funeral bak'd meats<sup>o</sup> 180
 Did coldly furnish forth the marriage tables.
 Would I had met my dearest<sup>o</sup> foe in heaven
 Or ever I had seen that day, Horatio!
 My father!—methinks I see my father.
- HORATIO: Where, my lord?
- HAMLET: In my mind's eye, Horatio. 185
- HORATIO: I saw him once; 'a<sup>o</sup> was a goodly king.
- HAMLET: 'A was a man, take him for all in all,
 I shall not look upon his like again.
- HORATIO: My lord, I think I saw him yesternight.
- HAMLET: Saw? who? 190
- HORATIO: My lord, the king your father.
- HAMLET: The king my father!
- HORATIO: Season your admiration<sup>o</sup> for a while
 With an attent ear, till I may deliver,
 Upon the witness of these gentlemen,
 This marvel to you.

163 I'll . . . you: I'll be your servant, you shall be my friend; also explained as "I'll exchange the name of friend with you." 179 hard: Close. 180 bak'd meats: Meat pies. 182 dearest: Direst. The adjective dear in Shakespeare has two different origins: O.E. deore, "beloved," and O.E. deor, "fierce." Dearest is the superlative of the second. 186 'a: He. 192 Season your admiration: Restrain your astonishment.

- HAMLET: For God's love, let me hear. 195
- HORATIO: Two nights together had these gentlemen,
 Marcellus and Bernardo, on their watch,
 In the dead waste and middle of the night,
 Been thus encount'ed. A figure like your father,
 Armed at point exactly, cap-a-pe,<sup>o</sup> 200
 Appears before them, and with solemn march
 Goes slow and stately by them: thrice he walk'd
 By their oppress'd<sup>o</sup> and fear-surprised eyes,
 Within his truncheon's<sup>o</sup> length; whilst they, distill'd<sup>o</sup>
 Almost to jelly with the act<sup>o</sup> of fear, 205
 Stand dumb and speak not to him. This to me
 In dreadful secrecy impart they did;
 And I with them the third night kept the watch:
 Where, as they had deliver'd, both in time,
 Form of the thing, each word made true and good, 210
 The apparition comes: I knew your father;
 These hands are not more like.
- HAMLET: But where was this?
- MARCELLUS: My lord, upon the platform where we watch'd.
- HAMLET: Did you not speak to it?
- HORATIO: My lord, I did;
 But answer made it none: yet once methought 215
 It lifted up it<sup>o</sup> head and did address
 Itself to motion, like as it would speak;
 But even then the morning cock crew loud,
 And at the sound it shrunk in haste away,
 And vanish'd from our sight.
- HAMLET: 'Tis very strange. 220
- HORATIO: As I do live, my honour'd lord, 'tis true;
 And we did think it writ down in our duty
 To let you know of it.
- HAMLET: Indeed, indeed, sirs, but this troubles me.
 Hold you the watch to-night?
- MARCELLUS: }
 BERNARDO: } We do, my lord. 225
- HAMLET: Arm'd, say you?
- MARCELLUS: }
 BERNARDO: } Arm'd, my lord.

200 cap-a-pe: From head to foot. 203 oppress'd: Distressed. 204 truncheon: Officer's staff. distill'd: Softened, weakened. 205 act: Action. 216 it: Its.

HAMLET: From top to toe?

MARCELLUS:        }
BERNARDO:        }       My lord, from head to foot.

HAMLET: Then saw you not his face?

HORATIO: O, yes, my lord; he wore his beaver<sup>o</sup> up.

HAMLET: What, look'd he frowningly?

HORATIO:                               A countenance more                               230
          In sorrow than in anger.

HAMLET:                               Pale or red?

HORATIO: Nay, very pale.

HAMLET:                               And fix'd his eyes upon you?

HORATIO: Most constantly.

HAMLET:                               I would I had been there.

HORATIO: It would have much amaz'd you.

HAMLET: Very like, very like. Stay'd it long?                               235

HORATIO: While one with moderate haste might tell a hundred.

MARCELLUS:        }
BERNARDO:        }       Longer, longer.

HORATIO: Not when I saw't.

HAMLET:                               His beard was grizzled,—no?

HORATIO: It was, as I have seen it in his life,
          A sable<sup>o</sup> silver'd.

HAMLET:               I will watch to-night;                               240
          Perchance 'twill walk again.

HORATIO:                               I warr'nt it will.

HAMLET: If it assume my noble father's person,
          I'll speak to it, though hell itself should gape
          And bid me hold my peace. I pray you all,
          If you have hitherto conceal'd this sight,                               245
          Let it be tenable in your silence still;
          And whatsoever else shall hap to-night,
          Give it an understanding, but no tongue:
          I will requite your loves. So, fare you well:
          Upon the platform, 'twixt eleven and twelve,                               250
          I'll visit you.

ALL:                       Our duty to your honour.

HAMLET: Your loves, as mine to you: farewell.                               Exeunt [all but HAMLET].

          My father's spirit in arms! all is not well;
          I doubt<sup>o</sup> some foul play: would the night were come!
          Till then sit still, my soul: foul deeds will rise,                               255
          Though all the earth o'erwhelm them, to men's eyes.                               Exit.

229 beaver: Visor on the helmet.   240 sable: Black color.   254 doubt: Fear.

[SCENE iii: A room in POLONIUS's house.]

Enter LAERTES and OPHELIA, his sister.

LAERTES: My necessities are embark'd: farewell:

And, sister, as the winds give benefit
And convoy is assistant,<sup>3</sup> do not sleep,
But let me hear from you.

OPHELIA: Do you doubt that?

LAERTES: For Hamlet and the trifling of his favour,

Hold it a fashion<sup>6</sup> and a toy in blood,<sup>7</sup>
A violet in the youth of primy<sup>8</sup> nature, Forward,<sup>9</sup> not permanent, sweet, not lasting,
The perfume and suppliance of a minute;<sup>10</sup>
No more.

OPHELIA: No more but so?

LAERTES: Think it no more:

For nature, crescent,<sup>11</sup> does not grow alone
In thews<sup>12</sup> and bulk, but, as this temple<sup>13</sup> waxes,
The inward service of the mind and soul
Grows wide withal. Perhaps he loves you now,
And now no soil<sup>15</sup> nor cautel<sup>16</sup> doth besmirch
The virtue of his will: but you must fear,
His greatness weigh'd,<sup>17</sup> his will is not his own;
For he himself is subject to his birth:
He may not, as unvalued persons do,
Carve for himself; for on his choice depends
The safety and health of this whole state;
And therefore must his choice be circumscrib'd
Unto the voice and yielding<sup>23</sup> of that body
Whereof he is the head. Then if he says he loves you,
It fits your wisdom so far to believe it
As he in his particular act and place
May give his saying deed;<sup>27</sup> which is no further Than the main voice of Denmark goes withal.
Then weigh what loss your honour may sustain,
If with too credent<sup>30</sup> ear you list his songs,
Or lose your heart, or your chaste treasure open

Scene iii. 3 convoy is assistant: Means of conveyance are available. 6 fashion: Custom, prevailing usage. 7 toy in blood: Passing amorous fancy. 8 primy: In its prime. 9 Forward: Precocious. 10 suppliance of a minute: Diversion to fill up a minute. 11 crescent: Growing, waxing. 12 thews: Bodily strength; temple: Body. 15 soil: Blemish. cautel: Crafty device. 17 greatness weigh'd: High position considered. 23 voice and yielding: Assent, approval. 27 deed: Effect. 30 credent: Credulous.

- To his unmast' red° importunity.
 Fear it, Ophelia, fear it, my dear sister,
 And keep you in the rear of your affection,
 Out of the shot and danger of desire. 35
 The chariest° maid is prodigal enough,
 If she unmask her beauty to the moon:
 Virtue itself 'scapes not calumnious strokes:
 The canker galls the infants of the spring,°
 Too oft before their buttons° be disclos'd,° 40
 And in the morn and liquid dew° of youth
 Contagious blastments° are most imminent.
 Be wary then; best safety lies in fear:
 Youth to itself rebels, though none else near.
 OPHELIA: I shall the effect of this good lesson keep, 45
 As watchman to my heart. But, good my brother,
 Do not, as some ungracious° pastors do,
 Show me the steep and thorny way to heaven;
 Whiles, like a puff'd° and reckless libertine,
 Himself the primrose path of dalliance treads, 50
 And recks° not his own rede.°

Enter POLONIUS.

- LAERTES: O, fear me not.
 I stay too long; but here my father comes.
 A double° blessing is a double grace;
 Occasion° smiles upon a second leave.
 POLONIUS: Yet here, Laertes? aboard, aboard, for shame! 55
 The wind sits in the shoulder of your sail,
 And you are stay'd for. There; my blessing with thee!
 And these few precepts° in thy memory
 Look thou character.° Give thy thoughts no tongue,
 Nor any unproportion'd° thought his act. 60
 Be thou familiar, but by no means vulgar.°
 Those friends thou hast, and their adoption tried,
 Grapple them to thy soul with hoops of steel;

32 unmast' red: Unrestrained. 36 chariest: Most scrupulously modest. 39 The canker . . . spring: The cankerworm destroys the young plants of spring. 40 buttons: Buds. disclos'd: Opened. 41 liquid dew: I.e., time when dew is fresh. 42 blastments: Blights. 47 ungracious: Graceless. 49 puff'd: Bloated. 51 recks: Heeds. rede: Counsel. 53 double: I.e., Laertes has already bade his father good-by. 54 Occasion: Opportunity. 58 precepts: Many parallels have been found to the series of maxims which follows, one of the closer being that in Lyly's Euphues. 59 character: Inscribe. 60 unproportion'd: Inordinate. 61 vulgar: Common.

But do not dull thy palm with entertainment
 Of each new-hatch'd, unfledg'd<sup>65</sup> comrade. Beware Of entrance to a quarrel, but being in,
 Bear't that th' opposed may beware of thee.
 Give every man thy ear, but few thy voice;
 Take each man's censure, but reserve thy judgement.
 Costly thy habit as thy purse can buy, 70
 But not express'd in fancy;<sup>71</sup> rich, not gaudy;
 For the apparel oft proclaims the man,
 And they in France of the best rank and station
 Are of a most select and generous chief in that.<sup>72</sup>
 Neither a borrower nor a lender be; 75
 For loan oft loses both itself and friend,
 And borrowing dulleth edge of husbandry.<sup>73</sup>
 This above all: to thine own self be true,
 And it must follow, as the night the day,
 Thou canst not then be false to any man. 80
 Farewell: my blessing season<sup>74</sup> this in thee!
 LAERTES: Most humbly do I take my leave, my lord.
 POLONIUS: The time invites you; go; your servants tend.
 LAERTES: Farewell, Ophelia; and remember well
 What I have said to you.
 OPHELIA: 'Tis in my memory lock'd, 85
 And you yourself shall keep the key of it.
 LAERTES: Farewell. Exit LAERTES.
 POLONIUS: What is 't, Ophelia, he hath said to you?
 OPHELIA: So please you, something touching the Lord Hamlet.
 POLONIUS: Marry, well bethought: 90
 'Tis told me, he hath very oft of late
 Given private time to you; and you yourself
 Have of your audience been most free and bounteous:
 If it be so, as so't is put on<sup>75</sup> me,
 And that in way of caution, I must tell you, 95
 You do not understand yourself so clearly
 As it behooves my daughter and your honour.
 What is between you? give me up the truth.
 OPHELIA: He hath, my lord, of late made many tenders<sup>76</sup>
 Of his affection to me. 100
 POLONIUS: Affection! pooh! you speak like a green girl,

65 unfledg'd: Immature. 71 express'd in fancy: Fantastical in design. 74 Are . . . that: Chief is usually taken as a substantive meaning "head," "eminence." 77 husbandry: Thrift. 81 season: Mature. 94 put on: Impressed on. 99 tenders: Offers.

- Unsifted° in such perilous circumstance.
 Do you believe his tenders,° as you call them?
- OPHELIA: I do not know, my lord, what I should think.
- POLONIUS: Marry, I will teach you: think yourself a baby;
 That you have ta'en these tenders° for true pay,
 Which are not sterling.° Tender° yourself more dearly;
 Or—not to crack the wind° of the poor phrase,
 Running it thus—you'll tender me a fool.°
- OPHELIA: My lord, he hath importun'd me with love
 In honourable fashion.
- POLONIUS: Ay, fashion° you may call it; go to, go to.
- OPHELIA: And hath given countenance° to his speech, my lord,
 With almost all the holy vows of heaven.
- POLONIUS: Ay, springes° to catch woodcocks.° I do know,
 When the blood burns, how prodigal the soul
 Lends the tongue vows: these blazes, daughter,
 Giving more light than heat, extinct in both,
 Even in their promise, as it is a-making,
 You must not take for fire. From this time
 Be somewhat scanter of your maiden presence;
 Set your entreatments° at a higher rate
 Than a command to parley.° For Lord Hamlet, Believe so much in him,° that he is young,
 And with a larger tether may he walk
 Than may be given you: in few,° Ophelia,
 Do not believe his vows; for they are brokers,°
 Not of that dye° which their investments° show,
 But mere implorators of° unholy suits,
 Breathing° like sanctified and pious bawds,
 The better to beguile. This is for all:
 I would not, in plain terms, from this time forth,
 Have you so slander° any moment leisure,
 As to give words or talk with the Lord Hamlet.
 Look to 't, I charge you: come your ways.
- OPHELIA: I shall obey, my lord.
- Exeunt.*

102 Unsifted: Untried. 103 tenders: Offers. 106 tenders: Promises to pay. 107 sterling: Legal currency. Tender: Hold. 108 crack the wind: I.e., run it until it is broken-winded. 109 tender . . . fool: Show me a fool (for a daughter). 112 fashion: Mere form, pretense. 113 countenance: Credit, support. 115 springes: Snares. woodcocks: Birds easily caught, type of stupidity. 122 entreatments: Conversations, interviews. 123 command to parley: Mere invitation to talk. 124 so . . . him: This much concerning him. 126 in few: Briefly. 127 brokers: Go-betweens, procurers. 128 dye: Color or sort. investments: Clothes. 129 implorators of: Solicitors of. 130 Breathing: Speaking. 133 slander: Bring disgrace or reproach upon.

[SCENE iv: The platform.]

Enter HAMLET, HORATIO, and MARCELLUS.

HAMLET: The air bites shrewdly; it is very cold.

HORATIO: It is a nipping and an eager air.

HAMLET: What hour now?

HORATIO: I think it lacks of twelve.

MARCELLUS: No, it is struck.

HORATIO: Indeed? I heard it not: then it draws near the season
Wherein the spirit held his wont to walk.

A flourish of trumpets, and two pieces go off.

What does this mean, my lord?

HAMLET: The king doth wake<sup>o</sup> to-night and takes his rouse,<sup>o</sup>
Keeps wassail,<sup>o</sup> and the swagg'ring up-spring<sup>o</sup> reels;<sup>o</sup>
And, as he drains his draughts of Rhenish<sup>o</sup> down,
The kettle-drum and trumpet thus bray out
The triumph of his pledge.<sup>o</sup>

HORATIO: Is it a custom?

HAMLET: Ay, marry, is 't:

But to my mind, though I am native here
And to the manner born,<sup>o</sup> it is a custom
More honour'd in the breach than the observance.
This heavy-headed revel east and west
Makes us traduc'd and tax'd of other nations:
They clepe<sup>o</sup> us drunkards, and with swinish phrase<sup>o</sup> Soil our addition;<sup>o</sup> and indeed it takes
From our achievements, though perform'd at height,
The pith and marrow of our attribute.<sup>o</sup>
So, oft it chanceth in particular men,
That for some vicious mole of nature<sup>o</sup> in them,
As, in their birth—wherein they are not guilty,
Since nature cannot choose his origin—
By the o'ergrowth of some complexion,
Oft breaking down the pales<sup>o</sup> and forts of reason,
Or by some habit that too much o'er-leavens<sup>o</sup>

Scene iv. 8 wake: Stay awake, hold revel. rouse: Carouse, drinking bout. 9 wassail: Carousal. up-spring: Last and wildest dance at German merry-makings. reels: Reels through. 10 Rhenish: Rhine wine. 12 triumph . . . pledge: His glorious achievement as a drinker. 15 to . . . born: Destined by birth to be subject to the custom in question. 19 clepe: Call. with swinish phrase: By calling us swine. 20 addition: Reputation. 22 attribute: Reputation. 24 mole of nature: Natural blemish in one's constitution. 28 pales: Palings (as of a fortification). 29 o'er-leavens: Induces a change throughout (as yeast works in bread).

The form of plausible<sup>o</sup> manners, that these men, 30
 Carrying, I say, the stamp of one defect,
 Being nature's livery,<sup>o</sup> or fortune's star,<sup>o</sup> —
 Their virtues else — be they as pure as grace,
 As infinite as man may undergo —
 Shall in the general censure take corruption 35
 From that particular fault: the dram of eale<sup>o</sup>
 Doth all the noble substance of a doubt
 To his own scandal.<sup>o</sup>

Enter GHOST.

HORATIO: Look, my lord, it comes!

HAMLET: Angels and ministers of grace<sup>o</sup> defend us!
 Be thou a spirit of health or goblin damn'd, 40
 Bring with thee airs from heaven or blasts from hell,
 Be thy intents wicked or charitable,
 Thou com'st in such a questionable<sup>o</sup> shape
 That I will speak to thee: I'll call thee Hamlet,
 King, father, royal Dane: O, answer me! 45
 Let me not burst in ignorance; but tell
 Why thy canoniz'd<sup>o</sup> bones, hearsed<sup>o</sup> in death,
 Have burst their cerements;<sup>o</sup> why the sepulchre,
 Wherein we saw thee quietly interr'd,
 Hath op'd his ponderous and marble jaws, 50
 To cast thee up again. What may this mean,
 That thou, dead corse, again in complete steel
 Revisits thus the glimpses of the moon,<sup>o</sup>
 Making night hideous; and we fools of nature<sup>o</sup>
 So horridly to shake our disposition 55
 With thoughts beyond the reaches of our souls?
 Say, why is this? wherefore? what should we do?

[GHOST] beckons [HAMLET].

HORATIO: It beckons you to go away with it,
 As if it some impartment<sup>o</sup> did desire
 To you alone.

30 plausible: Pleasing. 32 nature's livery: Endowment from nature. fortune's star: The position in which one is placed by fortune, a reference to astrology. The two phrases are aspects of the same thing. 36–38 the dram . . . scandal: A famous crux: dram of eale has had various interpretations, the preferred one being probably “a dram of evil.” 39 ministers of grace: Messengers of God. 43 questionable: Inviting question or conversation. 47 canoniz'd: Buried according to the canons of the church. hearsed: Coffined. 48 cerements: Grave-clothes. 53 glimpses of the moon: The earth by night. 54 fools of nature: Mere men, limited to natural knowledge. 59 impartment: Communication.

- MARCELLUS: Look, with what courteous action 60
 It waves you to a more removed<sup>61</sup> ground:
 But do not go with it.
- HORATIO: No, by no means.
- HAMLET: It will not speak; then I will follow it.
- HORATIO: Do not, my lord!
- HAMLET: Why, what should be the fear?
 I do not set my life at a pin's fee; 65
 And for my soul, what can it do to that,
 Being a thing immortal as itself?
 It waves me forth again: I'll follow it.
- HORATIO: What if it tempt you toward the flood, my lord,
 Or to the dreadful summit of the cliff 70
 That beetles o'er<sup>71</sup> his base into the sea,
 And there assume some other horrible form,
 Which might deprive your sovereignty of reason<sup>73</sup>
 And draw you into madness? think of it:
 The very place puts toys of desperation,<sup>75</sup> 75
 Without more motive, into every brain
 That looks so many fathoms to the sea
 And hears it roar beneath.
- HAMLET: It waves me still.
 Go on; I'll follow thee.
- MARCELLUS: You shall not go, my lord.
- HAMLET: Hold off your hands! 80
- HORATIO: Be rul'd; you shall not go.
- HAMLET: My fate cries out,
 And makes each petty artere<sup>82</sup> in this body
 As hardy as the Nemean lion's<sup>83</sup> nerve.<sup>85</sup>
 Still am I call'd. Unhand me, gentlemen.
 By heaven, I'll make a ghost of him that lets<sup>85</sup> me!
 I say, away! Go on; I'll follow thee. Exeunt GHOST and HAMLET.
- HORATIO: He waxes desperate with imagination.
- MARCELLUS: Let's follow; 'tis not fit thus to obey him.
- HORATIO: Have after. To what issue<sup>89</sup> will this come?
- MARCELLUS: Something is rotten in the state of Denmark. 90

61 removed: Remote. 71 beetles o'er: Overhangs threateningly. 73 deprive . . . reason: Take away the sovereignty of your reason. It was thought that evil spirits would sometimes assume the form of departed spirits in order to work madness in a human creature. 75 toys of desperation: Freakish notions of suicide. 82 artere: Artery. 83 Nemean lion's: The Nemean lion was one of the monsters slain by Hercules. nerve: Sinew, tendon. The point is that the arteries which were carrying the spirits out into the body were functioning and were as stiff and hard as the sinews of the lion. 85 lets: Hinders. 89 issue: Outcome.

HORATIO: Heaven will direct it.<sup>o</sup>

MARCELLUS: Nay, let's follow him.

Exeunt.

[SCENE V: Another part of the platform.]

Enter GHOST and HAMLET.

HAMLET: Whither wilt thou lead me? speak; I'll go no further.

GHOST: Mark me.

HAMLET: I will.

GHOST: My hour is almost come,
When I to sulphurous and tormenting flames
Must render up myself.

HAMLET: Alas, poor ghost!

GHOST: Pity me not, but lend thy serious hearing
To what I shall unfold.

5

HAMLET: Speak; I am bound to hear.

GHOST: So art thou to revenge, when thou shalt hear.

HAMLET: What?

GHOST: I am thy father's spirit,

Doom'd for a certain term to walk the night,

And for the day confin'd to fast<sup>o</sup> in fires,

Till the foul crimes done in my days of nature

Are burnt and purg'd away. But that I am forbid

To tell the secrets of my prison-house,

I could a tale unfold whose lightest word

Would harrow up thy soul, freeze thy young blood,

Make thy two eyes, like stars, start from their spheres,<sup>o</sup>

Thy knotted<sup>o</sup> and combined<sup>o</sup> locks to part

And each particular hair to stand an end,

Like quills upon the fretful porpentine:<sup>o</sup>

But this eternal blazon<sup>o</sup> must not be

To ears of flesh and blood. List, list, O, list!

If thou didst ever thy dear father love—

HAMLET: O God!

GHOST: Revenge his foul and most unnatural<sup>o</sup> murder.

HAMLET: Murder!

91 it: I.e., the outcome. Scene v. 11 fast: Probably, do without food. It has been sometimes taken in the sense of doing general penance. 17 spheres: Orbits. 18 knotted: Perhaps intricately arranged. combined: Tied, bound. 20 porpentine: Porcupine. 21 eternal blazon: Promulgation or proclamation of eternity, revelation of the hereafter. 25 unnatural: I.e., pertaining to fratricide.

GHOST: Murder most foul, as in the best it is;
 But this most foul, strange and unnatural.
 HAMLET: Haste me to know't, that I, with wings as swift
 As meditation or the thoughts of love, 30
 May sweep to my revenge.
 GHOST: I find thee apt;
 And duller shouldst thou be than the fat weed°
 That roots itself in ease on Lethe wharf,° Wouldst thou not stir in this. Now, Hamlet, hear:
 'Tis given out that, sleeping in my orchard, 35
 A serpent stung me; so the whole ear of Denmark
 Is by a forged process of my death
 Rankly abus'd: but know, thou noble youth,
 The serpent that did sting thy father's life
 Now wears his crown.
 HAMLET: O my prophetic soul! 40
 My uncle!
 GHOST: Ay, that incestuous, that adulterate° beast,
 With witchcraft of his wit, with traitorous gifts,—
 O wicked wit and gifts, that have the power
 So to seduce!—won to his shameful lust 45
 The will of my most seeming-virtuous queen:
 O Hamlet, what a falling-off was there!
 From me, whose love was of that dignity
 That it went hand in hand even with the vow
 I made to her in marriage, and to decline 50
 Upon a wretch whose natural gifts were poor
 To those of mine!
 But virtue, as it never will be moved,
 Though lewdness court it in a shape of heaven,
 So lust, though to a radiant angel link'd, 55
 Will sate itself in a celestial bed,
 And prey on garbage.
 But, soft! methinks I scent the morning air;
 Brief let me be. Sleeping within my orchard,
 My custom always of the afternoon, 60
 Upon my secure° hour thy uncle stole,
 With juice of cursed hebona° in a vial,

32 fat weed: Many suggestions have been offered as to the particular plant intended, including asphodel; probably a general figure for plants growing along rotting wharves and piles. 33 Lethe wharf: Bank of the river of forgetfulness in Hades. 42 adulterate: Adulterous. 61 secure: Confident, unsuspecting. 62 hebona: Generally supposed to mean "henbane," conjectured hemlock; ebenus, meaning "yew."

And in the porches of my ears did pour
 The leperous<sup>o</sup> distilment; whose effect
 Holds such an enmity with blood of man 65
 That swift as quicksilver it courses through
 The natural gates and alleys of the body,
 And with a sudden vigour it doth posset<sup>o</sup>
 And curd, like eager<sup>o</sup> droppings into milk,
 The thin and wholesome blood: so did it mine; 70
 And a most instant tetter bark'd about,
 Most lazar-like,<sup>o</sup> with vile and loathsome crust,
 All my smooth body.
 Thus was I, sleeping, by a brother's hand
 Of life, of crown, of queen, at once dispatch'd:<sup>o</sup> 75
 Cut off even in the blossoms of my sin,
 No reck'ning made, but sent to my account
 With all my imperfections on my head:
 O, horrible! O, horrible! most horrible!<sup>o</sup> 80
 If thou hast nature in thee, bear it not;
 Let not the royal bed of Denmark be
 A couch for luxury<sup>o</sup> and damned incest.
 But, howsomever thou pursues this act,
 Taint not thy mind,<sup>o</sup> nor let thy soul contrive 85
 Against thy mother aught: leave her to heaven
 And to those thorns that in her bosom lodge,
 To prick and sting her. Fare thee well at once!
 The glow-worm shows the matin<sup>o</sup> to be near,
 And 'gins to pale his uneffectual fire:<sup>o</sup> 90
 Adieu, adieu, adieu! remember me. [Exit.]

HAMLET: O all you host of heaven! O earth! what else?
 And shall I couple<sup>o</sup> hell? O, fie! Hold, hold, my heart;
 And you, my sinews, grow not instant old,
 But bear me stiffly up. Remember thee! 95
 Ay, thou poor ghost, whiles memory holds a seat
 In this distracted globe.<sup>o</sup> Remember thee!

64 leperous: Causing leprosy. 68 posset: Coagulate, curdle. 69 eager: Sour, acid. 72 lazar-like: Leperlike. 75 dispatch'd: Suddenly bereft. 77 Unhous'led: Without having received the sacrament. disappointed: Unready, without equipment for the last journey. unanel'd: Without having received extreme unction. 80 O . . . horrible: Many editors give this line to Hamlet; Garrick and Sir Henry Irving spoke it in that part. 83 luxury: Lechery. 85 Taint . . . mind: Probably, deprave not thy character, do nothing except in the pursuit of a natural revenge. 89 matin: Morning. 90 uneffectual fire: Cold light. 93 couple: Add. 97 distracted globe: Confused head.

Yea, from the table of my memory
 I'll wipe away all trivial fond records,
 All saws<sup>o</sup> of books, all forms, all pressures<sup>o</sup> past, 100
 That youth and observation copied there;
 And thy commandment all alone shall live
 Within the book and volume of my brain,
 Unmix'd with baser matter: yes, by heaven!
 O most pernicious woman! 105
 O villain, villain, smiling, damned villain!
 My tables,<sup>o</sup>—meet it is I set it down,
 That one may smile, and smile, and be a villain;
 At least I am sure it may be so in Denmark: [Writing.]
 So, uncle, there you are. Now to my word;<sup>o</sup> 110
 It is "Adieu, adieu! remember me,"
 I have sworn't.

Enter HORATIO and MARCELLUS.

HORATIO: My lord, my lord—

MARCELLUS: Lord Hamlet,—

HORATIO: Heavens secure him!

HAMLET: So be it!

MARCELLUS: Hillo, ho, ho,<sup>o</sup> my lord! 115

HAMLET: Hillo, ho, ho, boy! come, bird, come.

MARCELLUS: How is't, my noble lord?

HORATIO: What news, my lord?

HAMLET: O, wonderful!

HORATIO: Good my lord, tell it.

HAMLET: No; you will reveal it.

HORATIO: Not I, my lord, by heaven.

MARCELLUS: Nor I, my lord. 120

HAMLET: How say you, then; would heart of man once think it?

But you'll be secret?

HORATIO: }
 MARCELLUS: } Ay, by heaven, my lord.

HAMLET: There's ne'er a villain dwelling in all Denmark

But he's an arrant<sup>o</sup> knave.

HORATIO: There needs no ghost, my lord, come from the grave 125
 To tell us this.

HAMLET: Why, right; you are in the right;

And so, without more circumstance at all,

100 saws: Wise sayings. pressures: Impressions stamped. 107 tables: Probably a small portable writing-tablet carried at the belt. 110 word: Watchword. 115 Hillo, ho, ho: A falconer's call to a hawk in air. 124 arrant: Thoroughgoing.

- I hold it fit that we shake hands and part:
 You, as your business and desire shall point you;
 For every man has business and desire, 130
 Such as it is; and for my own poor part,
 Look you, I'll go pray.
- HORATIO: These are but wild and whirling words, my lord.
- HAMLET: I am sorry they offend you, heartily;
 Yes, 'faith, heartily.
- HORATIO: There's no offence, my lord. 135
- HAMLET: Yes, by Saint Patrick,<sup>o</sup> but there is, Horatio,
 And much offence too. Touching this vision here,
 It is an honest<sup>o</sup> ghost, that let me tell you:
 For your desire to know what is between us,
 O'ermaster 't as you may. And now, good friends, 140
 As you are friends, scholars and soldiers,
 Give me one poor request.
- HORATIO: What is 't, my lord? we will.
- HAMLET: Never make known what you have seen to-night.
- HORATIO: }
 MARCELLUS: } My lord, we will not.
- HAMLET: Nay, but swear 't.
- HORATIO: In faith, 145
 My lord, not I.
- MARCELLUS: Nor I, my lord, in faith.
- HAMLET: Upon my sword.<sup>o</sup>
- MARCELLUS: We have sworn, my lord, already.
- HAMLET: Indeed, upon my sword, indeed. GHOST cries under the stage.
- GHOST: Swear.
- HAMLET: Ah, ha, boy! say'st thou so? art thou there, truepenny?<sup>o</sup> 150
 Come on—you hear this fellow in the cellarage—Consent to swear.
- HORATIO: Propose the oath, my lord.
- HAMLET: Never to speak of this that you have seen,
 Swear by my sword.
- GHOST [beneath]: Swear. 155
- HAMLET: Hic et ubique?<sup>o</sup> then we'll shift our ground.
 Come hither, gentlemen,
 And lay your hands again upon my sword:
 Swear by my sword,
 Never to speak of this that you have heard. 160

136 Saint Patrick: St. Patrick was keeper of Purgatory and patron saint of all blunders and confusion. 138 honest: I.e., a real ghost and not an evil spirit. 147 sword: I.e., the hilt in the form of a cross. 150 truepenny: Good old boy, or the like. 156 Hic et ubique?: Here and everywhere?

GHOST [beneath]: Swear by his sword.

HAMLET: Well said, old mole! canst work i' th' earth so fast?

A worthy pioner!<sup>o</sup> Once more remove, good friends.

HORATIO: O day and night, but this is wondrous strange!

HAMLET: And therefore as a stranger give it welcome.

There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio,

Than are dreamt of in your philosophy.

But come;

Here, as before, never, so help you mercy,

How strange or odd soe'er I bear myself,

170

As I perchance hereafter shall think meet

To put an antic<sup>o</sup> disposition on,

That you, at such times seeing me, never shall,

With arms encumb'<sup>red</sup> thus, or this head-shake,

Or by pronouncing of some doubtful phrase,

175

As "Well, well, we know," or "We could, an if we would,"

Or "If we list to speak," or "There be, an if they might,"

Or such ambiguous giving out,<sup>o</sup> to note<sup>o</sup>

That you know aught of me: this not to do,

So grace and mercy at your most need help you,

Swear.

GHOST [beneath]: Swear.

HAMLET: Rest, rest, perturbed spirit! [They swear.] So, gentlemen,

With all my love I do commend me to you:

And what so poor a man as Hamlet is

May do, t' express his love and friending<sup>o</sup> to you,

God willing, shall not lack. Let us go in together;

And still your fingers on your lips, I pray.

The time is out of joint: O cursed spite,

That ever I was born to set it right!

Nay, come, let's go together.

Exeunt.

[ACT II]

SCENE i: A room in POLONIUS's house.]

POLONIUS: Give him this money and these notes, Reynaldo.

REYNALDO: I will, my lord.

163 pioner: Digger, miner. 172 antic: Fantastic. 174 encumb'<sup>red</sup>: Folded or entwined. 178 giving out: Profession of knowledge. to note: To give a sign. 186 friending: Friendliness.

POLONIUS: You shall do marvellous wisely, good Reynaldo,
 Before you visit him, to make inquire
 Of his behaviour.

REYNALDO: My lord, I did intend it. 5

POLONIUS: Marry, well said; very well said. Look you, sir, Inquire me first what Danskers<sup>o</sup> are in Paris;
 And how, and who, what means, and where they keep,<sup>o</sup>
 What company, at what expense; and finding
 By this encompassment<sup>o</sup> and drift<sup>o</sup> of question 10
 That they do know my son, come you more nearer Than your particular demands will touch it:<sup>o</sup>
 Take<sup>o</sup> you as 'twere, some distant knowledge of him;
 As thus, "I know his father and his friends,
 And in part him": do you mark this, Reynaldo? 15

REYNALDO: Ay, very well, my lord.

POLONIUS: "And in part him; but" you may say "not well:
 But, if 't be he I mean, he's very wild;
 Addicted so and so": and there put on<sup>o</sup> him
 What forgeries<sup>o</sup> you please; marry, none so rank 20
 As may dishonour him; take heed of that;
 But, sir, such wanton,<sup>o</sup> wild and usual slips
 As are companions noted and most known
 To youth and liberty.

REYNALDO: As gaming, my lord.

POLONIUS: Ay, or drinking, fencing,<sup>o</sup> swearing, quarrelling, 25
 Drabbing;<sup>o</sup> you may go so far.

REYNALDO: My lord, that would dishonour him.

POLONIUS: 'Faith, no; as you may season it in the charge.
 You must not put another scandal on him,
 That he is open to incontinency;<sup>o</sup> 30
 That's not my meaning: but breathe his faults so quaintly<sup>o</sup>
 That they may seem the taints of liberty,<sup>o</sup>
 The flash and outbreak of a fiery mind,
 A savageness in unreclaimed<sup>o</sup> blood,
 Of general assault.<sup>o</sup>

---

Act II, Scene i. 7 Danskers: Danske was a common variant for "Denmark"; hence "Dane." 8 keep: Dwell. 10 encompassment: Roundabout talking. drift: Gradual approach or course. 11–12 come . . . it: I.e., you will find out more this way than by asking pointed questions. 13 Take: Assume, pretend. 19 put on: Impute to. 20 forgeries: Invented tales. 22 wanton: Sportive, unrestrained. 25 fencing: Indicative of the ill repute of professional fencers and fencing schools in Elizabethan times. 26 Drabbing: Associating with immoral women. 30 incontinency: Habitual loose behavior. 31 quaintly: Delicately, ingeniously. 32 taints of liberty: Blemishes due to freedom. 34 unreclaimed: Untamed. 35 general assault: Tendency that assails all untrained youth.

- REYNALDO: But, my good lord,— 35
- POLONIUS: Wherefore should you do this?
- REYNALDO: Ay, my lord,
I would know that.
- POLONIUS: Marry, sir, here's my drift;
And, I believe, it is a fetch of wit:<sup>o</sup>
You laying these slight sullies on my son,
As 'twere a thing a little soil'd i' th' working, 40
Mark you,
Your party in converse, him you would sound,
Having ever<sup>o</sup> seen in the prenominate<sup>o</sup> crimes
The youth you breathe of guilty, be assur'd
He closes with you in this consequence;<sup>o</sup> 45
"Good sir," or so, or "friend," or "gentleman,"
According to the phrase or the addition
Of man and country.
- REYNALDO: Very good, my lord.
- POLONIUS: And then, sir, does 'a this—'a does—what was I about to say? By the mass, I was about to say something: where did I leave? 50
- REYNALDO: At "closes in the consequence," at "friend or so," and "gentleman."
- POLONIUS: At "closes in the consequence," ay, marry;
He closes thus: "I know the gentleman;
I saw him yesterday, or t' other day,
Or then, or then; with such, or such; and, as you say, 55
There was 'a gaming; there o'ertook in 's rouse;<sup>o</sup>
There falling out at tennis": or perchance,
"I saw him enter such a house of sale,"
Videlicet,<sup>o</sup> a brothel, or so forth.
See you now; 60
Your bait of falsehood takes this carp of truth:
And thus do we of wisdom and of reach,<sup>o</sup>
With windlasses<sup>o</sup> and with assays of bias,<sup>o</sup>
By indirections<sup>o</sup> find directions<sup>o</sup> out:
So by my former lecture<sup>o</sup> and advice, 65
Shall you my son. You have me, have you not?
- REYNALDO: My lord, I have.
- POLONIUS: God bye ye;<sup>o</sup> fare ye well.

38 fetch of wit: Clever trick. 43 ever: At any time. prenominate: Before-mentioned. 45 closes . . . consequence: Agrees with you in this conclusion. 56 o'ertook in 's rouse: Overcome by drink. 59 Videlicet: Namely. 62 reach: Capacity, ability. 63 windlasses: I.e., circuitous paths. assays of bias: Attempts that resemble the course of the bowl, which, being weighted on one side, has a curving motion. 64 indirections: Devious courses. directions: Straight courses, i.e., the truth. 65 lecture: Admonition. 67 bye ye: Be with you.

REYNALDO: Good my lord!

POLONIUS: Observe his inclination in yourself.<sup>69</sup>

REYNALDO: I shall, my lord.

70

POLONIUS: And let him ply his music.<sup>70</sup>

REYNALDO: Well, my lord.

POLONIUS: Farewell!

Exit REYNALDO.

Enter OPHELIA.

How now, Ophelia! what's the matter?

OPHELIA: O, my lord, my lord, I have been so affrighted!

POLONIUS: With what, i' th' name of God?

OPHELIA: My lord, as I was sewing in my closet,<sup>71</sup>

Lord Hamlet, with his doublet<sup>72</sup> all unbrac'd;<sup>73</sup>

No hat upon his head; his stockings foul'd,

Ungart' red, and down-gyved<sup>74</sup> to his ankle;

Pale as his shirt; his knees knocking each other;

And with a look so piteous in purport

As if he had been loosed out of hell

To speak of horrors,—he comes before me.

POLONIUS: Mad for thy love?

OPHELIA: My lord, I do not know;

But truly, I do fear it.

POLONIUS: What said he?

OPHELIA: He took me by the wrist and held me hard;

85

Then goes he to the length of all his arm;

And, with his other hand thus o'er his brow,

He falls to such perusal of my face

As 'a would draw it. Long stay'd he so;

At last, a little shaking of mine arm

And thrice his head thus waving up and down,

He rais'd a sigh so piteous and profound

As it did seem to shatter all his bulk<sup>75</sup>

And end his being: that done, he lets me go:

And, with his head over his shoulder turn'd,

He seem'd to find his way without his eyes;

For out o' doors he went without their helps,

And, to the last, bended their light on me.

POLONIUS: Come, go with me: I will go seek the king.

This is the very ecstasy of love,

69 Observe . . . yourself: In your own person, not by spies; or conform your own conduct to his inclination; or test him by studying yourself. 71 ply his music: Probably to be taken literally. 75 closet: Private chamber. 76 doublet: Close-fitting coat. unbrac'd: Unfastened. 78 down-gyved: Fallen to the ankles (like gyves or fetters). 93 bulk: Body.

Whose violent property<sup>o</sup> fordoes<sup>o</sup> itself
 And leads the will to desperate undertakings
 As oft as any passion under heaven
 That does afflict our natures. I am sorry.
 What, have you given him any hard words of late? 105
 OPHELIA: No, my good lord, but, as you did command,
 I did repel his letters and denied
 His access to me.
 POLONIUS: That hath made him mad.
 I am sorry that with better heed and judgement
 I had not quoted<sup>o</sup> him: I fear'd he did but trifle, 110
 And meant to wrack thee; but, beshrew my jealousy!<sup>o</sup>
 By heaven, it is as proper to our age
 To cast beyond<sup>o</sup> ourselves in our opinions
 As it is common for the younger sort
 To lack discretion. Come, go we to the king: 115
 This must be known; which, being kept close, might move
 More grief to hide than hate to utter love.<sup>o</sup>
 Come. Exeunt.

[SCENE ii: A room in the castle.]

Flourish. Enter KING and QUEEN, ROSENCRANTZ, and GUILDENSTERN [with others].

KING: Welcome, dear Rosencrantz and Guildenstern!
 Moreover that<sup>o</sup> we much did long to see you,
 The need we have to use you did provoke
 Our hasty sending. Something have you heard
 Of Hamlet's transformation; so call it, 5
 Sith<sup>o</sup> nor th' exterior nor the inward man Resembles that it was. What it should be,
 More than his father's death, that thus hath put him
 So much from th' understanding of himself,
 I cannot dream of: I entreat you both, 10
 That, being of so young days<sup>o</sup> brought up with him,
 And sith so neighbour'd to his youth and haviour,
 That you vouchsafe your rest<sup>o</sup> here in our court

101 property: Nature. fordoes: Destroys. 110 quoted: Observed. 111 beshrew my jealousy: Curse my suspicions. 113 cast beyond: Overshoot, miscalculate. 116–117 might . . . love: I.e., I might cause more grief to others by hiding the knowledge of Hamlet's love to Ophelia than hatred to me and mine by telling of it. Scene ii. 2 Moreover that: Besides the fact that. 6 Sith: Since. 11 of . . . days: From such early youth. 13 vouchsafe your rest: Please to stay.

- Some little time: so by your companies
 To draw him on to pleasures, and to gather, 15
 So much as from occasion you may glean,
 Whether aught, to us unknown, afflicts him thus,
 That, open'd, lies within our remedy.
- QUEEN: Good gentlemen, he hath much talk'd of you;
 And sure I am two men there are not living 20
 To whom he more adheres. If it will please you
 To show us so much gentry° and good will
 As to expend your time with us awhile,
 For the supply and profit° of our hope,
 Your visitation shall receive such thanks 25
 As fits a king's remembrance.
- ROSENCRANTZ: Both your majesties
 Might, by the sovereign power you have of us,
 Put your dread pleasures more into command
 Than to entreaty.
- GUILDENSTERN: But we both obey,
 And here give up ourselves, in the full bent° 30
 To lay our service freely at your feet,
 To be commanded.
- KING: Thanks, Rosencrantz and gentle Guildenstern.
- QUEEN: Thanks, Guildenstern and gentle Rosencrantz:
 And I beseech you instantly to visit 35
 My too much changed son. Go, some of you,
 And bring these gentlemen where Hamlet is.
- GUILDENSTERN: Heavens make our presence and our practices Pleasant and helpful to him!
- QUEEN: Ay, amen!
- Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN [with some ATTENDANTS].*
- Enter POLONIUS.*
- POLONIUS: Th' ambassadors from Norway, my good lord,
 Are joyfully return'd. 40
- KING: Thou still hast been the father of good news.
- POLONIUS: Have I, my lord? I assure my good liege,
 I hold my duty, as I hold my soul,
 Both to my God and to my gracious king; 45
 And I do think, or else this brain of mine
 Hunts not the trail of policy so sure

22 gentry: Courtesy. 24 supply and profit: Aid and successful outcome. 30 in . . . bent: To the utmost degree of our mental capacity.

As it hath us'd to do, that I have found
 The very cause of Hamlet's lunacy.
 KING: O, speak of that; that do I long to hear. 50
 POLONIUS: Give first admittance to th' ambassadors;
 My news shall be the fruit to that great feast.
 KING: Thyself do grace to them, and bring them in. [Exit POLONIUS.]
 He tells me, my dear Gertrude, he hath found
 The head and source of all your son's distemper. 55
 QUEEN: I doubt<sup>o</sup> it is no other but the main;<sup>o</sup>
 His father's death, and our o'erhasty marriage.
 KING: Well, we shall sift him.
Enter AMBASSADORS [VOLTIMAND and CORNELIUS, with POLONIUS].
 Welcome, my good friends!
 Say, Voltimand, what from our brother Norway?
 VOLTIMAND: Most fair return of greetings and desires. 60
 Upon our first, he sent out to suppress
 His nephew's levies; which to him appear'd
 To be a preparation 'gainst the Polack;
 But, better look'd into, he truly found
 It was against your highness: whereat griev'd,
 That so his sickness, age and impotence 65
 Was falsely borne in hand,<sup>o</sup> sends out arrests
 On Fortinbras; which he, in brief, obeys;
 Receives rebuke from Norway, and in fine<sup>o</sup>
 Makes vow before his uncle never more 70
 To give th' assay<sup>o</sup> of arms against your majesty.
 Whereon old Norway, overcome with joy,
 Gives him three score thousand crowns in annual fee,
 And his commission to employ those soldiers,
 So levied as before, against the Polack:
 With an entreaty, herein further shown, 75
 That it might please you to give quiet pass
 Through your dominions for this enterprise,
 On such regards of safety and allowance<sup>o</sup>
 As therein are set down. [Giving a paper.]
 KING: It likes<sup>o</sup> us well; 80
 And at our more consider'd<sup>o</sup> time we'll read, Answer, and think upon this business.

56 doubt: Fear. main: Chief point, principal concern. 67 borne in hand: Deluded. 69 in fine: In the end. 71 assay: Assault, trial (of arms). 79 safety and allowance: Pledges of safety to the country and terms of permission for the troops to pass. 80 likes: Pleases. 81 consider'd: Suitable for deliberation.

- Meantime we thank you for your well-took labour:
 Go to your rest; at night we'll feast together:
 Most welcome home! Exeunt AMBASSADORS.
- POLONIUS: This business is well ended. 85
 My liege, and madam, to expostulate
 What majesty should be, what duty is,
 Why day is day, night night, and time is time,
 Were nothing but to waste night, day and time.
 Therefore, since brevity is the soul of wit,<sup>90</sup> 90
 And tediousness the limbs and outward flourishes,<sup>90</sup>
 I will be brief: your noble son is mad:
 Mad call I it; for, to define true madness,
 What is 't but to be nothing else but mad?
 But let that go.
- QUEEN: More matter, with less art. 95
- POLONIUS: Madam, I swear I use no art at all.
 That he is mad, 'tis true: 'tis true 'tis pity;
 And pity 'tis 'tis true: a foolish figure;<sup>90</sup>
 But farewell it, for I will use no art.
 Mad let us grant him, then: and now remains 100
 That we find out the cause of this effect,
 Or rather say, the cause of this defect,
 For this effect defective comes by cause:
 Thus it remains, and the remainder thus.
 Perpend.<sup>90</sup> 105
 I have a daughter—have while she is mine—
 Who, in her duty and obedience, mark, Hath given me this: now gather, and surmise. [Reads the letter.] “To the celestial and my soul's idol,
 the most beautified Ophelia,”— 110
 That's an ill phrase, a vile phrase; “beautified” is a vile phrase: but you shall hear.
 Thus: [Reads.]
 “In her excellent white bosom, these, & c.”
- QUEEN: Came this from Hamlet to her?
- POLONIUS: Good madam, stay awhile; I will be faithful. [Reads.] 115 “Doubt thou the stars are fire;
 Doubt that the sun doth move;
 Doubt truth to be a liar;
 But never doubt I love.
 “O dear Ophelia, I am ill at these numbers;<sup>90</sup> I have not art to reckon<sup>90</sup> 120

90 wit: Sound sense or judgment. 91 flourishes: Ostentation, embellishments. 98 figure: Figure of speech. 105 Perpend: Consider. 120 ill . . . numbers: Unskilled at writing verses. reckon: Number metrically, scan.

my groans: but that I love thee best, O most best, believe it. Adieu.

“Thine evermore, most dear lady, whilst this machine<sup>o</sup> is to him, HAMLET.”

This, in obedience, hath my daughter shown me,

As they fell out<sup>o</sup> by time, by means<sup>o</sup> and place,

All given to mine ear.

KING: But how hath she Receiv'd his love?

POLONIUS: What do you think of me?

KING: As of a man faithful and honourable.

POLONIUS: I would fain prove so. But what might you think,

130

When I had seen this hot love on the wing—

As I perceiv'd it, I must tell you that,

Before my daughter told me—what might you,

Or my dear majesty your queen here, think,

If I had play'd the desk or table-book,<sup>o</sup>

Or given my heart a winking,<sup>o</sup> mute and dumb,

Or look'd upon this love with idle sight;

What might you think? No, I went round to work,

And my young mistress thus I did bespeak:<sup>o</sup>

140

This must not be”: and then I prescripts gave her,

That she should lock herself from his resort,

Admit no messengers, receive no tokens.

Which done, she took the fruits of my advice;

And he, repelled—a short tale to make—145

Fell into a sadness, then into a fast,

Thence to a watch,<sup>o</sup> thence into a weakness,

Thence to a lightness,<sup>o</sup> and, by this declension,<sup>o</sup>

Into the madness wherein now he raves,

And all we mourn for.

KING: Do you think 'tis this?

150

QUEEN: It may be, very like.

POLONIUS: Hath there been such a time—I would fain know that—

That I have positively said “'Tis so,”

When it prov'd otherwise?

KING: Not that I know.

122 machine: Bodily frame. 125 more above: Moreover. 126 fell out: Occurred. means: Opportunities (of access). 135 play'd . . . table-book: I.e., remained shut up, concealed this information. 136 given . . . winking: Given my heart a signal to keep silent. 139 bespeak: Address. 140 out . . . star: Above thee in position. 147 watch: State of sleeplessness. 148 lightness: Lightheadedness. declension: Decline, deterioration.

POLONIUS [pointing to his head and shoulder]: Take this from this, if this be otherwise:

If circumstances lead me, I will find
Where truth is hid, though it were hid indeed
Within the centre.<sup>o</sup>

KING: How may we try it further?

POLONIUS: You know, sometimes he walks four hours together
Here in the lobby.

QUEEN: So he does indeed.

160

POLONIUS: At such a time I'll loose my daughter to him:

Be you and I behind an arras<sup>o</sup> then;
Mark the encounter: if he love her not
And be not from his reason fall'n thereon,<sup>o</sup>
Let me be no assistant for a state,
But keep a farm and carters.

KING: We will try it.

Enter HAMLET [reading on a book].

QUEEN: But, look, where sadly the poor wretch comes reading.

POLONIUS: Away, I do beseech you both, away:

Exeunt KING and QUEEN [with ATTENDANTS].

I'll board<sup>o</sup> him presently. O, give me leave.
How does my good Lord Hamlet?

170

HAMLET: Well, God-a-mercy.

POLONIUS: Do you know me, my lord?

HAMLET: Excellent well; you are a fishmonger.<sup>o</sup>

POLONIUS: Not I, my lord.

HAMLET: Then I would you were so honest a man.

175

POLONIUS: Honest, my lord!

HAMLET: Ay, sir; to be honest, as this world goes, is to be one man picked out of ten thousand.

POLONIUS: That's very true, my lord.

HAMLET: For if the sun breed maggots in a dead dog, being a good kissing carrion,<sup>o</sup>—Have you a daughter?

POLONIUS: I have, my lord.

HAMLET: Let her not walk i' the sun:<sup>o</sup> conception<sup>o</sup> is a blessing; but as your daughter may conceive—Friend, look to 't.

158 centre: Middle point of the earth. 162 arras: Hanging, tapestry. 164 thereon: On that account. 169 board: Accost. 173 fishmonger: An opprobrious expression meaning “bawd,” “procurer.” 180–181 good kissing carrion: I.e., a good piece of flesh for kissing (?). 183 i' the sun: In the sunshine of princely favors. conception: Quibble on “understanding” and “pregnancy.”

POLONIUS [aside]: How say you by<sup>o</sup> that? Still harping on my daughter: yet he knew me not at first; 'a said I was a fishmonger: 'a is far gone, far gone: and truly in my youth I suffered much extremity for love; very near this. I'll speak to him again.
What do you read, my lord?

HAMLET: Words, words, words.

POLONIUS: What is the matter,<sup>o</sup> my lord? 190

HAMLET: Between who?<sup>o</sup>

POLONIUS: I mean, the matter that you read, my lord.

HAMLET: Slanders, sir: for the satirical rogue says here that old men have grey beards, that their faces are wrinkled, their eyes purging<sup>o</sup> thick amber and plum-tree gum and that they have a plentiful lack of wit, together with most weak hams: 195 all which, sir, though I most powerfully and potently believe, yet I hold it not honesty<sup>o</sup> to have it thus set down, for yourself, sir, should be old as I am, if like a crab you could go backward.

POLONIUS [aside]: Though this be madness, yet there is method in 't.—Will you walk out of the air, my lord? 200

HAMLET: Into my grave.

POLONIUS: Indeed, that's out of the air. [Aside.] How pregnant sometimes his replies are! a happiness<sup>o</sup> that often madness hits on, which reason and sanity could not so prosperously<sup>o</sup> be delivered of. I will leave him, and suddenly contrive the means of meeting between him and my daughter.—My honourable lord, I will 205 most humbly take my leave of you.

HAMLET: You cannot, sir, take from me any thing that I will more willingly part withal: except my life, except my life, except my life.

Enter GUILDENSTERN and ROSENCRANTZ.

POLONIUS: Fare you well, my lord.

HAMLET: These tedious old fools! 210

POLONIUS: You go to seek the Lord Hamlet; there he is.

ROSENCRANTZ [to POLONIUS]: God save you, sir! [Exit POLONIUS.]

GUILDENSTERN: My honoured lord!

ROSENCRANTZ: My most dear lord!

HAMLET: My excellent good friends! How dost thou, Guildenstern? Ah, Rosencrantz! 215
Good lads, how do ye both?

ROSENCRANTZ: As the indifferent<sup>o</sup> children of the earth.

GUILDENSTERN: Happy, in that we are not over-happy;

On Fortune's cap we are not the very button.

HAMLET: Nor the soles of her shoe? 220

ROSENCRANTZ: Neither, my lord.

---

185 by: Concerning. 190 matter: Substance. 191 Between who: Hamlet deliberately takes matter as meaning "basis of dispute." 194 purging: discharging. 197 honesty: Decency. 203 happiness: Felicity of expression. 204 prosperously: Successfully. 217 indifferent: Ordinary.

- HAMLET: Then you live about her waist, or in the middle of her favours?
 GUILDENSTERN: 'Faith, her privates<sup>o</sup> we.
 HAMLET: In the secret parts of Fortune? O, most true; she is a strumpet. What's the news? 225
 ROSENCRANTZ: None, my lord, but that the world's grown honest.
 HAMLET: Then is doomsday near: but your news is not true. Let me question more in particular: what have you, my good friends, deserved at the hands of Fortune, that she sends you to prison hither?
 GUILDENSTERN: Prison, my lord! 230
 HAMLET: Denmark's a prison.
 ROSENCRANTZ: Then is the world one.
 HAMLET: A goodly one; in which there are many confines,<sup>o</sup> wards and dungeons, Denmark being one o' the worst.
 ROSENCRANTZ: We think not so, my lord. 235
 HAMLET: Why, then, 'tis none to you; for there is nothing either good or bad, but thinking makes it so: to me it is a prison.
 ROSENCRANTZ: Why then, your ambition makes it one; 'tis too narrow for your mind.
 HAMLET: O God, I could be bounded in a nutshell and count myself a king of infinite space, were it not that I have bad dreams. 240
 GUILDENSTERN: Which dreams indeed are ambition, for the very substance of the ambitious<sup>o</sup> is merely the shadow of a dream.
 HAMLET: A dream itself is but a shadow.
 ROSENCRANTZ: Truly, and I hold ambition of so airy and light a quality that it is but a shadow's shadow. 245
 HAMLET: Then are our beggars bodies, and our monarchs and outstretched heroes the beggars' shadows. Shall we to the court? for, by my fay,<sup>o</sup> I cannot reason.<sup>o</sup>
 ROSENCRANTZ: }
 GUILDENSTERN: } We'll wait upon<sup>o</sup> you.
 HAMLET: No such matter: I will not sort<sup>o</sup> you with the rest of my servants, for, to speak to you like an honest man, I am most dreadfully attended.<sup>o</sup> But, in the beaten way of friendship,<sup>o</sup> what make you at Elsinore? 250
 ROSENCRANTZ: To visit you, my lord: no other occasion.
 HAMLET: Beggar that I am, I am ever poor in thanks; but I thank you: and sure, dear friends, my thanks are too dear a<sup>o</sup> halfpenny. Were you not sent for? Is it your own inclining? Is it a free visitation? Come, come, deal justly with me: come, come; nay, speak. 255
 GUILDENSTERN: What should we say, my lord?

223 privates: I.e., ordinary men (sexual pun on private parts). 233 confines: Places of confinement. 242–243 very . . . ambitious: That seemingly most substantial thing which the ambitious pursue. 248 fay: Faith. reason: Argue. 249 wait upon: Accompany. 250 sort: Class. 251 dreadfully attended: Poorly provided with servants. 251–252 in the . . . friendship: As a matter of course among friends. 255 a: I.e., at a.

HAMLET: Why, any thing, but to the purpose. You were sent for; and there is a kind of confession in your looks which your modesties have not craft enough to colour: 260
I know the good king and queen have sent for you.

ROSENCRANTZ: To what end, my lord?

HAMLET: That you must teach me. But let me conjure° you, by the rights of our fellowship, by the consonancy of our youth,° by the obligation of our ever- 265 preserved love, and by what more dear a better proposer° could charge you withal, be even and direct with me, whether you were sent for, or no?

ROSENCRANTZ [aside to GUILDENSTERN]: What say you?

HAMLET [aside]: Nay, then, I have an eye of you.—If you love me, hold not off.

GUILDENSTERN: My lord, we were sent for.

HAMLET: I will tell you why; so shall my anticipation prevent your discovery,° 270 and your secrecy to the king and queen moult no feather. I have of late—but wherefore I know not—lost all my mirth, forgone all custom of exercises; and indeed it goes so heavily with my disposition that this goodly frame, the earth, seems to me a sterile promontory, this most excellent canopy, the air, look you, this brave o’erhanging firmament, this majestical roof fretted° with 275 golden fire, why, it appeareth nothing to me but a foul and pestilent congregation of vapours. What a piece of work is a man! how noble in reason! how infinite in faculties!° in form and moving how express° and admirable! in action how like an angel! in apprehension° how like a god! the beauty of the world! the paragon of animals! And yet, to me, what is this quintessence° of 280 dust? man delights not me: no, nor woman neither, though by your smiling you seem to say so.

ROSENCRANTZ: My lord, there was no such stuff in my thoughts.

HAMLET: Why did you laugh then, when I said “man delights not me”?

ROSENCRANTZ: To think, my lord, if you delight not in man, what lenten° entertain- 285 ment the players shall receive from you: we coted° them on the way; and hither are they coming, to offer you service.

HAMLET: He that plays the king shall be welcome; his majesty shall have tribute of me; the adventurous knight shall use his foil and target;° the lover shall not sigh gratis; the humorous man° shall end his part in peace; the clown shall make 290 those laugh whose lungs are tickle o’ the sere;° and the lady shall say her mind freely, or the blank verse shall halt for ’t.° What players are they?

263 conjure: Adjure, entreat. 264 consonancy of our youth: The fact that we are of the same age. 265 better proposer: One more skillful in finding proposals. 270 prevent your discovery: Forestall your disclosure. 275 fretted: Adorned. 278 faculties: Capacity. express: Well-framed (?), exact (?). 279 apprehension: Understanding. 280 quintessence: The fifth essence of ancient philosophy, supposed to be the substance of the heavenly bodies and to be latent in all things. 285 lenten: Meager. 286 coted: Overtook and passed beyond. 289 foil and target: Sword and shield. 290 humorous man: Actor who takes the part of the humor characters. 291 tickle o’ the sere: Easy on the trigger. 291–292 the lady . . . for ’t: The lady (fond of talking) shall have opportunity to talk, blank verse or no blank verse.

ROSENCRANTZ: Even those you were wont to take delight in, the tragedians of the city.

HAMLET: How chances it they travel? their residence,<sup>o</sup> both in reputation and profit, was better both ways. 295

ROSENCRANTZ: I think their inhibition<sup>o</sup> comes by the means of the late innovation.<sup>o</sup>

HAMLET: Do they hold the same estimation they did when I was in the city? are they so followed?

ROSENCRANTZ: No, indeed, are they not. 300

HAMLET: How<sup>o</sup> comes it? do they grow rusty?

ROSENCRANTZ: Nay, their endeavour keeps in the wonted pace: but there is, sir, an aery<sup>o</sup> of children, little eyases,<sup>o</sup> that cry out on the top of question,<sup>o</sup> and are most tyrannically<sup>o</sup> clapped for 't: these are now the fashion, and so berattle<sup>o</sup> the common stages<sup>o</sup>—so they call them—that many wearing rapiers<sup>o</sup> are afraid of goose-quills<sup>o</sup> and dare scarce come thither. 305

HAMLET: What, are they children? who maintains 'em? how are they escoted?<sup>o</sup> Will they pursue the quality<sup>o</sup> no longer than they can sing?<sup>o</sup> will they not say afterwards, if they should grow themselves to common<sup>o</sup> players—as it is most like, if their means are no better—their writers do them wrong, to make them exclaim against their own succession?<sup>o</sup> 310

ROSENCRANTZ: 'Faith, there has been much to do on both sides; and the nation holds it no sin to tarre<sup>o</sup> them to controversy: there was, for a while, no money bid for argument,<sup>o</sup> unless the poet and the player went to cuffs<sup>o</sup> in the question.<sup>o</sup>

HAMLET: Is't possible? 315

GUILDENSTERN: O, there has been much throwing about of brains.

HAMLET: Do the boys carry it away?<sup>o</sup>

ROSENCRANTZ: Ay, that they do, my lord; Hercules and his load<sup>o</sup> too.

HAMLET: It is not very strange; for my uncle is king of Denmark, and those that would make mows<sup>o</sup> at him while my father lived, give twenty, forty, fifty, a hundred 320

295 residence: Remaining in one place. 297 inhibition: Formal prohibition (from acting plays in the city or, possibly, at court). innovation: The new fashion in satirical plays performed by boy actors in the “private” theaters. 301–318 How . . . load: The passage is the famous one dealing with the War of the Theatres (1599–1602); namely, the rivalry between the children’s companies and the adult actors. 303 aery: Nest. eyases: Young hawks. cry . . . question: Speak in a high key dominating conversation; clamor forth the height of controversy; probably “excel”; perhaps intended to decry leaders of the dramatic profession. 304 tyrannically: Outrageously. berattle: Berate. 305 common stages: Public theaters. many wearing rapiers: Many men of fashion, who were afraid to patronize the common players for fear of being satirized by the poets who wrote for the children. 306 goose-quills: I.e., pens of satirists. 307 escoted: Maintained. 308 quality: Acting profession. no longer . . . sing: I.e., until their voices change. 309 common: Regular, adult. 311 succession: Future careers. 313 tarre: Set on (as dogs). 314 argument: Probably, plot for a play. went to cuffs: Came to blows. question: Controversy. 317 carry it away: Win the day. 318 Hercules . . . load: Regarded as an allusion to the sign of the Globe Theatre, which was Hercules bearing the world on his shoulder. 320 mows: Grimaces.

ducats° a-piece for his picture in little.° 'Sblood, there is something in this more than natural, if philosophy could find it out.

A flourish [of trumpets within].

GUILDENSTERN: There are the players.

HAMLET: Gentlemen, you are welcome to Elsinore. Your hands, come then: the appurtenance of welcome is fashion and ceremony: let me comply° with you in this garb,° lest my extent° to the players, which, I tell you, must show fairly outwards, should more appear like entertainment than yours. You are welcome: but my uncle-father and aunt-mother are deceived.

GUILDENSTERN: In what, my dear lord?

HAMLET: I am but mad north-north-west:° when the wind is southerly I know a hawk from a handsaw.°

Enter POLONIUS.

POLONIUS: Well be with you, gentlemen!

HAMLET: Hark you, Guildenstern; and you too: at each ear a hearer: that great baby you see there is not yet out of his swaddling-clouts.°

ROSENCRANTZ: Happily he is the second time come to them; for they say an old man is twice a child.

HAMLET: I will prophesy he comes to tell me of the players; mark it.—You say right, sir: o' Monday morning;° 'twas then indeed.

POLONIUS: My lord, I have news to tell you.

HAMLET: My lord, I have news to tell you. When Roscius° was an actor in Rome,— POLONIUS: The actors are come hither, my lord.

HAMLET: Buz, buz!°

POLONIUS: Upon my honour,—

HAMLET: Then came each actor on his ass,—

POLONIUS: The best actors in the world, either for tragedy, comedy, history, pastoral, pastoral-comical, historical-pastoral, tragical-historical, tragical-comical-historical-pastoral, scene individable,° or poem unlimited:° Seneca° cannot be too heavy, nor Plautus° too light. For the law of writ and the liberty,° these are the only men.

321 ducats: Gold coins worth 9 shillings and 4 pence. in little: In miniature. 325 comply: Observe the formalities of courtesy. 326 garb: Manner. extent: Showing of kindness. 330 I am . . . north-north-west: I am only partly mad, i.e., in only one point of the compass. 331 handsaw: A proposed reading of hernshaw would mean “heron”; handsaw may be an early corruption of hernshaw. Another view regards hawk as the variant of hack, a tool of the pickax type, and handsaw as a saw operated by hand. 334 swaddling-clouts: Cloths in which to wrap a newborn baby. 338 o' Monday morning: Said to mislead Polonius. 340 Roscus: A famous Roman actor. 342 Buz, buz: An interjection used at Oxford to denote stale news. 347 scene indivisible: A play observing the unity of place. poem unlimited: A play disregarding the unities of time and place. Seneca: Writer of Latin tragedies, model of early Elizabethan writers of tragedy. 348 Plautus: Writer of Latin comedy. law . . . liberty: Pieces written according to rules and without rules, i.e., “classical” and “romantic” dramas.

HAMLET: O Jephthah, judge of Israel,<sup>o</sup> what a treasure hadst thou! 350

POLONIUS: What a treasure had he, my lord?

HAMLET: Why,

“One fair daughter, and no more,
The which he loved passing well.”

POLONIUS [aside]: Still on my daughter. 355

HAMLET: Am I not i’ the right, old Jephthah?

POLONIUS: If you call me Jephthah, my lord, I have a daughter that I love passing<sup>o</sup> well.

HAMLET: Nay, that follows not.

POLONIUS: What follows, then, my lord? 360

HAMLET: Why,

“As by lot, God wot,”
and then, you know,
“It came to pass, as most like<sup>o</sup> it was,” — the first row<sup>o</sup> of the pious chanson<sup>o</sup> will show you more; for look, where my abridgement comes.<sup>o</sup> 365

Enter the PLAYERS.

You are welcome, masters; welcome, all. I am glad to see thee well. Welcome, good friends. O, old friend! why, thy face is valanced<sup>o</sup> since I saw thee last: comest thou to beard me in Denmark? What, my young lady and mistress! By’r lady, your ladyship is nearer to heaven than when I saw you last, by the altitude of a 370
chopine.<sup>o</sup> Pray God, your voice, like a piece of uncurrent<sup>o</sup> gold, be not cracked within the ring.<sup>o</sup> Masters, you are all welcome. We’ll e’en to ’t like French falcon-ers, fly at any thing we see: we’ll have a speech straight: come, give us a taste of your quality; come, a passionate speech.

FIRST PLAYER: What speech, my good lord? 375

HAMLET: I heard thee speak me a speech once, but it was never acted; or, if it was, not above once; for the play, I remember, pleased not the million; ’twas caviary to the general:<sup>o</sup> but it was—as I received it, and others, whose judgements in such matters cried in the top of<sup>o</sup> mine—an excellent play, well digested in the scenes, set down with as much modesty as cunning.<sup>o</sup> I remember, one said there were 380 no sallets<sup>o</sup> in the lines to make the matter savoury, nor no matter in the phrase

350 Jephthah . . . Israel: Jephthah had to sacrifice his daughter; see Judges II. 357 passing: Surpassingly. 364 like: Probable. 365 row: Stanza. chanson: Ballad. 366 abridgement comes: Opportunity comes for cutting short the conversation. 368 valanced: Fringed (with a beard). 371 chopine: Kind of shoe raised by the thickness of the heel; worn in Italy, particularly at Venice. uncurrent: Not passable as lawful coinage. 371–372 cracked within the ring: In the center of coins were rings enclosing the sovereign’s head; if the coin was cracked within this ring, it was unfit for currency. 377–378 caviary to the general: Not relished by the multitude. 379 cried in the top of: Spoke with greater authority than. 380 cunning: Skill. 381 sallets: Salads: here, spicy improprieties.

that might indict<sup>o</sup> the author of affectation; but called it an honest method, as wholesome as sweet, and by very much more handsome than fine.<sup>o</sup> One speech in 't I chiefly loved: 'twas Æneas' tale to Dido;<sup>o</sup> and thereabout of it especially, where he speaks of Priam's slaughter: if it live in your memory, begin at this line: 385

let me see, let me see—

"The rugged Pyrrhus,<sup>o</sup> like th' Hyrcanian beast,"<sup>o</sup>—

'tis not so:—it begins with Pyrrhus:—

"The rugged Pyrrhus, he whose sable arms,
Black as his purpose, did the night resemble 390

When he lay couched in the ominous horse,<sup>o</sup>

Hath now this dread and black complexion smear'd

With heraldry more dismal; head to foot

Now is he total gules;<sup>o</sup> horridly trick'd<sup>o</sup>

With blood of fathers, mothers, daughters, sons, 395

Bak'd and impasted<sup>o</sup> with the parching streets,

That lend a tyrannous and a damned light

To their lord's murder: roasted in wrath and fire,

And thus o'er-sized<sup>o</sup> with coagulate gore,

With eyes like carbuncles, the hellish Pyrrhus 400

Old grandsire Priam seeks."

So, proceed you.

POLONIUS: 'Fore God, my lord, well spoken, with good accent and good discretion.

FIRST PLAYER: "Anon he finds him

Striking too short at Greeks; his antique sword, 405

Rebellious to his arm, lies where it falls,

Repugnant<sup>o</sup> to command: unequal match'd,

Pyrrhus at Priam drives; in rage strikes wide;

But with the whiff and wind of his fell sword

Th' unnerved father falls. Then senseless Ilium,<sup>o</sup> 410

Seeming to feel this blow, with flaming top

Stoops to his base, and with a hideous crash

Takes prisoner Pyrrhus' ear: for, lo! his sword

Which was declining on the milky head

Of reverend Priam, seem'd i' th' air to stick: 415

382 indict: Convict. 382–383 as wholesome . . . fine: Its beauty was not that of elaborate ornament, but that of order and proportion. 384 Æneas' tale to Dido: The lines recited by the player are imitated from Marlowe and Nashe's Dido Queen of Carthage (II.i.214 ff.). They are written in such a way that the conventionality of the play within a play is raised above that of ordinary drama. 387 Pyrrhus. A Greek hero in the Trojan War. Hyrcanian beast: The tiger; see Virgil, Aeneid, IV.266. 391 ominous horse: Trojan horse. 394 gules: Red, a heraldic term. trick'd: Spotted, smeared. 396 impasted: Made into a paste. 399 o'er-sized: Covered as with size or glue. 407 Repugnant: Disobedient. 410 Then senseless Ilium: Insensate Troy.

So, as a painted tyrant,<sup>o</sup> Pyrrhus stood,
And like a neutral to his will and matter,<sup>o</sup>
Did nothing.

But, as we often see, against<sup>o</sup> some storm,
A silence in the heavens, the rack<sup>o</sup> stand still, 420

The bold winds speechless and the orb below
As hush as death, anon the dreadful thunder
Doth rend the region,<sup>o</sup> so, after Pyrrhus' pause, Aroused vengeance sets him new a-work;
And never did the Cyclops' hammers fall 425

On Mars's armour forg'd for proof eterne<sup>o</sup>
With less remorse than Pyrrhus' bleeding sword
Now falls on Priam.

Out, out, thou strumpet, Fortune! All you gods,
In general synod,<sup>o</sup> take away her power; 430
Break all the spokes and fellies<sup>o</sup> from her wheel,
And bowl the round nave<sup>o</sup> down the hill of heaven,
As low as to the fiends!"

POLONIUS: This is too long.

HAMLET: It shall to the barber's, with your beard. Prithee, say on: he's for a jig<sup>o</sup> or a 435 tale of bawdry,<sup>o</sup> or he sleeps: say on: come to Hecuba.<sup>o</sup>

FIRST PLAYER: "But who, ah woe! had seen the mobled<sup>o</sup> queen —"

HAMLET: "The mobled queen?"

POLONIUS: That's good; "mobled queen" is good.

FIRST PLAYER: "Run barefoot up and down, threat'ning the flames 440
With bisson rheum;<sup>o</sup> a clout<sup>o</sup> upon that head

Where late the diadem stood, and for a robe,
About her lank and all o'er-teemed<sup>o</sup> loins,
A blanket, in the alarm of fear caught up;
Who this had seen, with tongue in venom steep'd, 445
'Gainst Fortune's state would treason have pronounc'd:<sup>o</sup>

But if the gods themselves did see her then
When she saw Pyrrhus make malicious sport
In mincing with his sword her husband's limbs,
The instant burst of clamour that she made, 450
Unless things mortal move them not at all,

416 painted tyrant: Tyrant in a picture. 417 matter: Task. 419 against: Before. 420 rack: Mass of clouds. 423 region: Assembly. 426 proof eterne: External resistance to assault. 430 synod: Assembly. 431 fellies: Pieces of wood forming the rim of a wheel. 432 nave: Hub. 435 jig: Comic performance given at the end or in an interval of a play. 436 bawdry: Indecency. Hecuba: Wife of Priam, king of Troy. 437 mobled: Muffled. 441 bisson rheum: Blinding tears. clout: Piece of cloth. 443 o'er-teemed: Worn out with bearing children. 446 pronounc'd: Proclaimed.

Would have made milch<sup>o</sup> the burning eyes of heaven,
And passion in the gods.”

POLONIUS: Look, whē'r he has not turned<sup>o</sup> his colour and has tears in 's eyes. Prithee,
no more. 455

HAMLET: 'Tis well; I'll have thee speak out the rest soon. Good my lord, will you see the players well bestowed? Do you hear, let them be well used; for they are the abstract<sup>o</sup> and brief chronicles of the time: after your death you were better have a bad epitaph than their ill report while you live.

POLONIUS: My lord, I will use them according to their desert. 460

HAMLET: God's bodykins,<sup>o</sup> man, much better: use every man after his desert, and who shall 'scape whipping? Use them after your own honour and dignity: the less they deserve, the more merit is in your bounty. Take them in.

POLONIUS: Come, sirs.

HAMLET: Follow him, friends: we'll hear a play tomorrow. [Aside to First Player.] 465 Dost thou hear me, old friend; can you play the Murder of Gonzago?

FIRST PLAYER: Ay, my lord.

HAMLET: We'll ha 't to-morrow night. You could, for a need, study a speech of some dozen or sixteen lines,<sup>o</sup> which I would set down and insert in 't, could you not?

FIRST PLAYER: Ay, my lord. 470

HAMLET: Very well. Follow that lord; and look you mock him not.—My good friends, I'll leave you till night: you are welcome to Elsinore.

Exeunt POLONIUS and PLAYERS.

ROSENCRANTZ: Good my lord! Exeunt [ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN].

HAMLET: Ay, so, God bye to you.—Now I am alone.

O, what a rogue and peasant<sup>o</sup> slave am I! 475

Is it not monstrous that this player here,

But in a fiction, in a dream of passion,

Could force his soul so to his own conceit

That from her working all his visage wann'd,<sup>o</sup>

Tears in his eyes, distraction in 's aspect, 480

A broken voice, and his whole function suiting

With forms to his conceit?<sup>o</sup> and all for nothing!

For Hecuba!

What's Hecuba to him, or he to Hecuba,

That he should weep for her? What would he do, 485

Had he the motive and the cue for passion

That I have? He would drown the stage with tears

And cleave the general ear with horrid speech,

452 milch: Moist with tears. 454 turned: Changed. 458 abstract: Summary account. 461 bodykins: Diminutive form of the oath “by God's body.” 469 dozen or sixteen lines: Critics have amused themselves by trying to locate Hamlet's lines. Lucianus's speech III.ii.229–234 is the best guess. 475 peasant: Base. 479 wann'd: Grew pale. 481–482 his whole . . . conceit: His whole being responded with forms to suit his thought.

Make mad the guilty and appall the free,
 Confound the ignorant, and amaze indeed 490
 The very faculties of eyes and ears.
 Yet I,
 A dull and muddy-mettled<sup>o</sup> rascal, peak,<sup>o</sup>
 Like John-a-dreams,<sup>o</sup> unpregnant of<sup>o</sup> my cause,
 And can say nothing; no, not for a king. 495
 Upon whose property<sup>o</sup> and most dear life
 A damn'd defeat was made. Am I a coward?
 Who calls me villain? breaks my pate across?
 Plucks off my beard, and blows it in my face?
 Tweaks me by the nose? gives me the lie i' th' throat, 500
 As deep as to the lungs? who does me this?
 Ha!
 'Swounds, I should take it: for it cannot be
 But I am pigeon-liver'd<sup>o</sup> and lack gall
 To make oppression bitter, or ere this 505
 I should have fatted all the region kites<sup>o</sup>
 With this slave's offal: bloody, bawdy villain!
 Remorseless, treacherous, lecherous, kindless<sup>o</sup> villain!
 O, vengeance!
 Why, what an ass am I! This is most brave, 510
 That I, the son of a dear father murder'd,
 Prompted to my revenge by heaven and hell,
 Must, like a whore, unpack my heart with words,
 And fall a-cursing, like a very drab,<sup>o</sup>
 A stallion!<sup>o</sup> 515
 Fie upon 't! foh! About,<sup>o</sup> my brains! Hum, I have heard
 That guilty creatures sitting at a play
 Have by the very cunning of the scene
 Been struck so to the soul that presently
 They have proclaim'd their malefactions; 520
 For murder, though it have no tongue, will speak
 With most miraculous organ. I'll have these players Play something like the murder of my father
 Before mine uncle: I'll observe his looks:
 I'll tent<sup>o</sup> him to the quick: if 'a do blench,<sup>o</sup> 525

493 muddy-mettled: Dull-spirited. peak: Mope, pine. 494 John-a-dreams: An expression occurring elsewhere in Elizabethan literature to indicate a dreamer. unpregnant of: Not quickened by. 496 property: Proprietorship (of crown and life). 504 pigeon-liver'd: The pigeon was supposed to secrete no gall; if Hamlet, so he says, had had gall, he would have felt the bitterness of oppression, and avenged it. 506 region kites: Kites of the air. 508 kindless: Unnatural. 514 drab: Prostitute. 515 stallion: Prostitute (male or female). 516 About: About it, or turn thou right about. 525 tent: Probe. blench: Quail, flinch.

I know my course. The spirit that I have seen
 May be the devil:° and the devil hath power
 T' assume a pleasing shape; yea, and perhaps
 Out of my weakness and my melancholy,
 As he is very potent with such spirits,° 530
 Abuses me to damn me: I'll have grounds
 More relative° than this:° the play's the thing
 Wherein I'll catch the conscience of the king. Exit.

[ACT III]

SCENE i: A room in the castle.Enter KING, QUEEN, POLONIUS, OPHELIA, ROSENCRANTZ, GUILDENSTERN, LORDS.

KING: And can you, by no drift of conference,°
 Get from him why he puts on this confusion,
 Grating so harshly all his days of quiet
 With turbulent and dangerous lunacy?
 ROSENCRANTZ: He does confess he feels himself distracted; 5
 But from what cause 'a will by no means speak.
 GUILDENSTERN: Nor do we find him forward° to be sounded,
 But, with a crafty madness, keeps aloof,
 When we would bring him on to some confession
 Of his true state.
 QUEEN: Did he receive you well? 10
 ROSENCRANTZ: Most like a gentleman.
 GUILDENSTERN: But with much forcing of his disposition.°
 ROSENCRANTZ: Niggard of question;° but, of our demands,
 Most free in his reply.
 QUEEN: Did you assay° him 15
 To any pastime?
 ROSENCRANTZ: Madam, it so fell out, that certain players
 We o'er-raught° on the way: of these we told him;
 And there did seem in him a kind of joy
 To hear of it: they are here about the court,
 And, as I think, they have already order 20
 This night to play before him.
 POLONIUS: 'Tis most true:

527 May be the devil: Hamlet's suspicion is properly grounded in the belief of the time. 530 spirits: Humors. 532 relative: Closely related, definite. this: I.e., the ghost's story. Act III, Scene i. 1 drift of conference: Device of conversation. 7 forward: Willing. 12 forcing of his disposition: I.e., against his will. 13 Niggard of question: Sparing of conversation. 14 assay: Try to win. 17 o'er-raught: Overtook.

- And he beseech'd me to entreat your majesties
To hear and see the matter.
- KING: With all my heart; and it doth much content me
To hear him so inclin'd. 25
Good gentlemen, give him a further edge,<sup>o</sup>
And drive his purpose into these delights.
- ROSENCRANTZ: We shall, my lord. Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.
- KING: Sweet Gertrude, leave us too;
For we have closely<sup>o</sup> sent for Hamlet hither,
That he, as 'twere by accident, may here 30
Affront<sup>o</sup> Ophelia:
Her father and myself, lawful espials,<sup>o</sup>
Will so bestow ourselves that, seeing, unseen,
We may of their encounter frankly judge,
And gather by him, as he is behav'd, 35
If 't be th' affliction of his love or no
That thus he suffers for.
- QUEEN: I shall obey you.
And for your part, Ophelia, I do wish
That your good beauties be the happy cause
Of Hamlet's wildness:<sup>o</sup> so shall I hope your virtues 40
Will bring him to his wonted way again,
To both your honours.
- OPHELIA: Madam, I wish it may. [Exit QUEEN.]
- POLONIUS: Ophelia, walk you here. Gracious,<sup>o</sup> so please you,
We will bestow ourselves. [To OPHELIA.] Read on this book;
That show of such an exercise<sup>o</sup> may colour<sup>o</sup> 45
Your loneliness. We are oft to blame in this,—
'Tis too much prov'd—that with devotion's visage
And pious action we do sugar o'er
The devil himself.
- KING: [aside] O, 'tis too true!
How smart a lash that speech doth give my conscience! 50
The harlot's cheek, beautied with plast'ring art,
Is not more ugly to<sup>o</sup> the thing<sup>o</sup> that helps it
Than is my deed to my most painted word:
O heavy burthen!
- POLONIUS: I hear him coming: let's withdraw, my lord. 55
[Exeunt KING and POLONIUS.]

26 edge: Incitement. 29 closely: Secretly. 31 Affront: Confront. 32 lawful espials: Legitimate spies. 40 wildness: Madness. 43 Gracious: Your grace (addressed to the king). 45 exercise: Act of devotion (the book she reads is one of devotion). colour: Give a plausible appearance to. 52 to: Compared to. thing: I.e., the cosmetic.

Enter HAMLET.

HAMLET: To be, or not to be: that is the question:

Whether 'tis nobler in the mind to suffer
 The slings and arrows of outrageous fortune,
 Or to take arms against a sea° of troubles,
 And by opposing end them? To die: to sleep;
 No more; and by a sleep to say we end 60
 The heart-ache and the thousand natural shocks
 That flesh is heir to, 'tis a consummation
 Devoutly to be wish'd. To die, to sleep;
 To sleep: perchance to dream: ay, there's the rub;
 For in that sleep of death what dreams may come 65
 When we have shuffled° off this mortal coil,°
 Must give us pause: there's the respect°
 That makes calamity of so long life;°
 For who would bear the whips and scorns of time,° 70
 Th' oppressor's wrong, the proud man's contumely,°
 The pangs of despis'd° love, the law's delay,
 The insolence of office° and the spurns°
 That patient merit of th' unworthy takes,
 When he himself might his quietus° make 75
 With a bare bodkin?° who would fardels° bear,
 To grunt and sweat under a weary life,
 But that the dread of something after death,
 The undiscover'd° country from whose bourn°
 No traveller returns, puzzles the will 80
 And makes us rather bear those ills we have Than fly to others that we know not of?
 Thus conscience° does make cowards of us all;
 And thus the native hue° of resolution
 Is sicklied o'er° with the pale cast° of thought, 85
 And enterprises of great pitch° and moment°

59 sea: The mixed metaphor of this speech has often been commented on; a later emendation siege has sometimes been spoken on the stage. 67 shuffled: Sloughed, cast. coil: Usually means "turmoil"; here, possibly "body" (conceived of as wound about the soul like rope); clay, soil, veil, have been suggested as emendations. 68 respect: Consideration. 69 of . . . life: So long-lived. 70 time: The world. 71 contumely: rudeness arising from arrogance or insolence; contemptuous treatment.—Eds. 72 despis'd: Rejected. 73 office: Office-holders. spurns: Insults. 75 quietus: Acquittance; here, death. 76 bare bodkin: Mere dagger; bare is sometimes understood as "unsheathed." fardels: Burdens. 79 undiscover'd: undisclosed, unrevealed.—Eds. bound: Boundary. 83 conscience: Probably, inhibition by the faculty of reason restraining the will from doing wrong. 84 native hue: Natural color; metaphor derived from the color of the face. 85 sicklied o'er: Given a sickly tinge. cast: Shade of color. 86 pitch: Height (as of a falcon's flight). moment: Importance.

- With this regard° their currents° turn awry,
 And lose the name of action — Soft you now!
 The fair Ophelia! Nymph, in thy orisons°
 Be all my sins rememb'ed.
- OPHELIA: Good my lord, 90
 How does your honour for this many a day?
- HAMLET: I humbly thank you; well, well, well.
- OPHELIA: My lord, I have remembrances of yours,
 That I have longed long to re-deliver;
 I pray you, now receive them.
- HAMLET: No, not I; 95
 I never gave you aught.
- OPHELIA: My honour'd lord, you know right well you did;
 And, with them, words of so sweet breath compos'd
 As made the things more rich: their perfume lost,
 Take these again; for to the noble mind 100
 Rich gifts wax poor when givers prove unkind.
 There, my lord.
- HAMLET: Ha, ha! are you honest°
- OPHELIA: My lord?
- HAMLET: Are you fair? 105
- OPHELIA: What means your lordship?
- HAMLET: That if you be honest and fair, your honesty° should admit no discourse to° your beauty.
- OPHELIA: Could beauty, my lord, have better commerce° than with honesty?
- HAMLET: Ay, truly; for the power of beauty will sooner transform honesty from what 110 it is to a bawd than the force of honesty can translate beauty into his likeness:
 this was sometime a paradox, but now the time° gives it proof. I did love you once.
- OPHELIA: Indeed, my lord, you made me believe so.
- HAMLET: You should not have believed me; for virtue cannot so inoculate° our old 115 stock but we shall relish of it:° I loved you not.
- OPHELIA: I was the more deceived.
- HAMLET: Get thee to a nunnery: why wouldst thou be a breeder of sinners? I am myself indifferent honest;° but yet I could accuse me of such things that it were better my mother had not borne me: I am very proud, revengeful, ambitious, 120

87 regard: Respect, consideration. currents: Courses. 89 orisons: Prayers. 103–108 are you honest . . . beauty: Honest meaning “truthful” and “chaste” and fair meaning “just, honorable” (l. 105) and “beauty” (l. 108) are not mere quibbles; the speech has the irony of a double entendre. 107 your honesty: Your chastity. 107–108 discourse to: Familiar intercourse with. 109 commerce: Intercourse. 112 the time: The present age. 115 inoculate: Graft (metaphorical). 116 but . . . it: I.e., that we do not still have about us a taste of the old stock; i.e., retain our sinfulness. 119 indifferent honest: Moderately virtuous.

with more offences at my beck<sup>o</sup> than I have thoughts to put them in, imagination to give them shape, or time to act them in. What should such fellows as I do crawling between earth and heaven? We are arrant knaves, all; believe none of us. Go thy ways to a nunnery. Where's your father?

OPHELIA: At home, my lord. 125

HAMLET: Let the doors be shut upon him, that he may play the fool no where but in 's own house. Farewell.

OPHELIA: O, help him, you sweet heavens!

HAMLET: If thou dost marry, I'll give thee this plague for thy dowry: be thou as chaste as ice, as pure as snow, thou shalt not escape calumny. Get thee to a nunnery, go: farewell. Or, if thou wilt needs marry, marry a fool; for wise men know well enough what monsters<sup>o</sup> you make of them. To a nunnery, go, and quickly too. Farewell. 130

OPHELIA: O heavenly powers, restore him!

HAMLET: I have heard of your<sup>o</sup> paintings too, well enough; God hath given you one face, and you make yourselves another: you jig,<sup>o</sup> you amble, and you lisp; you nick-name God's creatures, and make your wantonness your ignorance.<sup>o</sup> Go to, I'll no more on 't; it hath made me mad. I say, we will have no more marriage: those that are married already, all but one,<sup>o</sup> shall live; the rest shall keep as they are. To a nunnery, go. Exit. 135 140

OPHELIA: O, what a noble mind is here o'er-thrown!

The courtier's, soldier's, scholar's, eye, tongue, sword;

Th' expectancy and rose<sup>o</sup> of the fair state,

The glass of fashion and the mould of form,<sup>o</sup>

Th' observ'd of all observers,<sup>o</sup> quite, quite down! 145

And I, of ladies most deject and wretched,

That suck'd the honey of his music vows,

Now see that noble and most sovereign reason,

Like sweet bells jangled, out of time and harsh;

That unmatch'd form and feature of blown<sup>o</sup> youth 150

Blasted with ecstasy:<sup>o</sup> O, woe is me, T' have seen what I have seen, see what I see!

Enter KING and POLONIUS.

KING: Love! his affections do not that way tend;

Nor what he spake, though it lack'd form a little,

121 beck: Command. 132 monsters: An allusion to the horns of a cuckold. 135 your: Indefinite use. 136 jig: Move with jerky motion; probably allusion to the jig, or song and dance, of the current stage. 137 make . . . ignorance: I.e., excuse your wantonness on the ground of your ignorance. 139 one: I.e., the king. 143 expectancy and rose: Source of hope. 144 The glass . . . form: The mirror of fashion and the pattern of courtly behavior. 145 observ'd . . . observers: I.e., the center of attention in the court. 150 blown: Blooming. 151 ecstasy: Madness.

- Was not like madness. There's something in his soul,
 O'er which his melancholy sits on brood;
 And I do doubt<sup>o</sup> the hatch and the disclose<sup>o</sup>
 Will be some danger: which for to prevent,
 I have in quick determination
 Thus set it down: he shall with speed to England,
 For the demand of our neglected tribute:
 Haply the seas and countries different
 With variable<sup>o</sup> objects shall expel
 This something-settled<sup>o</sup> matter in his heart, Whereon his brains still beating puts him thus
 From fashion of himself.<sup>o</sup> What think you on 't? 155
- POLONIUS: It shall do well: but yet do I believe
 The origin and commencement of his grief
 Sprung from neglected love. How now, Ophelia!
 You need not tell us what Lord Hamlet said;
 We heard it all. My lord, do as you please;
 But, if you hold it fit, after the play
 Let his queen mother all alone entreat him
 To show his grief: let her be round<sup>o</sup> with him;
 And I'll be plac'd, so please you, in the ear
 Of all their conference. If she find him not,
 To England send him, or confine him where Your wisdom best shall think. 160
- KING: It shall be so:
 Madness in great ones must not unwatch'd go. 165
- Exeunt.* 170

[SCENE ii: A hall in the castle.]

Enter HAMLET and three of the PLAYERS.

HAMLET: Speak the speech, I pray you, as I pronounced it to you, trippingly on the tongue: but if you mouth it, as many of your<sup>o</sup> players do, I had as lief the town-crier spoke my lines. Nor do not saw the air too much with your hand, thus, but use all gently; for in the very torrent, tempest, and, as I may say, whirlwind of your passion, you must acquire and beget a temperance that may give it smoothness. O, it offends me to the soul to hear a robustious<sup>o</sup> periwig-pated<sup>o</sup> fellow tear a passion to tatters, to very rags, to split the ears of the groundlings,<sup>o</sup> who for 5

157 doubt: Fear. disclose: Disclosure or revelation (by chipping of the shell). 163 variable: Various. 164 something-settled: Somewhat settled. 166 From . . . himself: Out of his natural manner. 174 round: Blunt. Scene ii. 2 your: Indefinite use. 6 robustious: Violent, boisterous. periwig-pated: Wearing a wig. 7 groundlings: Those who stood in the yard of the theater.

the most part are capable of° nothing but inexplicable° dumb-shows and noise:
I would have such a fellow whipped for o'er-doing Termagant;° it out-herods
Herod:° pray you, avoid it.

FIRST PLAYER: I warrant your honour.

HAMLET: Be not too tame neither, but let your own discretion be your tutor: suit the action to the word, the word to the action; with this special observance, that you o'er-step not the modesty of nature: for any thing so overdone is from the purpose of playing, whose end, both at the first and now, was and is, to hold, as 't were, the mirror up to nature; to show virtue her own feature, scorn her own image, and the very age and body of the time his form and pressure.° Now this overdone, or come tardy off,° though it make the unskilful laugh, cannot but make the judicious grieve; the censure of the which one° must in your allowance o'erweigh a whole theatre of others. O, there be players that I have seen play, and heard others praise, and that highly, not to speak it profanely, that, neither having the accent of Christians nor the gait of Christian, pagan, nor man, have so strutted and bellowed that I have thought some of nature's journeymen° had made men and not made them well, they imitated humanity so abominably.

FIRST PLAYER: I hope we have reformed that indifferently° with us, sir.

25

HAMLET: O, reform it altogether. And let those that play your clowns speak no more than is set down for them; for there be of° them that will themselves laugh, to set on some quantity of barren° spectators to laugh too; though, in the mean time, some necessary question of the play be then to be considered: that's villanous, and shows a most pitiful ambition in the fool that uses it. Go, make you ready.

[Exeunt PLAYERS.]

Enter POLONIUS, GUILDENSTERN, and ROSENCRANTZ.

How now, my lord! will the king hear this piece of work?

POLONIUS: And the queen too, and that presently.

HAMLET: Bid the players make haste.

[Exit POLONIUS.]

Will you two help to hasten them?

ROSENCRANTZ: }

GUILDENSTERN: }

We will, my lord.

Exeunt they two.

HAMLET:

What ho! Horatio!

35

8 capable of: Susceptible of being influenced by. inexplicable: Of no significance worth explaining. 9 Termagant: A god of the Saracens; a character in the St. Nicholas play, where one of his worshipers, leaving him in charge of goods, returns to find them stolen; whereupon he beats the god (or idol), which howls vociferously. 10 Herod: Herod of Jewry; a character in The Slaughter of the Innocents and other cycle plays. The part was played with great noise and fury. 17 pressure: Stamp, impressed character. 18 come tardy off: Inadequately done. 19 the censure . . . one: The judgment of even one of whom. 23 journeymen: Laborers not yet masters in their trade. 25 indifferently: Fairly, tolerably. 27 of: I.e., some among them. 28 barren: I.e., of wit.

Enter HORATIO.

HORATIO: Here, sweet lord, at your service.

HAMLET: Horatio, thou art e'en as just<sup>o</sup> a man
As e'er my conversation cop'd withal.

HORATIO: O, my dear lord, —

HAMLET: Nay, do not think I flatter;

For what advancement may I hope from thee 40

That no revenue hast but thy good spirits,

To feed and clothe thee? Why should the poor be flatter'd?

No, let the candied tongue lick absurd pomp,

And crook the pregnant<sup>o</sup> hinges of the knee

Where thrift<sup>o</sup> may follow fawning. Dost thou hear? 45

Since my dear soul was mistress of her choice

And could of men distinguish her election,

S' hath seal'd thee for herself; for thou hast been

As one, in suff'ring all, that suffers nothing,

A man that fortune's buffets and rewards 50

Hast ta'en with equal thanks: and blest are those Whose blood and judgement are so well commedled,

That they are not a pipe for fortune's finger

To sound what stop<sup>o</sup> she please. Give me that man

That is not passion's slave, and I will wear him 55

In my heart's core, ay, in my heart of heart,

As I do thee. — Something too much of this. —

There is a play to-night before the king;

One scene of it comes near the circumstance

Which I have told thee of my father's death: 60

I prithee, when thou seest that act afoot,

Even with the very comment of thy soul<sup>o</sup>

Observe my uncle: if his occulted<sup>o</sup> guilt

Do not itself unkennel in one speech,

It is a damned<sup>o</sup> ghost that we have seen, 65

And my imaginations are as foul

As Vulcan's stithy.<sup>o</sup> Give him heedful note;

For I mine eyes will rivet to his face,

And after we will both our judgements join

In censure of his seeming.<sup>o</sup>

HORATIO: Well, my lord: 70

37 just: Honest, honorable. 44 pregnant: Pliant. 45 thrift: Profit. 54 stop: Hole in a wind instrument for controlling the sound. 62 very . . . soul: Inward and sagacious criticism. 63 occulted: Hidden. 65 damned: In league with Satan. 67 stithy: Smithy, place of stiths (anvils). 70 censure . . . seeming: Judgment of his appearance or behavior.

If 'a steal aught the whilst this play is playing,
And 'scape detecting, I will pay the theft.

Enter trumpets and kettledrums, KING, QUEEN, POLONIUS, OPHELIA, [ROSENCRANTZ, GUILDENSTERN, and others].

HAMLET: They are coming to the play; I must be idle:° Get you a place.

KING: How fares our cousin Hamlet?

HAMLET: Excellent, i' faith; of the chameleon's dish:° I eat the air, promise-crammed: 75 you cannot feed capons so.

KING: I have nothing with° this answer, Hamlet; these words are not mine.°

HAMLET: No, nor mine now. [To POLONIUS.] My lord, you played once i' the university, you say?

POLONIUS: That did I, my lord; and was accounted a good actor. 80

HAMLET: What did you enact?

POLONIUS: I did enact Julius Cæsar: I was killed i' the Capitol; Brutus killed me.

HAMLET: It was a brute part of him to kill so capital a calf there. Be the players ready?

ROSENCRANTZ: Ay, my lord; they stay upon your patience.

QUEEN: Come hither, my dear Hamlet, sit by me. 85

HAMLET: No, good mother, here's metal more attractive.

POLONIUS [to the king]: O, ho! do you mark that?

HAMLET: Lady, shall I lie in your lap? [Lying down at OPHELIA's feet.]

OPHELIA: No, my lord.

HAMLET: I mean, my head upon your lap? 90

OPHELIA: Ay, my lord.

HAMLET: Do you think I meant country° matters?

OPHELIA: I think nothing, my lord.

HAMLET: That's a fair thought to lie between maids' legs.

OPHELIA: What is, my lord? 95

HAMLET: Nothing.

OPHELIA: You are merry, my lord.

HAMLET: Who, I?

OPHELIA: Ay, my lord.

HAMLET: O God, your only° jig-maker.° What should a man do but be merry? for, look 100 you, how cheerfully my mother looks, and my father died within's two hours.

OPHELIA: Nay, 'tis twice two months, my lord.

HAMLET: So long? Nay then, let the devil wear black, for I'll have a suit of sables.° O heavens! die two months ago, and not forgotten yet? Then there's hope a great

73 idle: Crazy, or not attending to anything serious. 75 chameleon's dish: Chameleons were supposed to feed on air. (Hamlet deliberately misinterprets the king's "fares" as "feeds.") 77 have . . . with: Make nothing of. are not mine: Do not respond to what I ask. 92 country: With a bawdy pun. 100 your only: Only your. jig-maker: Composer of jigs (song and dance). 103 suit of sables: Garments trimmed with the fur of the sable, with a quibble on sable meaning "black."

man's memory may outlive his life half a year: but, by 'r lady, 'a must build churches, then; or else shall 'a suffer not thinking on,<sup>o</sup> with the hobbyhorse, whose epitaph is "For, O, for, O, the hobbyhorse is forgot."<sup>o</sup> 105

The trumpets sound. Dumb show follows.

Enter a King and a Queen [very lovingly]; the Queen embracing him, and he her. [She kneels, and makes show of protestation unto him.] He takes her up, and declines his head upon her neck: he lies him down upon a bank of flowers: she, seeing him asleep, leaves him. Anon comes in another man, takes off his crown, kisses it, pours poison in the sleeper's ears, and leaves him. The Queen returns; finds the King dead, makes passionate action. The Poisoner, with some three or four come in again, seems to condole with her. The dead body is carried away. The Poisoner woos the Queen with gifts: she seems harsh awhile, but in the end accepts love. [Exeunt.]

OPHELIA: What means this, my lord?

OPHELIA: Belike this show imports the argument of the play. 110

Enter PROLOGUE.

HAMLET: We shall know by this fellow: the players cannot keep counsel; they'll tell all.

OPHELIA: Will 'a tell us what this show meant?

HAMLET: Ay, or any show that you'll show him: be not you ashamed to show, he'll not shame to tell you what it means. 115

OPHELIA: You are naught, you are naught:<sup>o</sup> I'll mark the play.

PROLOGUE: For us, and for our tragedy,

Here stooping<sup>o</sup> to your clemency,

We beg your hearing patiently. [Exit.]

HAMLET: Is this a prologue, or the posy<sup>o</sup> of a ring? 120

OPHELIA: 'Tis brief, my lord.

HAMLET: As woman's love.

Enter [two PLAYERS as] King and Queen.

PLAYER KING: Full thirty times hath Phoebus' cart gone round

Neptune's salt wash<sup>o</sup> and Tellus<sup>o</sup> orbed ground,

And thirty dozen moons with borrowed<sup>o</sup> sheen 125

About the world have times twelve thirties been,

Since love our hearts and Hymen<sup>o</sup> did our hands

Unite commutual<sup>o</sup> in most sacred bands.

106 suffer . . . on: Undergo oblivion. 107 "For . . . forgot": Verse of a song occurring also in Love's Labour's Lost, III.i.30. The hobbyhorse was a character in the Morris Dance. 109 miching mallecho: Sneaking mischief. 116 naught: Indecent. 118 stooping: Bowing. 120 posy: Motto. 124 salt wash: The sea. Tellus: Goddess of the earth (orbed ground). 125 borrowed: I.e., reflected. 127 Hymen: God of matrimony. 128 commutual: Mutually.

- PLAYER QUEEN: So many journeys may the sun and moon
 Make us again count o'er ere love be done! 130
 But, woe is me, you are so sick of late,
 So far from cheer and from your former state,
 That I distrust° you. Yet, though I distrust, Discomfort you, my lord, it nothing must:
 For women's fear and love holds quantity;° 135
 In neither aught, or in extremity.
 Now, what my love is, proof hath made you know;
 And as my love is siz'd, my fear is so:
 Where love is great, the littlest doubts are fear;
 Where little fears grow great, great love grows there. 140
- PLAYER KING: 'Faith, I must leave thee, love, and shortly too;
 My operant° powers their functions leave° to do:
 And thou shalt live in this fair world behind,
 Honour'd, belov'd; and haply one as kind
 For husband shalt thou —
- PLAYER QUEEN: O, confound the rest! 145
 Such love must needs be treason in my breast:
 In second husband let me be accurst!
 None wed the second but who kill'd the first.
- HAMLET [aside]: Wormwood, wormwood.
- PLAYER QUEEN: The instances that second marriage move 150
 Are base respects of thrift, but none of love:
 A second time I kill my husband dead,
 When second husband kisses me in bed.
- PLAYER KING: I do believe you think what now you speak;
 But what we do determine oft we break. 155
 Purpose is but the slave to memory,
 Of violent birth, but poor validity:
 Which now, like fruit unripe, sticks on the tree;
 But fall, unshaken, when they mellow be.
 Most necessary 'tis that we forget 160
 To pay ourselves what to ourselves is debt:
 What to ourselves in passion we propose,
 The passion ending, doth the purpose lose.
 The violence of either grief or joy
 Their own enactures° with themselves destroy: 165
 Where joy most revels, grief doth most lament;
 Grief joys, joy grieves, on slender accident.
 This world is not for aye,° nor 'tis not strange

133 distrust: Am anxious about. 135 holds quantity: Keeps proportion between. 142 operant: Active. leave: Cease. 165 enactures: Fulfillments. 168 aye: Ever.

- That even our loves should with our fortunes change;
 For 'tis a question left us yet to prove, 170
 Whether love lead fortune, or else fortune love.
 The great man down, you mark his favourite flies;
 The poor advanc'd makes friends of enemies.
 And hitherto doth love on fortune tend;
 For who° not needs shall never lack a friend, 175
 And who in want a hollow friend doth try,
 Directly seasons° him his enemy.
 But, orderly to end where I begun,
 Our wills and fates do so contrary run
 That our devices still are overthrown; 180
 Our thoughts are ours, their ends° none of our own:
 So think thou wilt no second husband wed;
 But die thy thoughts when thy first lord is dead.
 PLAYER QUEEN: Nor earth to me give food, nor heaven light!
 Sport and repose lock from me day and night! 185
 To desperation turn my trust and hope!
 An anchor's° cheer° in prison be my scope!
 Each opposite° that blanks° the face of joy
 Meet what I would have well and it destroy!
 Both here and hence pursue me lasting strife, 190
 If, once a widow, ever I be wife!
 HAMLET: If she should break it now!
 PLAYER KING: 'Tis deeply sworn. Sweet, leave me here awhile;
 My spirits grow dull, and fain I would beguile
 The tedious day with sleep. [Sleeps.]
 PLAYER QUEEN: Sleep rock thy brain; 195
 And never come mischance between us twain! Exit.
 HAMLET: Madam, how like you this play?
 QUEEN: The lady doth protest too much, methinks.
 HAMLET: O, but she'll keep her word.
 KING: Have you heard the argument? Is there no offence in 't? 200
 HAMLET: No, no, they do but jest, poison in jest; no offence i' the world.
 KING: What do you call the play?
 HAMLET: The Mouse-trap. Marry, how? Tropically.° This play is the image of a murder done in Vienna: Gonzago° is the duke's name; his wife, Baptista: you shall see anon; 't is a knavish piece of work: but what o' that? your majesty and we 205

175 who: Whoever. 177 seasons: Matures, ripens. 181 ends: Results. 187 An anchor's: An anchorite's. cheer: Fare; sometimes printed as chair. 188 opposite: Adverse thing. blanks: Causes to blanch or grow pale. 203 Tropicallly: Figuratively, trapically suggests a pun on trap in Mouse-trap (l. 203). 204 Gonzago: In 1538, Luigi Gonzago murdered the Duke of Urbano by pouring poisoned lotion in his ears.

that have free souls, it touches us not: let the galled jade<sup>o</sup> winch,<sup>o</sup> our withers<sup>o</sup> are unwrung.<sup>o</sup>

Enter LUCIANUS.

This is one Lucianus, nephew to the king.

OPHELIA: You are as good as a chorus,<sup>o</sup> my lord.

HAMLET: I could interpret between you and your love, if I could see the puppets 210
dallying.<sup>o</sup>

OPHELIA: You are keen, my lord, you are keen.

HAMLET: It would cost you a groaning to take off my edge.

OPHELIA: Still better, and worse.<sup>o</sup>

HAMLET: So you mistake<sup>o</sup> your husbands. Begin, murderer; pox,<sup>o</sup> leave thy damnable 215 faces, and begin. Come: the croaking raven doth bellow for revenge.

LUCIANUS: Thoughts black, hands apt, drugs fit, and time agreeing;

Confederate<sup>o</sup> season, else no creature seeing;

Thou mixture rank, of midnight weeds collected,

With Hecate's<sup>o</sup> ban<sup>o</sup> thrice blasted, thrice infected, 220

Thy natural magic and dire property,

On wholesome life usurp immediately.

[Pours the poison into the sleeper's ears.]

HAMLET: 'A poisons him i' the garden for his estate. His name's Gonzago: the story is extant, and written in very choice Italian: you shall see anon how the murderer gets the love of Gonzago's wife. 225

OPHELIA: The king rises.

HAMLET: What, frighted with false fire!<sup>o</sup>

QUEEN: How fares my lord?

POLONIUS: Give o'er the play.

KING: Give me some light: away! 230

POLONIUS: Lights, lights, lights! Exeunt all but HAMLET and HORATIO.

HAMLET: Why, let the stricken deer go weep,

The hart ungalled play;

For some must watch, while some must sleep:

Thus runs the world away.<sup>o</sup> 235

206 galled jade: Horse whose hide is rubbed by saddle or harness. winch: Wince. withers: The part between the horse's shoulder blades. 207 unwrung: Not wrung or twisted. 209 chorus: In many Elizabethan plays, the action was explained by an actor known as the "chorus"; at a puppet show the actor who explained the action was known as an "interpreter," as indicated by the lines following. 211 dallying: With sexual suggestion, continued in keen (sexually aroused), groaning (i.e., in pregnancy), and edge (i.e., sexual desire or impetuosity). 214 Still . . . worse: More keen, less decorous. 215 mistake: Err in taking. pox: An imprecation. 218 Confederate: Conspiring (to assist the murderer). 220 Hecate: The goddess of witchcraft. ban: Curse. 227 false fire: Fireworks, or a blank discharge. 232–235 Why . . . away: Probably from an old ballad, with allusion to the popular belief that a wounded deer retires to weep and die. Cf. As You Like It, II.i.66.

Would not this,<sup>o</sup> sir, and a forest of feathers<sup>o</sup>—if the rest of my fortunes turn Turk with<sup>o</sup> me—with two Provincial roses<sup>o</sup> on my razed<sup>o</sup> shoes, get me a fellowship in a cry<sup>o</sup> of players,<sup>o</sup> sir?

HORATIO: Half a share.<sup>o</sup>

HAMLET: A whole one, I.

240

For thou dost know, O Damon<sup>o</sup> dear,
This realm dismantled<sup>o</sup> was
Of Jove himself; and now reigns here
A very, very<sup>o</sup>—pajock.<sup>o</sup>

HORATIO: You might have rhymed.

245

HAMLET: O good Horatio, I'll take the ghost's word for a thousand pound. Didst perceive?

HORATIO: Very well, my lord.

HAMLET: Upon the talk of the poisoning?

HORATIO: I did very well note him.

250

HAMLET: Ah, ha! Come, some music! come, the recorders!<sup>o</sup>

For if the king like not the comedy,
Why then, belike, he likes it not, perdy.<sup>o</sup>
Come, some music!

Enter ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.

GUILDENSTERN: Good my lord, vouchsafe me a word with you.

255

HAMLET: Sir, a whole history.

GUILDENSTERN: The king, sir,—

HAMLET: Ay, sir, what of him?

GUILDENSTERN: Is in his retirement marvellous distempered.

HAMLET: With drink, sir?

260

GUILDENSTERN: No, my lord, rather with choler.<sup>o</sup>

HAMLET: Your wisdom should show itself more richer to signify this to his doctor; for, for me to put him to his purgation would perhaps plunge him into far more choler.

GUILDENSTERN: Good my lord, put your discourse into some frame<sup>o</sup> and start not so wildly from my affair.

236 this: I.e., the play. feathers: Allusion to the plumes which Elizabethan actors were fond of wearing. 236–237 turn Turk with: Go back on. 237 two Provincial roses: Rosettes of ribbon like the roses of Provins near Paris, or else the roses of Provence. razed: Cut, slashed (by way of ornament). 237–238 fellowship . . . players: Partnership in a theatrical company. 238 cry: Pack (as of hounds). 239 Half a share: Allusion to the custom in dramatic companies of dividing the ownership into a number of shares among the householders. 241 Damon: Symbol of loyalty and friendship in Greek myth.—Eds. 241–244 For . . . very: Probably from an old ballad having to do with Damon and Pythias. 242 dismantled: Stripped, divested. pajock: Peacock (a bird with a bad reputation). Possibly the word was patchock, diminutive of patch, clown. 251 recorders: Wind instruments of the flute kind. 253 perdy: Corruption of par dieu. 261 choler: Bilious disorder, with quibble on the sense “anger.” 265 frame: Order.

HAMLET: I am tame, sir: pronounce.

GUILDENSTERN: The queen, your mother, in most great affliction of spirit, hath sent me to you.

HAMLET: You are welcome. 270

GUILDENSTERN: Nay, good my lord, this courtesy is not of the right breed. If it shall please you to make me a wholesome<sup>o</sup> answer, I will do your mother's commandment; if not, your pardon and my return shall be the end of my business.

HAMLET: Sir, I cannot.

GUILDENSTERN: What, my lord? 275

HAMLET: Make you a wholesome answer; my wit's diseased: but, sir, such answer as I can make, you shall command; or, rather, as you say, my mother: therefore no more, but to the matter:<sup>o</sup> my mother, you say,—

ROSENCRANTZ: Then thus she says; your behaviour hath struck her into amazement and admiration. 280

HAMLET: O wonderful son, that can so 'stonish a mother! But is there no sequel at the heels of this mother's admiration? Impart.

ROSENCRANTZ: She desires to speak with you in her closet, ere you go to bed.

HAMLET: We shall obey, were she ten times our mother. Have you any further trade with us? 285

ROSENCRANTZ: My lord, you once did love me.

HAMLET: And do still, by these pickers and stealers.<sup>o</sup>

ROSENCRANTZ: Good my lord, what is your cause of distemper? you do, surely, bar the door upon your own liberty, if you deny your griefs to your friend.

HAMLET: Sir, I lack advancement. 290

ROSENCRANTZ: How can that be, when you have the voice<sup>o</sup> of the king himself for your succession in Denmark?

HAMLET: Ay, sir, but "While the grass grows,"<sup>o</sup>—the proverb is something musty.

Enter the Players with recorders.

O, the recorders! let me see one. To withdraw<sup>o</sup> with you:—why do you go about to recover the wind<sup>o</sup> of me, as if you would drive me into a toil?<sup>o</sup> 295

GUILDENSTERN: O, my lord, if my duty be too bold, my love is too unmannerly.<sup>o</sup>

HAMLET: I do not well understand that. Will you play upon this pipe?

GUILDENSTERN: My lord, I cannot.

HAMLET: I pray you.

GUILDENSTERN: Believe me, I cannot. 300

HAMLET: I beseech you.

272 wholesome: Sensible. 278 matter: Matter in hand. 287 pickers and stealers: Hands, so called from the catechism "to keep my hands from picking and stealing." 291 voice: Support. 293 "While . . . grows": The rest of the proverb is "the silly horse starves." Hamlet may be destroyed while he is waiting for the succession to the kingdom. 294 withdraw: Speak in private. 295 recover the wind: Get to the windward side. toil: Snare. 296 if . . . unmannerly: If I am using an unmannerly boldness, it is my love which occasions it.

GUILDENSTERN: I know no touch of it, my lord.

HAMLET: 'Tis as easy as lying: govern these ventages<sup>o</sup> with your fingers and thumb, give it breath with your mouth, and it will discourse most eloquent music. Look you, these are the stops. 305

GUILDENSTERN: But these cannot I command to any utterance of harmony; I have not the skill.

HAMLET: Why, look you now, how unworthy a thing you make of me! You would play upon me; you would seem to know my stops; you would pluck out the heart of my mystery; you would sound me from my lowest note to the top of my compass:<sup>o</sup> and there is much music, excellent voice, in this little organ;<sup>o</sup> yet cannot you make it speak. 'Sblood, do you think I am easier to be played on than a pipe? Call me what instrument you will, though you can fret<sup>o</sup> me, you cannot play upon me. 310

Enter POLONIUS.

God bless you, sir! 315

POLONIUS: My lord, the queen would speak with you, and presently.

HAMLET: Do you see yonder cloud that 's almost in shape of a camel?

POLONIUS: By the mass, and 'tis like a camel, indeed.

HAMLET: Methinks it is like a weasel.

POLONIUS: It is backed like a weasel. 320

HAMLET: Or like a whale?

POLONIUS: Very like a whale.

HAMLET: Then I will come to my mother by and by. [Aside.] They fool me to the top of my bent.<sup>o</sup>—I will come by and by.<sup>o</sup>

POLONIUS: I will say so. [Exit.] 325

HAMLET: By and by is easily said.

Leave me, friends. [Exeunt all but HAMLET.]

'Tis now the very witching time<sup>o</sup> of night,

When churchyards yawn and hell itself breathes out

Contagion to this world: now could I drink hot blood, 330

And do such bitter business as the day

Would quake to look on. Soft! now to my mother.

O heart, lose not thy nature; let not ever

The soul of Nero<sup>o</sup> enter this firm bosom:

Let me be cruel, not unnatural: 335

I will speak daggers to her, but use none;

My tongue and soul in this be hypocrites;

303 ventages: Stops of the recorders. 311 compass: Range of voice. organ: Musical instrument, i.e., the pipe. 313 fret: Quibble on meaning "irritate" and the piece of wood, gut, or metal which regulates the fingering. 323–324 top of my bent: Limit of endurance, i.e., extent to which a bow may be bent. 324 by and by: Immediately. 328 witching time: I.e., time when spells are cast. 334 Nero: Murderer of his mother, Agrippina.

How in my words somever she be shent,<sup>o</sup>
To give them seals<sup>o</sup> never, my soul, consent!

Exit.

[SCENE iii: A room in the castle.]

Enter KING, ROSENCRANTZ, and GUILDENSTERN.

KING: I like him not, nor stands it safe with us
To let his madness range. Therefore prepare you;
I your commission will forthwith dispatch,<sup>o</sup>
And he to England shall along with you:
The terms<sup>o</sup> of our estate<sup>o</sup> may not endure
Hazard so near us as doth hourly grow
Out of his brows.<sup>o</sup>

5

GUILDENSTERN: We will ourselves provide:
Most holy and religious fear it is
To keep those many many bodies safe
That live and feed upon your majesty.

10

ROSENCRANTZ: The single and peculiar<sup>o</sup> life is bound,
With all the strength and armour of the mind,
To keep itself from noyance;<sup>o</sup> but much more
That spirit upon whose weal depend and rest
The lives of many. The cess<sup>o</sup> of majesty
Dies not alone; but, like a gulf,<sup>o</sup> doth draw
What's near it with it: it is a massy wheel,
Fix'd on the summit of the highest mount,
To whose huge spokes ten thousand lesser things
Are mortis'd and adjoin'd; which, when it falls,
Each small annexment, petty consequence,
Attends<sup>o</sup> the boist'rous ruin. Never alone
Did the king sigh, but with a general groan.

KING: Arm<sup>o</sup> you, I pray you, to this speedy voyage;
For we will fetters put about this fear,
Which now goes too free-footed.

25

ROSENCRANTZ: We will haste us.

Exeunt GENTLEMEN [ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN].

Enter POLONIUS.

---

338 shent: Rebuked. 339 give them seals: Confirm with deeds. Scene iii. 3 dispatch: Prepare. 5 terms: Condition, circumstances. estate: State. 7 brows: Effronteries. 11 single and peculiar: Individual and private. 13 noyance: Harm. 15 cess: Decease. 16 gulf: Whirlpool. 22 Attends: Participates in. 24 Arm: Prepare.

- POLONIUS: My lord, he's going to his mother's closet:
 Behind the arras° I'll convey° myself,
 To hear the process;° I'll warrant she'll tax him home:°
 And, as you said, and wisely was it said, 30
 'Tis meet that some more audience than a mother,
 Since nature makes them partial, should o'erhear
 The speech, of vantage.° Fare you well, my liege:
 I'll call upon you ere you go to bed,
 And tell you what I know.
- KING: Thanks, dear my lord. Exit [POLONIUS]. 35
 O, my offence is rank, it smells to heaven;
 It hath the primal eldest curse° upon't,
 A brother's murder. Pray can I not,
 Though inclination be as sharp as will:°
 My stronger guilt defeats my strong intent; 40
 And, like a man to double business bound,
 I stand in pause where I shall first begin,
 And both neglect. What if this cursed hand
 Were thicker than itself with brother's blood,
 Is there not rain enough in the sweet heavens 45
 To wash it white as snow? Whereto serves mercy
 But to confront° the visage of offence?
 And what's in prayer but this two-fold force,
 To be forestalled° ere we come to fall,
 Or pardon'd being down? Then I'll look up; 50
 My fault is past. But, O, what form of prayer
 Can serve my turn? "Forgive me my foul murder"?
 That cannot be: since I am still possess'd
 Of those effects for which I did the murder,
 My crown, mine own ambition° and my queen. 55
 May one be pardon'd and retain th' offence?°
 In the corrupted currents° of this world
 Offence's gilded hand° may shove by justice,
 And oft 'tis seen the wicked prize° itself
 Buys out the law: but 'tis not so above; 60
 There is no shuffling,° there the action lies°

28 arras: Screen of tapestry placed around the walls of household apartments. convey: Implication of secrecy, convey was often used to mean "steal." 29 process: Proceedings. tax him home: Reprove him severely. 33 of vantage: From an advantageous place. 37 primal eldest curse: The curse of Cain, the first to kill his brother. 39 sharp as will: I.e., his desire is as strong as his determination. 47 confront: Oppose directly. 49 forestalled: Prevented. 55 ambition: I.e., realization of ambition. 56 offence: Benefit accruing from offense. 57 currents: Courses. 58 gilded hand: Hand offering gold as a bribe. 59 wicked prize: Prize won by wickedness. 61 shuffling: Escape by trickery. lies: Is sustainable.

In his true nature; and we ourselves compell'd,
 Even to the teeth and forehead° of our faults,
 To give in evidence. What then? what rests?°
 Try what repentance can: what can it not? 65
 Yet what can it when one can not repent?
 O wretched state! O bosom black as death!
 O limed° soul, that, struggling to be free,
 Art more engag'd!° Help, angels! Make assay!°
 Bow, stubborn knees; and, heart with strings of steel, 70
 Be soft as sinews of the new-born babe!
 All may be well. [He kneels.]

Enter HAMLET.

HAMLET: Now might I do it pat,° now he is praying;
 And now I'll do't. And so 'a goes to heaven;
 And so am I reveng'd. That would be scann'd:° 75
 A villain kills my father; and for that,
 I, his sole son, do this same villain send
 To heaven.
 Why, this is hire and salary, not revenge.
 'A took my father grossly, full of bread;° 80
 With all his crimes broad blown,° as flush° as May;
 And how his audit stands who knows save heaven?
 But in our circumstance and course° of thought,
 'Tis heavy with him: and am I then reveng'd,
 To take him in the purging of his soul, 85
 When he is fit and season'd for his passage?°
 No!
 Up, sword; and know thou a more horrid hent:°
 When he is drunk asleep,° or in his rage,
 Or in th' incestuous pleasure of his bed; 90
 At game, a-swearing, or about some act
 That has no relish of salvation in't;
 Then trip him, that his heels may kick at heaven,
 And that his soul may be as damn'd and black
 As hell, whereto it goes. My mother stays: 95
 This physic° but prolongs thy sickly days. Exit.

63 teeth and forehead: Very face. 64 rests: Remains. 68 limed: Caught as with birdlime. 69 engag'd: Embedded. assay: Trial. 73 pat: Opportunely. 75 would be scann'd: Needs to be looked into. 80 full of bread: Enjoying his worldly pleasures (see Ezekiel 16:49). 81 broad blown: In full bloom. flush: Lusty. 83 in . . . course: As we see it in our mortal situation. 86 fit . . . passage: I.e., reconciled to heaven by forgiveness of his sins. 88 hent: Seizing; or more probably, occasion of seizure. 89 drunk asleep: In a drunken sleep. 96 physic: Purging (by prayer).

KING: [Rising] My words fly up, my thoughts remain below:
Words without thoughts never to heaven go.

Exit.

[SCENE iv: The QUEEN's closet.]

Enter [QUEEN] GERTRUDE and POLONIUS.

POLONIUS: 'A will come straight. Look you lay<sup>o</sup> home to him:
Tell him his pranks have been too broad<sup>o</sup> to bear with,
And that your grace hath screen'd and stood between Much heat<sup>o</sup> and him. I'll sconce<sup>o</sup> me even here.
Pray you, be round<sup>o</sup> with him.

HAMLET [within]: Mother, mother, mother!

QUEEN: I'll warrant you,
Fear me not: withdraw, I hear him coming.

[POLONIUS hides behind the arras.]

Enter HAMLET.

HAMLET: Now, mother, what's the matter?

QUEEN: Hamlet, thou hast thy father much offended.

HAMLET: Mother, you have my father<sup>o</sup> much offended.

10

QUEEN: Come, come, you answer with an idle tongue.

HAMLET: Go, go, you question with a wicked tongue.

QUEEN: Why, how now, Hamlet!

HAMLET: What's the matter now?

QUEEN: Have you forgot me?

HAMLET: No, by the rood,<sup>o</sup> not so:

You are the queen, your husband's brother's wife;

15

And—would it were not so!—you are my mother.

QUEEN: Nay, then, I'll set those to you that can speak.

HAMLET: Come, come, and sit you down; you shall not budge;

You go not till I set you up a glass

Where you may see the inmost part of you.

20

QUEEN: What wilt thou do? thou wilt not murder me?

Help, help, ho!

POLONIUS [behind]: What, ho! help, help; help!

HAMLET [drawing]: How now! a rat? Dead, for a ducat, dead!

[Makes a pass through the arras.]

POLONIUS [behind]: O, I am slain!

[Falls and dies.]

25

QUEEN: O me, what hast thou done?

---

Scene iv. 1 lay: Thrust. 2 broad: Unrestrained. 4 Much heat: I.e., the king's anger. sconce: Hide. 5 round: Blunt. 9–10 thy father, my father: I.e., Claudius, the elder Hamlet. 14 rood: Cross.

- HAMLET: Nay, I know not:
Is it the king?
- QUEEN: O, what a rash and bloody deed is this!
- HAMLET: A bloody deed! almost as bad, good mother,
As kill a king, and marry with his brother. 30
- QUEEN: As kill a king!
- HAMLET: Ay, lady, it was my word.
[Lifts up the arras and discovers POLONIUS.]
Thou wretched, rash, intruding fool, farewell!
I took thee for thy better: take thy fortune;
Thou find'st to be too busy is some danger.
Leave wringing of your hands: peace! sit you down, 35
And let me wring your heart; for so I shall,
If it be made of penetrable stuff,
If damned custom have not braz'd<sup>o</sup> it so
That it be proof and bulwark against sense.
- QUEEN: What have I done, that thou dar'st wag thy tongue
In noise so rude against me? 40
- HAMLET: Such an act
That blurs the grace and blush of modesty,
Calls virtue hypocrite, takes off the rose
From the fair forehead of an innocent love
And sets a blister<sup>o</sup> there, makes marriage-vows 45
As false as dicers' oaths: O, such a deed
As from the body of contraction<sup>o</sup> plucks
The very soul, and sweet religion<sup>o</sup> makes
A rhapsody<sup>o</sup> of words: heaven's face does glow
O'er this solidity and compound mass 50
With heated visage, as against the doom
Is thought-sick at the act.<sup>o</sup>
- QUEEN: Ay me, what act,
That roars so loud, and thunders in the index?<sup>o</sup>
- HAMLET: Look here, upon this picture, and on this.
The counterfeit presentment<sup>o</sup> of two brothers. 55
See, what a grace was seated on this brow;
An eye like Mars, to threaten and command;

---

38 braz'd: Brazened, hardened. 45 sets a blister: Brands as a harlot. 47 contraction: The marriage contract. 48 religion: Religious vows. 49 rhapsody: Senseless string. 49–52 heaven's . . . act: Heaven's face blushes to look down on this world, and Gertrude's marriage makes heaven feel as sick as though the day of doom were near. 53 index: Prelude or preface. 55 counterfeit presentment: Portrayed representation. 57 Hyperion's: The sun god's. front: Brow.

A station° like the herald Mercury
 New-lighted on a heaven-kissing hill; 60
 A combination and a form indeed,
 Where every god did seem to set his seal,
 To give the world assurance° of a man:
 This was your husband. Look you now, what follows:
 Here is your husband; like a mildew'd ear,° 65
 Blasting his wholesome brother. Have you eyes?
 Could you on this fair mountain leave to feed,
 And batten° on this moor?° Ha! have you eyes?
 You cannot call it love; for at your age
 The hey-day° in the blood is tame, it's humble, 70
 And waits upon the judgement: and what judgement
 Would step from this to this? Sense, sure, you have,
 Else could you not have motion;° but sure, that sense
 Is apoplex'd;° for madness would not err,
 Nor sense to ecstasy was ne'er so thrall'd° 75
 But it reserv'd some quantity of choice,°
 To serve in such a difference. What devil was't
 That thus hath cozen'd° you at hoodman-blind?°
 Eyes without feeling, feeling without sight,
 Ears without hands or eyes, smelling sans° all, 80
 Or but a sickly part of one true sense
 Could not so mope.°
 O shame! where is thy blush? Rebellious hell,
 If thou canst mutine° in a matron's bones,
 To flaming youth let virtue be as wax, 85
 And melt in her own fire: proclaim no shame
 When the compulsive ardour gives the charge,°
 Since frost itself as actively doth burn
 And reason panders will.°

QUEEN: O Hamlet, speak no more:
 Thou turn'st mine eyes into my very soul; 90

59 station: Manner of standing. 63 assurance: Pledge, guarantee. 65 mildew'd ear: See Genesis 41:5–7. 68 batten: Grow fat. moor: Barren upland. 70 hey-day: State of excitement. 72–73 Sense . . . motion: Sense and motion are functions of the middle or sensible soul, the possession of sense being the basis of motion. 74 apoplex'd: Paralyzed. Mental derangement was thus of three sorts: apoplexy, ecstasy, and diabolic possession. 75 thrall'd: Enslaved. 76 quantity of choice: Fragment of the power to choose. 78 cozen'd: Tricked, cheated. hoodman-blind: Blindman's buff. 80 sans: Without. 82 mope: Be in a depressed, spiritless state; act aimlessly. 84 mutine: Mutiny, rebel. 87 gives the charge: Delivers the attack. 89 reason panders will: The normal and proper situation was one in which reason guided the will in the direction of good; here, reason is perverted and leads in the direction of evil.

And there I see such black and grained° spots
As will not leave their tinct.

HAMLET: Nay, but to live
In the rank sweat of an enseamed° bed,
Stew'd in corruption, honeying and making love
Over the nasty sty,—

QUEEN: O, speak to me no more;
These words, like daggers, enter in mine ears;
No more, sweet Hamlet!

HAMLET: A murderer and a villain;
A slave that is not twentieth part the tithe
Of your precedent lord;° a vice of kings;°
A cutpurse of the empire and the rule,
That from a shelf the precious diadem stole,
And put it in his pocket!

QUEEN: No more!

Enter GHOST.

HAMLET: A king of shreds and patches,° —
Save me, and hover o'er me with your wings,
You heavenly guards! What would your gracious figure?

QUEEN: Alas, he's mad!

HAMLET: Do you not come your tardy son to chide,
That, laps'd in time and passion,° lets go by
Th' important° acting of your dread command?
O, say!

GHOST: Do not forget: this visitation
Is but to whet thy almost blunted purpose.
But, look, amazement° on thy mother sits:
O, step between her and her fighting soul:
Conceit in weakest bodies strongest works:
Speak to her, Hamlet.

HAMLET: How is it with you, lady?

QUEEN: Alas, how is 't with you,
That you do bend your eye on vacancy
And with th' incorporal° air do hold discourse?

91 grained: Dyed in grain. 93 enseamed: Loaded with grease, greased. 99 precedent lord: I.e., the elder Hamlet. vice of kings: Buffoon of kings; a reference to the vice, or clown, of the morality plays and interludes. 103 shreds and patches: I.e., motley, the traditional costume of the vice. 108 laps'd . . . passion: Having suffered time to slip and passion to cool; also explained as “engrossed in casual events and lapsed into mere fruitless passion, so that he no longer entertains a rational purpose.” 109 important: Urgent. 113 amazement: Frenzy, distraction. 119 incorporal: Immaterial.

- Forth at your eyes your spirits wildly peep; 120
 And, as the sleeping soldiers in th' alarm,
 Your bedded<sup>o</sup> hair, like life in excrements,<sup>o</sup>
 Start up, and stand an<sup>o</sup> end. O gentle son,
 Upon the heat and flame of thy distemper
 Sprinkle cool patience. Whereon do you look? 125
- HAMLET: On him, on him! Look you, how pale he glares!
 His form and cause conjoin'd,<sup>o</sup> preaching to stones,
 Would make them capable.—Do not look upon me;
 Lest with this piteous action you convert
 My stern effects:<sup>o</sup> then what I have to do 130
 Will want true colour;<sup>o</sup> tears perchance for blood.
- QUEEN: To whom do you speak this?
- HAMLET: Do you see nothing there?
- QUEEN: Nothing at all; yet all that is I see.
- HAMLET: Nor did you nothing hear?
- QUEEN: No, nothing but ourselves.
- HAMLET: Why, look you there! look, how it steals away! 135
 My father, in his habit as he liv'd!
 Look, where he goes, even now, out at the portal! Exit GHOST.
- QUEEN: This is the very coinage of your brain:
 This bodiless creation ecstasy
 Is very cunning in.
- HAMLET: Ecstasy! 140
 My pulse, as yours, doth temperately keep time,
 And makes as healthful music: it is not madness
 That I have utt'red: bring me to the test,
 And I the matter will re-word,<sup>o</sup> which madness
 Would gambol<sup>o</sup> from. Mother, for love of grace, 145
 Lay not that flattering unction<sup>o</sup> to your soul,
 That not your trespass, but my madness speaks:
 It will but skin and film the ulcerous place,
 Whiles rank corruption, mining<sup>o</sup> all within,
 Infects unseen. Confess yourself to heaven;
 Repent what's past; avoid what is to come;<sup>o</sup> 150

122 bedded: Laid in smooth layers. excrements: The hair was considered an excrement or voided part of the body. 123 an: On. 127 conjoin'd: United. 129–130 convert . . . effects: Divert me from my stern duty. For effects, possibly affects (affections of the mind). 131 want true colour: Lack good reason so that (with a play on the normal sense of colour) I shall shed tears instead of blood. 144 re-word: Repeat in words. 145 gambol: Skip away. 146 unction: Ointment used medicinally or as a rite; suggestion that forgiveness for sin may not be so easily achieved. 149 mining: Working under the surface. 151 what is to come: I.e., the sins of the future.

- And do not spread the compost° on the weeds,
 To make them ranker. Forgive me this my virtue;°
 For in the fatness° of these pursy° times
 Virtue itself of vice must pardon beg, 155
 Yea, curb° and woo for leave to do him good.
- QUEEN: O Hamlet, thou hast cleft my heart in twain.
- HAMLET: O, throw away the worser part of it,
 And live the purer with the other half.
 Good night: but go not to my uncle's bed;
 Assume a virtue, if you have it not. 160
 That monster, custom, who all sense doth eat,
 Of habits devil, is angel yet in this,
 That to the use of actions fair and good
 He likewise gives a frock or livery, 165
 That aptly is put on. Refrain to-night,
 And that shall lend a kind of easiness
 To the next abstinence: the next more easy;
 For use almost can change the stamp of nature,
 And either . . . the devil, or throw him out° 170
 With wondrous potency. Once more, good night:
 And when you are desirous to be bless'd,°
 I'll blessing beg of you. For this same lord, [Pointing to POLONIUS.]
 I do repent: but heaven hath pleas'd it so,
 To punish me with this and this with me, 175
 That I must be their scourge and minister.
 I will bestow him, and will answer well
 The death I gave him. So, again, good night.
 I must be cruel, only to be kind:
 Thus bad begins and worse remains behind. 180
 One word more, good lady.
- QUEEN: What shall I do?
- HAMLET: Not this, by no means, that I bid you do:
 Let the bloat° king tempt you again to bed;
 Pinch wanton on your cheek; call you his mouse;
 And let him, for a pair of reechy° kisses, 185
 Or paddling in your neck with his damn'd fingers,
 Make you to ravel all this matter out,

152 compost: Manure. 153 this my virtue: My virtuous talk in reproving you. 154 fatness: Grossness. pursy: Short-winded, corpulent. 156 curb: Bow, bend the knee. 170 Defective line usually emended by inserting master after either. 172 be bless'd: Become blessed, i.e., repentant. 183 bloat: Bloated. 185 reechy: Dirty, filthy.

- That I essentially<sup>o</sup> am not in madness,
 But mad in craft. 'Twere good you let him know;
 For who, that's but a queen, fair, sober, wise, 190
 Would from a paddock,<sup>o</sup> from a bat, a gib,<sup>o</sup>
 Such dear concernings<sup>o</sup> hide? who would do so?
 No, in despite of sense and secrecy,
 Unpeg the basket on the house's top,
 Let the birds fly, and, like the famous ape,<sup>o</sup> 195
 To try conclusions,<sup>o</sup> in the basket creep,
 And break your own neck down.
- QUEEN: Be thou assur'd, if words be made of breath,
 And breath of life, I have no life to breathe
 What thou hast said to me. 200
- HAMLET: I must to England; you know that?
- QUEEN: Alack,
 I had forgot: 'tis so concluded on.
- HAMLET: There's letters seal'd: and my two schoolfellows, Whom I will trust as I will adders fang'd,
 They bear the mandate; they must sweep my way,<sup>o</sup> 205
 And marshal me to knavery. Let it work;
 For 'tis the sport to have the engineer<sup>o</sup>
 Hoist<sup>o</sup> with his own petar:<sup>o</sup> and 't shall go hard
 But I will delve one yard below their mines,
 And blow them at the moon: O, 'tis most sweet, 210
 When in one line two crafts<sup>o</sup> directly meet.
 This man shall set me packing:<sup>o</sup>
 I'll lug the guts into the neighbour room.
 Mother, good night. Indeed this counsellor
 Is now most still, most secret and most grave, 215
 Who was in life a foolish prating knave.
 Come, sir, to draw<sup>o</sup> toward an end with you.
 Good night, mother. Exeunt [severally]; HAMLET dragging in POLONIUS].

188 essentially: In my essential nature. 191 paddock: Toad. gib: Tomcat. 192 dear concernings: Important affairs. 195 the famous ape: A letter from Sir John Suckling seems to supply other details of the story, otherwise not identified: "It is the story of the jackanapes and the partridges; thou starest after a beauty till it be lost to thee, then let'st out another, and starest after that till it is gone too." 196 conclusions: Experiments. 205 sweep my way: Clear my path. 207 engineer: Constructor of military works, or possibly artilleryman. 208 Hoist: Blown up. petar: Defined as a small engine of war used to blow in a door or make a breach, and as a case filled with explosive materials. 211 two crafts: Two acts of guile, with quibble on the sense of "two ships." 212 set me packing: Set me to making schemes, set me to lugging (him), and, also, send me off in a hurry. 217 draw: Come, with quibble on literal sense.

[ACT IV

SCENE i: A room in the castle.]Enter KING and QUEEN, with ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.

KING: There's matter in these sighs, these profound heaves:

You must translate: 'tis fit we understand them.

Where is your son?

QUEEN: Bestow this place on us a little while.

[Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]

Ah, mine own lord, what have I seen to-night!

5

KING: What, Gertrude? How does Hamlet?

QUEEN: Mad as the sea and wind, when both contend

Which is the mightier: in his lawless fit,

Behind the arras hearing something stir,

Whips out his rapier, cries, "A rat, a rat!"

10

And, in this brainish<sup>o</sup> apprehension,<sup>o</sup> kills

The unseen good old man.

KING: O heavy deed!

It had been so with us, had we been there:

His liberty is full of threats to all;

To you yourself, to us, to every one.

15

Alas, how shall this bloody deed be answer'd?

It will be laid to us, whose providence<sup>o</sup>Should have kept short,<sup>o</sup> restrain'd and out of haunt,<sup>o</sup>

This mad young man: but so much was our love,

We would not understand what was most fit;

20

But, like the owner of a foul disease,

To keep it from divulging,<sup>o</sup> let it feed

Even on the pith of life. Where is he gone?

QUEEN: To draw apart the body he hath kill'd:

O'er whom his very madness, like some ore

25

Among a mineral<sup>o</sup> of metals base,

Shows itself pure; 'a weeps for what is done.

KING: O Gertrude, come away!

The sun no sooner shall the mountains touch,

But we will ship him hence: and this vile deed

30

We must, with all our majesty and skill,

Both countenance and excuse. Ho, Guildenstern!

Enter ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.

---

Act IV, Scene i. 11 brainish: Headstrong, passionate. apprehension: Conception, imagination. 17 providence: Foresight. 18 short: I.e., on a short tether. out of haunt: Secluded. 22 divulging: Becoming evident. 26 mineral: Mine.

Friends both, go join you with some further aid:
 Hamlet in madness hath Polonius slain,
 And from his mother's closet hath he dragg'd him: 35
 Go seek him out; speak fair, and bring the body
 Into the chapel. I pray you, haste in this.

[Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]

Come, Gertrude, we'll call up our wisest friends;
 And let them know, both what we mean to do,
 And what's untimely done . . . ° 40
 Whose whisper o'er the world's diameter, °
 As level ° as the cannon to his blank, °
 Transports his pois'ned shot, may miss our name,
 And hit the woundless ° air. O, come away!
 My soul is full of discord and dismay. Exeunt. 45

[SCENE ii: Another room in the castle.]

Enter HAMLET.

HAMLET: Safely stowed.

ROSENCRANTZ: } [within] Hamlet! Lord Hamlet!
 GUILDENSTERN: }

HAMLET: But soft, what noise? who calls on Hamlet? O, here they come.

Enter ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.

ROSENCRANTZ: What have you done, my lord, with the dead body?

HAMLET: Compounded it with dust, whereto 'tis kin. 5

ROSENCRANTZ: Tell us where 'tis, that we may take it thence

And bear it to the chapel.

HAMLET: Do not believe it.

ROSENCRANTZ: Believe what?

HAMLET: That I can keep your counsel ° and not mine own. Besides, to be demanded 10 of a sponge! what replication ° should be made by the son of a king?

ROSENCRANTZ: Take you me for a sponge, my lord?

HAMLET: Ay, sir, that soaks up the king's countenance, his rewards, his authorities. ° But such officers do the king best service in the end: he keeps them, like an ape an apple, in the corner of his jaw; first mouthed, to be last swallowed: when he needs what 15 you have gleaned, it is but squeezing you, and, sponge, you shall be dry again.

40 Defective line; some editors add: so, haply, slander; others add: for, haply, slander; other conjectures. 41 diameter: Extent from side to side. 42 level: Straight. blank: White spot in the center of a target. 44 woundless: Invulnerable. Scene ii. 10 keep your counsel: Hamlet is aware of their treachery but says nothing about it. 11 replication: Reply. 13 authorities: Authoritative backing.

ROSENCRANTZ: I understand you not, my lord.

HAMLET: I am glad of it: a knavish speech sleeps in a foolish ear.

ROSENCRANTZ: My lord, you must tell us where the body is, and go with us to the king.

HAMLET: The body is with the king, but the king is not with the body.<sup>o</sup> The king is a thing— 20

GUILDENSTERN: A thing, my lord!

HAMLET: Of nothing: bring me to him. Hide fox, and all after.<sup>o</sup> Exeunt.

[SCENE iii: Another room in the castle.]

Enter KING, and two or three.

KING: I have sent to seek him, and to find the body.

How dangerous is it that this man goes loose!

Yet must not we put the strong law on him:

He's lov'd of the distracted<sup>o</sup> multitude,

Who like not in their judgement, but their eyes; 5

And where 'tis so, th' offender's scourge<sup>o</sup> is weigh'd,<sup>o</sup>

But never the offence. To bear all smooth and even,

This sudden sending him away must seem

Deliberate pause:<sup>o</sup> diseases desperate grown

By desperate appliance are reliev'd, 10

Or not at all.

Enter ROSENCRANTZ, [GUILDENSTERN,] and all the rest.

How now! what hath befall'n?

ROSENCRANTZ: Where the dead body is bestow'd, my lord,

We cannot get from him.

KING: But where is he?

ROSENCRANTZ: Without, my lord; guarded, to know your pleasure.

KING: Bring him before us. 15

ROSENCRANTZ: Ho! bring in the lord.

They enter [with HAMLET].

KING: Now, Hamlet, where's Polonius?

HAMLET: At supper.

KING: At supper! where?

20 The body . . . body: There are many interpretations; possibly, "The body lies in death with the king, my father; but my father walks disembodied"; or "Claudius has the bodily possession of kingship, but kingliness, or justice of inheritance, is not with him." 23 Hide . . . after: An old signal cry in the game of hide-and-seek. Scene iii. 4 distracted: I.e., without power of forming logical judgments. 6 scourge: Punishment. weigh'd: Taken into consideration. 9 Deliberate pause: Considered action.

HAMLET: Not where he eats, but where 'a is eaten: a certain convocation of politic<sup>o</sup> worms<sup>o</sup> are e'en at him. Your worm is your only emperor for diet: we fat all creatures else to fat us, and we fat ourselves for maggots: your fat king and your lean beggar is but variable service,<sup>o</sup> two dishes, but to one table: that's the end. 20

KING: Alas, alas!

HAMLET: A man may fish with the worm that hath eat of a king, and eat of the fish that hath fed of that worm. 25

KING: What dost thou mean by this?

HAMLET: Nothing but to show you how a king may go a progress<sup>o</sup> through the guts of a beggar.

KING: Where is Polonius? 30

HAMLET: In heaven; send thither to see: if your messenger find him not there, seek him i' the other place yourself. But if indeed you find him not within this month, you shall nose him as you go up the stairs into the lobby.

KING [to some ATTENDANTS]: Go seek him there.

HAMLET: 'A will stay till you come. [Exeunt ATTENDANTS.] 35

KING: Hamlet, this deed, for thine especial safety,—

Which we do tender,<sup>o</sup> as we dearly grieve

For that which thou hast done,—must send thee hence

With fiery quickness: therefore prepare thyself;

The bark is ready, and the wind at help, 40

Th' associates tend, and everything is bent

For England.

HAMLET: For England!

KING: Ay, Hamlet.

HAMLET: Good.

KING: So is it, if thou knew'st our purposes.

HAMLET: I see a cherub<sup>o</sup> that sees them. But, come; for England! Farewell, dear mother. 45

KING: Thy loving father, Hamlet.

HAMLET: My mother: father and mother is man and wife; man and wife is one flesh; and so, my mother. Come, for England! Exit.

KING: Follow him at foot;<sup>o</sup> tempt him with speed aboard;

Delay it not; I'll have him hence to-night: 50

Away! for every thing is seal'd and done

That else leans on th' affair: pray you, make haste.

[Exeunt all but the KING.]

And, England, if my love thou hold'st at aught—

As my great power thereof may give thee sense,

20–21 convocation . . . worms: Allusion to the Diet of Worms (1521). 20 politic: Crafty. 23 variable service: A variety of dishes. 28 progress: Royal journey of state. 37 tender: Regard, hold dear. 44 cherub: Cherubim are angels of knowledge. 49 at foot: Close behind, at heel.

Since yet thy cicatrice° looks raw and red 55
 After the Danish sword, and thy free awe°
 Pays homage to us—thou mayst not coldly set
 Our sovereign process; which imports at full,
 By letters congruing to that effect,
 The present death of Hamlet. Do it, England; 60
 For like the hectic° in my blood he rages,
 And thou must cure me: till I know 'tis done,
 Howe'er my haps,° my joys were ne'er begun. Exit.

[SCENE iv: A plain in Denmark.]

Enter FORTINBRAS with his ARMY over the stage.

FORTINBRAS: Go, captain, from me greet the Danish king;
 Tell him that, by his license,° Fortinbras
 Craves the conveyance° of a promis'd march
 Over his kingdom. You know the rendezvous.
 If that his majesty would aught with us, 5
 We shall express our duty in his eye;°
 And let him know so.

CAPTAIN: I will do't, my lord.

FORTINBRAS: Go softly° on. [Exeunt all but CAPTAIN.]

Enter HAMLET, ROSENCRANTZ, [GUILDENSTERN,] &c.

HAMLET: Good sir, whose powers are these?
 CAPTAIN: They are of Norway, sir. 10
 HAMLET: How purpos'd, sir, I pray you?
 CAPTAIN: Against some part of Poland.
 HAMLET: Who commands them, sir?
 CAPTAIN: The nephew to old Norway, Fortinbras.
 HAMLET: Goes it against the main° of Poland, sir, 15
 Or for some frontier?
 CAPTAIN: Truly to speak, and with no addition,
 We go to gain a little patch of ground
 That hath in it no profit but the name.
 To pay five ducats, five, I would not farm it;° 20
 Nor will it yield to Norway or the Pole
 A ranker rate, should it be sold in fee.°

55 cicatrice: Scar. 56 free awe: Voluntary show of respect. 61 hectic: Fever. 63 haps: Fortunes. Scene iv. 2 license: Leave. 3 conveyance: Escort, convoy. 6 in his eye: In his presence. 8 softly: Slowly. 15 main: Country itself. 20 farm it: Take a lease of it. 22 fee: Fee simple.

HAMLET: Why, then the Polack never will defend it.

CAPTAIN: Yes, it is already garrison'd.

HAMLET: Two thousand souls and twenty thousand ducats

25

Will not debate the question of this straw:<sup>o</sup>

This is th' imposthume<sup>o</sup> of much wealth and peace,

That inward breaks, and shows no cause without

Why the man dies. I humbly thank you, sir.

CAPTAIN: God be wi' you, sir.

[Exit.]

ROSENCRANTZ: Will 't please you go, my lord?

30

HAMLET: I'll be with you straight. Go a little before. [Exeunt all except HAMLET.]

How all occasions<sup>o</sup> do inform against<sup>o</sup> me,

And spur my dull revenge! What is a man,

If his chief good and market of his time<sup>o</sup>

Be but to sleep and feed? a beast, no more.

35

Sure, he that made us with such large discourse,

Looking before and after, gave us not

That capability and god-like reason

To fust<sup>o</sup> in us unus'd. Now, whether it be Bestial oblivion, or some craven scruple

40

Of thinking too precisely on th' event,

A thought which, quarter'd, hath but one part wisdom

And ever three parts coward, I do not know

Why yet I live to say "This thing 's to do";

Sith I have cause and will and strength and means

45

To do 't. Examples gross as earth exhort me:

Witness this army of such mass and charge

Led by a delicate and tender prince,

Whose spirit with divine ambition puff'd

Makes mouths at the invisible event,

50

Exposing what is mortal and unsure

To all that fortune, death and danger dare,

Even for an egg-shell. Rightly to be great

Is not to stir without great argument,

But greatly to find quarrel in a straw

55

When honour's at the stake. How stand I then,

That have a father kill'd, a mother stain'd,

Excitements of<sup>o</sup> my reason and my blood,

And let all sleep? while, to my shame, I see

26 debate . . . straw: Settle this trifling matter. 27 imposthume: Purulent abscess or swelling. 32 occasions: Incidents, events. inform against: Generally defined as "show," "betray" (i.e., his tardiness); more probably inform means "take shape," as in Macbeth, II.i.48. 34 market of his time: The best use he makes of his time, or that for which he sells his time. 39 fust: Grow moldy. 58 Excitements of: Incentives to.

The imminent death of twenty thousand men, 60
 That, for a fantasy and trick° of fame,
 Go to their graves like beds, fight for a plot°
 Whereon the numbers cannot try the cause,
 Which is not tomb enough and continent
 To hide the slain? O, from this time forth, 65
 My thoughts be bloody, or be nothing worth! Exit.

[SCENE v: Elsinore. A room in the castle.]

Enter HORATIO, [QUEEN] GERTRUDE, and a GENTLEMAN.

QUEEN: I will not speak with her.

GENTLEMAN: She is importunate, indeed distract:

Her mood will needs be pitied.

QUEEN: What would she have?

GENTLEMAN: She speaks much of her father; says she hears

There's tricks° i' th' world; and hems, and beats her heart;° 5

Spurns enviously at straws;° speaks things in doubt,

That carry but half sense: her speech is nothing,

Yet the unshaped° use of it doth move

The hearers to collection;° they yawn° at it,

And botch° the words up fit to their own thoughts; 10

Which, as her winks, and nods, and gestures yield° them,

Indeed would make one think there might be thought,

Though nothing sure, yet much unhappily.°

HORATIO: 'Twere good she were spoken with: for she may strew

Dangerous conjectures in ill-breeding minds.° 15

QUEEN: Let her come in.

[Exit GENTLEMAN.]

[Aside.] To my sick soul, as sin's true nature is,

Each toy seems prologue to some great amiss:°

So full of artless jealousy is guilt,

It spills itself in fearing to be spilt.° 20

Enter OPHELIA [distracted].

OPHELIA: Where is the beauteous majesty of Denmark?

61 trick: Toy, trifle. 62 plot: Piece of ground. Scene v. 5 tricks: Deceptions. heart: I.e., breast. 6 Spurns . . . straws: Kicks spitefully at small objects in her path. 8 unshaped: Unformed, artless. 9 collection: Inference, a guess at some sort of meaning. yawn: Wonder. 10 botch: Patch. 11 yield: Deliver, bring forth (her words). 13 much unhappily: Expressive of much unhappiness. 15 ill-breeding minds: Minds bent on mischief. 18 great amiss: Calamity, disaster. 19–20 So . . . spilt: Guilt is so full of suspicion that it unskillfully betrays itself in fearing to be betrayed.

QUEEN: How now, Ophelia!

OPHELIA [she sings]: "How should I your true love know
From another one?
By his cockle hat<sup>o</sup> and staff,
And his sandal shoon."<sup>o</sup>

25

QUEEN: Alas, sweet lady, what imports this song?

OPHELIA: Say you? nay, pray you mark.

[Song] "He is dead and gone, lady,
He is dead and gone;
At his head a grass-green turf,
At his heels a stone."
O, ho!

30

QUEEN: Nay, but, Ophelia—

OPHELIA: Pray you, mark.

35

[Sings.] "White his shroud as the mountain snow"—

Enter KING.

QUEEN: Alas, look here, my lord.

OPHELIA [Song]: "Larded<sup>o</sup> all with flowers;
Which bewept to the grave did not go
With true-love showers."

40

KING: How do you, pretty lady?

OPHELIA: Well, God 'ild<sup>o</sup> you! They say the owl<sup>o</sup> was a baker's daughter. Lord, we know what we are, but know not what we may be. God be at your table!

KING: Conceit upon her father.

OPHELIA: Pray let's have no words of this; but when they ask you what it means, say you this:

45

[Song] "To-morrow is Saint Valentine's day,
All in the morning betime,
And I a maid at your window,
To be your Valentine."<sup>o</sup>

50

Then up he rose, and donn'd his clothes,
And dupp'd<sup>o</sup> the chamber-door;
Let in the maid, that out a maid
Never departed more."

KING: Pretty Ophelia!

---

25 cockle hat: Hat with cockleshell stuck in it as a sign that the wearer has been a pilgrim to the shrine of St. James of Compostella. The pilgrim's garb was a conventional disguise for lovers. 26 shoon: Shoes. 38 Larded: Decorated. 42 God 'ild: God yield or reward. owl: Reference to a monkish legend that a baker's daughter was turned into an owl for refusing bread to the Savior. 50 Valentine: This song alludes to the belief that the first girl seen by a man on the morning of this day was his valentine or true love. 52 dupp'd: Opened.

OPHELIA: Indeed, la, without an oath, I'll make an end on 't:

[Sings.] "By Gis° and by Saint Charity,

Alack, and fie for shame!

Young men will do 't, if they come to 't;

By cock,° they are to blame.

60

Quoth she, 'before you tumbled me,

You promis'd me to wed.'

'So would I ha' done, by yonder sun,

An thou hadst not come to my bed.'"

KING: How long hath she been thus?

65

OPHELIA: I hope all will be well. We must be patient: but I cannot choose but weep, to think they would lay him i' the cold ground. My brother shall know of it: and so I thank you for your good counsel. Come, my coach! Good night, ladies; good night, sweet ladies; good night, good night.

[Exit.]

KING: Follow her close; give her good watch, I pray you.

[Exit HORATIO.] 70

O, this is the poison of deep grief; it springs

All from her father's death. O Gertrude, Gertrude,

When sorrows come, they come not single spies,

But in battalions. First, her father slain:

Next your son gone; and he most violent author

75

Of his own just remove: the people muddied,

Thick and unwholesome in their thoughts and whispers,

For good Polonius' death; and we have done but greenly,°

In hugger-mugger° to inter him: poor Ophelia

Divided from herself and her fair judgement,

80

Without the which we are pictures, or mere beasts:

Last, and as much containing as all these,

Her brother is in secret come from France;

Feeds on his wonder, keeps himself in clouds,°

And wants not buzzers° to infect his ear

85

With pestilent speeches of his father's death;

Wherein necessity, of matter beggar'd,°

Will nothing stick° our person to arraign

In ear and ear.° O my dear Gertrude, this,

Like to a murd'ring-piece,° in many places

90

Gives me superfluous death.

A noise within.

QUEEN: Alack, what noise is this?

KING: Where are my Switzers?° Let them guard the door.

57 Gis: Jesus. 60 cock: Perversion of "God" in oaths. 78 greenly: Foolishly. 79 hugger-mugger: Secret haste. 84 in clouds: Invisible. 85 buzzers: Gossipers. 87 of matter beggar'd: Unprovided with facts. 88 nothing stick: Not hesitate. 89 In ear and ear: In everybody's ears. 90 murd'ring-piece: Small cannon or mortar; suggestion of numerous missiles fired. 92 Switzers: Swiss guards, mercenaries.

Enter a MESSENGER.

What is the matter?

MESSENGER: Save yourself, my lord:

The ocean, overpeering<sup>o</sup> of his list,<sup>o</sup>

Eats not the flats with more impiteous haste

95

Than young Laertes, in a riotous head,

O'erbears your officers. The rabble call him lord;

And, as the world were now but to begin,

Antiquity forgot, custom not known,

The ratifiers and props of every word,<sup>o</sup>

100

They cry "Choose we: Laertes shall be king":

Caps, hands, and tongues, applaud it to the clouds:

"Laertes shall be king, Laertes king!"

A noise within.

QUEEN: How cheerfully on the false trail they cry!

O, this is counter,<sup>o</sup> you false Danish dogs!

105

KING: The doors are broke.

Enter LAERTES with others.

LAERTES: Where is this king? Sirs, stand you all without.

DANES: No, let's come in.

LAERTES: I pray you, give me leave.

DANES: We will, we will.

[They retire without the door.]

LAERTES: I thank you: keep the door. O thou vile king, 110

Give me my father!

QUEEN: Calmly, good Laertes.

LAERTES: That drop of blood that's calm proclaims me bastard,

Cries cuckold to my father, brands the harlot

Even here, between the chaste unsmirched brow

Of my true mother.

KING: What is the cause, Laertes,

115

That thy rebellion looks so giant-like?

Let him go, Gertrude; do not fear our person:

There's such divinity doth hedge a king,

That treason can but peep to<sup>o</sup> what it would,<sup>o</sup>

Acts little of his will. Tell me, Laertes,

120

Why thou art thus incens'd. Let him go, Gertrude.

Speak, man.

LAERTES: Where is my father?

KING: Dead.

QUEEN: But not by him.

---

94 overpeering: Overflowing. list: Shore. 100 word: Promise. 105 counter: A hunting term meaning to follow the trail in a direction opposite to that which the game has taken. 119 peep to: I.e., look at from afar off. would: Wishes to do.

KING: Let him demand his fill.

LAERTES: How came he dead? I'll not be juggled with: 125

To hell, allegiance! vows, to the blackest devil!

Conscience and grace, to the profoundest pit!

I dare damnation. To this point I stand,

That both the worlds I give to negligence,<sup>o</sup>

Let come what comes; only I'll be reveng'd 130

Most throughly<sup>o</sup> for my father.

KING: Who shall stay you?

LAERTES: My will,<sup>o</sup> not all the world's:

And for my means, I'll husband them so well,

They shall go far with little.

KING: Good Laertes,

If you desire to know the certainty 135

Of your dear father, is 't writ in your revenge,

That, swoopstake,<sup>o</sup> you will draw both friend and foe,

Winner and loser?

LAERTES: None but his enemies.

KING: Will you know them then?

LAERTES: To his good friends thus wide I'll ope my arms; 140

And like the kind life-rend'ring pelican,<sup>o</sup>

Repast<sup>o</sup> them with my blood.

KING: Why, now you speak

Like a good child and a true gentleman.

That I am guiltless of your father's death,

And am most sensibly in grief for it, 145

It shall as level to your judgement 'pear

As day does to your eye.

A noise within: "Let her come in."

LAERTES: How now! what noise is that?

Enter OPHELIA.

O heat,<sup>o</sup> dry up my brains! tears seven times salt,

Burn out the sense and virtue of mine eye! 150

By heaven, thy madness shall be paid with weight,

Till our scale turn the beam. O rose of May!

Dear maid, kind sister, sweet Ophelia!

O heavens! is 't possible, a young maid's wits

Should be as mortal as an old man's life? 155

129 give to negligence: He despises both the here and the hereafter. 131 throughly: thoroughly. 132 My will: He will not be stopped except by his own will. 137 swoopstake: Literally, drawing the whole stake at once, i.e., indiscriminately. 141 pelican: Reference to the belief that the pelican feeds its young with its own blood. 142 Repast: Feed. 149 heat: Probably the heat generated by the passion of grief.

- Nature is fine in love, and where 'tis fine,
It sends some precious instance of itself
After the thing it loves.
- OPHELIA [Song]: "They bore him barefac'd on the bier;
Hey non nonny, nonny, hey nonny;
And in his grave rain'd many a tear:" — 160
Fare you well, my dove!
- LAERTES: Hadst thou thy wits, and didst persuade revenge,
It could not move thus.
- OPHELIA [sings]: "You must sing a-down a-down, 165
An you call him a-down-a."
O, how the wheel<sup>o</sup> becomes it! It is the false steward,<sup>o</sup> that stole his master's daughter.
- LAERTES: This nothing's more than matter.
- OPHELIA: There's rosemary,<sup>o</sup> that's for remembrance; pray you, love, remember: and 170 there is pansies,<sup>o</sup> that's for thoughts.
- LAERTES: A document<sup>o</sup> in madness, thoughts and remembrance fitted.
- OPHELIA: There's fennel<sup>o</sup> for you, and columbines:<sup>o</sup> there's rue<sup>o</sup> for you; and here's some for me: we may call it herb of grace<sup>o</sup> o' Sundays: O, you must wear your rue with a difference. There's a daisy:<sup>o</sup> I would give you some violets,<sup>o</sup> but they 175 withered all when my father died: they say 'a made a good end,— [Sings.] "For bonny sweet Robin is all my joy."<sup>o</sup>
- LAERTES: Thought<sup>o</sup> and affliction, passion, hell itself,
She turns to favour and to prettiness.
- OPHELIA [Song]: "And will 'a not come again?
And will 'a not come again?
No, no, he is dead:
Go to thy death-bed:
He never will come again.
"His beard was as white as snow, 185
All flaxen was his poll:<sup>o</sup>
He is gone, he is gone,

---

167 wheel: Spinning wheel as accompaniment to the song refrain. false steward: The story is unknown. 170 rosemary: Used as a symbol of remembrance both at weddings and at funerals. 171 pansies: Emblems of love and courtship (from the French pensée). 172 document: Piece of instruction or lesson. 173 fennel: Emblem of flattery. columbines: Emblem of unchastity (?) or ingratitude (?). rue: Emblem of repentance. It was usually mingled with holy water and then known as herb of grace. Ophelia is probably playing on the two meanings of rue, "repentant" and "even for ruth (pity)"; the former signification is for the queen, the latter for herself. 175 daisy: Emblem of dissembling, faithlessness. violets: Emblems of faithfulness. 177 For . . . joy: Probably a line from a Robin Hood ballad. 178 Thought: Melancholy thought. 180 And . . . again: This song appeared in the songbooks as "The Merry Milkmaids' Dumps." 186 poll: Head.

And we cast away<sup>o</sup> moan:
 God ha' mercy on his soul!"
 And of all Christian souls, I pray God. God be wi' you. [Exit.] 190

LAERTES: Do you see this, O God?

KING: Laertes, I must commune with your grief,
 Or you deny me right.<sup>o</sup> Go but apart,
 Make choice of whom your wisest friends you will,
 And they shall hear and judge 'twixt you and me: 195
 If by direct or by collateral<sup>o</sup> hand
 They find us touch'd,<sup>o</sup> we will our kingdom give,
 Our crown, our life, and all that we call ours,
 To you in satisfaction; but if not,
 Be you content to lend your patience to us, 200
 And we shall jointly labour with your soul
 To give it due content.

LAERTES: Let this be so;
 His means of death, his obscure funeral —
 No trophy, sword, nor hatchment<sup>o</sup> o'er his bones,
 No noble rite nor formal ostentation — 205
 Cry to be heard, as 'twere from heaven to earth,
 That I must call 't in question.

KING: So you shall;
 And where th' offence is let the great axe fall.
 I pray you, go with me. Exeunt.

[SCENE vi: Another room in the castle.]

Enter HORATIO and others.

HORATIO: What are they that would speak with me?

GENTLEMAN: Sea-faring men, sir: they say they have letters for you.

HORATIO: Let them come in. [Exit GENTLEMAN.]

I do not know from what part of the world
 I should be greeted, if not from Lord Hamlet.

5

Enter SAILORS.

FIRST SAILOR: God bless you, sir.

HORATIO: Let him bless thee too.

FIRST SAILOR: 'A shall sir, an 't please him. There's a letter for you, sir; it comes from the ambassador that was bound for England; if your name be Horatio, as I am let to know it is.

188 cast away: Shipwrecked. 193 right: My rights. 196 collateral: Indirect. 197 touch'd: Implicated. 204 hatchment: Tablet displaying the armorial bearings of a deceased person.

HORATIO [reads]: “Horatio, when thou shalt have overlooked this, give these fellows some means<sup>o</sup> to the king: they have letters for him. Ere we were two days old at sea, a pirate of very warlike appointment gave us chase. Finding ourselves too slow of sail, we put on a compelled valour, and in the grapple I boarded them: on the instant they got clear of our ship; so I alone became their prisoner. They have dealt with me like thieves of mercy:<sup>o</sup> but they knew what they did; I am to do a good turn for them. Let the king have the letters I have sent; and repair thou to me with as much speed as thou wouldest fly death. I have words to speak in thine ear will make thee dumb; yet are they much too light for the bore<sup>o</sup> of the matter. These good fellows will bring thee where I am. Rosencrantz and Guildenstern hold their course for England: of them I have much to tell thee. Farewell. He that thou knowest thine, HAMLET.”

Come, I will give you way for these your letters;
And do ’t the speedier, that you may direct me
To him from whom you brought them. Exeunt.

[SCENE vii: Another room in the castle.]

Enter KING and LAERTES.

KING: Now must your conscience<sup>o</sup> my acquittance seal,
And you must put me in your heart for friend,
Sith you have heard, and with a knowing ear,
That he which hath your noble father slain
Pursued my life.

LAERTES: It well appears: but tell me
Why you proceeded not against these feats,
So criminal and so capital<sup>o</sup> in nature,
As by your safety, wisdom, all things else,
You mainly<sup>o</sup> were stirr’d up.

KING: O, for two special reasons;
Which may to you, perhaps, seem much unsinew’d,<sup>o</sup>
But yet to me th’ are strong. The queen his mother
Lives almost by his looks; and for myself —
My virtue or my plague, be it either which —
She’s so conjunctive<sup>o</sup> to my life and soul,
That, as the star moves not but in his sphere,<sup>o</sup>
I could not but by her. The other motive,

Scene vi. 12 means: Means of access. 16 thieves of mercy: Merciful thieves. 19 bore: Caliber, importance. Scene vii. 1 conscience: Knowledge that this is true. 7 capital: Punishable by death. 9 mainly: Greatly. 10 unsinew’d: Weak. 14 conjunctive: Conformable (the next line suggesting planetary conjunction). 15 sphere: The hollow sphere in which, according to Ptolemaic astronomy, the planets were supposed to move.

Why to a public count<sup>o</sup> I might not go,
 Is the great love the general gender<sup>o</sup> bear him;
 Who, dipping all his faults in their affection,
 Would, like the spring<sup>o</sup> that turneth wood to stone, 20
 Convert his gyves<sup>o</sup> to graces; so that my arrows,
 Too slightly timber'd<sup>o</sup> for so loud<sup>o</sup> a wind,
 Would have reverted to my bow again,
 And not where I had aim'd them.

LAERTES: And so have I a noble father lost; 25
 A sister driven into desp'rate terms,<sup>o</sup>
 Whose worth, if praises may go back<sup>o</sup> again,
 Stood challenger on mount<sup>o</sup> of all the age<sup>o</sup>
 For her perfections: but my revenge will come.

KING: Break not your sleeps for that: you must not think 30
 That we are made of stuff so flat and dull
 That we can let our beard be shook with danger
 And think it pastime. You shortly shall hear more:
 I lov'd your father, and we love ourself;
 And that, I hope, will teach you to imagine — 35

Enter a MESSENGER with letters.

How now! what news?

MESSENGER: Letters, my lord, from Hamlet:
 These to your majesty; this to the queen.<sup>o</sup>

KING: From Hamlet! who brought them?

MESSENGER: Sailors, my lord, they say; I saw them not: 40
 They were given me by Claudio;<sup>o</sup> he receiv'd them
 Of him that brought them.

KING: Laertes, you shall hear them.

Leave us. [Exit MESSENGER.]

[Reads.] "High and mighty, You shall know I am set naked<sup>o</sup> on your kingdom.
 To-morrow shall I beg leave to see your kingly eyes: when I shall, first asking your pardon thereunto, recount the occasion of my sudden and more strange 45 return. HAMLET."
 What should this mean? Are all the rest come back?
 Or is it some abuse, and no such thing?

17 count: Account, reckoning. 18 general gender: Common people. 20 spring: I.e., one heavily charged with lime. 21 gyves: Fetters; here, faults, or possibly, punishments inflicted (on him). 22 slightly timber'd: Light. loud: Strong. 26 terms: State, condition. 27 go back: Return to Ophelia's former virtues. 28 on mount: Set up on high, mounted (on horseback). of all the age: Qualifies challenger and not mount. 37 to the queen: One hears no more of the letter to the queen. 40 Claudio: This character does not appear in the play. 43 naked: Unprovided (with retinue).

LAERTES: Know you the hand?

KING: 'Tis Hamlet's character. "Naked!"

And in a postscript here, he says "alone."

50

Can you devise<sup>o</sup> me?

LAERTES: I'm lost in it, my lord. But let him come;

It warms the very sickness in my heart,
That I shall live and tell him to his teeth,
"Thus didst thou."

KING: If it be so, Laertes —

55

As how should it be so? how otherwise?<sup>o</sup> —

Will you be rul'd by me?

LAERTES: Ay, my lord;

So you will not o'errule me to a peace.

KING: To thine own peace. If he be now return'd,

As checking at<sup>o</sup> his voyage, and that he means

60

No more to undertake it, I will work him

To an exploit, now ripe in my device,

Under the which he shall not choose but fall:

And for his death no wind of blame shall breathe,

But even his mother shall uncharge the practice<sup>o</sup>

65

And call it accident.

LAERTES: My lord, I will be rul'd;

The rather, if you could devise it so

That I might be the organ.<sup>o</sup>

KING: It falls right.

You have been talk'd of since your travel much,

And that in Hamlet's hearing, for a quality

70

Wherein, they say, you shine: your sum of parts

Did not together pluck such envy from him

As did that one, and that, in my regard,

Of the unworthiest siege.<sup>o</sup>

LAERTES: What part is that, my lord?

KING: A very riband in the cap of youth,

75

Yet needful too; for youth no less becomes

The light and careless livery that it wears

Than settled age his sables<sup>o</sup> and his weeds,

Importing health and graveness. Two months since,

51 devise: Explain to. 56 As . . . otherwise? How can this (Hamlet's return) be true? (yet) how otherwise than true (since we have the evidence of his letter)? Some editors read How should it not be so, etc., making the words refer to Laertes's desire to meet with Hamlet. 60 checking at: Used in falconry of a hawk's leaving the quarry to fly at a chance bird; turn aside. 65 uncharge the practice: Acquit the stratagem of being a plot. 68 organ: Agent, instrument. 74 siege: Rank. 78 sables: Rich garments.

- Here was a gentleman of Normandy:— 80
 I have seen myself, and serv'd against, the French,
 And they can well<sup>o</sup> on horseback: but this gallant
 Had witchcraft in 't; he grew unto his seat;
 And to such wondrous doing brought his horse,
 As had he been incorp's'd and demi-natur'd<sup>o</sup> 85
 With the brave beast: so far he topp'd<sup>o</sup> my thought,
 That I, in forgery<sup>o</sup> of shapes and tricks,
 Come short of what he did.
- LAERTES: A Norman was 't?
 KING: A Norman.
 LAERTES: Upon my life, Lamord.<sup>o</sup>
 KING: The very same. 90
 LAERTES: I know him well: he is the brooch indeed
 And gem of all the nation.
 KING: He made confession<sup>o</sup> of you,
 And gave you such a masterly report
 For art and exercise<sup>o</sup> in your defence<sup>o</sup> 95
 And for your rapier most especial,
 That he cried out, 'twould be a sight indeed,
 If one could match you: the scrimers<sup>o</sup> of their nation,
 He swore, had neither motion, guard, nor eye,
 If you oppos'd them. Sir, this report of his 100
 Did Hamlet so envenom with his envy
 That he could nothing do but wish and beg
 Your sudden coming o'er, to play<sup>o</sup> with you.
 Now, out of this,—
- LAERTES: What out of this, my lord?
 KING: Laertes, was your father dear to you? 105
 Or are you like the painting of a sorrow,
 A face without a heart?
- LAERTES: Why ask you this?
 KING: Not that I think you did not love your father;
 But that I know love is begun by time;
 And that I see, in passages of proof,<sup>o</sup> 110
 Time qualifies the spark and fire of it.
 There lives within the very flame of love

82 can well: Are skilled. 85 incorp's'd and demi-natur'd: Of one body and nearly of one nature (like the centaur). 86 topp'd: Surpassed. 87 forgery: Invention. 90 Lamord: This refers possibly to Pietro Monte, instructor to Louis XII's master of the horse. 93 confession: Grudging admission of superiority. 95 art and exercise: Skillful exercise. defence: Science of defense in sword practice. 98 scrimers: Fencers. 103 play: Fence. 110 passages of proof: Proved instances.

A kind of wick or snuff that will abate it;
 And nothing is at a like goodness still;
 For goodness, growing to a plurisy,<sup>o</sup> 115
 Dies in his own too much:<sup>o</sup> that we would do,
 We should do when we would; for this “would” changes
 And hath abatements<sup>o</sup> and delays as many
 As there are tongues, are hands, are accidents;<sup>o</sup>
 And then this “should” is like a spendthrift<sup>o</sup> sigh, 120
 That hurts by easing. But, to the quick o’ th’ ulcer:<sup>o</sup> —
 Hamlet comes back: what would you undertake,
 To show yourself your father’s son in deed
 More than in words?

LAERTES: To cut his throat i’ th’ church.

KING: No place, indeed, should murder sanctuarize;<sup>o</sup> 125
 Revenge should have no bounds. But, good Laertes,
 Will you do this, keep close within your chamber.
 Hamlet return’d shall know you are come home:
 We’ll put on those shall praise your excellence
 And set a double varnish on the fame 130
 The Frenchman gave you, bring you in fine together
 And wager on your heads: he, being remiss,
 Most generous and free from all contriving,
 Will not peruse the foils; so that, with ease,
 Or with a little shuffling, you may choose 135
 A sword unbated,<sup>o</sup> and in a pass of practice<sup>o</sup>
 Requite him for your father.

LAERTES: I will do ’t:

And, for that purpose, I’ll anoint my sword.
 I bought an unction of a mountebank,<sup>o</sup>
 So mortal that, but dip a knife in it, 140
 Where it draws blood no cataplasms<sup>o</sup> so rare, Collected from all simples<sup>o</sup> that have virtue
 Under the moon,<sup>o</sup> can save the thing from death
 That is but scratch’d withal: I’ll touch my point

115 plurisy: Excess, plethora. 116 in his own too much: Of its own excess. 118 abatements: Diminutions. 119 accidents: Occurrences, incidents. 120 spendthrift: An allusion to the belief that each sigh cost the heart a drop of blood. 121 quick o’ th’ ulcer: Heart of the difficulty. 125 sanctuarize: Protect from punishment; allusion to the right of sanctuary with which certain religious places were invested. 136 unbated: Not blunted, having no button. pass of practice: Treacherous thrust. 139 mountebank: Quack doctor. 141 cataplasms: Plaster or poultice. 142 simples: Herbs. 143 Under the moon: I.e., when collected by moonlight to add to their medicinal value.

With this contagion, that, if I gall<sup>o</sup> him slightly, 145
It may be death.

KING: Let's further think of this;
Weigh what convenience both of time and means
May fit us to our shape:<sup>o</sup> if this should fail,
And that our drift look through our bad performance,<sup>o</sup>
'Twere better not assay'd: therefore this project 150
Should have a back or second, that might hold,
If this should blast in proof.<sup>o</sup> Soft! let me see:
We'll make a solemn wager on your cunnings:<sup>o</sup>
I ha 't:
When in your motion you are hot and dry — 155
As make your bouts more violent to that end —
And that he calls for drink, I'll have prepar'd him
A chalice<sup>o</sup> for the nonce, whereon but sipping,
If he by chance escape your venom'd stuck,<sup>o</sup>
Our purpose may hold there. But stay, what noise? 160

Enter QUEEN.

QUEEN: One woe doth tread upon another's heel,
So fast they follow: your sister's drown'd, Laertes.

LAERTES: Drown'd! O, where?

QUEEN: There is a willow<sup>o</sup> grows askant<sup>o</sup> the brook,
That shows his hoar<sup>o</sup> leaves in the glassy stream; 165
There with fantastic garlands did she make
Of crow-flowers,<sup>o</sup> nettles, daisies, and long purples<sup>o</sup>
That liberal<sup>o</sup> shepherds give a grosser name,
But our cold maids do dead men's fingers call them:
There, on the pendent boughs her crownet<sup>o</sup> weeds 170
Clamb'ring to hang, an envious sliver<sup>o</sup> broke;
When down her weedy<sup>o</sup> trophies and herself
Fell in the weeping brook. Her clothes spread wide;
And, mermaid-like, awhile they bore her up:
Which time she chanted snatches of old lauds;<sup>o</sup> 175
As one incapable<sup>o</sup> of her own distress,

145 gall: Graze, wound. 148 shape: Part we propose to act. 149 drift . . . performance: Intention be disclosed by our bungling. 152 blast in proof: Burst in the test (like a cannon). 153 cunnings: Skills. 158 chalice: Cup. 159 stuck: Thrust (from stoccado). 164 willow: For its significance of forsaken love. askant: Aslant. 165 hoar: White (i.e., on the underside). 167 crow-flowers: Buttercups. long purples: Early purple orchids. 168 liberal: Probably, free-spoken. 170 crownet: Coronet; made into a chaplet. 171 sliver: Branch. 172 weedy: I.e., of plants. 175 lauds: Hymns. 176 incapable: Lacking capacity to apprehend.

Or like a creature native and indued°
 Upon that element: but long it could not be Till that her garments, heavy with their drink, Pull'd the poor wretch from her melodious lay 180
 To muddy death.

LAERTES: Alas, then, she is drown'd?

QUEEN: Drown'd, drown'd.

LAERTES: Too much of water hast thou, poor Ophelia,
 And therefore I forbid my tears: but yet
 It is our trick;° nature her custom holds, 185
 Let shame say what it will: when these are gone,
 The woman will be out.° Adieu, my lord:
 I have a speech of fire, that fain would blaze,
 But that this folly drowns it. Exit.

KING: Let's follow, Gertrude:
 How much I had to do to calm his rage! 190
 Now fear I this will give it start again;
 Therefore let 's follow. Exeunt.

[ACT V

SCENE i: A churchyard.]

Enter two CLOWNS° [with spades, &c.].

FIRST CLOWN: Is she to be buried in Christian burial when she wilfully seeks her own salvation?

SECOND CLOWN: I tell thee she is; therefore make her grave straight:° the crowner° hath sat on her, and finds it Christian burial.

FIRST CLOWN: How can that be, unless she drowned herself in her own defence? 5

SECOND CLOWN: Why, 'tis found so.

FIRST CLOWN: It must be "se offendendo";° it cannot be else. For here lies the point: if I drown myself wittingly,° it argues an act: and an act hath three branches;° it is, to act, to do, and to perform: argal,° she drowned herself wittingly.

SECOND CLOWN: Nay, but hear you, Goodman delver,° — 10

177 indued: Endowed with qualities fitting her for living in water. 185 trick: Way. 186–187 when . . . out: When my tears are all shed, the woman in me will be satisfied. Act V, Scene i. Clowns: The word clown was used to denote peasants as well as humorous characters; here applied to the rustic type of clown. 3 straight: Straightway, immediately; some interpret "from east to west in a direct line, parallel with the church." crowner: Coroner. 7 "se offendendo": For se defendendo, term used in verdicts of justifiable homicide. 8 wittingly: Intentionally. three branches: Parody of legal phraseology. 9 argal: Corruption of ergo, therefore. 10 delver: Digger.

FIRST CLOWN: Give me leave. Here lies the water; good: here stands the man; good: if the man go to this water, and drown himself, it is, will he, nill he, he goes, — mark you that; but if the water come to him and drown him, he drowns not himself: argal, he that is not guilty of his own death shortens not his own life.

SECOND CLOWN: But is this law? 15

FIRST CLOWN: Ay, marry, is 't; crowner's quest<sup>o</sup> law.

SECOND CLOWN: Will you ha' the truth on 't? If this had not been a gentlewoman, she should have been buried out o' Christian burial.

FIRST CLOWN: Why, there thou say'st:<sup>o</sup> and the more pity that great folk should have countenance<sup>o</sup> in this world to drown or hang themselves, more than their even<sup>o</sup> 20 Christian. Come, my spade. There is no ancient gentlemen but gardeners, ditchers, and grave-makers: they hold up<sup>o</sup> Adam's profession.

SECOND CLOWN: Was he a gentleman?

FIRST CLOWN: 'A was the first that ever bore arms.

SECOND CLOWN: Why, he had none. 25

FIRST CLOWN: What, art a heathen? How dost thou understand the Scripture? The Scripture says "Adam digged": could he dig without arms? I'll put another question to thee: if thou answerest me not to the purpose, confess thyself<sup>o</sup> —

SECOND CLOWN: Go to.<sup>o</sup>

FIRST CLOWN: What is he that builds stronger than either the mason, the shipwright, 30 or the carpenter?

SECOND CLOWN: The gallows-maker; for that frame outlives a thousand tenants.

FIRST CLOWN: I like thy wit well, in good faith: the gallows does well; but how does it well? it does well to those that do ill: now thou dost ill to say the gallows is built 35 stronger than the church: argal, the gallows may do well to thee. To 't again, come.

SECOND CLOWN: "Who builds stronger than a mason, a shipwright, or a carpenter?"

FIRST CLOWN: Ay, tell me that, and unyoke.<sup>o</sup>

SECOND CLOWN: Marry, now I can tell.

FIRST CLOWN: To 't.

SECOND CLOWN: Mass,<sup>o</sup> I cannot tell. 40

Enter HAMLET and HORATIO [at a distance].

FIRST CLOWN: Cudgel thy brains no more about it, for your dull ass will not mend his pace with beating; and, when you are asked this question next, say "a grave-maker": the houses he makes last till doomsday. Go, get thee in, and fetch me a stoup<sup>o</sup> of liquor. [Exit SECOND CLOWN.] Song. [He digs.]

"In youth, when I did love, did love,

Methought it was very sweet,

45

16 quest: Inquest. 19 there thou say'st: That's right. 20 countenance: Privilege. even: Fellow. 22 hold up: Maintain, continue. 28 confess thyself: "And be hanged" completes the proverb. 29 Go to: Perhaps, "begin," or some other form of concession. 37 unyoke: After this great effort you may unharness the team of your wits. 40 Mass: By the Mass. 44 stoup: Two-quart measure.

- To contract—O—the time, for—a—my behave,<sup>o</sup> O, methought, there—a—was nothing—a—meet.”
- HAMLET: Has this fellow no feeling of his business, that ’a sings at grave-making?
- HORATIO: Custom hath made it in him a property of easiness.<sup>o</sup> 50
- HAMLET: ’Tis e’en so: the hand of little employment hath the daintier sense.
- FIRST CLOWN [Song]: “But age, with his stealing steps, Hath claw’d me in his clutch,
 And hath shipped me into the land
 As if I had never been such.” [Throws up a skull.] 55
- HAMLET: That skull had a tongue in it, and could sing once: how the knave jowls<sup>o</sup> it to the ground, as if ’twere Cain’s jaw-bone,<sup>o</sup> that did the first murder! This might be the pate of a politician,<sup>o</sup> which this ass now o’er-reaches;<sup>o</sup> one that would circumvent God, might it not?
- HORATIO: It might, my lord. 60
- HAMLET: Or of a courtier; which could say “Good morrow, sweet lord! How dost thou, sweet lord?” This might be my lord such-a-one, that praised my lord such-a-one’s horse, when he meant to beg it; might it not?
- HORATIO: Ay, my lord.
- HAMLET: Why, e’en so: and now my Lady Worm’s; chapless,<sup>o</sup> and knocked about the 65
 mazzard<sup>o</sup> with a sexton’s spade: here’s fine revolution, an we had the trick to see
 ’t. Did these bones cost no more the breeding, but to play at loggats<sup>o</sup> with ’em?
 mine ache to think on ’t.
- FIRST CLOWN [Song]: “A pick-axe, and a spade, a spade,
 For and<sup>o</sup> a shrouding sheet: 70
 O, a pit of clay for to be made
 For such a guest is meet.” [Throws up another skull.]
- HAMLET: There’s another: why may not that be the skull of a lawyer? Where be his quiddities<sup>o</sup> now, his quillities,<sup>o</sup> his cases, his tenures,<sup>o</sup> and his tricks? why does he suffer this mad knave now to knock him about the sconce<sup>o</sup> with a dirty shovel, 75 and will not tell him of his action of battery? Hum! This fellow might be in ’s time a great buyer of land, with his statutes, his recognizances,<sup>o</sup> his fines, his

---

47 behave: Benefit. 50 property of easiness: A peculiarity that now is easy. 56 jowls: Dashes. 57 Cain’s jaw-bone: Allusion to the old tradition that Cain slew Abel with the jaw-bone of an ass. 58 politician: Schemer, plotter. o’er-reaches: Quibble on the literal sense and the sense “circumvent.” 65 chapless: Having no lower jaw. 66 mazzard: Head. 67 loggats: A game in which six sticks are thrown to lie as near as possible to a stake fixed in the ground or block of wood on a floor. 70 For and: And moreover. 74 quiddities: Subtleties, quibbles. quillities: Verbal niceties, subtle distinctions. tenures: The holding of a piece of property or office, or the conditions or period of such holding. 75 sconce: Head. 77 statutes, recognizances: Legal terms connected with the transfer of land. 78 vouchers: Persons called on to warrant a tenant’s title. recoveries: Process for transfer of entailed estate. fine: The four uses of this word are as follows: (1) end, (2) legal process, (3) elegant, (4) small.

his recoveries, to have his fine pate full of fine dirt? will his vouchers vouch him no more of his purchases, and double ones too, than the length and breadth of a pair of indentures?<sup>80</sup> The very conveyances of his lands will scarcely lie in this box; and must the inheritor<sup>81</sup> himself have no more, ha?

HORATIO: Not a jot more, my lord.

HAMLET: Is not parchment made of sheep-skins?

HORATIO: Ay, my lord, and of calf-skins<sup>82</sup> too. 85

HAMLET: They are sheep and calves which seek out assurance in that.<sup>83</sup>

I will speak to this fellow. Whose grave's this, sirrah?

FIRST CLOWN: Mine, sir.

[Sings.] "O, a pit of clay for to be made
For such a guest is meet." 90

HAMLET: I think it be thine, indeed; for thou liest in 't.

FIRST CLOWN: You lie out on 't, sir, and therefore 't is not yours: for my part, I do not lie in 't, yet it is mine.

HAMLET: Thou dost lie in 't, to be in 't and say it is thine: 'tis for the dead, not for the quick; therefore thou liest. 95

FIRST CLOWN: 'Tis a quick lie, sir; 'twill away again, from me to you.

HAMLET: What man dost thou dig it for?

FIRST CLOWN: For no man, sir.

HAMLET: What woman, then?

FIRST CLOWN: For none, neither. 100

HAMLET: Who is to be buried in 't?

FIRST CLOWN: One that was a woman, sir; but, rest her soul, she's dead.

HAMLET: How absolute<sup>84</sup> the knave is! we must speak by the card,<sup>85</sup> or equivocation<sup>86</sup> will undo us. By the Lord, Horatio, these three years I have taken note of it; the age is grown so picked<sup>87</sup> that the toe of the peasant comes so near the heel of the 105 courtier, he galls<sup>88</sup> his kibe.<sup>89</sup> How long hast thou been a grave-maker?

FIRST CLOWN: Of all the day i' the year, I came to 't that day that our last king Hamlet overcame Fortinbras.

HAMLET: How long is that since?

FIRST CLOWN: Cannot you tell that? every fool can tell that: it was the very day that 110 young Hamlet was born; he that is mad, and sent into England.

HAMLET: Ay, marry, why was he sent into England?

FIRST CLOWN: Why, because 'a was mad: 'a shall recover his wits there; or, if 'a do not,
'tis no great matter there.

HAMLET: Why? 115

FIRST CLOWN: 'Twill not be seen in him there; there the men are as mad as he.

---

81 indentures: Conveyances or contracts. 82 inheritor: Possessor, owner. 85 calf-skins: Parchments. 86 assurance in that: Safety in legal parchments. 103 absolute: Positive, decided. by the card: With precision, i.e., by the mariner's card on which the points of the compass were marked. equivocation: Ambiguity in the use of terms. 105 picked: Refined, fastidious. 106 galls: Chafes. kibe: Chilblain.

HAMLET: How came he mad?

FIRST CLOWN: Very strangely, they say.

HAMLET: How strangely?

FIRST CLOWN: Faith, e'en with losing his wits. 120

HAMLET: Upon what ground?

FIRST CLOWN: Why, here in Denmark: I have been sexton here, man and boy, thirty years.<sup>o</sup>

HAMLET: How long will a man lie i' the earth ere he rot?

FIRST CLOWN: Faith, if 'a be not rotten before 'a die—as we have many pocky<sup>o</sup> corsers 125 now-a-days, that will scarce hold the laying in—'a will last you some eight year or nine year: a tanner will last you nine year.

HAMLET: Why he more than another?

FIRST CLOWN: Why, sir, his hide is so tanned with his trade, that 'a will keep out water a great while; and your water is a sore decayer of your whoreson dead body. 130
Here's a skull now hath lain you i' th' earth three and twenty years.

HAMLET: Whose was it?

FIRST CLOWN: A whoreson mad fellow's it was: whose do you think it was?

HAMLET: Nay, I know not.

FIRST CLOWN: A pestilence on him for a mad rogue! 'a poured a flagon of Rhenish on 135 my head once. This same skull, sir, was Yorick's skull, the king's jester.

HAMLET: This?

FIRST CLOWN: E'en that.

HAMLET: Let me see. [Takes the skull.] Alas, poor Yorick! I knew him, Horatio: a fellow of infinite jest, of most excellent fancy: he hath borne me on his back a 140 thousand times; and now, how abhorred in my imagination it is! my gorge rises at it. Here hung those lips that I have kissed I know not how oft. Where be your gibes now? your gambols? your songs? your flashes of merriment, that were wont to set the table on a roar? Not one now, to mock your own grinning? quite chap-fallen? Now get you to my lady's chamber, and tell her, let her paint an inch 145 thick, to this favour she must come; make her laugh at that. Prithee, Horatio, tell me one thing.

HORATIO: What's that, my lord?

HAMLET: Dost thou think Alexander looked o' this fashion i' the earth?

HORATIO: E'en so. 150

HAMLET: And smelt so? pah! [Puts down the skull.]

HORATIO: E'en so, my lord.

HAMLET: To what base uses we may return, Horatio! Why may not imagination trace the noble dust of Alexander, till 'a find it stopping a bung-hole?

HORATIO: 'Twere to consider too curiously,<sup>o</sup> to consider so. 155

HAMLET: No, faith, not a jot; but to follow him thither with modesty enough, and likelihood to lead it: as thus: Alexander died, Alexander was buried, Alexander

122–123 thirty years: This statement with that in lines 110–111 shows Hamlet's age to be thirty years. 125 pocky: Rotten, diseased. 155 curiously: Minutely.

returneth into dust; the dust is earth; of earth we make loam;<sup>o</sup> and why of that loam, whereto he was converted, might they not stop a beer-barrel?

Imperious<sup>o</sup> Cæsar, dead and turn'd to clay, 160
 Might stop a hole to keep the wind away:
 O, that that earth, which kept the world in awe,
 Should patch a wall t'expel the winter's flaw!<sup>o</sup>
 But soft! but soft awhile! here comes the king,

Enter KING, QUEEN, LAERTES, and the Corse [of OPHELIA, in procession, with Priest, Lords, etc.].

The queen, the courtiers: who is this they follow? 165
 And with such maimed rites? This doth betoken
 The corse they follow did with desp'rate hand
 Couch<sup>o</sup> we awhile, and mark. [Retiring with HORATIO.]

LAERTES: What ceremony else?

HAMLET: That is Laertes, 170

A very noble youth: mark.

LAERTES: What ceremony else?

FIRST PRIEST: Her obsequies have been as far enlarg'd<sup>o</sup>
 As we have warranty: her death was doubtful;
 And, but that great command o'ersways the order, 175
 She should in ground unsanctified have lodg'd
 Till the last trumpet; for charitable prayers,
 Shards,<sup>o</sup> flints and pebbles should be thrown on her:
 Yet here she is allow'd her virgin crants,<sup>o</sup>
 Her maiden strewments<sup>o</sup> and the bringing home 180
 Of bell and burial.<sup>o</sup>

LAERTES: Must there no more be done?

FIRST PRIEST: No more be done:

We should profane the service of the dead

To sing a requiem and such rest to her

As to peace-parted<sup>o</sup> souls.

LAERTES: Lay her i' th' earth: 185

And from her fair and unpolluted flesh

May violets spring! I tell thee, churlish priest,

158 loam: Clay paste for brickmaking. 160 Imperious: Imperial. 163 flaw: Gust of wind. 168 Fordo: Destroy. it: Its. 169 Couch: Hide, lurk. 173 enlarg'd: Extended, referring to the fact that suicides are not given full burial rites. 178 Shards: Broken bits of pottery. 179 crants: Garlands customarily hung upon the biers of unmarried women. 180 strewments: Traditional strewing of flowers. 180–181 bringing . . . burial: The laying to rest of the body, to the sound of the bell. 185 peace-parted: Allusion to the text "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace."

- A minist'ring angel shall my sister be,
When thou liest howling.<sup>o</sup>
- HAMLET: What, the fair Ophelia!
- QUEEN: Sweets to the sweet: farewell! [Scattering flowers.] 190
I hop'd thou shouldst have been my Hamlet's wife;
I thought thy bride-bed to have deck'd, sweet maid,
And not have strew'd thy grave.
- LAERTES: O, treble woe
Fall ten times treble on that cursed head,
Whose wicked deed thy most ingenious sense<sup>o</sup> 195
Depriv'd thee of! Hold off the earth awhile,
Till I have caught her once more in mine arms: [Leaps into the grave.]
Now pile your dust upon the quick and dead,
Till of this flat a mountain you have made,
T' o'ertop old Pelion,<sup>o</sup> or the skyish head 200
Of blue Olympus.
- HAMLET: [Advancing] What is he whose grief
Bears such an emphasis? whose phrase of sorrow
Conjures the wand'ring stars,<sup>o</sup> and makes them stand
Like wonder-wounded hearers? This is I,
Hamlet the Dane. [Leaps into the grave.]
- LAERTES: The devil take thy soul! [Grappling with him.] 205
- HAMLET: Thou pray'st not well.
I prithee, take thy fingers from my throat;
For, though I am not splenitive<sup>o</sup> and rash,
Yet have I in me something dangerous,
Which let thy wisdom fear: hold off thy hand. 210
- KING: Pluck them asunder.
- QUEEN: Hamlet, Hamlet!
- ALL: Gentlemen,—
- HORATIO: Good my lord, be quiet.
- [The ATTENDANTS part them, and they come out of the grave.]*
- HAMLET: Why, I will fight with him upon this theme Until my eyelids will no longer wag.<sup>o</sup>
- QUEEN: O my son, what theme? 215
- HAMLET: I lov'd Ophelia: forty thousand brothers
Could not, with all their quantity<sup>o</sup> of love,
Make up my sum. What wilt thou do for her?

---

189 howling: I.e., in hell. 195 ingenious sense: Mind endowed with finest qualities. 200 Pelion: Olympus, Pelion, and Ossa are mountains in the north of Thessaly. 203 wand'ring stars: Planets. 208 splenitive: Quick-tempered. 214 wag: Move (not used ludicrously). 217 quantity: Some suggest that the word is used in a deprecatory sense (little bits, fragments).

KING: O, he is mad, Laertes.

QUEEN: For love of God, forbear<sup>o</sup> him.

HAMLET: 'Swounds,<sup>o</sup> show me what thou 'lt do:

Woo 't<sup>o</sup> weep? woo 't fight? woo 't fast? woo 't tear thyself?

Woo 't drink up eisel?<sup>o</sup> eat a crocodile?

I'll do 't. Dost thou come here to whine?

To outface me with leaping in her grave?

225

Be buried quick with her, and so will I:

And, if thou prate of mountains, let them throw

Millions of acres on us, till our ground,

Singeing his pate against the burning zone,<sup>o</sup>

Make Ossa like a wart! Nay, an thou 'lt mouth, 230

I'll rant as well as thou.

QUEEN: This is mere madness:

And thus awhile the fit will work on him;

Anon, as patient as the female dove.

When that her golden couplets<sup>o</sup> are disclos'd,

His silence will sit drooping.

HAMLET: Hear you, sir;

235

What is the reason that you use me thus?

I lov'd you ever: but it is no matter;

Let Hercules himself do what he may,

The cat will mew and dog will have his day.

KING: I pray thee, good Horatio, wait upon him. Exit HAMLET and HORATIO.

240

[To LAERTES.] Strengthen your patience in<sup>o</sup> our last night's speech;

We'll put the matter to the present push.<sup>o</sup>

Good Gertrude, set some watch over your son.

This grave shall have a living<sup>o</sup> monument:

An hour of quiet shortly shall we see;

245

Till then, in patience our proceeding be.

Exeunt.

[SCENE ii: A hall in the castle.]

Enter HAMLET and HORATIO.

HAMLET: So much for this, sir: now shall you see the other;

You do remember all the circumstance?

220 forbear: Leave alone. 221 'Swounds: Oath, "God's wounds." 222 Woo 't: Wilt thou. 223 eisel: Vinegar. Some editors have taken this to be the name of a river, such as the Yssel, the Weissel, or the Nile. 229 burning zone: Sun's orbit. 234 golden couplets: The pigeon lays two eggs; the young when hatched are covered with golden down. 241 in: By recalling. 242 present push: Immediate test. 244 living: Lasting; also refers (for Laertes's benefit) to the plot against Hamlet.

HORATIO: Remember it, my lord!

HAMLET: Sir, in my heart there was a kind of fighting,
 That would not let me sleep: methought I lay 5
 Worse than the mutines in the bilboes.<sup>9</sup> Rashly,<sup>9</sup>
 And prais'd be rashness for it, let us know,
 Our indiscretion sometime serves us well,
 When our deep plots do pall:<sup>9</sup> and that should learn us
 There's a divinity that shapes our ends, 10
 Rough-hew<sup>9</sup> them how we will,—

HORATIO: That is most certain.

HAMLET: Up from my cabin,
 My sea-gown<sup>9</sup> scarf'd about me, in the dark
 Grop'd I to find out them; had my desire,
 Finger'd<sup>9</sup> their packet, and in fine<sup>9</sup> withdrew 15
 To mine own room again; making so bold,
 My fears forgetting manners, to unseal
 Their grand commission; where I found, Horatio,— O royal knavery!—an exact command,
 Larded<sup>9</sup> with many several sorts of reasons 20
 Importing Denmark's health and England's too,
 With, ho! such bugs<sup>9</sup> and goblins in my life,<sup>9</sup>
 That, on the supervise,<sup>9</sup> no leisure bated,<sup>9</sup>
 No, not to stay the grinding of the axe,
 My head should be struck off.

HORATIO: Is 't possible? 25

HAMLET: Here's the commission: read it at more leisure.

But wilt thou hear me how I did proceed?

HORATIO: I beseech you.

HAMLET: Being thus be-netted round with villanies,—
 Ere I could make a prologue to my brains, 30
 They had begun the play<sup>9</sup>—I sat me down,
 Devis'd a new commission, wrote it fair:
 I once did hold it, as our statist<sup>9</sup> do,
 A baseness to write fair<sup>9</sup> and labour'd much
 How to forget that learning, but, sir, now 35

Scene ii. 6 mutines in the bilboes: Mutineers in shackles. Rashly: Goes with line 12. 9 pall: Fail. 11 Rough-hew: Shape roughly; it may mean "bungle." 13 sea-gown: "A sea-gown, or a coarse, high-collared, and short-sleeved gowne, reaching down to the mid-leg, and used most by seamen and saylors" (Cotgrave, quoted by Singer). 15 Finger'd: Pilfered, filched. in fine: Finally. 20 Larded: Enriched. 22 bugs: Bugbears. such . . . life: Such imaginary dangers if I were allowed to live. 23 supervise: Perusal. leisure bated: Delay allowed. 30–31 prologue . . . play: I.e., before I could begin to think, my mind had made its decision. 33 statists: Statesmen. 34 fair: In a clear hand.

It did me yeoman's<sup>o</sup> service: wilt thou know
Th' effect of what I wrote?

HORATIO: Ay, good my lord.

HAMLET: An earnest conjuration from the king,
As England was his faithful tributary,
As love between them like the palm might flourish, 40
As peace should still her wheaten garland<sup>o</sup> wear
And stand a comma<sup>o</sup> 'tween their amities,
And many such-like 'As'es<sup>o</sup> of great charge,<sup>o</sup>
That, on the view and knowing of these contents,
Without debatement further, more or less, 45
He should the bearers put to sudden death,
Not shriving-time<sup>o</sup> allow'd.

HORATIO: How was this seal'd?

HAMLET: Why, even in that was heaven ordinant.<sup>o</sup>
I had my father's signet in my purse,
Which was the model of that Danish seal; 50
Folded the writ up in the form of th' other,
Subscrib'd it, gave 't th' impression, plac'd it safely,
The changeling never known. Now, the next day
Was our sea-fight; and what to this was sequent<sup>o</sup>
Thou know'st already. 55

HORATIO: So Guildenstern and Rosencrantz go to 't.

HAMLET: Why, man, they did make love to this employment;
They are not near my conscience; their defeat
Does by their own insinuation<sup>o</sup> grow:
'Tis dangerous when the baser nature comes 60
Between the pass<sup>o</sup> and fell incensed<sup>o</sup> points
Of mighty opposites.

HORATIO: Why, what a king is this!

HAMLET: Does it not, think thee, stand<sup>o</sup> me now upon—
He that hath kill'd my king and whor'd my mother,
Popp'd in between th' election<sup>o</sup> and my hopes, 65
Thrown out his angle<sup>o</sup> for my proper life,
And with such coz'nage<sup>o</sup>—is 't not perfect conscience, 36 yeoman's: I.e., faithful. 41 wheaten garland: Symbol of peace. 42 comma: Smallest break or separation. Here, amity begins and amity ends the period, and peace stands between like a dependent clause. The comma indicates continuity, link. 43 'As'es: The "whereases" of a formal document, with play on the word ass. charge: Import, and burden. 47 shriving-time: Time for absolution. 48 ordinant: Directing. 54 sequent: Subsequent. 59 insinuation: Interference. 61 pass: Thrust. fell incensed: Fiercely angered. 63 stand: Become incumbent. 65 election: The Danish throne was filled by election. 66 angle: Fishing line. 67 coz'nage: Trickery.

To quit<sup>o</sup> him with this arm? and is 't not to be damn'd,
 To let this canker<sup>o</sup> of our nature come
 In further evil?

70

HORATIO: It must be shortly known to him from England
 What is the issue of the business there.

HAMLET: It will be short: the interim is mine;
 And a man's life's no more than to say "One."
 But I am very sorry, good Horatio,
 That to Laertes I forgot myself;
 For, by the image of my cause, I see
 The portraiture of his: I'll court his favours:
 But, sure, the bravery<sup>o</sup> of his grief did put me
 Into a tow'ring passion.

75

HORATIO: Peace! who comes here?

80

Enter a COURTIER [OSRIC].

OSRIC: Your lordship is right welcome back to Denmark.

HAMLET: I humbly thank you, sir. [To HORATIO.] Dost know this water-fly?<sup>o</sup>

HORATIO: No, my good lord.

HAMLET: Thy state is the more gracious; for 'tis a vice to know him. He hath much land, and fertile: let a beast be lord of beasts,<sup>o</sup> and his crib shall stand at the king's mess:<sup>o</sup> 'tis a chough;<sup>o</sup> but, as I say, spacious in the possession of dirt.

85

OSRIC: Sweet lord, if your lordship were at leisure, I should impart a thing to you from his majesty.

HAMLET: I will receive it, sir, with all diligence of spirit. Put your bonnet to his right use; 'tis for the head.

90

OSRIC: I thank your lordship, it is very hot.

HAMLET: No, believe me, 'tis very cold; the wind is northerly.

OSRIC: It is indifferent<sup>o</sup> cold, my lord, indeed.

HAMLET: But yet methinks it is very sultry and hot for my complexion.

OSRIC: Exceedingly, my lord; it is very sultry,—as 'twere,—I cannot tell how. But, my lord, his majesty bade me signify to you that 'a has laid a great wager on your head: sir, this is the matter,—

95

HAMLET: I beseech you, remember<sup>o</sup>—

[HAMLET moves him to put on his hat.]

OSRIC: Nay, good my lord; for mine ease,<sup>o</sup> in good faith. Sir, here is newly come to court Laertes; believe me, an absolute gentleman, full of most excellent differences, 100

68 quit: Repay. 69 canker: Ulcer, or possibly the worm which destroys buds and leaves. 79 bravery: Bravado. 82 water-fly: Vain or busily idle person. 85 lord of beasts: See Genesis 1:26, 28. 85–86 his crib . . . mess: He shall eat at the king's table and be one of the group of persons (usually four) constituting a mess at a banquet. 86 chough: Probably, chattering jackdaw; also explained as chuff, provincial boor or churl. 93 indifferent: Somewhat. 98 remember: I.e., remember thy courtesy; conventional phrase for "Be covered." 99 mine ease:
 Conventional reply declining the invitation of "Remember thy courtesy."

of very soft<sup>o</sup> society and great showing<sup>o</sup>; indeed, to speak feelingly<sup>o</sup> of him, he is the card<sup>o</sup> or calendar of gentry<sup>o</sup>; for you shall find in him the continent of what part a gentleman would see.

HAMLET: Sir, his definement<sup>o</sup> suffers no perdition<sup>o</sup> in you; though, I know, to divide him inventorially<sup>o</sup> would dozy<sup>o</sup> the arithmetic of memory, and yet but yaw<sup>o</sup> neither, in respect of his quick sail. But, in the verity of extolment, I take him to be a soul of great article<sup>o</sup>; and his infusion<sup>o</sup> of such dearth and rareness<sup>o</sup>, as, to make true diction of him, his semblable<sup>o</sup> is his mirror; and who else would trace<sup>o</sup> him, his umbrage<sup>o</sup>, nothing more.

OSRIC: Your lordship speaks most infallibly of him.

HAMLET: The concernancy<sup>o</sup>, sir? why do we wrap the gentleman in our more rawer breath?<sup>o</sup>

OSRIC: Sir?

HORATIO [aside to HAMLET]: Is 't not possible to understand in another tongue?<sup>o</sup> You will do 't, sir, really.

HAMLET: What imports the nomination<sup>o</sup> of this gentleman?

OSRIC: Of Laertes?

HORATIO [aside to HAMLET]: His purse is empty already; all 's golden words are spent.

HAMLET: Of him, sir.

OSRIC: I know you are not ignorant—

HAMLET: I would you did, sir; yet, in faith, if you did, it would not much approve<sup>o</sup> me. Well, sir?

OSRIC: You are not ignorant of what excellence Laertes is—

HAMLET: I dare not confess that, lest I should compare with him in excellence; but, to know a man well, were to know himself.<sup>o</sup>

OSRIC: I mean, sir, for his weapon; but in the imputation<sup>o</sup> laid on him by them, in his meed<sup>o</sup> he's unfellowed.

HAMLET: What's his weapon?

OSRIC: Rapier and dagger.

HAMLET: That's two of his weapons: but, well.

OSRIC: The king, sir, hath wagered with him six Barbary horses: against the which he has impawned<sup>o</sup>, as I take it, six French rapiers and poniards, with their 101 soft: Gentle. showing: Distinguished appearance. feelingly: With just perception. 102 card: Chart, map. gentry: Good breeding. 104 definement: Definition. perdition: Loss, diminution. 104–105 divide him inventorially: I.e., enumerate his graces. 105 dozy: Dizzy. yaw: To move unsteadily (of a ship). 107 article: Moment or importance. infusion: Infused temperament, character imparted by nature. dearth and rareness: Rarity. 108 semblable: True likeness. trace: Follow. 109 umbrage: Shadow. 111 concernancy: Import. 112 breath: Speech. 114 Is 't . . . tongue?: I.e., can one converse with Osric only in this outlandish jargon? 116 nomination: Naming. 122 approve: Command. 125–126 but . . . himself: But to know a man as excellent were to know Laertes. 127 imputation: Reputation. 128 meed: Merit. 133 he has impawned: He has wagered.

assigns, as girdle, hangers,<sup>o</sup> and so: three of the carriages, in faith, are very dear to fancy,<sup>o</sup> very responsive<sup>o</sup> to the hilts, most delicate<sup>o</sup> carriages, and of very liberal conceit.<sup>o</sup> 135

HAMLET: What call you the carriages?

HORATIO [aside to HAMLET]: I knew you must be edified by the margent<sup>o</sup> ere you had done.

OSRIC: The carriages, sir, are the hangers. 140

HAMLET: The phrase would be more german<sup>o</sup> to the matter, if we could carry cannon by our sides: I would it might be hangers till then. But, on: six Barbary horses against six French swords, their assigns, and three liberal-conceited carriages; that's the French bet against the Danish. Why is this "impawned," as you call it? 145

OSRIC: The king, sir, hath laid, that in a dozen passes between yourself and him, he shall not exceed you three hits: he hath laid on twelve for nine; and it would come to immediate trial, if your lordship would vouchsafe the answer.

HAMLET: How if I answer "no"?

OSRIC: I mean, my lord, the opposition of your person in trial. 150

HAMLET: Sir, I will walk here in the hall: if it please his majesty, it is the breathing time<sup>o</sup> of day with me; let the foils be brought, the gentleman willing, and the king hold his purpose, I will win for him as I can; if not, I will gain nothing but my shame and the odd hits.

OSRIC: Shall I re-deliver you e'en so? 155

HAMLET: To this effect, sir; after what flourish your nature will.

OSRIC: I commend my duty to your lordship.

HAMLET: Yours, yours. [Exit OSRIC.] He does well to commend it himself; there are no tongues else for 's turn.

HORATIO: This lapwing<sup>o</sup> runs away with the shell on his head. 160

HAMLET: 'A did comply, sir, with his dug,<sup>o</sup> before 'a sucked it. Thus has he—and many more of the same breed that I know the drossy<sup>o</sup> age dotes on—only got the tune<sup>o</sup> of the time and out of an habit of encounter;<sup>o</sup> a kind of yesty<sup>o</sup> collection, which carries them through and through the most fann'd and winnowed<sup>o</sup> opinions; and do but blow them to their trial, the bubbles are out.<sup>o</sup> 165

Enter a LORD.

134 hangers: Straps on the sword belt from which the sword hung. 134–135 dear to fancy: Fancifully made. 135 responsive: Probably, well balanced, corresponding closely. delicate: Fine in workmanship. 136 liberal conceit: Elaborate design. 138 margent: Margin of a book, place for explanatory notes. 141 german: Germane, appropriate. 151–152 breathing time: Exercise period. 160 lapwing: Peewit; noted for its wiliness in drawing a visitor away from its nest and its supposed habit of running about when newly hatched with its head in the shell; possibly an allusion to Osric's hat. 161 did comply . . . dug: Paid compliments to his mother's breast. 162 drossy: Frivolous. 163 tune: Temper, mood. habit of encounter: Demeanor of social intercourse. ysty: Frothy. 164 fann'd and winnowed: Select and refined. 165 blow . . . out: I.e., put them to the test, and their ignorance is exposed.

LORD: My lord, his majesty commended him to you by young Osric, who brings back to him, that you attend him in the hall: he sends to know if your pleasure hold to play with Laertes, or that you will take longer time.

HAMLET: I am constant to my purposes; they follow the king's pleasure: if his fitness speaks, mine is ready; now or whensoever, provided I be so able as now. 170

LORD: The king and queen and all are coming down.

HAMLET: In happy time.<sup>o</sup>

LORD: The queen desires you to use some gentle entertainment to Laertes before you fall to play.

HAMLET: She well instructs me. [Exit LORD.] 175

HORATIO: You will lose this wager, my lord.

HAMLET: I do not think so; since he went into France, I have been in continual practice; I shall win at the odds. But thou wouldst not think how ill all 's here about my heart: but it is no matter.

HORATIO: Nay, good my lord,— 180

HAMLET: It is but foolery; but it is such a kind of gain-giving,<sup>o</sup> as would perhaps trouble a woman.

HORATIO: If your mind dislike any thing, obey it: I will forestall their repair hither, and say you are not fit.

HAMLET: Not a whit, we defy augury: there's a special providence in the fall of a sparrow. If it be now, 'tis not to come; if it be not to come, it will be now; if it be not now, yet it will come: the readiness is all:<sup>o</sup> since no man of aught he leaves knows, what is 't to leave betimes? Let be. 185

A table prepared. [Enter] TRUMPETS, DRUMS, and OFFICERS with cushions; KING, QUEEN, [OSRIC,] and all the STATE; foils, daggers, [and wine borne in;] and LAERTES.

KING: Come, Hamlet, come, and take this hand from me.

[The KING puts LAERTES's hand into HAMLET's.]

HAMLET: Give me your pardon, sir: I have done you wrong; But pardon 't as you are a gentleman. 190

This presence<sup>o</sup> knows,

And you must needs have heard, how I am punish'd

With a sore distraction. What I have done,

That might your nature, honour and exception<sup>o</sup> 195

Roughly awake, I here proclaim was madness.

Was 't Hamlet wrong'd Laertes? Never Hamlet:

If Hamlet from himself be ta'en away,

And when he's not himself does wrong Laertes,

Then Hamlet does it not, Hamlet denies it. 200

Who does it, then? His madness: if 't be so,

172 In happy time: A phrase of courtesy. 181 gain-giving: Misgiving. 187 all: All that matters. 192 presence: Royal assembly. 195 exception: Disapproval.

Hamlet is of the faction that is wrong'd;
 His madness is poor Hamlet's enemy.
 Sir, in this audience,
 Let my disclaiming from a purpos'd evil 205
 Free me so far in your most generous thoughts,
 That I have shot mine arrow o'er the house,
 And hurt my brother.

LAERTES: I am satisfied in nature,<sup>o</sup>
 Whose motive, in this case, should stir me most
 To my revenge: but in my terms of honour 210
 I stand aloof; and will no reconciliation,
 Till by some elder masters, of known honour,
 I have a voice<sup>o</sup> and precedent of peace,
 To keep my name ungor'd. But till that time,
 I do receive your offer'd love like love, 215
 And will not wrong it.

HAMLET: I embrace it freely;
 And will this brother's wager frankly play.
 Give us the foils. Come on.

LAERTES: Come, one for me.

HAMLET: I'll be your foil,<sup>o</sup> Laertes: in mine ignorance
 Your skill shall, like a star i' th' darkest night, 220
 Stick fiery off<sup>o</sup> indeed.

LAERTES: You mock me, sir.

HAMLET: No, by this hand.

KING: Give them the foils, young Osric. Cousin Hamlet,
 You know the wager?

HAMLET: Very well, my lord;
 Your grace has laid the odds o' th' weaker side. 225

KING: I do not fear it; I have seen you both:
 But since he is better'd, we have therefore odds.

LAERTES: This is too heavy, let me see another.

HAMLET: This likes me well. These foils have all a length?

[They prepare to play.]

OSRIC: Ay, my good lord. 230

KING: Set me the stoups of wine upon that table.

If Hamlet give the first or second hit,

---

208 nature: I.e., he is personally satisfied, but his honor must be satisfied by the rules of the code of honor. 213 voice: Authoritative pronouncement. 219 foil: Quibble on the two senses: "background which sets something off" and "blunted rapier for fencing." 221 Stick fiery off: Stand out brilliantly.

Or quit in answer of the third exchange,
 Let all the battlements their ordnance fire;
 The king shall drink to Hamlet's better breath; 235
 And in the cup an union° shall he throw,
 Richer than that which four successive kings
 In Denmark's crown have worn. Give me the cups;
 And let the kettle° to the trumpet speak,
 The trumpet to the cannoneer without, 240
 The cannons to the heavens, the heavens to earth,
 "Now the king drinks to Hamlet." Come begin:
Trumpets the while.
 And you, the judges, bear a wary eye.

HAMLET: Come on, sir.

LAERTES: Come, my lord. [They play.]

HAMLET: One.

LAERTES: No.

HAMLET: Judgement.

OSRIC: A hit, a very palpable hit.

Drum, trumpets, and shot. Flourish. A piece goes off.

LAERTES: Well; again. 245

KING: Stay; give me drink. Hamlet, this pearl° is thine;
 Here's to thy health. Give him the cup.

HAMLET: I'll play this bout first; set it by awhile.
 Come. [They play.] Another hit; what say you?

LAERTES: A touch, a touch, I do confess 't. 250

KING: Our son shall win.

QUEEN: He's fat,° and scant of breath.
 Here, Hamlet, take my napkin, rub thy brows:
 The queen carouses° to thy fortune, Hamlet.

HAMLET: Good madam!

KING: Gertrude, do not drink.

QUEEN: I will, my lord; I pray you, pardon me. [Drinks.] 255

KING [aside]: It is the poison'd cup: it is too late.

HAMLET: I dare not drink yet, madam; by and by.

QUEEN: Come, let me wipe thy face.

LAERTES: My lord, I'll hit him now.

KING: I do not think 't.

LAERTES [aside]: And yet 'tis almost 'gainst my conscience. 260

236 union: Pearl. 239 kettle: Kettledrum. 246 pearl: I.e., the poison. 251 fat: Not physically fit, out of training. Some earlier editors speculated that the term applied to the corpulence of Richard Burbage, who originally played the part, but the allusion now appears unlikely. Fat may also suggest "sweaty." 253 carouses: Drinks a toast.

HAMLET: Come, for the third, Laertes: you but dally;
 I pray you, pass with your best violence;
 I am afeard you make a wanton<sup>o</sup> of me.

LAERTES: Say you so? come on.

[They play.]

OSRIC: Nothing, neither way.

265

LAERTES: Have at you now!

[LAERTES wounds HAMLET; then, in scuffling, they change rapiers,<sup>o</sup> and HAMLET wounds LAERTES.]

KING: Part them; they are incens'd.

HAMLET: Nay, come again.

[The QUEEN falls.]

OSRIC: Look to the queen there, ho!

HORATIO: They bleed on both sides. How is it, my lord?

OSRIC: How is 't, Laertes?

LAERTES: Why, as a woodcock<sup>o</sup> to mine own springe,<sup>o</sup> Osric;

270

I am justly kill'd with mine own treachery.

HAMLET: How does the queen?

KING: She swoonds<sup>o</sup> to see them bleed.

QUEEN: No, no, the drink, the drink,—O my dear Hamlet,—

The drink, the drink! I am poison'd.

[Dies.]

HAMLET: O villany! Ho! let the door be lock'd:

275

Treachery! Seek it out.

[LAERTES falls.]

LAERTES: It is here, Hamlet: Hamlet, thou art slain;

No med'cine in the world can do thee good;

In thee there is not half an hour of life;

The treacherous instrument is in thy hand,

280

Unbated<sup>o</sup> and envenom'd: the foul practice

Hath turn'd itself on me; lo, here I lie,

Never to rise again: thy mother's poison'd:

I can no more: the king, the king's to blame.

HAMLET: The point envenom'd too!

285

Then, venom, to thy work.

[Stabs the KING.]

ALL: Treason! treason!

KING: O, yet defend me, friends; I am but hurt.

HAMLET: Here, thou incestuous, murd'rous, damned Dane,

Drink off this potion. Is thy union here?

290

Follow my mother.

[KING dies.]

LAERTES: He is justly serv'd;

It is a poison temper'd<sup>o</sup> by himself.

263 wanton: Spoiled child. [s. d.] in scuffling, they change rapiers: According to a widespread stage tradition, Hamlet receives a scratch, realizes that Laertes's sword is unbated, and accordingly forces an exchange. 270 woodcock: As type of stupidity or as decoy. springe: Trap, snare. 272 swoonds: Swoons. 281 Unbated: Not blunted with a button. 292 temper'd: Mixed.

- Exchange forgiveness with me, noble Hamlet:
 Mine and my father's death come not upon thee,
 Nor thine on me! [Dies.] 295
- HAMLET: Heaven make thee free of it! I follow thee.
 I am dead, Horatio. Wretched queen, adieu!
 You that look pale and tremble at this chance,
 That are but mutes<sup>o</sup> or audience to this act,
 Had I but time—as this fell sergeant,<sup>o</sup> Death, 300
 Is strict in his arrest—O, I could tell you—
 But let it be. Horatio, I am dead;
 Thou livest; report me and my cause aright
 To the unsatisfied.
- HORATIO: Never believe it:
 I am more an antique Roman<sup>o</sup> than a Dane: 305
 Here 's yet some liquor left.
- HAMLET: As th' art a man,
 Give me the cup: let go, by heaven, I'll ha 't.
 O God! Horatio, what a wounded name,
 Things standing thus unknown, shall live behind me!
 If thou didst ever hold me in thy heart, 310
 Absent thee from felicity awhile,
 And in this harsh world draw thy breath in pain,
 To tell my story. A march afar off.
- What warlike noise is this?
- OSRIC: Young Fortinbras, with conquest come from Poland,
 To the ambassadors of England gives 315
 This warlike volley.
- HAMLET: O, I die, Horatio;
 The potent poison quite o'er-crows<sup>o</sup> my spirit:
 I cannot live to hear the news from England;
 But I do prophesy th' election lights
 On Fortinbras: he has my dying voice; 320
 So tell him, with th' occurrents,<sup>o</sup> more and less,
 Which have solicited.<sup>o</sup> The rest is silence. [Dies.]
- HORATIO: Now cracks a noble heart. Good night, sweet prince;
 And flights of angels sing thee to thy rest!
 Why does the drum come hither? [March within.] 325
- Enter FORTINBRAS, with the [English] AMBASSADORS [and others].*
- FORTINBRAS: Where is this sight?

---

299 mutes: Performers in a play who speak no words. 300 sergeant: Sheriff's officer. 305 Roman: It was the Roman custom to follow masters in death. 317 o'er-crows: Triumphs over. 321 occurrents: Events, incidents. 322 solicited: Moved, urged.

- HORATIO: What is it you would see?
If aught of woe or wonder, cease your search.
- FORTINBRAS: This quarry° cries on havoc.° O proud Death,
What feast is toward in thine eternal cell,
That thou so many princes at a shot 330
So bloodily hast struck?
- FIRST AMBASSADOR: The sight is dismal;
And our affairs from England come too late:
The ears are senseless that should give us hearing,
To tell him his commandment is fulfill'd,
That Rosencrantz and Guildenstern are dead: 335
Where should we have our thanks?
- HORATIO: Not from his mouth,°
Had it th' ability of life to thank you:
He never gave commandment for their death.
But since, so jump° upon this bloody question,°
You from the Polack wars, and you from England, 340
Are here arriv'd, give order that these bodies
High on a stage° be placed to the view;
And let me speak to th' yet unknowing world
How these things came about: so shall you hear
Of carnal, bloody, and unnatural acts, 345
Of accidental judgements, casual slaughters,
Of deaths put on by cunning and forc'd cause,
And, in this upshot, purposes mistook
Fall'n on th' inventors' heads: all this can I Truly deliver.
- FORTINBRAS: Let us haste to hear it, 350
And call the noblest to the audience.
For me, with sorrow I embrace my fortune:
I have some rights of memory° in this kingdom,
Which now to claim my vantage doth invite me.
- HORATIO: Of that I shall have also cause to speak, 355
And from his mouth whose voice will draw on more:°
But let this same be presently perform'd,
Even while men's minds are wild; lest more mischance,
On° plots and errors, happen.
- FORTINBRAS: Let four captains 360
Bear Hamlet, like a soldier, to the stage;

328 quarry: Heap of dead. cries on havoc: Proclaims a general slaughter. 336 his mouth: I.e., the king's. 339 jump: Precisely. question: Dispute. 342 stage: Platform. 353 of memory: Traditional, remembered. 356 voice . . . more: Vote will influence still others. 359 On: On account of, or possibly, on top of, in addition to.

For he was likely, had he been put on,
 To have prov'd most royal: and, for his passage,<sup>o</sup>
 The soldiers' music and the rites of war
 Speak loudly for him.
 Take up the bodies: such a sight as this Becomes the field,<sup>o</sup> but here shows much amiss.
 Go, bid the soldiers shoot.

365

Exeunt [marching, bearing off the dead bodies; after which a peal of ordnance is shot off].

[c. 1600]

Questions for Discussion

1. What is the political situation in Denmark as the play begins? What information does Horatio provide beginning in line 79 of the opening scene? What further information do we learn from Claudius's speech that begins scene ii?
2. How does Shakespeare characterize Horatio in the opening scenes? What are some of his chief qualities? How does Hamlet characterize Claudius? How does Hamlet compare Horatio and Claudius?
3. What does Hamlet's first soliloquy (I.ii.129–59) reveal about his state of mind? What is the source of his discontent?
4. What is the basis for both Laertes's and Polonius's objections to Ophelia's relationship with Hamlet? Which of their arguments seem most (and least) persuasive or fair? What does their treatment of Ophelia in act I, scene iii, reveal about their motivations? What does it suggest about their attitude toward Ophelia and toward women in general? How does class or station function in their arguments?
5. What do we learn from the Ghost in act I, scene v? If what he says is true, how does that reinforce what we have learned about the political situation in Denmark? How does Hamlet respond to the Ghost's instructions? What does he mean by saying, "O my prophetic soul!" (I.v.40)?
6. After listening to the Ghost speak, Hamlet wants to write about it, as indicated in act I, scene v, lines 107 and 108. How does this contrast with his remarks earlier in this speech? What does it suggest about his state of mind?
7. Why do you think Hamlet tells his companions he is likely to put on an "antic disposition" (I.v.172)? Is his behavior a deliberate strategy or a natural reaction to his anger and grief? Explain.
8. Compare the way Hamlet responds to Polonius in act II, scene ii, lines 171–210, with how he responds to his friends Rosencrantz and Guildenstern in lines 215–90. What do you learn about Hamlet from these responses?

362 passage: Death. 366 field: I.e., of battle.

9. In act III, scene i, lines 56–90, Hamlet delivers his famous “To be, or not to be” speech, arguably the most recognized passage in English literature. What is he contemplating? What inner conflict is he pondering? What conclusions does he reach?
10. Following his “To be, or not to be” soliloquy (III.i.56–90), why does Hamlet treat Ophelia so harshly? How does Ophelia describe Hamlet in lines 141–52? What does this description suggest about Hamlet before the time of the play? What does it suggest about the relationship between Hamlet and Ophelia?
11. What does the scene with the players (II.ii.367–472) reveal about Hamlet? How does the First Player’s speech (II.ii.404–33) parallel Hamlet’s situation?
12. Hamlet’s speech to the players at the beginning of act III, scene ii, has often been interpreted as a sort of aside from Shakespeare containing his philosophy of acting. How else can it be interpreted? How do Hamlet’s instructions tie in to some of the themes of the play?
13. In act III, scene iii, lines 73–96, Hamlet has a perfect opportunity to kill his uncle and avenge his murdered father. Instead, he makes a speech. Why does he hesitate in killing Claudius? Do you think we are meant to respect his piety or despise his cowardice? If you combine this incident with Hamlet’s soliloquy at the end of act II, does it reveal something about Hamlet? about a theme of the play?
14. In act II, scene ii, lines 236–37, Hamlet says, “Why, then, ’tis none to you; for there is nothing either good or bad, but thinking makes it so.” What assumptions underline Hamlet’s response? What does he mean? Do you agree with what he says? He then says to his old friends, “I am but mad north-north-west: when the wind is southerly I know a hawk from a handsaw” (II.ii.330–31). What does this remark suggest about Hamlet’s madness, about his “antic disposition” (I.v.172)? Is he mad? Is he acting? Explain.
15. Why do you think the Ghost is visible to Horatio and the guards in act I, scenes i and iv, but not to Gertrude in act III, scene iv? Does the murder of Polonius in this scene make you reassess whether the Ghost is in fact a demon, and not the ghost of Hamlet’s father?
16. What has driven Ophelia mad in act IV, scene v? What does her behavior suggest about the relationship between her and Hamlet? Cite specific lines to support your answer.
17. How does Laertes respond to his father’s death? to Ophelia’s? How do his responses compare to Hamlet’s reaction to the death of his father?
18. Hamlet seems preoccupied with death for much of the play; what new insight does the graveyard scene (V.i.) reveal regarding his attitude toward mortality? toward life, fame, and accomplishment? How does this attitude connect to his central conflict in the play?
19. Why does Hamlet give his dying support to Fortinbras (V.ii.316–22)?

Questions on Style and Structure

1. The opening scene presents a great number of questions. How do these contribute to the mood of the scene and, ultimately, of the play itself?

2. Hamlet's first three lines (I.ii.65, 67, 74) are evasive answers using puns or other wordplay. What does this behavior reveal about his character and his state of mind?
3. How would you describe Claudius's opening speech (I.ii.1–39) and his reply to Hamlet (I.ii.87–117)? What does his use of imagery and juxtaposition in the first speech reveal about his purpose? What is the nature of his argument in the second?
4. How does the diction and imagery in the Ghost's speech to Hamlet (I.v.42–91) create a comparison between the two "gardens" before and after the entrance of the "serpents"?
5. In lines 270–282 of act II, scene ii, Hamlet delivers a lengthy explanation to Rosencrantz and Guildenstern, ending with a rhetorical question. What is the substance of this speech? How does the imagery that Hamlet uses transition his speech from an assessment of himself to that of mankind as a whole?
6. The king's aside in act III, scene i, lines 49–54, is the first definitive evidence of his guilt. Structurally, why do you think this revelation takes place halfway through the play as opposed to earlier (or later)?
7. Notice Hamlet's behavior toward Ophelia in act III, scene i. Why do you think—in dramatic, structural, and thematic terms—we have not observed a scene between Hamlet and Ophelia until this point?
8. In act II, scene i, Polonius says, "By indirections find directions out" (l. 64). What does he mean by that? How does such a comment reveal his character? Find another such witty or clever remark by another character, and explain how it reveals the character of its speaker.
9. Hamlet's four soliloquies (I.ii.129–59; II.ii.474–533; III.i.56–90; IV.iv.32–66) are remarkable for their style as well as their substance. Choose one of these monologues and discuss how its diction, figurative language, and imagery contribute to Hamlet's meaning and purpose.
10. Shakespeare occasionally gives two characters very similar lines or phrasings, the second instance reminding the reader or viewer of the first. In act IV, scene iv, for example, Hamlet wonders if he might be "thinking too precisely on th' event" (l. 41). In act V, scene i, Horatio says to Hamlet, "'Twere to consider too curiously, to consider so" (l. 155). What is the effect of these types of echoes throughout the play?
11. Do a close reading of one of Ophelia's songs in act IV, scene v, exploring how its form and content relate and respond to the action of the play (both actual and implied) and to Ophelia's state of mind. In your response, consider what has occurred offstage, as well as the possible or implied events to which she alludes. Why is she given song, as opposed to speech, in this instance?

Suggestions for Writing

1. In Hamlet, as vengeance is applied, order is restored—or is it? Write an essay that discusses the symmetry at the end of the play, explaining how the plot of Hamlet makes an argument for or against revenge. Support your thesis with specific textual evidence.

2. While there are only two major female characters in Hamlet—Gertrude and Ophelia—they both play crucial roles. Write an essay in which you explain the importance of each of these women to the play, especially in terms of her relationship to Hamlet.
3. Recognize the immense importance of diction in Hamlet by making note of each instance of certain kinds of words. First, note words having to do with appearances, such as play, act, seem, assume, show, reveal, appear, form, shape, and like (for comparison), as well as references to pictures, images, mirrors, faces, and the like; then note references to clothing and fashion, such as investments, trappings, suits, and fashion, as well as references to watching and spying throughout the play. Through diction and the imagery it creates, trace the contrast between appearance and reality throughout the play, and write an essay explaining how that motif contributes to the meaning of the play as a whole.
4. Critic Northrop Frye has said that Hamlet is Shakespeare's longest play because everyone in it (with the exceptions of Gertrude and Ophelia) "talks too much." Despite the calls to be brief from both the Ghost and Polonius, the characters do go on at length, and Hamlet certainly has a lot to say. Write an essay in which you explore why this play, for much of its length, focuses more on conversation and reflection than on action—and why this, in your opinion, contributes to a theme of the play. Support your position with textual evidence.
5. In The Prince, a Renaissance text from 1532, Niccolò Machiavelli writes:

A prince ought to be a fox in recognizing snares and a lion in driving off wolves. Those who assume the bearing of a lion alone lack understanding. It follows, then, that a wise prince cannot and should not keep his pledge when it is against his interest to do so and when his reasons for making the pledge are no longer operative. . . . But one must know how to mask this [fox-like] nature skillfully and be a great dissembler.

In an essay, explore how both Hamlet and Claudius act in accordance with this advice. How do their tactics differ?

6. References to the macrocosm and the microcosm suggest that the same forces are at work within as without. In the play, man is seen as a little world at the center of the world at large, where veins are rivers, and Hamlet speaks of his "distracted globe" (I.v.97). Find other references that reflect the presence of the macrocosm and the microcosm, and discuss their effect on the meaning of the play as a whole.
7. Consider the many conflicts in the play—for example, those between reason and passion, order and chaos, concealing and revealing, and honesty and deception. Choose one, and write an essay explaining how that conflict reveals a dominant theme of the play.
8. Hamlet's conversation with Rosencrantz and Guildenstern in act II, scene ii, contains a misunderstanding or disagreement surrounding the word dream; when Hamlet tells them he has had "bad dreams," Guildenstern equivocates dream with ambition (ll. 242–43). Write an essay in which you explore how this or other disagreements over meaning exacerbate the central conflicts of the play.

9. One interpretation of Hamlet's indecision involves the influence of multiple distracting events or motivations, which either directly delay him or confuse him to the point that he forgets his purpose. In an essay, explore how other characters in the play fall victim to distraction. Refer to specific incidents in the play, quoting from the text to support your essay.
10. The "To be, or not to be" soliloquy in act III, scene i (ll. 56–90) is perhaps the most famous monologue in the English language, yet its meaning is much debated. Write a close-analysis essay in which you interpret the speech. Consider Hamlet's prior soliloquy at the end of act II, scene ii; is this monologue a continuation of that scene, or a separate line of thought? Is Hamlet aware of his audience (Claudius and Polonius, hidden behind a tapestry), or is he speaking to himself on the assumption that he is alone?

The Book of the Dead

EDWIDGE DANTICAT

Born in Haiti in 1969, Edwidge Danticat immigrated to the United States when she was twelve and currently lives in Miami. She received her BA from Barnard College and her MFA from Brown University, where her thesis project became her first novel, Breath, Eyes, Memory (1994), which was an Oprah Winfrey Book Club selection in 1998. Her other fiction includes Krik? Krak! (1995), The Farming of Bones (1998), and The Dew Breaker (2004). Danticat has also written nonfiction: After the Dance: A Walk through Carnival in Jacmel, Haiti (2002) and Brother, I'm Dying, an autobiography that won the 2007 National Book Critics Circle Award. She is the author of two children's books, Behind the Mountains (2002) and Anacaona, Golden Flower (2005), and the editor of The Butterfly's Way: Voices from the Haitian Diaspora in the United States (2001). Danticat has worked with filmmaker Jonathan Demme on several documentaries related to Haiti. "The Book of the Dead" is the first in a series of seven interrelated stories in The Dew Breaker. Dew breakers were Haitian militiamen, or Tonton Macoutes, who carried out the tyrannical policies of dictator François Duvalier in Haiti during the 1960s. They were called dew breakers because they usually struck at dawn.

My father is gone. I'm slouched in a cast-aluminum chair across from two men, one the manager of the hotel where we're staying and the other a policeman. They're both waiting for me to explain what's become of him, my father.

The hotel manager—MR. FLAVIO SALINAS, the plaque on his office door reads—has the most striking pair of chartreuse eyes I've ever seen on a man with an island Spanish lilt to his voice.

The police officer, Officer Bo, is a baby-faced, short, white Floridian with a potbelly.

"Where are you and your daddy from, Ms. Bienaimé?" Officer Bo asks, doing the best he can with my last name. He does such a lousy job that, even though he and I and Salinas are the only people in Salinas' office, at first I think he's talking to someone else.

I was born and raised in East Flatbush, Brooklyn, and have never even been to my parents' birthplace. Still, I answer "Haiti" because it is one more thing I've always longed to have in common with my parents.

Officer Bo plows forward with, "You all the way down here in Lakeland from Haiti?"

"We live in New York," I say. "We were on our way to Tampa."

"To do what?" Officer Bo continues. "Visit?"

"To deliver a sculpture." I say. "I'm an artist, a sculptor."

I'm really not an artist, not in the way I'd like to be. I'm more of an obsessive wood-carver with a single subject thus far—my father. 10

My creative eye finds Manager Salinas' office gaudy. The walls are covered with orange-and-green wallpaper, briefly interrupted by a giant gold-leaf-bordered print of a Victorian cottage that resembles the building we're in.

Patting his light green tie, which brings out even more the hallucinatory shade of his eyes, Manager Salinas reassuringly tells me, "Officer Bo and I will do our best."

We start out with a brief description of my father: "Sixty-five, five feet eight inches, one hundred and eighty pounds, with a widow's peak, thinning salt-and-pepper hair, and velvet-brown eyes—"

"Velvet?" Officer Bo interrupts.

"Deep brown, same color as his complexion," I explain. 15

My father has had partial frontal dentures since he fell off his and my mother's bed and landed on his face ten years ago when he was having one of his prison nightmares. I mention that too. Just the dentures, not the nightmares. I also bring up the blunt, ropelike scar that runs from my father's right cheek down to the corner of his mouth, the only visible reminder of the year he spent in prison in Haiti.

"Please don't be offended by what I'm about to ask," Officer Bo says. "I deal with an older population here, and this is something that comes up a lot when they go missing. Does your daddy have any kind of mental illness, senility?"

I reply, "No, he's not senile."

"You have any pictures of your daddy?" Officer Bo asks.

My father has never liked having his picture taken. We have only a few of him at home, some awkward shots at my different school graduations, with him standing between my mother and me, his hand covering his scar. I had hoped to take some pictures of him on this trip, but he hadn't let me. At one of the rest stops I bought a disposable camera and pointed it at him anyway. As usual, he protested, covering his face with both hands like a little boy protecting his cheeks from a slap. He didn't want any more pictures taken of him for the rest of his life, he said, he was feeling too ugly. 20

"That's too bad," Officer Bo offers at the end of my too lengthy explanation. "He speaks English, your daddy? Can he ask for directions, et cetera?"

"Yes," I say.

"Is there anything that might make your father run away from you, particularly here in Lakeland?" Manager Salinas asks. "Did you two have a fight?"

I had never tried to tell my father's story in words before now, but my first completed sculpture of him was the reason for our trip: a three-foot mahogany figure of my father naked, kneeling on a half-foot-square base, his back arched like the curve of a crescent moon, his downcast eyes fixed on his very long fingers and the large palms of his hands. It was hardly revolutionary, rough and not too detailed, minimalist at best, but it was my favorite of all my attempted representations of my father. It was the way I had imagined him in prison.

The last time I had seen my father? The previous night, before falling asleep. When we pulled our rental car into the hotel's hedge-bordered parking lot, it was almost 25 midnight. All the restaurants in the area were closed. There was nothing to do but shower and go to bed.

"It's like paradise here," my father had said when he'd seen our tiny room. It had the same orange-and-green wallpaper as Salinas' office, and the plush emerald carpet matched the walls. "Look, Ka," he said, his deep, raspy voice muted with exhaustion, "the carpet is like grass under our feet."

He'd picked the bed closest to the bathroom, removed the top of his gray jogging suit, and unpacked his toiletries. Soon after, I heard him humming loudly, as he always did, in the shower.

I checked on the sculpture, just felt it a little bit through the bubble padding and carton wrapping to make sure it was still whole. I'd used a piece of mahogany that was naturally flawed, with a few superficial cracks along what was now the back. I'd thought these cracks beautiful and had made no effort to sand or polish them away, as they seemed like the wood's own scars, like the one my father had on his face. But I was also a little worried about the cracks. Would they seem amateurish and unintentional, like a mistake? Could the wood come apart with simple movements or with age? Would the client be satisfied?

I closed my eyes and tried to picture the client to whom I was delivering the sculpture: Gabrielle Fonteneau, a Haitian American woman about my age, the star of a popular television series and an avid art collector. My friend Céline Benoit, a former colleague at the junior high school where I'm a substitute art teacher, had grown up with Gabrielle Fonteneau in Tampa and, at my request, on a holiday visit home had shown Gabrielle Fonteneau a snapshot of my Father piece and had persuaded her to buy it.

Gabrielle Fonteneau was spending the week away from Hollywood at her parents' house in Tampa. I took some time off, and both my mother and I figured that my father, who watched a lot of television, both at home and at his Nostrand Avenue barbershop, would enjoy meeting Gabrielle Fonteneau too. But when I woke up, my father was gone and so was the sculpture.

I stepped out of the room and onto the balcony overlooking the parking lot. It was a hot and muggy morning, the humid air laden with the smell of the freshly mowed tropical grass and sprinkler-showered hibiscus bordering the parking lot. My rental car too was gone. I hoped my father was driving around trying to find us some breakfast and would explain when he got back why he'd taken the sculpture with him, so I got dressed and waited. I watched a half hour of local morning news, smoked five mentholated cigarettes even though we were in a nonsmoking room, and waited some more.

All that waiting took two hours, and I felt guilty for having held back so long before going to the front desk to ask, "Have you seen my father?"

I feel Officer Bo's fingers gently stroking my wrist, perhaps to tell me to stop talking. Up close Officer Bo smells like fried eggs and gasoline, like breakfast at the Amoco.

"I'll put the word out with the other boys," he says. "Salinas here will be in his office. Why don't you go on back to your hotel room in case your daddy shows up there?"

Back in the room, I lie in my father's unmade bed. The sheets smell like his cologne, an odd mix of lavender and lime that I've always thought too pungent, but that he likes nonetheless.

I jump up when I hear the click from the electronic key in the door. It's the maid. She's a young Cuban woman who is overly polite, making up for her lack of English with deferential gestures: a great big smile, a nod, even a bow as she backs out of the room. She reminds me of my mother when she has to work on non-Haitian clients at her beauty shop, how she pays much more attention to those clients, forcing herself to laugh at jokes she barely understands and smiling at insults she doesn't quite grasp, all to avoid being forced into a conversation, knowing she couldn't hold up her end very well.

It's almost noon when I pick up the phone and call my mother at the salon. One of her employees tells me that she's not yet returned from the Mass she attends every day. After the Mass, if she has clients waiting, she'll walk the twenty blocks from the church to the salon. If she has no appointments, then she'll let her workers handle the walk-ins and go home for lunch. This was as close to retirement as my mother would ever come. This routine was her dream when she first started the shop. She had always wanted a life with room for daily Mass and long walks and the option of sometimes not going to work.

I call my parents' house. My mother isn't there either, so I leave the hotel number on the machine.

"Please call as soon as you can, Manman," I say. "It's about Papa."

It's early afternoon when my mother calls back, her voice cracking with worry. I had been sitting in that tiny hotel room, eating chips and candy bars from the vending machines, chain-smoking and waiting for something to happen, either for my father, Officer Bo, or Manager Salinas to walk into the room with some terrible news or for my mother or Gabrielle Fonteneau to call. I took turns imagining my mother screaming hysterically, berating both herself and me for thinking this trip with my father a good idea, then envisioning Gabrielle Fonteneau calling to say that we shouldn't have come on the trip. It had all been a joke. She wasn't going to buy a sculpture from me after all, especially one I didn't have.

40

"Where Papa?" Just as I expected, my mother sounds as though she's gasping for breath. I tell her to calm down, that nothing bad has happened. Papa's okay. I've just lost sight of him for a little while.

"How you lost him?" she asks.

"He got up before I did and disappeared," I say.

"How long he been gone?"

I can tell she's pacing back and forth in the kitchen, her slippers flapping against the Mexican tiles. I can hear the faucet when she turns it on, imagine her pushing a glass underneath it and filling it up. I hear her sipping the water as I say, "He's been gone for hours now. I don't even believe it myself."

45

"You call police?"

Now she's probably sitting at the kitchen table, her eyes closed, her fingers sliding back and forth across her forehead. She clicks her tongue and starts humming one of those mournful songs from the Mass, songs that my father, who attends church only at Christmas, picks up from her and also hums to himself in the shower.

My mother stops humming just long enough to ask, "What the police say?"

"To wait, that he'll come back."

There's a loud tapping on the line, my mother thumping her fingers against the phone's mouthpiece; it gives me a slight ache in my ear.

"He come back," she says with more certainty than either Officer Bo or Manager Salinas. "He not leave you like that."

I promise to call my mother hourly with an update, but I know she'll call me sooner than that, so I dial Gabrielle Fonteneau's cell phone. Gabrielle Fonteneau's voice sounds just as it does on television, but more silken, nuanced, and seductive without the sitcom laugh track.

"To think," my father once said while watching her show, in which she plays a smart-mouthed nurse in an inner-city hospital's maternity ward. "A Haitian-born actress with her own American television show. We have really come far."

"So nice of you to come all this way to personally deliver the sculpture," Gabrielle Fonteneau says. She sounds like she's in a place with cicadas, waterfalls, palm trees, and citronella candles to keep the mosquitoes away. I realize that I too am in such a place, but I'm not able to enjoy it.

"Were you told why I like this sculpture so much?" Gabrielle Fonteneau asks. "It's regal and humble at the same time. It reminds me of my own father."

I hadn't been trying to delve into the universal world of fathers, but I'm glad my sculpture reminds Gabrielle Fonteneau of her father, for I'm not beyond the spontaneous fanaticism inspired by famous people, whose breezy declarations seem to carry so much more weight than those of ordinary mortals. I still had trouble believing I had Gabrielle Fonteneau's cell number, which Céline Benoit had made me promise not to share with anyone else, not even my father.

My thoughts are drifting from Gabrielle Fonteneau's father to mine when I hear her say, "So when will you get here? You have the directions, right? Maybe you can join us for lunch tomorrow, at around twelve."

"We'll be there," I say.

But I'm no longer so certain.

My father loves museums. When he's not working at his barbershop, he's often at the Brooklyn Museum. The Ancient Egyptian rooms are his favorites.

"The Egyptians, they was like us," he likes to say. The Egyptians worshiped their gods in many forms, fought among themselves, and were often ruled by foreigners. The pharaohs were like the dictators he had fled, and their queens were as beautiful as Gabrielle Fonteneau. But what he admires most about the Ancient Egyptians is the way they mourn their dead.

"They know how to grieve," he'd say, marveling at the mummification process that went on for weeks but resulted in corpses that survived thousands of years.

My whole adult life, I have struggled to find the proper manner of sculpting my father, a quiet and distant man who only came alive while standing with me most of the Saturday mornings of my childhood, mesmerized by the golden masks, the shawabtis, and the schist tablets, Isis, Nefertiti, and Osiris, the jackal-headed ruler of the underworld.

The sun is setting and my mother has called more than a dozen times when my father finally appears in the hotel room doorway. He looks like a much younger man and appears calm and rested, as if bronzed after a long day at the beach.

"Too smoky in here," he says.

I point to my makeshift ashtray, a Dixie cup filled with tobacco-dyed water and cigarette butts.

"Ka, let your father talk to you." He fans the smoky air with his hands, walks over to the bed, and bends down to unlace his sneakers. "Yon ti koze, a little chat."

"Where were you?" I feel my eyelids twitching, a nervous reaction I inherited from my epileptic mother. "Why didn't you leave a note? And Papa, where is the sculpture?"

"That is why we must chat," he says, pulling off his sand-filled sneakers and rubbing the soles of his large, calloused feet each in turn. "I have objections."

He's silent for a long time, concentrating on his foot massage, as though he'd been looking forward to it all day.

70

"I'd prefer you not sell that statue," he says at last. Then he turns away, picks up the phone, and calls my mother.

"I know she called you," he says to her in Creole. "She panicked. I was just walking, thinking."

I hear my mother loudly scolding him, telling him not to leave me again. When he hangs up, he grabs his sneakers and puts them back on.

"Where's the sculpture?" My eyes are twitching so badly now I can barely see.

"We go," he says. "I take you to it."

75

We walk out to the parking lot, where the hotel sprinkler is once more at work, spouting water onto the grass and hedges like centrifugal rain. The streetlights are on now, looking brighter and brighter as the dusk deepens around them. New hotel guests are arriving. Others are leaving for dinner, talking loudly as they walk to their cars.

As my father maneuvers our car out of the parking lot, I tell myself that he might be ill, mentally ill, even though I'd never detected any signs of it before, beyond his prison nightmares.

When I was eight years old and my father had the measles for the first time in his life, I overheard him say to a customer on the phone, "Maybe serious. Doctor tell me, at my age, measles can kill."

This was the first time I realized that my father could die. I looked up the word "kill" in every dictionary and encyclopedia at school, trying to understand what it really meant, that my father could be eradicated from my life.

My father stops the car on the side of the highway near a man-made lake, one of those marvels of the modern tropical city, with curved stone benches surrounding a stagnant body of water. There's scant light to see by except a half-moon. Stomping the well-manicured grass, my father heads toward one of the benches. I sit down next to him, letting my hands dangle between my legs.

Here I am a little girl again, on some outing with my father, like his trips to the botanic garden or the zoo or the Egyptian statues at the museum. Again, I'm there simply because he wants me to be. I knew I was supposed to learn something from these childhood outings, but it took me years to realize that ultimately my father was doing his best to be like other fathers, to share as much of himself with me as he could.

I glance over at the lake. It's muddy and dark, and there are some very large pink fishes bobbing back and forth near the surface, looking as though they want to leap out and trade places with us.

"Is this where the sculpture is?" I ask.

"In the water," he says.

"Okay," I say calmly. But I know I'm already defeated. I know the piece is already lost. The cracks have probably taken in so much water that the wood has split into several chunks and plunged to the bottom. All I can think of saying is something glib, something I'm not even sure my father will understand. 85

"Please know this about yourself," I say. "You're a very harsh critic."

My father attempts to smother a smile. He scratches his chin and the scar on the side of his face, but says nothing. In this light the usually chiseled and embossed-looking scar appears deeper than usual, yet somehow less threatening, like a dimple that's spread out too far.

Anger is a wasted emotion, I've always thought. My parents would complain to each other about unjust politics in New York, but they never got angry at my grades, at all the Cs I got in everything but art classes, at my not eating my vegetables or occasionally vomiting my daily spoonful of cod-liver oil. Ordinary anger, I've always thought, is useless. But now I'm deeply angry. I want to hit my father, beat the craziness out of his head.

"Ka," he says, "I tell you why I named you Ka."

Yes, he'd told me, many, many times before. Now does not seem like a good time to remind me, but maybe he's hoping it will calm me, keep me from hating him for the rest of my life. 90

"Your mother not like the name at all," he says. "She say everybody tease you, people take pleasure repeating your name, calling you Kaka, Kaka, Kaka."

This too I had heard before.

"Okay," I interrupt him with a quick wave of my hands. "I've got it."

"I call you Ka," he says, "because in Egyptian world —"

A ka is a double of the body, I want to complete the sentence for him — the body's companion through life and after life. It guides the body through the kingdom of the dead. That's what I tell my students when I overhear them referring to me as Teacher Kaka. 95

"You see, ka is like soul," my father now says. "In Haiti is what we call good angel, ti bon anj. When you born, I look at your face, I think, here is my ka, my good angel."

I'm softening a bit. Hearing my father call me his good angel is the point at which I often stop being apathetic.

"I say rest in Creole," he prefaces, "because my tongue too heavy in English to say things like this, especially older things."

"Fine," I reply defiantly in English.

"Ka," he continues in Creole, "when I first saw your statue, I wanted to be buried with it, to take it with me into the other world."

"Like the Ancient Egyptians," I continue in English.

He smiles, grateful, I think, that in spite of everything, I can still appreciate his passions.

"Ka," he says, "when I read to you, with my very bad accent, from The Book of the Dead, do you remember how I made you read some chapters to me too?"

But this recollection is harder for me to embrace. I had been terribly bored by The Book of the Dead. The images of dead hearts being placed on scales and souls traveling aimlessly down fiery underground rivers had given me my own nightmares. It had seemed selfish of him not to ask me what I wanted to listen to before going to bed, what I wanted to read and have read to me. But since he'd recovered from the measles and hadn't died as we'd both feared, I'd vowed to myself to always tolerate, even indulge him, letting him take me places I didn't enjoy and read me things I cared nothing about, simply to witness the joy they gave him, the kind of bliss that might keep a dying person alive. But maybe he wasn't going to be alive for long. Maybe this is what this outing is about. Perhaps my "statue," as he called it, is a sacrificial offering, the final one that he and I would make together before he was gone.

"Are you dying?" I ask my father. It's the one explanation that would make what he's done seem insignificant or even logical. "Are you ill? Are you going to die?"

What would I do now, if this were true? I'd find him the best doctor, move back home with him and my mother. I'd get a serious job, find a boyfriend, and get married, and I'd never complain again about his having dumped my sculpture in the lake.

Like me, my father tends to be silent a moment too long during an important conversation and then say too much when less should be said. I listen to the wailing of crickets and cicadas, though I can't tell where they're coming from. There's the highway, and the cars racing by, the half-moon, the lake dug up from the depths of the ground—with my sculpture now at the bottom of it, the allée of royal palms whose shadows intermingle with the giant fishes on the surface of that lake, and there is me and my father.

"Do you recall the judgment of the dead," my father speaks up at last, "when the heart of a person is put on a scale? If it's heavy, the heart, then this person cannot enter the other world."

It is a testament to my upbringing, and perhaps the Kaka and good angel story has something to do with this as well, that I remain silent now, at this particular time.

105

"I don't deserve a statue," my father says. But at this very instant he does look like one, like the Madonna of humility, contemplating her losses in the dust, or an Ancient Egyptian funerary priest, kneeling with his hands prayerfully folded on his lap. 110

"Ka," he says, "when I took you to the Brooklyn Museum, I would stand there for hours admiring them. But all you noticed was how there were pieces missing from them, eyes, noses, legs, sometimes even heads. You always noticed more what was not there than what was."

Of course, this way of looking at things was why I ultimately began sculpting in the first place, to make statues that would amaze my father even more than these ancient relics.

"Ka, I am like one of those statues," he says.

"An Ancient Egyptian?" I hear echoes of my loud, derisive laugh only after I've been laughing for a while. It's the only weapon I have now, the only way I know to take my revenge on my father.

"Don't do that," he says, frowning, irritated, almost shouting over my laughter. 115
"Why do that? If you are mad, let yourself be mad. Why do you always laugh like a clown when you are angry?"

I tend to wave my hands about wildly when I laugh, but I don't notice I'm doing that now until he reaches over to grab them. I quickly move them away, but he ends up catching my right wrist, the same wrist Officer Bo had stroked earlier to make me shut up. My father holds on to it so tightly now that I feel his fingers crushing the bone, almost splitting it apart, and I can't laugh anymore.

"Let go," I say, and he releases my wrist quickly. He looks down at his own fingers, then lowers his hand to his lap.

My wrist is still throbbing. I keep stroking it to relieve some of the pain. It's the ache there that makes me want to cry more than anything, not so much this sudden, uncharacteristic flash of anger from my father.

"I'm sorry," he says. "I did not want to hurt you. I did not want to hurt anyone."

I keep rubbing my wrist, hoping he'll feel even sorrier, even guiltier for grabbing me so hard, but even more for throwing away my work. 120

"Ka, I don't deserve a statue," he says again, this time much more slowly, "not a whole one, at least. You see, Ka, your father was the hunter, he was not the prey."

I stop stroking my wrist, sensing something coming that might hurt much more. He's silent again. I don't want to prod him, feed him any cues, urge him to speak, but finally I get tired of the silence and feel I have no choice but to ask, "What are you talking about?"

I immediately regret the question. Is he going to explain why he and my mother have no close friends, why they've never had anyone over to the house, why they never speak of any relatives in Haiti or anywhere else, or have never returned there or, even after I learned Creole from them, have never taught me anything else about the country beyond what I could find out on my own, on the television, in newspapers, in books? Is he about to tell me why Manman is so pious? Why she goes to daily Mass? I am not sure I want to know anything more than the little they've chosen to share with me all these years, but it is clear to me that he needs to tell me, has been trying to for a long time.

"We have a proverb," he continues. "One day for the hunter, one day for the prey. Ka, your father was the hunter, he was not the prey."

Each word is now hard-won as it leaves my father's mouth, balanced like those hearts on the Ancient Egyptian scales.

"Ka, I was never in prison," he says.

"Okay," I say, sounding like I am fourteen again, chanting from what my mother used to call the meaningless adolescent chorus, just to sound like everyone else my age.

"I was working in the prison," my father says. And I decide not to interrupt him again until he's done.

Stranded in the middle of this speech now, he has to go on. "It was one of the prisoners inside the prison who cut my face in this way," he says.

My father now points to the long, pitted scar on his right cheek. I am so used to his hands covering it up that this new purposeful motion toward it seems dramatic and extreme, almost like raising a veil.

"This man who cut my face," he continues, "I shot and killed him, like I killed many people."

I'm amazed that he managed to say all of this in one breath, like a monologue. I wish I too had had some rehearsal time, a chance to have learned what to say in response.

There is no time yet, no space in my brain to allow for whatever my mother might have to confess. Was she huntress or prey? A thirty-year-plus disciple of my father's coercive persuasion? She'd kept to herself even more than he had, like someone who was nurturing a great pain that she could never speak about. Yet she had done her best to be a good mother to me, taking charge of feeding and clothing me and making sure my hair was always combed, leaving only what she must have considered my intellectual development to my father.

When I was younger, she'd taken me to Mass with her on Sundays. Was I supposed to have been praying for my father all that time, the father who was the hunter and not the prey?

I think back to "The Negative Confession" ritual from The Book of the Dead, a ceremony that was supposed to take place before the weighing of hearts, giving the dead a chance to affirm that they'd done only good things in their lifetime. It was one of the chapters my father read to me most often. Now he was telling me I should have heard something beyond what he was reading. I should have removed the negatives.

"I am not a violent man," he had read. "I have made no one weep. I have never been angry without cause. I have never uttered any lies. I have never slain any men or women. I have done no evil."

And just so I will be absolutely certain of what I'd heard, I ask my father, "And those nightmares you were always having, what were they?"

"Of what I," he says, "your father, did to others."

Another image of my mother now fills my head, of her as a young woman, a woman my age, taking my father in her arms. At what point did she decide that she loved him? When did she know that she was supposed to have despised him?

125

135

"Does Manman know?" I ask.

"Yes," he says. "I explained, after you were born."

140

I am the one who drives the short distance back to the hotel. The ride seems drawn out, the cars in front of us appear to be dawdling. I honk impatiently, even when everyone except me is driving at a normal speed. My father is silent, not even telling me, as he has always done whenever he's been my passenger, to calm down, to be careful, to take my time.

As we are pulling into the hotel parking lot, I realize that I haven't notified Officer Bo and Manager Salinas that my father has been found. I decide that I will call them from my room. Then, before we leave the car, my father says, "Ka, no matter what, I'm still your father, still your mother's husband. I would never do these things now."

And this to me is as meaningful a declaration as his other confession. It was my first inkling that maybe my father was wrong in his own representation of his former life, that maybe his past offered more choices than being either hunter or prey.

When we get back to the hotel room, I find messages from both Officer Bo and Manager Salinas. Their shifts are over, but I leave word informing them that my father has returned.

145

While I'm on the phone, my father slips into the bathroom and runs the shower at full force. He is not humming.

When it seems he's never coming out, I call my mother at home in Brooklyn.

"Manman, how do you love him?" I whisper into the phone.

My mother is clicking her tongue and tapping her fingers against the mouthpiece again. Her soft tone makes me think I have awakened her from her sleep.

"He tell you?" she asks.

150

"Yes," I say.

"Everything?"

"Is there more?"

"What he told you he want to tell you for long time," she says, "you, his good angel."

It has always amazed me how much my mother and father echo each other, in their speech, their actions, even in their businesses. I wonder how much more alike they could possibly be. But why shouldn't they be alike? Like all parents, they were a society of two, sharing a series of private codes and associations, a past that even if I'd been born in the country of their birth, I still wouldn't have known, couldn't have known, thoroughly. I was a part of them. Some might say I belonged to them. But I wasn't them.

"I don't know, Ka." My mother is whispering now, as though there's a chance she might also be overheard by my father. "You and me, we save him. When I meet him, it made him stop hurt the people. This how I see it. He a seed thrown in rock. You, me, we make him take root."

As my mother is speaking, this feeling comes over me that I sometimes have when I'm carving, this sensation that my hands don't belong to me at all, that something else besides my brain and muscles is moving my fingers, something bigger and stronger than myself, an invisible puppetmaster over whom I have no control. I feel as though it's this same puppetmaster that now forces me to lower the phone and hang up, in midconversation, on my mother.

As soon as I put the phone down, I tell myself that I could continue this particular conversation at will, in a few minutes, a few hours, a few days, even a few years. Whenever I'm ready.

My father walks back into the room, his thinning hair wet, his pajamas on. My mother does not call me back. Somehow she must know that she has betrayed me by not sharing my confusion and, on some level, my feeling that my life could have gone on fine without my knowing these types of things about my father.

When I get up the next morning, my father's already dressed. He's sitting on the edge of the bed, his head bowed, his face buried in his palms, his forehead shadowed by his fingers. If I were sculpting him at this moment, I would carve a praying mantis, crouching motionless, seeming to pray, while actually waiting to strike.

With his back to me now, my father says, "Will you call that actress and tell her we have it no more, the statue?"

"We were invited to lunch there," I say. "I believe we should go and tell her in person."

He raises his shoulders and shrugs.

"Up to you," he says.

We start out for Gabrielle Fonteneau's house after breakfast. It's not quite as hot as the previous morning, but it's getting there. I crank up the AC at full blast, making it almost impossible for us to have a conversation, even if we wanted to.

The drive seems longer than the twenty-four hours it took to get to Lakeland from New York. I quickly grow tired of the fake lakes, the fenced-in canals, the citrus groves, the fan-shaped travelers' palms, the highway so imposingly neat. My father turns his face away from me and takes in the tropical landscape, as though he will never see it again. I know he's enjoying the live oaks with Spanish moss and bromeliads growing in their shade, the yellow trumpet flowers and flame vines, the tamarinds and jacaranda trees we speed by, because he expressed his admiration for them before, on the first half of our journey.

As we approach Gabrielle Fonteneau's house, my father breaks the silence in the car by saying, "Now you see, Ka, why your mother and me, we have never returned home."

The Fonteneaus' house is made of bricks and white coral, on a cul-de-sac with a row of banyans separating the two sides of the street.

My father and I get out of the car and follow a concrete path to the front door. Before we can knock, an older woman appears in the doorway. It's Gabrielle

Fonteneau's mother. She resembles Gabrielle Fonteneau, or the way Gabrielle looks on television, with stunning almond eyes, skin the color of sorrel and spiraling curls brushing the sides of her face.

"We've been looking out for you," she says with a broad smile.

170

When Gabrielle's father joins her in the doorway, I realize where Gabrielle Fonteneau gets her height. He's more than six feet tall.

Mr. Fonteneau extends his hands, first to my father and then to me. They're relatively small, half the size of my father's.

We move slowly through the living room, which has a cathedral ceiling and walls covered with Haitian paintings with subjects ranging from market scenes and first communions to weddings and wakes. Most remarkable is a life-size portrait of Gabrielle Fonteneau sitting on a canopy-covered bench in what seems like her parents' garden.

Out on the back terrace, which towers over a nursery of azaleas, hibiscus, dra-caenas, and lemongrass, a table is set for lunch.

Mr. Fonteneau asks my father where he is from in Haiti, and my father lies. In the past, I thought he always said he was from a different province each time because he'd really lived in all of those places, but I realize now that he says this to reduce the possibility of anyone identifying him, even though thirty-seven years and a thinning head of widow-peaked salt-and-pepper hair shield him from the threat of immediate recognition.

175

When Gabrielle Fonteneau makes her entrance, in an off-the-shoulder ruby dress, my father and I both rise from our seats.

"Gabrielle," she coos, extending her hand to my father, who leans forward and kisses it before spontaneously blurting out, "My dear, you are one of the most splendid flowers of Haiti."

Gabrielle Fonteneau looks a bit flustered. She tilts her head coyly and turns toward me.

"Welcome," she says.

During the meal of conch, fried plantains, and mushroom rice, Mr. Fonteneau tries to draw my father into conversation by asking him, in Creole, when he was last in Haiti.

180

"Thirty-seven years," my father answers with a mouthful of food.

"No going back for you?" asks Mrs. Fonteneau.

"I have not yet had the opportunity," my father replies.

"We go back every year," says Mrs. Fonteneau, "to a beautiful place overlooking the ocean, in the mountains of Jacmel."

"Have you ever been to Jacmel?" Gabrielle Fonteneau asks me.

185

I shake my head no.

"We're fortunate," Mrs. Fonteneau says, "that we have a place to go where we can say the rain is sweeter, the dust is lighter, our beaches prettier."

"So now we are tasting rain and weighing dust?" Mr. Fonteneau says and laughs.

"There's nothing like drinking the sweet juice from a coconut fetched from your own tree." Mrs. Fonteneau's eyes are lit up now as she puts her fork down to better paint the picture for us. She's giddy, her voice grows louder and higher, and even her daughter is absorbed, smiling and recollecting with her mother.

"There's nothing like sinking your hand in sand from the beach in your own country," Mrs. Fonteneau is saying. "It's a wonderful feeling, wonderful." 190

I imagine my father's nightmares. Maybe he dreams of dipping his hands in the sand on a beach in his own country and finding that what he comes up with is a fistful of blood.

After lunch, my father asks if he can have a closer look at the Fonteneaus' garden. While he's taking the tour, I make my confession about the sculpture to Gabrielle Fonteneau.

She frowns as she listens, fidgeting, shifting her weight from one foot to the other, as though she's greatly annoyed that so much of her valuable time had been so carelessly squandered on me. Perhaps she's wondering if this was just an elaborate scheme to meet her, perhaps she wants us out of her house as quickly as possible.

"I don't usually have people come into my house like this," she says, "I promise you."

"I appreciate it," I say. "I'm grateful for your trust and I didn't mean to violate it." 195

"I guess if you don't have it, then you don't have it," she says. "But I'm very disappointed. I really wanted to give that piece to my father."

"I'm sorry," I say.

"I should have known something was off," she says, looking around the room, as if for something more interesting to concentrate on. "Usually when people come here to sell us art, first of all they're always carrying it with them and they always show it to us right away. But since you know Céline I overlooked that."

"There was a sculpture," I say, aware of how stupid my excuse was going to sound. "My father didn't like it, and he threw it away."

She raises her perfectly arched eyebrows, as if out of concern for my father's sanity, or for my own. Or maybe it's another indirect signal that she now wants us out of her sight. 200

"We're done, then," she says, looking directly at my face. "I have to make a call. Enjoy the rest of your day."

Gabrielle Fonteneau excuses herself, disappearing behind a closed door. Through the terrace overlooking the garden, I see her parents guiding my father along rows of lemongrass. I want to call Gabrielle Fonteneau back and promise her that I will make her another sculpture, but I can't. I don't know that I will be able to work on anything for some time. I have lost my subject, the prisoner father I loved as well as pitied.

In the garden Mr. Fonteneau snaps a few sprigs of lemongrass from one of the plants, puts them in a plastic bag that Mrs. Fonteneau is holding. Mrs. Fonteneau hands the bag of lemongrass to my father.

Watching my father accept with a nod of thanks, I remember the chapter "Driving Back Slaughters" from The Book of the Dead, which my father sometimes read to me to drive away my fear of imagined monsters. It was a chapter full of terrible lines like “My mouth is the keeper of both speech and silence. I am the child who travels the roads of yesterday, the one who has been wrought from his eye.”

I wave to my father in the garden to signal that we should leave now, and he slowly comes toward me, the Fonteneaus trailing behind him. 205

With each step forward, he rubs the scar on the side of his face, and out of a strange reflex I scratch my face in the same spot.

Maybe the last person my father harmed had dreamed moments like this into my father’s future, strangers seeing that scar furrowed into his face and taking turns staring at it and avoiding it, forcing him to conceal it with his hands, pretend it’s not there, or make up some lie about it, to explain.

Out on the sidewalk in front of the Fonteneaus’ house, before we both take our places in the car, my father and I wave good-bye to Gabrielle Fonteneau’s parents, who are standing in their doorway. Even though I’m not sure they understood the purpose of our visit, they were more than kind, treating us as though we were old friends of their daughter’s, which maybe they had mistaken us for.

As the Fonteneaus turn their backs to us and close their front door, I look over at my father, who’s still smiling and waving. When he smiles the scar shrinks and nearly disappears into the folds of his cheek, which used to make me wish he would never stop smiling.

Once the Fonteneaus are out of sight, my father reaches down on his lap and strokes the plastic bag with the lemongrass the Fonteneaus had given him. The car is already beginning to smell too much like lemongrass, like air freshener overkill. 210

“What will you use that for?” I ask.

“To make tea,” he says, “for Manman and me.”

I pull the car away from the Fonteneaus’ curb, dreading the rest stops, the gas station, the midway hotels ahead for us. I wish my mother were here now, talking to us about some miracle she’d just heard about in a sermon at the Mass. I wish my sculpture were still in the trunk. I wish I hadn’t met Gabrielle Fonteneau, that I still had that to look forward to somewhere else, sometime in the future. I wish I could give my father whatever he’d been seeking in telling me his secret. But my father, if anyone could, must have already understood that confessions do not lighten living hearts.

I had always thought that my father’s only ordeal was that he’d left his country and moved to a place where everything from the climate to the language was so unlike his own, a place where he never quite seemed to fit in, never appeared to belong. The only thing I can grasp now, as I drive way beyond the speed limit down yet another highway, is why the unfamiliar might have been so comforting, rather than distressing, to my father. And why he has never wanted the person he was, is, permanently documented in any way. He taught himself to appreciate the enormous weight of permanent markers by learning about the Ancient Egyptians. He had gotten to know them, through their crypts and monuments, in a way that he wanted no one to know him, no one except my mother and me, we, who are now his kas, his good angels, his masks against his own face.

Questions for Discussion

1. Danticat does not name the Tonton Macoutes or refer to François Duvalier in her story, yet this background is essential to the dew breaker's life in Haiti as well as in the United States. Why isn't Danticat more explicit about the historical context?
2. How do you interpret the title of the story? How does it both refer to the ancient Egyptian Book of the Dead and go beyond that reference? Why is Ka's father drawn to this culture?
3. Ka's father offers one explanation for why he destroyed her sculpture. Do you believe him? What are other possible explanations for his action?
4. Ka has a somewhat different relationship with her mother than she does with her father. How would you characterize each of these relationships? Do you think it would have mattered to Ka if her mother rather than her father had revealed to her his past as "hunter" rather than "prey"? Explain your answer.
5. How much does Ka's mother know about her husband? Is it significant that he told her about his past after they were married and had their daughter?
6. Once her father has revealed his secret identity to her, Ka immediately turns to thoughts of her mother: "There is no time yet, no space in my brain to allow for whatever my mother might have to confess. Was she huntress or prey?" (para. 133). Why does Ka shift to her mother before responding to her father in either words or thoughts?
7. How has Ka's relationship with her father changed by the end of the story? Explain whether you believe she will forgive him. Even if she does, do you think it will impact their relationship? Do you think she would rather not have known about his past?
8. Will Ka do another sculpture of her father in the future? If you think not, explain your reasoning. If you think so, explain what you think the sculpture might look like.
9. Ka says that her father, "if anyone could, must have already understood that confessions do not lighten living hearts" (para. 213). Why does she think he would understand this? And if he does understand this, why does he reveal his past to her?
10. Who are the victimizers and who are the victims in this story? Is such a classification appropriate or even possible under these circumstances?
11. Danticat poses powerful questions about blame, guilt, forgiveness, healing, and redemption in "The Book of the Dead." Is she arguing that Ka should forgive her father? Has he forgiven himself? Does forgiveness—by his daughter or his wife or even himself—mean that he is not morally culpable for his actions as a young man?

Questions on Style and Structure

1. “The Book of the Dead” opens with the simple sentence, “My father is gone.” How is this sentence explained, echoed, and explored throughout the story?
2. Why do you think Danticat chose to tell this story through Ka rather than through her father or an omniscient narrator who might have revealed the feelings of Ka, her mother, and her father?
3. What elements of mystery are present in the story? As the story begins, Ka is trying to locate her father, who has gone missing. When do you realize that he has not been hurt, taken ill, or become the victim of a violent crime but that he has left on his own? Is this an effective way to begin the story, or do you think it is misleading? What are some of the clues Ka has about her father’s identity? What information about her parents and the way the family lives in New York changes meaning when Ka learns about her father’s past in Haiti?
4. When her father reveals his past, he begins by referring to himself in the first person (“I don’t deserve a statue”), then shifts to the third person (“your father was the hunter, he was not the prey”) (para. 121). Why? What does that change in perspective suggest?
5. Ka describes the material she chose for her sculpture: “a piece of mahogany that was naturally flawed, with a few superficial cracks along what was now the back. I’d thought these cracks beautiful and had made no effort to sand or polish them away, as they seemed like the wood’s own scars, like the one my father had on his face” (para. 28). What does this passage suggest about Ka’s intuition about her father? What does it suggest about her ability to accept imperfection? Has her father tried to “polish away” his own scars up until this point?
6. What is the function of the minor characters of Gabrielle Fonteneau and her parents? How does Danticat weave them into the structure of the story, and how do they contribute to the development of the story’s themes? As you explore their role, ask yourself why Danticat did not simply structure the story so that Ka and her father chose not to visit the Fonteneaus’ after the sculpture was destroyed.
7. In an interview in The Caribbean Writer, Danticat talks about silence:

Silence is at the core of a story like this, just as it is during the dictatorship. There’s so much you’re not allowed to say. The Duvaliers silenced—by killing a whole generation and stunning many of the survivors into silence. . . . Migration also silences you. You’re in a country where you don’t speak the language, don’t know the names of things, so there is a silencing there as well . . . [yet] that these characters tell their stories in different ways, to the reader, to other people, breaks that silence.

Discuss the role of silence and voice in “The Book of the Dead,” paying special attention to who chooses to speak and when, and the use of Haitian Creole in exchanges between Ka and her parents.

8. What does Ka mean when she thinks back to “The Negative Confession” ritual from The Book of the Dead: “Now he was telling me I should have heard something beyond what he was reading. I should have removed the negatives” (para. 135)?
9. After his confession, her father assures Ka that “no matter what, I’m still your father, still your mother’s husband. I would never do these things now” (para. 143). Why does she think that this statement “is as meaningful a declaration as his other confession” (para. 144)? What does she mean when she thinks, “It was my first inkling that maybe my father was wrong in his own representation of his former life, that maybe his past offered more choices than being either hunter or prey” (para. 144)?
10. Who or what is the “puppetmaster” in paragraph 157 in which Ka describes how she feels when talking to her mother about her father’s past:

As my mother is speaking, this feeling comes over me that I sometimes have when I’m carving, this sensation that my hands don’t belong to me at all, that something else besides my brain and muscles is moving my fingers, something bigger and stronger than myself, an invisible puppetmaster over whom I have no control. I feel as though it’s this same puppetmaster that now forces me to lower the phone and hang up, in midconversation, on my mother.
11. How do you interpret the final paragraph of the story? Does it end on a hopeful note? What does Danticat mean by “the enormous weight of permanent markers”? How are the dew breaker’s “good angels” “his masks against his own face”?

Suggestions for Writing

1. Write an essay discussing the ways in which this new information about her father shakes Ka’s own identity. Consider her various responses from feeling that her “life could have gone on fine without . . . knowing these types of things about [her] father” (para. 159), to imagining that she feels a scar in the same place on her face as her father’s.
2. Do a close reading of the passage in which Ka’s father reveals that he was “the hunter . . . not the prey” (paras. 110–41). Discuss how Danticat conveys the confusion Ka is feeling as her father makes this revelation to her.
3. Write an essay comparing and contrasting “The Book of the Dead” with another work in which a character’s relationship to events in the past contributes to the meaning of the work. Consider how these events positively or negatively affect the present actions, attitudes, or values of Ka or her father and a character from another work.
4. Discuss “The Book of the Dead” in terms of what Michiko Kakutani, a book reviewer for the New York Times, has said: “a tale that simultaneously unfolds to become a philosophical meditation on the possibility of redemption and the longing of victims and victimizers alike to believe in the promise of new beginnings held forth by the American Dream.”

5. Write an essay explaining whether you think that Ka should forgive her father. Center your discussion on “The Book of the Dead,” but explore the concept of forgiveness, healing, and redemption through research into other areas, such as the documentary “As We Forgive”—about reconciliation efforts in Rwanda—and the Amy Biehl Foundation in South Africa.
6. Draw, paint, sculpt, or digitally create your interpretation of Ka’s sculpture of her father. Explain what information in Danticat’s story led you to your design and how you might have changed her original sculpture to fit your interpretation of the story.
7. Watch Jonathan Demme’s documentary The Agronomist, the true story of Jean Dominique, a Haitian radio journalist and human rights activist. Write an essay discussing how this film expands your understanding of “The Book of the Dead.”

Bartleby, the Scrivener

A Story of Wall Street

HERMAN MELVILLE

Herman Melville (1819–1891), best known for his novel Moby-Dick (1851), was born in New York City. By the time he was in his early twenties, he went off to sea, sailing first to Liverpool, England, then to the Marquesas Islands and areas in the South Seas on a whaling ship. Based on his experiences, he wrote the novels Typee and Omoo, which were both published in 1847; Redburn, an autobiographical novel based on his first voyage, appeared in 1849. Largely self-educated, Melville read widely, especially William Shakespeare and Ralph Waldo Emerson, both of whom influenced Melville's legendary novel, Moby-Dick. In the book, Melville's narrator, Ishmael, tells of the epic quest of Captain Ahab after the white whale. Now widely regarded as one of the greatest novels of American literature for its gripping epic adventure and its profound metaphysical journey, it was not well received in its time, nor were the later novels Pierre; or, The Ambiguities (1852), The Confidence Man (1857), or Billy Budd (published posthumously in 1924). Although Melville is most known for his novels, later in his life he also wrote poems and many fine stories, including "Bartleby, the Scrivener," which reflects his experience of working on Wall Street.

I am a rather elderly man. The nature of my avocations, for the last thirty years, has brought me into more than ordinary contact with what would seem an interesting and somewhat singular set of men, of whom, as yet, nothing, that I know of, has ever been written—I mean, the law-copyists, or scriveners. I have known very many of them, professionally and privately, and, if I pleased, could relate diverse histories, at which good-natured gentlemen might smile, and sentimental souls might weep. But I waive the biographies of all other scriveners, for a few passages in the life of Bartleby, who was a scrivener, the strangest I ever saw, or heard of. While, of other law-copyists, I might write the complete life, of Bartleby nothing of that sort can be done. I believe that no materials exist, for a full and satisfactory biography of this man. It is an irreparable loss to literature. Bartleby was one of those beings of whom nothing is ascertainable, except from the original sources, and, in his case, those are very small. What my own astonished eyes saw of Bartleby, that is all I know of him, except, indeed, one vague report, which will appear in the sequel.

Ere introducing the scrivener, as he first appeared to me, it is fit I make some mention of myself, my employés, my business, my chambers, and general surroundings, because some such description is indispensable to an adequate understanding of the chief character about to be presented. Imprimis:<sup>1</sup> I am a man who, from his youth upwards, has been filled with a profound conviction that the easiest way of life is the best. Hence, though I belong to a profession proverbially energetic and nervous, even to turbulence, at times, yet nothing of that sort have I ever suffered to invade my peace. I am one of those unambitious lawyers who never address a jury, or in any way draw down public applause; but, in the cool tranquillity of a snug retreat, do a snug business among rich men's bonds, and mortgages, and title-deeds. All who know me, consider me an eminently safe man. The late John Jacob Astor,<sup>2</sup> a personage little given to poetic enthusiasm, had no hesitation in pronouncing my first grand point to be prudence; my next, method. I do not speak it in vanity, but simply record the fact, that I was not unemployed in my profession by the late John Jacob Astor; a name which, I admit, I love to repeat; for it hath a rounded and orbicular sound to it, and rings like unto bullion. I will freely add, that I was not insensible to the late John Jacob Astor's good opinion.

Some time prior to the period at which this little history begins, my avocations had been largely increased. The good old office, now extinct in the State of New York, of a Master in Chancery, had been conferred upon me. It was not a very arduous office, but very pleasantly remunerative. I seldom lose my temper; much more seldom indulge in dangerous indignation at wrongs and outrages; but I must be permitted to be rash here and declare, that I consider the sudden and violent abrogation of the office of Master in Chancery, by the new Constitution, as a — premature act; inasmuch as I had counted upon a life-lease of the profits, whereas I only received those of a few short years. But this is by the way.

My chambers were up stairs, at No. — Wall Street. At one end, they looked upon the white wall of the interior of a spacious skylight shaft, penetrating the building from top to bottom.

This view might have been considered rather tame than otherwise, deficient 5 in what landscape painters call "life." But, if so, the view from the other end of my chambers offered, at least, a contrast, if nothing more. In that direction, my windows commanded an unobstructed view of a lofty brick wall, black by age and everlasting shade; which wall required no spyglass to bring out its lurking beauties, but, for the benefit of all near-sighted spectators, was pushed up to within ten feet of my window-panes. Owing to the great height of the surrounding buildings, and my chambers being on the second floor, the interval between this wall and mine not a little resembled a huge square cistern.

At the period just preceding the advent of Bartleby, I had two persons as copyists in my employment, and a promising lad as an office-boy. First, Turkey; second, Nippers; third, Ginger Nut. These may seem names, the like of which are not usually found in the Directory. In truth, they were nicknames, mutually conferred upon each other by my three clerks, and were deemed expressive of their respective persons or characters. Turkey was a short, pursy Englishman, of about my own age—that is, somewhere not far from sixty. In the morning, one might say, his face was of a fine florid hue, but after twelve o'clock, meridian—his dinner hour—it blazed like a grate full of Christmas coals; and continued blazing—but, as it were, with a gradual wane—till six o'clock, P.M., or thereabouts; after which, I saw no more of the proprietor of the face, which, gaining its meridian with the sun, seemed to set with it, to rise, culminate, and decline the following day, with the like regularity and undiminished glory. There are many singular coincidences I have known in the course of my life, not the least among which was the fact, that, exactly when Turkey displayed his fullest beams from his red and radiant countenance, just then, too, at that critical moment, began the daily period when I considered his business capacities as seriously disturbed for the remainder of the twenty-four hours. Not that he was absolutely idle, or averse to business then; far from it. The difficulty was, he was apt to be altogether too energetic. There was a strange, inflamed, flurried, flighty recklessness of activity about him. He would be incautious in dipping his pen into his inkstand. All his blots upon my documents were dropped there after twelve o'clock, meridian. Indeed, not only would he be reckless, and sadly given to making blots in the afternoon, but, some days, he went further, and was rather noisy. At such times, too, his face flamed with augmented blazonry, as if cannel coal had been heaped on anthracite. He made an unpleasant racket with his chair; spilled his sand-box; in mending his pens, impatiently split them all to pieces, and threw them on the floor in a sudden passion; stood up, and leaned over his table, boxing his papers about in a most indecorous manner, very sad to behold in an elderly man like him. Nevertheless, as he was in many ways a most valuable person to me, and all the time before twelve o'clock, meridian, was the quickest, steadiest creature, too, accomplishing a great deal of work in a style not easily to be matched—for these reasons, I was willing to overlook his eccentricities, though, indeed, occasionally, I remonstrated with him. I did this very gently, however, because, though the civilest, nay, the blandest and most reverential of men in the morning, yet, in the afternoon, he was disposed, upon provocation, to be slightly rash with his tongue—in fact, insolent. Now, valuing his morning services as I did, and resolved not to lose them—yet, at the same time, made uncomfortable by his inflamed ways after twelve o'clock—and being a man of peace, unwilling by my admonitions to call forth unseemly retorts from him, I took upon me, one Saturday noon (he was always worse on Saturdays) to hint to him, very kindly, that, perhaps, now that he was growing old, it might be well to abridge his labors; in short, he need not come to my chambers after twelve o'clock, but, dinner over, had best go home to his lodgings, and rest himself till tea-time. But no; he insisted upon his afternoon devotions. His countenance became intolerably fervid, as he oratorically assured me—gesticulating with a long ruler at the other end of the room—that if his services in the morning were useful, how indispensable, then, in the afternoon?

"With submission, sir," said Turkey, on this occasion, "I consider myself your right-hand man. In the morning I but marshal and deploy my columns; but in the afternoon I put myself at their head, and gallantly charge the foe, thus"—and he made a violent thrust with the ruler.

"But the blots, Turkey," intimated I.

"True; but, with submission, sir, behold these hairs! I am getting old. Surely, sir, a blot or two of a warm afternoon is not to be severely urged against gray hairs. Old age—even if it blot the page—is honorable. With submission, sir, we both are getting old."

This appeal to my fellow-feeling was hardly to be resisted. At all events, I saw that go he would not. So, I made up my mind to let him stay, resolving, nevertheless, to see to it that, during the afternoon, he had to do with my less important papers.

Nippers, the second on my list, was a whiskered, sallow, and, upon the whole, rather piratical-looking young man, of about five-and-twenty. I always deemed him the victim of two evil powers — ambition and indigestion. The ambition was evinced by a certain impatience of the duties of a mere copyist, an unwarrantable usurpation of strictly professional affairs such as the original drawing up of legal documents. The indigestion seemed betokened in an occasional nervous testiness and grinning irritability, causing the teeth to audibly grind together over mistakes committed in copying; unnecessary maledictions, hissed, rather than spoken, in the heat of business; and especially by a continual discontent with the height of the table where he worked. Though of a very ingenious mechanical turn, Nippers could never get this table to suit him. He put chips under it, blocks of various sorts, bits of pasteboard, and at last went so far as to attempt an exquisite adjustment, by final pieces of folded blotting-paper. But no invention would answer. If, for the sake of easing his back, he brought the table-lid at a sharp angle well up towards his chin, and wrote there like a man using the steep roof of a Dutch house for his desk, then he declared that it stopped the circulation in his arms. If now he lowered the table to his waistbands, and stooped over it in writing, then there was a sore aching in his back. In short, the truth of the matter was, Nippers knew not what he wanted. Or, if he wanted anything, it was to be rid of a scrivener's table altogether. Among the manifestations of his diseased ambition was a fondness he had for receiving visits from certain ambiguous-looking fellows in seedy coats, whom he called his clients. Indeed, I was aware that not only was he, at times, considerable of a ward-politician, but he occasionally did a little business at the justices' courts, and was not unknown on the steps of the Tombs.<sup>3</sup> I have good reason to believe, however, that one individual who called upon him at my chambers, and who, with a grand air, he insisted was his client, was no other than a dun, and the alleged title-deed, a bill. But, with all his failings, and the annoyances he caused me, Nippers, like his compatriot Turkey, was a very useful man to me; wrote a neat, swift hand; and, when he chose, was not deficient in a gentlemanly sort of deportment. Added to this, he always dressed in a gentlemanly sort of way; and so, incidentally, reflected credit upon my chambers. Whereas, with respect to Turkey, I had much ado to keep him from being a reproach to me. His clothes were apt to look oily, and smell of eating-houses. He wore his pantaloons very loose and baggy in summer. His coats were execrable, his hat not to be handled. But while the hat was a thing of indifference to me, inasmuch as his natural civility and deference, as a dependent Englishman, always led him to doff it the moment he entered the room, yet his coat was another matter. Concerning his coats, I reasoned with him; but with no effect. The truth was, I suppose, that a man with so small an income could not afford to sport such a lustrous face and a lustrous coat at one and the same time. As Nippers once observed, Turkey's money went chiefly for red ink. One winter day, I presented Turkey with a highly respectable-looking coat of my own—a padded gray coat, of a most comfortable warmth, and which buttoned straight up from the knee to the neck. I thought Turkey would appreciate the favor, and abate his rashness and obstreperousness of afternoons. But no; I verily believe that buttoning himself up in so downy and blanket-like a coat had a pernicious effect upon him—upon the same principle that too much oats are bad for horses. In fact, precisely as a rash, restive horse is said to feel his oats, so Turkey felt his coat. It made him insolent. He was a man whom prosperity harmed.

Though, concerning the self-indulgent habits of Turkey, I had my own private surmises, yet, touching Nippers, I was well persuaded that, whatever might be his faults in other respects, he was, at least, a temperate young man. But indeed, nature herself seemed to have been his vintner, and, at his birth, charged him so thoroughly with an irritable, brandy-like disposition, that all subsequent potations were needless. When I consider how, amid the stillness of my chambers, Nippers would sometimes impatiently rise from his seat, and stooping over his table, spread his arms wide apart, seize the whole desk, and move it, and jerk it, with a grim, grinding motion on the floor, as if the table were a perverse voluntary agent, intent on thwarting and vexing him, I plainly perceive that, for Nippers, brandy-and-water were altogether superfluous.

It was fortunate for me that, owing to its peculiar cause—indigestion—the irritability and consequent nervousness of Nippers were mainly observable in the morning, while in the afternoon he was comparatively mild. So that, Turkey's paroxysms only coming on about twelve o'clock, I never had to do with their eccentricities at one time. Their fits relieved each other, like guards. When Nippers' was on, Turkey's was off; and vice versa. This was a good natural arrangement, under the circumstances.

Ginger Nut, the third on my list, was a lad, some twelve years old. His father was a carman, ambitious of seeing his son on the bench instead of a cart, before he died. So he sent him to my office, as student at law, errand-boy, cleaner, and sweeper, at the rate of one dollar a week. He had a little desk to himself, but he did not use it much. Upon inspection, the drawer exhibited a great array of the shells of various sorts of nuts. Indeed, to this quick-witted youth, the whole noble science of the law was contained in a nutshell. Not the least among the employments of Ginger Nut, as well as one which he discharged with the most alacrity, was his duty as cake and apple purveyor for Turkey and Nippers. Copying lawpapers being proverbially a dry, husky sort of business, my two scriveners were fain to moisten their mouths very often with Spitzenbergs, to be had at the numerous stalls nigh the Custom House and Post Office. Also, they sent Ginger Nut very frequently for that peculiar cake—small, flat, round, and very spicy—after which he had been named by them. Of a cold morning, when business was but dull, Turkey would gobble up scores of these cakes, as if they were mere wafers—indeed, they sell them at the rate of six or eight for a penny—the scrape of his pen blending with the crunching of the crisp particles in his mouth. Of all the fiery afternoon blunders and flurried rashness of Turkey, was his once moistening a ginger-cake between his lips, and clapping it on to a mortgage, for a seal. I came within an ace of dismissing him then. But he mollified me by making an oriental bow, and saying—

“With submission, sir, it was generous of me to find you in stationery on my own account.” 15

Now my original business—that of a conveyancer and title hunter, and drawer-up of recondite documents of all sorts—was considerably increased by receiving the Master’s office. There was now great work for scriveners. Not only must I push the clerks already with me, but I must have additional help.

In answer to my advertisement, a motionless young man one morning stood upon my office threshold, the door being open, for it was summer. I can see that figure now—pallidly neat, pitiably respectable, incurably forlorn! It was Bartleby.

After a few words touching his qualifications, I engaged him, glad to have among my corps of copyists a man of so singularly sedate an aspect, which I thought might operate beneficially upon the flighty temper of Turkey, and the fiery one of Nippers.

I should have stated before that ground-glass folding-doors divided my premises into two parts, one of which was occupied by my scriveners, the other by myself. According to my humor, I threw open these doors, or closed them. I resolved to assign Bartleby a corner by the folding-doors, but on my side of them, so as to have this quiet man within easy call, in case any trifling thing was to be done. I placed his desk close up to a small side-window in that part of the room, a window which originally had afforded a lateral view of certain grimy brickyards and bricks, but which, owing to subsequent erections, commanded at present no view at all, though it gave some light. Within three feet of the panes was a wall, and the light came down from far above, between two lofty buildings, as from a very small opening in a dome. Still further to a satisfactory arrangement, I procured a high green folding screen, which might entirely isolate Bartleby from my sight, though not remove him from my voice. And thus, in a manner, privacy and society were conjoined.

At first, Bartleby did an extraordinary quantity of writing. As if long famishing 20 for something to copy, he seemed to gorge himself on my documents. There was no pause for digestion. He ran a day and night line, copying by sunlight and by candle-light. I should have been quite delighted with his application, had he been cheerfully industrious. But he wrote on silently, palely, mechanically.

It is, of course, an indispensable part of a scrivener’s business to verify the accuracy of his copy, word by word. Where there are two or more scriveners in an office, they assist each other in this examination, one reading from the copy, the other holding the original. It is a very dull, wearisome, and lethargic affair. I can readily imagine that, to some sanguine temperaments, it would be altogether intolerable. For example, I cannot credit that the mettlesome poet, Byron, would have contentedly sat down with Bartleby to examine a law document of, say five hundred pages, closely written in a crimped hand.

Now and then, in the haste of business, it had been my habit to assist in comparing some brief document myself, calling Turkey or Nippers for this purpose. One object I had, in placing Bartleby so handy to me behind the screen, was, to avail myself of his services on such trivial occasions. It was on the third day, I think, of his being with me, and before any necessity had arisen for having his own writing examined, that, being much hurried to complete a small affair I had in hand, I abruptly called to Bartleby. In my haste and natural expectancy of instant compliance, I sat with my head bent over the original on my desk, and my right hand sideways, and somewhat nervously extended with the copy, so that, immediately upon emerging from his retreat, Bartleby might snatch it and proceed to business without the least delay.

In this very attitude did I sit when I called to him, rapidly stating what it was I wanted him to do — namely, to examine a small paper with me. Imagine my surprise, nay, my consternation, when, without moving from his privacy, Bartleby, in a singularly mild, firm voice, replied, “I would prefer not to.”

I sat awhile in perfect silence, rallying my stunned faculties. Immediately it occurred to me that my ears had deceived me, or Bartleby had entirely misunderstood my meaning. I repeated my request in the clearest tone I could assume; but in quite as clear a one came the previous reply, “I would prefer not to.”

“Prefer not to,” echoed I, rising in high excitement, and crossing the room with a stride. “What do you mean? Are you moonstruck? I want you to help me compare this sheet here — take it,” and I thrust it towards him. 25

“I would prefer not to,” said he.

I looked at him steadfastly. His face was leanly composed; his gray eye dimly calm. Not a wrinkle of agitation rippled him. Had there been the least uneasiness, anger, impatience, or impertinence in his manner; in other words, had there been anything ordinarily human about him, doubtless I should have violently dismissed him from the premises. But as it was, I should have as soon thought of turning my pale plaster-of-paris bust of Cicero out of doors. I stood gazing at him awhile, as he went on with his own writing, and then reseated myself at my desk. This is very strange, thought I. What had one best do? But my business hurried me. I concluded to forget the matter for the present, reserving it for my future leisure. So, calling Nippers from the other room, the paper was speedily examined.

A few days after this, Bartleby concluded four lengthy documents, being quadruplicates of a week’s testimony taken before me in my High Court of Chancery. It became necessary to examine them. It was an important suit, and great accuracy was imperative. Having all things arranged, I called Turkey, Nippers, and Ginger Nut, from the next room, meaning to place the four copies in the hands of my four clerks, while I should read from the original. Accordingly, Turkey, Nippers, and Ginger Nut had taken their seats in a row, each with his document in his hand, when I called to Bartleby to join this interesting group.

I heard a slow scrape of his chair legs on the uncarpeted floor, and soon he appeared standing at the entrance of his hermitage. 30

“What is wanted?” said he, mildly.

“The copies, the copies,” said I, hurriedly. “We are going to examine them. There” — and I held towards him the fourth quadruplicate.

“I would prefer not to,” he said, and gently disappeared behind the screen.

For a few moments I was turned into a pillar of salt, standing at the head of my seated column of clerks. Recovering myself, I advanced towards the screen, and demanded the reason for such extraordinary conduct.

"Why do you refuse?"

35

"I would prefer not to."

With any other man I should have flown outright into a dreadful passion, scorned all further words, and thrust him ignominiously from my presence. But there was something about Bartleby that not only strangely disarmed me, but, in a wonderful manner, touched and disconcerted me. I began to reason with him.

"These are your own copies we are about to examine. It is labor saving to you, because one examination will answer for your four papers. It is common usage. Every copyist is bound to help examine his copy. Is it not so? Will you not speak? Answer!"

"I prefer not to," he replied in a flute-like tone. It seemed to me that, while I had been addressing him, he carefully revolved every statement that I made; fully comprehended the meaning; could not gainsay the irresistible conclusion; but, at the same time, some paramount consideration prevailed with him to reply as he did.

"You are decided, then, not to comply with my request—a request made according to common usage and common sense?"

He briefly gave me to understand, that on that point my judgment was sound. Yes: his decision was irreversible.

It is not seldom the case that, when a man is browbeaten in some unprecedented and violently unreasonable way, he begins to stagger in his own plainest faith. He begins, as it were, vaguely to surmise that, wonderful as it may be, all the justice and all the reason is on the other side. Accordingly, if any disinterested persons are present, he turns to them for some reinforcement for his own faltering mind.

"Turkey," said I, "what do you think of this? Am I not right?"

"With submission, sir," said Turkey, in his blandest tone, "I think that you are."

"Nippers," said I, "what do you think of it?"

45

"I think I should kick him out of the office."

(The reader of nice perceptions will have perceived that, it being morning, Turkey's answer is couched in polite and tranquil terms, but Nippers replies in ill-tempered ones. Or, to repeat a previous sentence, Nippers' ugly mood was on duty, and Turkey's off.)

"Ginger Nut," said I, willing to enlist the smallest suffrage in my behalf, "what do you think of it?"

"I think, sir, he's a little lunny," replied Ginger Nut, with a grin.

"You hear what they say," said I, turning towards the screen, "come forth and do your duty."

50

But he vouchsafed no reply. I pondered a moment in sore perplexity. But once more business hurried me. I determined again to postpone the consideration of this dilemma to my future leisure. With a little trouble we made out to examine the papers without Bartleby, though at every page or two Turkey deferentially dropped his opinion, that this proceeding was quite out of the common; while Nippers, twitching in his chair with a dyspeptic nervousness, ground out, between his set teeth, occasional hissing maledictions against the stubborn oaf behind the screen. And for his (Nippers') part, this was the first and the last time he would do another man's business without pay.

Meanwhile Bartleby sat in his hermitage, oblivious to everything but his own peculiar business there.

Some days passed, the scrivener being employed upon another lengthy work. His late remarkable conduct led me to regard his ways narrowly. I observed that he never went to dinner; indeed, that he never went anywhere. As yet I had never, of my personal knowledge, known him to be outside of my office. He was a perpetual sentry in the corner. At about eleven o'clock though, in the morning, I noticed that Ginger Nut would advance toward the opening in Bartleby's screen, as if silently beckoned thither by a gesture invisible to me where I sat. The boy would then leave the office, jingling a few pence, and reappear with a handful of ginger-nuts, which he delivered in the hermitage, receiving two of the cakes for his trouble.

He lives, then, on ginger-nuts, thought I; never eats a dinner, properly speaking; he must be a vegetarian, then, but no; he never eats even vegetables, he eats nothing but ginger-nuts. My mind then ran on in reveries concerning the probable effects upon the human constitution of living entirely on ginger-nuts. Ginger-nuts are so called, because they contain ginger as one of their peculiar constituents, and the final flavoring one. Now, what was ginger? A hot, spicy thing. Was Bartleby hot and spicy? Not at all. Ginger, then, had no effect upon Bartleby. Probably he preferred it should have none.

Nothing so aggravates an earnest person as a passive resistance. If the individual so resisted be of a not inhumane temper, and the resisting one perfectly harmless in his passivity, then, in the better moods of the former, he will endeavor charitably to construe to his imagination what proves impossible to be solved by his judgment. Even so, for the most part, I regarded Bartleby and his ways. Poor fellow! thought I, he means no mischief; it is plain he intends no insolence; his aspect sufficiently evinces that his eccentricities are involuntary. He is useful to me. I can get along with him. If I turn him away, the chances are he will fall in with some less indulgent employer, and then he will be rudely treated, and perhaps driven forth miserably to starve. Yes. Here I can cheaply purchase a delicious self-approval. To befriend Bartleby; to humor him in his strange wilfulness, will cost me little or nothing, while I lay up in my soul what will eventually prove a sweet morsel for my conscience. But this mood was not invariable with me. The passiveness of Bartleby sometimes irritated me. I felt strangely goaded on to encounter him in new opposition—to elicit some angry spark from him answerable to my own. But, indeed, I might as well have essayed to strike fire with my knuckles against a bit of Windsor soap. But one afternoon the evil impulse in me mastered me, and the following little scene ensued:

"Bartleby," said I, "when those papers are all copied, I will compare them with you."

"I would prefer not to."

"How? Surely you do not mean to persist in that mulish vagary?"

No answer.

I threw open the folding-doors nearby, and turning upon Turkey and Nippers, 60 exclaimed:

"Bartleby a second time says, he won't examine his papers. What do you think of it, Turkey?"

It was afternoon, be it remembered. Turkey sat glowing like a brass boiler; his bald head steaming; his hands reeling among his blotted papers.

"Think of it?" roared Turkey. "I think I'll just step behind his screen, and black his eyes for him!"

So saying, Turkey rose to his feet and threw his arms into a pugilistic position. He was hurrying away to make good his promise, when I detained him, alarmed at the effect of incautiously rousing Turkey's combativeness after dinner.

"Sit down, Turkey," said I, "and hear what Nippers has to say. What do you think 65 of it, Nippers? Would I not be justified in immediately dismissing Bartleby?"

"Excuse me, that is for you to decide, sir. I think his conduct quite unusual, and, indeed, unjust, as regards Turkey and myself. But it may only be a passing whim."

"Ah," exclaimed I, "you have strangely changed your mind, then—you speak very gently of him now."

"All beer," cried Turkey; "gentleness is effects of beer—Nippers and I dined together to-day. You see how gentle I am, sir. Shall I go and black his eyes?"

"You refer to Bartleby, I suppose. No, not to-day, Turkey," I replied; "pray, put up your fists."

I closed the doors, and again advanced towards Bartleby. I felt additional incen- 70 tives tempting me to my fate. I burned to be rebelled against again. I remembered that Bartleby never left the office.

"Bartleby," said I, "Ginger Nut is away; just step around to the Post Office, won't you?" (it was but a three minutes' walk) "and see if there is anything for me."

"I would prefer not to."

"You will not?"

"I prefer not."

I staggered to my desk, and sat there in a deep study. My blind inveteracy 75 returned. Was there any other thing in which I could procure myself to be ignominiously repulsed by this lean, penniless wight?—my hired clerk? What added thing is there, perfectly reasonable, that he will be sure to refuse to do?

"Bartleby!"

No answer.

"Bartleby," in a louder tone.

No answer.

"Bartleby," I roared. 80

Like a very ghost, agreeably to the laws of magical invocation, at the third summons, he appeared at the entrance of his hermitage.

"Go to the next room, and tell Nippers to come to me."

"I prefer not to," he respectfully and slowly said, and mildly disappeared.

“Very good, Bartleby,” said I, in a quiet sort of serenely-severe self-possessed tone, intimating the unalterable purpose of some terrible retribution very close at hand. At the moment I half intended something of the kind. But upon the whole, as it was drawing towards my dinner-hour, I thought it best to put on my hat and walk home for the day, suffering much from perplexity and distress of mind.

Shall I acknowledge it? The conclusion of this whole business was, that it soon became a fixed fact of my chambers, that a pale young scrivener, by the name of Bartleby, had a desk there; that he copied for me at the usual rate of four cents a folio (one hundred words); but he was permanently exempt from examining the work done by him, that duty being transferred to Turkey and Nippers, out of compliment, doubtless, to their superior acuteness; moreover, said Bartleby was never, on any account, to be dispatched on the most trivial errand of any sort; and that even if entreated to take upon him such a matter, it was generally understood that he would “prefer not to”—in other words, that he would refuse point-blank.

As days passed on, I became considerably reconciled to Bartleby. His steadiness, his freedom from all dissipation, his incessant industry (except when he chose to throw himself into a standing revery behind his screen), his great stillness, his unalterableness of demeanor under all circumstances, made him a valuable acquisition. One prime thing was this—he was always there—first in the morning, continually through the day, and the last at night. I had a singular confidence in his honesty. I felt my most precious papers perfectly safe in his hands. Sometimes, to be sure, I could not, for the very soul of me, avoid falling into sudden spasmodic passions with him. For it was exceeding difficult to bear in mind all the time those strange peculiarities, privileges, and unheard-of exemptions, forming the tacit stipulations on Bartleby’s part under which he remained in my office. Now and then, in the eagerness of dispatching pressing business, I would inadvertently summon Bartleby, in a short, rapid tone, to put his finger, say, on the incipient tie of a bit of red tape with which I was about compressing some papers. Of course, from behind the screen the usual answer, “I prefer not to,” was sure to come; and then, how could a human creature, with the common infirmities of our nature, refrain from bitterly exclaiming upon such perverseness—such unreasonableness? However, every added repulse of this sort which I received only tended to lessen the probability of my repeating the inadvertence.

Here it must be said, that, according to the custom of most legal gentlemen occupying chambers in densely populated law buildings, there were several keys to my door. One was kept by a woman residing in the attic, which person weekly scrubbed and daily swept and dusted my apartments. Another was kept by Turkey for convenience sake. The third I sometimes carried in my own pocket. The fourth I knew not who had.

Now, one Sunday morning I happened to go to Trinity Church, to hear a celebrated preacher, and finding myself rather early on the ground I thought I would walk round to my chambers for a while. Luckily I had my key with me; but upon applying it to the lock, I found it resisted by something inserted from the inside. Quite surprised, I called out; when to my consternation a key was turned from within; and thrusting his lean visage at me, and holding the door ajar, the apparition of Bartleby appeared, in his shirt-sleeves, and otherwise in a strangely tattered deshabille, saying quietly that he was sorry, but he was deeply engaged just then, and — preferred not admitting me at present. In a brief word or two, he moreover added, that perhaps I had better walk round the block two or three times, and by that time he would probably have concluded his affairs.

Now, the utterly unsurmised appearance of Bartleby, tenanted my law-chambers of a Sunday morning, with his cadaverously gentlemanly nonchalance, yet withal firm and self-possessed, had such a strange effect upon me, that incontinently I slunk away from my own door, and did as desired. But not without sundry twinges of impotent rebellion against the mild effrontery of this unaccountable scrivener. Indeed, it was his wonderful mildness chiefly, which not only disarmed me, but unmanned me, as it were. For I consider that one, for the time, is sort of unmanned when he tranquilly permits his hired clerk to dictate to him, and order him away from his own premises. Furthermore, I was full of uneasiness as to what Bartleby could possibly be doing in my office in his shirt-sleeves, and in an otherwise dismantled condition of a Sunday morning. Was anything amiss going on? Nay, that was out of the question. It was not to be thought of for a moment that Bartleby was an immoral person. But what could he be doing there? — copying? Nay again, whatever might be his eccentricities, Bartleby was an eminently decorous person. He would be the last man to sit down to his desk in any state approaching to nudity. Besides, it was Sunday; and there was something about Bartleby that forbade the supposition that he would by any secular occupation violate the proprieties of the day.

Nevertheless, my mind was not pacified; and full of a restless curiosity, at last I returned to the door. Without hindrance I inserted my key, opened it, and entered. Bartleby was not to be seen. I looked round anxiously, peeped behind his screen; but it was very plain that he was gone. Upon more closely examining the place, I surmised that for an indefinite period Bartleby must have ate, dressed, and slept in my office, and that too without plate, mirror, or bed. The cushioned seat of a rickety old sofa in one corner bore the faint impress of a lean, reclining form. Rolled away under his desk, I found a blanket; under the empty grate, a blacking box and brush; on a chair, a tin basin, with soap and a ragged towel; in a newspaper a few crumbs of ginger-nuts and a morsel of cheese. Yes, thought I, it is evident enough that Bartleby has been making his home here, keeping bachelor's hall all by himself. Immediately then the thought came sweeping across me, what miserable friendlessness and loneliness are here revealed! His poverty is great; but his solitude, how horrible! Think of it. Of a Sunday, Wall Street is deserted as Petra;<sup>4</sup> and every night of every day it is an emptiness. This building, too, which of week-days hums with industry and life, at nightfall echoes with sheer vacancy, and all through Sunday is forlorn. And here Bartleby makes his home; sole spectator of a solitude which he has seen all populous — a sort of innocent and transformed Marius brooding among the ruins of Carthage?<sup>5</sup>

For the first time in my life a feeling of overpowering stinging melancholy seized me. Before, I had never experienced aught but a not unpleasing sadness. The bond of a common humanity now drew me irresistibly to gloom. A fraternal melancholy! For both I and Bartleby were sons of Adam. I remembered the bright silks and sparkling faces I had seen that day, in gala trim, swan-like sailing down the Mississippi of Broadway; and I contrasted them with the pallid copyist, and thought to myself, Ah, happiness courts the light, so we deem the world is gay; but misery hides aloof, so we deem that misery there is none. These sad fancyings—chimeras, doubtless, of a sick and silly brain—led on to other and more special thoughts, concerning the eccentricities of Bartleby. Presentiments of strange discoveries hovered round me. The scrivener's pale form appeared to me laid out, among uncaring strangers, in its shivering winding-sheet.

Suddenly I was attracted by Bartleby's closed desk, the key in open sight left in the lock.

I mean no mischief, seek the gratification of no heartless curiosity, thought I; besides, the desk is mine, and its contents, too, so I will make bold to look within. Everything was methodically arranged, the papers smoothly placed. The pigeon-holes were deep, and removing the files of documents, I groped into their recesses. Presently I felt something there, and dragged it out. It was an old bandanna handkerchief, heavy and knotted. I opened it, and saw it was a savings' bank.

I now recalled all the quiet mysteries which I had noted in the man. I remembered that he never spoke but to answer; that, though at intervals he had considerable time to himself, yet I had never seen him reading—no, not even a newspaper; that for long periods he would stand looking out, at his pale window behind the screen, upon the dead brick wall; I was quite sure he never visited any refectory or eating-house; while his pale face clearly indicated that he never drank beer like Turkey; or tea and coffee even, like other men; that he never went anywhere in particular that I could learn; never went out for a walk, unless, indeed, that was the case at present; that he had declined telling who he was, or whence he came, or whether he had any relatives in the world; that though so thin and pale, he never complained of ill-health. And more than all, I remembered a certain unconscious air of pallid—how shall I call it?—of pallid haughtiness, say, or rather an austere reserve about him, which had positively awed me into my tame compliance with his eccentricities, when I had feared to ask him to do the slightest incidental thing for me, even though I might know, from his long-continued motionlessness, that behind his screen he must be standing in one of those dead-wall reveries of his.

Revolving all these things, and coupling them with the recently discovered fact, that he made my office his constant abiding place and home, and not forgetful of his morbid moodiness; revolving all these things, a prudential feeling began to steal over me. My first emotions had been those of pure melancholy and sincerest pity; but just in proportion as the forlornness of Bartleby grew and grew to my imagination, did that same melancholy merge into fear, that pity into repulsion. So true it is, and so terrible, too, that up to a certain point the thought or sight of misery enlists our best affections; but, in certain special cases, beyond that point it does not. They err who would assert that invariably this is owing to the inherent selfishness of the human heart. It rather proceeds from a certain hopelessness of remedying excessive and organic ill. To a sensitive being, pity is not seldom pain. And when at last it is perceived that such pity cannot lead to effectual succor, common sense bids the soul be rid of it. What I saw that morning persuaded me that the scrivener was the victim of innate and incurable disorder. I might give alms to his body; but his body did not pain him; it was his soul that suffered, and his soul I could not reach.

I did not accomplish the purpose of going to Trinity Church that morning. Somehow, the things I had seen disqualified me for the time from church-going. I walked homeward, thinking what I would do with Bartleby. Finally, I resolved upon this—I would put certain calm questions to him the next morning, touching his history, etc., and if he declined to answer them openly and unreservedly (and I supposed he would prefer not), then to give him a twenty dollar bill over and above whatever I might owe him, and tell him his services were no longer required; but that if in any other way I could assist him, I would be happy to do so, especially if he desired to return to his native place, wherever that might be, I would willingly help to defray the expenses. Moreover, if, after reaching home, he found himself at any time in want of aid, a letter from him would be sure of a reply.

The next morning came.

"Bartleby," said I, gently calling to him behind his screen.

No reply.

"Bartleby," said I, in a still gentler tone, "come here; I am not going to ask you to do anything you would prefer not to do—I simply wish to speak to you." 100

Upon this he noiselessly slid into view.

"Will you tell me, Bartleby, where you were born?"

"I would prefer not to."

"Will you tell me anything about yourself?"

"I would prefer not to." 105

"But what reasonable objection can you have to speak to me? I feel friendly towards you."

He did not look at me while I spoke, but kept his glance fixed upon my bust of Cicero, which, as I then sat, was directly behind me, some six inches above my head.

"What is your answer, Bartleby?" said I, after waiting a considerable time for a reply, during which his countenance remained immovable, only there was the faintest conceivable tremor of the white attenuated mouth.

"At present I prefer to give no answer," he said, and retired into his hermitage.

It was rather weak in me I confess, but his manner, on this occasion, nettled me. Not only did there seem to lurk in it a certain calm disdain, but his perverseness seemed ungrateful, considering the undeniable good usage and indulgence he had received from me. 110

Again I sat ruminating what I should do. Mortified as I was at his behavior, and resolved as I had been to dismiss him when I entered my office, nevertheless I strangely felt something superstitious knocking at my heart, and forbidding me to carry out my purpose, and denouncing me for a villain if I dared to breathe one bitter word against this forlornest of mankind. At last, familiarly drawing my chair behind his screen, I sat down and said: "Bartleby, never mind, then, about revealing your history; but let me entreat you, as a friend, to comply as far as may be with the usages of this office. Say now, you will help to examine papers tomorrow or next day: in short, say now, that in a day or two you will begin to be a little reasonable:—say so, Bartleby."

"At present I would prefer not to be a little reasonable," was his mildly cadaverous reply.

Just then the folding-doors opened, and Nippers approached. He seemed suffering from an unusually bad night's rest, induced by severer indigestion than common. He overheard those final words of Bartleby.

"Prefer not, eh?" grittled Nippers—"I'd prefer him, if I were you, sir," addressing me—"I'd prefer him; I'd give him preferences, the stubborn mule! What is it, sir, pray, that he prefers not to do now?"

Bartleby moved not a limb.

"Mr. Nippers," said I, "I'd prefer that you would withdraw for the present."

Somehow, of late, I had got into the way of involuntarily using this word "prefer" upon all sorts of not exactly suitable occasions. And I trembled to think that my contact with the scrivener had already and seriously affected me in a mental way. And what further and deeper aberration might it not yet produce? This apprehension had not been without efficacy in determining me to summary measures.

As Nippers, looking very sour and sulky, was departing, Turkey blandly and deferentially approached.

"With submission, sir," said he, "yesterday I was thinking about Bartleby here, and I think that if he would but prefer to take a quart of good ale every day, it would do much towards mending him, and enabling him to assist in examining his papers."

"So you have got the word, too," said I, slightly excited.

"With submission, what word, sir?" asked Turkey, respectfully crowding himself into the contracted space behind the screen, and by so doing, making me jostle the scrivener. "What word, sir?"

"I would prefer to be left alone here," said Bartleby, as if offended at being mobbed in his privacy.

"That's the word, Turkey," said I—"that's it."

"Oh, prefer? oh yes—queer word. I never use it myself. But, sir, as I was saying, if he would but prefer—"

"Turkey," interrupted I, "you will please withdraw."

"Oh certainly, sir, if you prefer that I should."

As he opened the folding-door to retire, Nippers at his desk caught a glimpse of me, and asked whether I would prefer to have a certain paper copied on blue paper or white. He did not in the least roguishly accent the word "prefer." It was plain that it involuntarily rolled from his tongue. I thought to myself, surely I must get rid of a demented man, who already has in some degree turned the tongues, if not the heads of myself and clerks. But I thought it prudent not to break the dismissal at once.

125

The next day I noticed that Bartleby did nothing but stand at his window in his dead-wall revery. Upon asking him why he did not write, he said that he had decided upon doing no more writing.

"Why, how now? what next?" exclaimed I, "do no more writing?"

"No more."

130

"And what is the reason?"

"Do you not see the reason for yourself?" he indifferently replied.

I looked steadfastly at him, and perceived that his eyes looked dull and glazed. Instantly it occurred to me, that his unexampled diligence in copying by his dim window for the first few weeks of his stay with me might have temporarily impaired his vision.

I was touched. I said something in condolence with him. I hinted that of course he did wisely in abstaining from writing for a while; and urged him to embrace that opportunity of taking wholesome exercise in the open air. This, however, he did not do. A few days after this, my other clerks being absent, and being in a great hurry to dispatch certain letters by the mail, I thought that, having nothing else earthly to do, Bartleby would surely be less inflexible than usual, and carry these letters to the Post Office. But he blankly declined. So, much to my inconvenience, I went myself.

Still added days went by. Whether Bartleby's eyes improved or not, I could not say. To all appearance, I thought they did. But when I asked him if they did, he vouchsafed no answer. At all events, he would do no copying. At last, in replying to my urgings, he informed me that he had permanently given up copying.

135

"What!" exclaimed I; "suppose your eyes should get entirely well—better than ever before—would you not copy then?"

"I have given up copying," he answered, and slid aside.

He remained as ever, a fixture in my chamber. Nay—if that were possible—he became still more of a fixture than before. What was to be done? He would do nothing in the office; why should he stay there? In plain fact, he had now become a millstone to me, not only useless as a necklace, but afflictive to bear. Yet I was sorry for him. I speak less than truth when I say that, on his own account, he occasioned me uneasiness. If he would but have named a single relative or friend, I would instantly have written, and urged their taking the poor fellow away to some convenient retreat. But he seemed alone, absolutely alone in the universe. A bit of wreck in the mid-Atlantic. At length, necessities connected with my business tyrannized over all other considerations. Decently as I could, I told Bartleby that in six days' time he must unconditionally leave the office. I warned him to take measures, in the interval, for procuring some other abode. I offered to assist him in this endeavor, if he himself would but take the first step towards a removal. "And when you finally quit me, Bartleby," added I, "I shall see that you go not away entirely unprovided. Six days from this hour, remember."

At the expiration of that period, I peeped behind the screen, and lo! Bartleby was there.

I buttoned up my coat, balanced myself; advanced slowly towards him, touched his shoulder, and said, "The time has come; you must quit this place; I am sorry for you; here is money; but you must go."

140

"I would prefer not," he replied, with his back still towards me.

"You must."

He remained silent.

Now I had an unbounded confidence in this man's common honesty. He had frequently restored to me sixpences and shillings carelessly dropped upon the floor, for I am apt to be very reckless in such shirt-button affairs. The proceeding, then, which followed will not be deemed extraordinary.

"Bartleby," said I, "I owe you twelve dollars on account; here are thirty-two, the odd twenty are yours—Will you take it?" and I handed the bills towards him.

But he made no motion.

"I will leave them here, then," putting them under a weight on the table. Then taking my hat and cane and going to the door, I tranquilly turned and added—"After you have removed your things from these offices, Bartleby, you will of course lock the door—since every one is now gone for the day but you—and if you please, slip your key underneath the mat, so that I may have it in the morning. I shall not see you again; so good-bye to you. If, hereafter, in your new place of abode, I can be of any service to you, do not fail to advise me by letter. Good-bye, Bartleby, and fare you well."

But he answered not a word; like the last column of some ruined temple, he remained standing mute and solitary in the middle of the otherwise deserted room.

As I walked home in a pensive mood, my vanity got the better of my pity. I could not but highly plume myself on my masterly management in getting rid of Bartleby. Masterly I call it, and such it must appear to any dispassionate thinker. The beauty of my procedure seemed to consist in its perfect quietness. There was no vulgar bullying, no bravado of any sort, no choleric hectoring, and striding to and fro across the apartment, jerking out vehement commands for Bartleby to bundle himself off with his beggarly traps. Nothing of the kind. Without loudly bidding Bartleby depart—as an inferior genius might have done—I assumed the ground that depart he must; and upon that assumption built all I had to say. The more I thought over my procedure, the more I was charmed with it. Nevertheless, next morning, upon awakening, I had my doubts—I had somehow slept off the fumes of vanity. One of the coolest and wisest hours a man has, is just after he awakes in the morning. My procedure seemed as sagacious as ever—but only in theory. How it would prove in practice—there was the rub. It was truly a beautiful thought to have assumed Bartleby's departure; but, after all, that assumption was simply my own, and none of Bartleby's. The great point was, not whether I had assumed that he would quit me, but whether he would prefer to do so. He was more a man of preferences than assumptions.

After breakfast, I walked down town, arguing the probabilities pro and con. One moment I thought it would prove a miserable failure, and Bartleby would be found all alive at my office as usual; the next moment it seemed certain that I should find his chair empty. And so I kept veering about. At the corner of Broadway and Canal Street, I saw quite an excited group of people standing in earnest conversation.

"I'll take odds he doesn't," said a voice as I passed.

"Doesn't go?—done!" said I, "put up your money."

I was instinctively putting my hand in my pocket to produce my own, when I remembered that this was an election day. The words I had overheard bore no reference to Bartleby, but to the success or non-success of some candidate for the mayoralty. In my intent frame of mind, I had, as it were, imagined that all Broadway shared in my excitement, and were debating the same question with me. I passed on, very thankful that the uproar of the street screened my momentary absent-mindedness.

As I had intended, I was earlier than usual at my office door. I stood listening for a moment. All was still. He must be gone. I tried the knob. The door was locked. Yes, my procedure had worked to a charm; he indeed must be vanished. Yet a certain melancholy mixed with this: I was almost sorry for my brilliant success. I was fumbling under the door mat for the key, which Bartleby was to have left there for me, when accidentally my knee knocked against a panel, producing a summoning sound, and in response a voice came to me from within—"Not yet; I am occupied."

It was Bartleby.

I was thunderstruck. For an instant I stood like the man who, pipe in mouth, was killed one cloudless afternoon long ago in Virginia, by summer lightning; at his own warm open window he was killed, and remained leaning out there upon the dreamy afternoon, till some one touched him, when he fell.

"Not gone!" I murmured at last. But again obeying that wondrous ascendancy which the inscrutable scrivener had over me, and from which ascendancy, for all my chafing, I could not completely escape, I slowly went down stairs and out into the street, and while walking round the block, considered what I should next do in this unheard-of perplexity. Turn the man out by an actual thrusting I could not; to drive him away by calling him hard names would not do; calling in the police was an unpleasant idea; and yet, permit him to enjoy his cadaverous triumph over me—this, too, I could not think of. What was to be done? or, if nothing could be done, was there anything further that I could assume in the matter? Yes, as before I had prospectively assumed that Bartleby would depart, so now I might retrospectively assume that departed he was. In the legitimate carrying out of this assumption, I might enter my office in a great hurry, and pretending not to see Bartleby at all, walk straight against him as if he were air. Such a proceeding would in a singular degree have the appearance of a home-thrust. It was hardly possible that Bartleby could withstand such an application of the doctrine of assumption. But upon second thoughts the success of the plan seemed rather dubious. I resolved to argue the matter over with him again.

"Bartleby," said I, entering the office, with a quietly severe expression, "I am seriously displeased. I am pained, Bartleby. I had thought better of you. I had imagined you of such a gentlemanly organization, that in any delicate dilemma a slight hint would suffice—in short, an assumption. But it appears I am deceived. Why," I added, unaffectedly starting, "you have not even touched that money yet," pointing to it, just where I had left it the evening previous.

He answered nothing.

"Will you, or will you not, quit me?" I now demanded in a sudden passion, advancing close to him.

160

"I would prefer not to quit you," he replied, gently emphasizing the not.

"What earthly right have you to stay here? Do you pay any rent? Do you pay my taxes? Or is this property yours?"

He answered nothing.

"Are you ready to go on and write now? Are your eyes recovered? Could you copy a small paper for me this morning? or help examine a few lines? or step round to the Post Office? In a word, will you do anything at all, to give a coloring to your refusal to depart the premises?"

He silently retired into his hermitage.

I was now in such a state of nervous resentment that I thought it but prudent to check myself at present from further demonstrations. Bartleby and I were alone. I remembered the tragedy of the unfortunate Adams and the still more unfortunate Colt<sup>6</sup> in the solitary office of the latter; and how poor Colt, being dreadfully incensed by Adams, and imprudently permitting himself to get wildly excited, was at unawares hurried into his fatal act—an act which certainly no man could possibly deplore more than the actor himself. Often it had occurred to me in my ponderings upon the subject that had that altercation taken place in the public street, or at a private residence, it would not have terminated as it did. It was the circumstance of being alone in a solitary office, up stairs, of a building entirely unhallowed by humanizing domestic associations—an uncarpeted office, doubtless, of a dusty, haggard sort of appearance—this it must have been, which greatly helped to enhance the irritable desperation of the hapless Colt.

But when this old Adam of resentment rose in me and tempted me concerning Bartleby, I grappled him and threw him. How? Why, simply by recalling the divine injunction: "A new commandment give I unto you, that ye love one another." Yes, this it was that saved me. Aside from higher considerations, charity often operates as a vastly wise and prudent principle—a great safeguard to its possessor. Men have committed murder for jealousy's sake, and anger's sake, and hatred's sake, and selfishness' sake, and spiritual pride's sake; but no man, that ever I heard of, ever committed a diabolical murder for sweet charity's sake. Mere self-interest, then, if no better motive can be enlisted, should, especially with high-tempered men, prompt all beings to charity and philanthropy. At any rate, upon the occasion in question, I strove to drown my exasperated feelings towards the scrivener by benevolently construing his conduct. Poor fellow, poor fellow! thought I, he don't mean anything; and besides, he has seen hard times, and ought to be indulged.

I endeavored, also, immediately to occupy myself, and at the same time to comfort my despondency. I tried to fancy, that in the course of the morning, at such time as might prove agreeable to him, Bartleby, of his own free accord, would emerge from his hermitage and take up some decided line of march in the direction of the door. But no. Half-past twelve o'clock came; Turkey began to glow in the face, overturn his inkstand, and become generally obstreperous; Nippers abated down into quietude and courtesy; Ginger Nut munched his noon apple; and Bartleby remained standing at his window in one of his profoundest dead-wall reveries. Will it be credited? Ought I to acknowledge it? That afternoon I left the office without saying one further word to him.

Some days now passed, during which, at leisure intervals I looked a little into “Edwards on the Will,” and “Priestley on Necessity.”<sup>7</sup> Under the circumstances, those books induced a salutary feeling. Gradually I slid into the persuasion that these troubles of mine, touching the scrivener, had been all predestined from eternity, and Bartleby was billeted upon me for some mysterious purpose of an all-wise Providence, which it was not for a mere mortal like me to fathom. Yes, Bartleby, stay there behind your screen, thought I; I shall persecute you no more; you are harmless and noiseless as any of these old chairs; in short, I never feel so private as when I know you are here. At last I see it, I feel it; I penetrate to the predestined purpose of my life. I am content. Others may have loftier parts to enact; but my mission in this world, Bartleby, is to furnish you with office-room for such period as you may see fit to remain.

I believe that this wise and blessed frame of mind would have continued with me, had it not been for the unsolicited and uncharitable remarks obtruded upon me by my professional friends who visited the rooms. But thus it often is, that the constant friction of illiberal minds wears out at last the best resolves of the more generous. Though to be sure, when I reflected upon it, it was not strange that people entering my office should be struck by the peculiar aspect of the unaccountable Bartleby, and so be tempted to throw out some sinister observations concerning him. Sometimes an attorney, having business with me, and calling at my office, and finding no one but the scrivener there, would undertake to obtain some sort of precise information from him touching my whereabouts; but without heeding his idle talk, Bartleby would remain standing immovable in the middle of the room. So after contemplating him in that position for a time, the attorney would depart, no wiser than he came.

Also, when a reference was going on, and the room full of lawyers and witnesses, and business driving fast, some deeply-occupied legal gentleman present, seeing Bartleby wholly unemployed, would request him to run round to his (the legal gentleman's) office and fetch some papers for him. Thereupon, Bartleby would tranquilly decline, and yet remain idle as before. Then the lawyer would give a great stare, and turn to me. And what could I say? At last I was made aware that all through the circle of my professional acquaintance, a whisper of wonder was running round, having reference to the strange creature I kept at my office. This worried me very much. And as the idea came upon me of his possibly turning out a long-lived man, and keeping occupying my chambers, and denying my authority; and perplexing my visitors; and scandalizing my professional reputation; and casting a general gloom over the premises; keeping soul and body together to the last upon his savings (for doubtless he spent but half a dime a day), and in the end perhaps outlive me, and claim possession of my office by right of his perpetual occupancy: as all these dark anticipations crowded upon me more and more, and my friends continually intruded their relentless remarks upon the apparition in my room; a great change was wrought in me. I resolved to gather all my faculties together, and forever rid me of this intolerable incubus.

Ere revolving any complicated project, however, adapted to this end, I first simply suggested to Bartleby the propriety of his permanent departure. In a calm and serious tone, I commended the idea to his careful and mature consideration. But, having taken three days to meditate upon it, he apprised me, that his original determination remained the same; in short, that he still preferred to abide with me.

What shall I do? I now said to myself, buttoning up my coat to the last button. What shall I do? what ought I to do? what does conscience say I should do with this man, or, rather, ghost. Rid myself of him, I must; go, he shall. But how? You will not thrust him, the poor, pale, passive mortal—you will not thrust such a helpless creature out of your door? you will not dishonor yourself by such cruelty? No, I will not, I cannot do that. Rather would I let him live and die here, and then mason up his remains in the wall. What, then, will you do? For all your coaxing, he will not budge. Bribes he leaves under your own paper-weight on your table; in short, it is quite plain that he prefers to cling to you.

Then something severe, something unusual must be done. What! surely you will not have him collared by a constable, and commit his innocent pallor to the common jail? And upon what ground could you procure such a thing to be done?—a vagrant, is he? What! he a vagrant, a wanderer, who refuses to budge? It is because he will not be a vagrant, then, that you seek to count him as a vagrant. That is too absurd. No visible means of support: there I have him. Wrong again: for indubitably he does support himself, and that is the only unanswerable proof that any man can show of his possessing the means so to do. No more, then. Since he will not quit me, I must quit him. I will change my offices; I will move elsewhere, and give him fair notice, that if I find him on my new premises I will then proceed against him as a common trespasser.

Acting accordingly, next day I thus addressed him: “I find these chambers too far from the City Hall; the air is unwholesome. In a word, I propose to remove my offices next week, and shall no longer require your services. I tell you this now, in order that you may seek another place.”

He made no reply, and nothing more was said.

On the appointed day I engaged carts and men, proceeded to my chambers, and having but little furniture, everything was removed in a few hours. Throughout, the scrivener remained standing behind the screen, which I directed to be removed the last thing. It was withdrawn; and, being folded up like a huge folio, left him the motionless occupant of a naked room. I stood in the entry watching him a moment, while something from within me upbraided me.

I re-entered, with my hand in my pocket—and—and my heart in my mouth.

"Good-bye, Bartleby; I am going—good-bye, and God some way bless you; and take that," slipping something in his hand. But it dropped upon the floor, and then—strange to say—I tore myself from him whom I had so longed to be rid of.

Established in my new quarters, for a day or two I kept the door locked, and started at every footfall in the passages. When I returned to my rooms, after any little absence, I would pause at the threshold for an instant, and attentively listen, ere applying my key. But these fears were needless. Bartleby never came nigh me.

I thought all was going well, when a perturbed-looking stranger visited me, inquiring whether I was the person who had recently occupied rooms at No. — Wall Street.

Full of forebodings, I replied that I was.

"Then, sir," said the stranger, who proved a lawyer, "you are responsible for the man you left there. He refuses to do any copying; he refuses to do anything; he says he prefers not to; and he refuses to quit the premises."

"I am very sorry, sir," said I, with assumed tranquillity, but an inward tremor, "but, really, the man you allude to is nothing to me—he is no relation or apprentice of mine, that you should hold me responsible for him."

"In mercy's name, who is he?"

"I certainly cannot inform you. I know nothing about him. Formerly I employed him as a copyist; but he has done nothing for me now for some time past."

"I shall settle him, then—good morning, sir."

Several days passed, and I heard nothing more; and, though I often felt a charitable prompting to call at the place and see poor Bartleby, yet a certain squeamishness, of I know not what, withheld me.

All is over with him, by this time, thought I, at last, when, through another week, no further intelligence reached me. But, coming to my room the day after, I found several persons waiting at my door in a high state of nervous excitement.

"That's the man—here he comes," cried the foremost one, whom I recognized as the lawyer who had previously called upon me alone.

"You must take him away, sir, at once," cried a portly person among them, advancing upon me, and whom I knew to be the landlord of No. — Wall Street. "These gentlemen, my tenants, cannot stand it any longer; Mr. B——," pointing to the lawyer, "has turned him out of his room, and he now persists in haunting the building generally, sitting upon the banisters of the stairs by day, and sleeping in the entry by night. Everybody is concerned; clients are leaving the offices; some fears are entertained of a mob; something you must do, and that without delay."

Aghast at this torrent, I fell back before it, and would fain have locked myself in my new quarters. In vain I persisted that Bartleby was nothing to me—no more than to any one else. In vain—I was the last person known to have anything to do with him, and they held me to the terrible account. Fearful, then, of being exposed in the papers (as one person present obscurely threatened), I considered the matter, and, at length, said, that if the lawyer would give me a confidential interview with the scrivener, in his (the lawyer's) own room, I would, that afternoon, strive my best to rid them of the nuisance they complained of.

Going up stairs to my old haunt, there was Bartleby silently sitting upon the banister at the landing.

"What are you doing here, Bartleby?" said I.

"Sitting upon the banister," he mildly replied.

195

I motioned him into the lawyer's room, who then left us.

"Bartleby," said I, "are you aware that you are the cause of great tribulation to me, by persisting in occupying the entry after being dismissed from the office?"

No answer.

"Now one of two things must take place. Either you must do something, or something must be done to you. Now what sort of business would you like to engage in? Would you like to re-engage in copying for some one?"

"No; I would prefer not to make any change."

200

"Would you like a clerkship in a dry-goods store?"

"There is too much confinement about that. No, I would not like a clerkship; but I am not particular."

"Too much confinement," I cried, "why, you keep yourself confined all the time!"

"I would prefer not to take a clerkship," he rejoined, as if to settle that little item at once.

"How would a bar-tender's business suit you? There is no trying of the eye-sight in that."

205

"I would not like it at all; though, as I said before, I am not particular."

His unwonted wordiness inspirited me. I returned to the charge.

"Well, then, would you like to travel through the country collecting bills for the merchants? That would improve your health."

"No, I would prefer to be doing something else."

"How, then, would going as a companion to Europe, to entertain some young gentleman with your conversation—how would that suit you?"

210

"Not at all. It does not strike me that there is anything definite about that. I like to be stationary. But I am not particular."

"Stationary you shall be, then," I cried, now losing all patience, and, for the first time in all my exasperating connection with him, fairly flying into a passion. "If you do not go away from these premises before night, I shall feel bound—indeed, I am bound—to—to quit the premises myself!" I rather absurdly concluded, knowing not with what possible threat to try to frighten his immobility into compliance. Despairing of all further efforts, I was precipitately leaving him, when a final thought occurred to me—one which had not been wholly unindulged before.

"Bartleby," said I, in the kindest tone I could assume under such exciting circumstances, "will you go home with me now—not to my office, but my dwelling—and remain there till we can conclude upon some convenient arrangement for you at our leisure? Come, let us start now, right away."

"No: at present I would prefer not to make any change at all."

I answered nothing; but, effectually dodging every one by the suddenness and rapidity of my flight, rushed from the building, ran up Wall Street towards Broadway, and, jumping into the first omnibus, was soon removed from pursuit. As soon as tranquillity returned, I distinctly perceived that I had now done all that I possibly could, both in respect to the demands of the landlord and his tenants, and with regard to my own desire and sense of duty, to benefit Bartleby, and shield him from rude persecution. I now strove to be entirely care-free and quiescent; and my conscience justified me in the attempt; though, indeed, it was not so successful as I could have wished. So fearful was I of being again hunted out by the incensed landlord and his exasperated tenants, that, surrendering my business to Nippers, for a few days, I drove about the upper part of the town and through the suburbs, in my rockaway; crossed over to Jersey City and Hoboken, and paid fugitive visits to Manhattanville and Astoria. In fact, I almost lived in my rockaway for the time.

When again I entered my office, lo, a note from the landlord lay upon the desk. I opened it with trembling hands. It informed me that the writer had sent to the police, and had Bartleby removed to the Tombs as a vagrant. Moreover, since I knew more about him than any one else, he wished me to appear at that place, and make a suitable statement of the facts. These tidings had a conflicting effect upon me. At first I was indignant; but, at last, almost approved. The landlord's energetic, summary disposition, had led him to adopt a procedure which I do not think I would have decided upon myself; and yet, as a last resort, under such peculiar circumstances, it seemed the only plan.

As I afterwards learned, the poor scrivener, when told that he must be conducted to the Tombs, offered not the slightest obstacle, but, in his pale, unmoving way, silently acquiesced.

Some of the compassionate and curious by-standers joined the party; and headed by one of the constables arm-in-arm with Bartleby, the silent procession filed its way through all the noise, and heat, and joy of the roaring thoroughfares at noon.

The same day I received the note, I went to the Tombs, or, to speak more properly, the Halls of Justice. Seeking the right officer, I stated the purpose of my call, and was informed that the individual I described was, indeed, within. I then assured the functionary that Bartleby was a perfectly honest man, and greatly to be compassionated, however unaccountably eccentric. I narrated all I knew, and closed by suggesting the idea of letting him remain in as indulgent confinement as possible, till something less harsh might be done—though, indeed, I hardly knew what. At all events, if nothing else could be decided upon, the almshouse must receive him. I then begged to have an interview.

Being under no disgraceful charge, and quite serene and harmless in all his ways, they had permitted him freely to wander about the prison, and, especially, in the inclosed grass-platted yards thereof. And so I found him there, standing all alone in the quietest of the yards, his face towards a high wall, while all around, from the narrow slits of the jail windows, I thought I saw peering out upon him the eyes of murderers and thieves.

"Bartleby!"

"I know you," he said, without looking round—"and I want nothing to say to you."

"It was not I that brought you here, Bartleby," said I, keenly pained at his implied suspicion. "And to you, this should not be so vile a place. Nothing reproachful attaches to you by being here. And see, it is not so sad a place as one might think. Look, there is the sky, and here is the grass."

"I know where I am," he replied, but would say nothing more, and so I left him.

As I entered the corridor again, a broad meat-like man, in an apron, accosted me, and, jerking his thumb over his shoulder, said—"Is that your friend?" 225

"Yes."

"Does he want to starve? If he does, let him live on the prison fare, that's all."

"Who are you?" asked I, not knowing what to make of such an unofficially speaking person in such a place.

"I am the grub-man. Such gentlemen as have friends here, hire me to provide them with something good to eat."

"Is this so?" said I, turning the turnkey. 230

He said it was.

"Well, then," said I, slipping some silver into the grub-man's hands (for so they called him), "I want you to give particular attention to my friend there; let him have the best dinner you can get. And you must be as polite to him as possible."

"Introduce me, will you?" said the grub-man, looking at me with an expression which seemed to say he was all impatience for an opportunity to give a specimen of his breeding.

Thinking it would prove of benefit to the scrivener, I acquiesced; and, asking the grub-man his name, went up with him to Bartleby.

"Bartleby, this is a friend; you will find him very useful to you." 235

"Your sarvant, sir, your sarvant," said the grub-man, making a low salutation behind his apron. "Hope you find it pleasant here, sir; nice grounds—cool apartments—hope you'll stay with us some time—try to make it agreeable. What will you have for dinner to-day?"

"I prefer not to dine to-day," said Bartleby, turning away. "It would disagree with me; I am unused to dinners." So saying, he slowly moved to the other side of the inclosure, and took up a position fronting the deadwall.

"How's this?" said the grub-man, addressing me with a stare of astonishment. "He's odd, ain't he?"

"I think he is a little deranged," said I, sadly.

"Deranged? deranged is it? Well, now, upon my word, I thought that friend of yourn was a gentleman forger; they are always pale and genteel-like, them forgers. I can't help pity 'em—can't help it, sir. Did you know Monroe Edwards?" he added, touchingly, and paused. Then, laying his hand piteously on my shoulder, sighed, "he died of consumption at Sing-Sing. So you weren't acquainted with Monroe?" 240

"No, I was never socially acquainted with any forgers. But I cannot stop longer. Look to my friend yonder. You will not lose by it. I will see you again."

Some few days after this, I again obtained admission to the Tombs, and went through the corridors in quest of Bartleby; but without finding him.

"I saw him coming from his cell not long ago," said a turnkey, "may be he's gone to loiter in the yards."

So I went in that direction.

"Are you looking for the silent man?" said another turnkey, passing me. "Yonder he lies—sleeping in the yard there. 'Tis not twenty minutes since I saw him lie down." 245

The yard was entirely quiet. It was not accessible to the common prisoners. The surrounding walls, of amazing thickness, kept off all sounds behind them. The Egyptian character of the masonry weighed upon me with its gloom. But a soft imprisoned turf grew under foot. The heart of the eternal pyramids, it seemed, wherein, by some strange magic, through the clefts, grass-seed, dropped by birds, had sprung.

Strangely huddled at the base of the wall, his knees drawn up, and lying on his side, his head touching the cold stones, I saw the wasted Bartleby. But nothing stirred. I paused; then went close up to him; stooped over, and saw that his dim eyes were open; otherwise he seemed profoundly sleeping. Something prompted me to touch him. I felt his hand, when a tingling shiver ran up my arm and down my spine to my feet.

The round face of the grub-man peered upon me now. "His dinner is ready. Won't he dine to-day, either? Or does he live without dining?"

"Lives without dining," said I, and closed the eyes.

"Eh!—He's asleep, ain't he?"

"With kings and counselors,"<sup>8</sup> murmured I. 250

There would seem little need for proceeding further in this history. Imagination will readily supply the meagre recital of poor Bartleby's interment. But, ere parting with the reader, let me say, that if this little narrative has sufficiently interested him, to awaken curiosity as to who Bartleby was, and what manner of life he led prior to the present narrator's making his acquaintance, I can only reply, that in such curiosity I fully share, but am wholly unable to gratify it. Yet here I hardly know whether I should divulge one little item of rumor, which came to my ear a few months after the scrivener's decease. Upon what basis it rested, I could never ascertain; and hence, how true it is I cannot now tell. But, inasmuch as this vague report has not been without a certain suggestive interest to me, however sad, it may prove the same with some others; and so I will briefly mention it. The report was this: that Bartleby had been a subordinate clerk in the Dead Letter Office at Washington, from which he had been suddenly removed by a change in the administration. When I think over this rumor, hardly can I express the emotions which seize me. Dead letters! does it not sound like dead men? Conceive a man by nature and misfortune prone to a pallid hopelessness, can any business seem more fitted to heighten it than that of continually handling these dead letters, and assorting them for the flames? For by the cart-load they are annually burned. Sometimes from out the folded paper the pale clerk takes a ring—the finger it was meant for, perhaps, moulders in the grave; a bank-note sent in swiftest charity—he whom it would relieve, nor eats nor hungers any more; pardon for those who died despairing; hope for those who died unhoping; good tidings for those who died stifled by unrelieved calamities. On errands of life, these letters speed to death.

Ah, Bartleby! Ah, humanity!

Exploring the Text

1. What effect does the opening paragraph have on you as a reader? What information do you learn? How does this paragraph embody “lawyerly language”—that is, language filled with qualifications and disclaimers?
2. The narrator’s description of his three clerks—Turkey, Nippers, and Ginger Nut—might be summarized as a list of assets and liabilities, or credits and debits. What are the pluses and minuses of these characters, as Melville presents them? What comparisons does he draw between and among the three workers? How do they set the stage for the introduction of Bartleby?
3. The narrator introduces Bartleby as “a motionless young man . . . pallidly neat, pitiably respectable, incurably forlorn!” (para. 17). How does he expand this description as the story develops? How does this initial characterization foreshadow Bartleby’s end?
4. How and why does Bartleby’s “passive resistance” (para. 55) stymie the lawyer-narrator? How do Bartleby’s “preferences” make their way into the culture of the narrator’s law office?
5. The narrator tells us that Bartleby “was more a man of preferences than assumptions” (para. 149). How does this worldview differ from the legal profession’s belief in precedents and assumptions?
6. What significance does the subtitle, “A Story of Wall Street,” have? Consider the literal walls in the office and in the Tombs that Melville describes.
7. The narrator characterizes himself as living the philosophy that “the easiest way of life is the best” (para. 2). Chart his changing responses to Bartleby throughout the story. Then consider the ways in which he validates or changes his initial philosophy. Does the narrator grow in self-awareness or deteriorate into self-delusion? How do you interpret his statement, “In vain I persisted that Bartleby was nothing to me—no more than to any one else” (para. 192)?
8. Humor, though often subtle and ironic, runs throughout the story. What examples of humor can you identify, and how do they work as commentary or characterization?
9. At the end of the story, the narrator offers the possibility that Bartleby’s rejection of life has been brought on by his working in the Dead Letter Office, a place where mail with inscrutable or partial addresses is ultimately destroyed. Is this a plausible explanation? How does it fit thematically in the story, or case, that Melville has built?

10. How does this “Story of Wall Street” fit with the way we view Wall Street today? How do attitudes toward money and materialism inform this story? Does the characterization of the environment of Wall Street as mechanical and dehumanizing ring true in the twenty-first century?

Harrison Bergeron

KURT VONNEGUT

Kurt Vonnegut (1922–2007) was one of the most influential writers in post–World War II America. Born in Indianapolis, Indiana, he attended Cornell University for two years before joining the army, where he fought in the Battle of the Bulge and was captured by German troops in 1944. While a prisoner of war, he witnessed the firebombing of Dresden, an experience that inspired his most famous novel, Slaughterhouse Five (1969), named for the building in which he was imprisoned. Vonnegut studied at the Carnegie Institute of Technology and the University of Tennessee while in the army; after the war, he went to graduate school to study anthropology at the University of Chicago. Before becoming a full-time writer, he worked as a reporter, teacher, and public relations employee for General Electric. His first novel, the satiric Player Piano (1952), was inspired by his time at GE. Among his other well-known books are The Sirens of Titan (1959), Cat’s Cradle (1963), and Breakfast of Champions (1973). “Harrison Bergeron” first appeared in Collier’s magazine, before being reprinted in the short-story collection Welcome to the Monkey House (1968).

The year was 2081, and everybody was finally equal. They weren’t only equal before God and the law. They were equal every which way. Nobody was smarter than anybody else. Nobody was better looking than anybody else. Nobody was stronger or quicker than anybody else. All this equality was due to the 211th, 212th, and 213th Amendments to the Constitution, and to the unceasing vigilance of agents of the United States Handicapper General.

Some things about living still weren’t quite right, though. April, for instance, still drove people crazy by not being springtime. And it was in that clammy month that the H-G men took George and Hazel Bergeron’s fourteen-year-old son, Harrison, away.

It was tragic, all right, but George and Hazel couldn’t think about it very hard. Hazel had a perfectly average intelligence, which meant she couldn’t think about anything except in short bursts. And George, while his intelligence was way above normal, had a little mental handicap radio in his ear. He was required by law to wear it at all times. It was tuned to a government transmitter. Every twenty seconds or so, the transmitter would send out some sharp noise to keep people like George from taking unfair advantage of their brains.

George and Hazel were watching television. There were tears on Hazel's cheeks, but she'd forgotten for the moment what they were about.

On the television screen were ballerinas.

5

A buzzer sounded in George's head. His thoughts fled in panic, like bandits from a burglar alarm.

"That was a real pretty dance, that dance they just did," said Hazel.

"Huh?" said George.

"That dance—it was nice," said Hazel.

"Yup," said George. He tried to think a little about the ballerinas. They weren't really very good—no better than anybody else would have been, anyway. They were burdened with sashweights and bags of birdshot, and their faces were masked, so that no one, seeing a free and graceful gesture or a pretty face, would feel like something the cat drug in. George was toying with the vague notion that maybe dancers shouldn't be handicapped. But he didn't get very far with it before another noise in his ear radio scattered his thoughts.

10

George winced. So did two out of the eight ballerinas.

Hazel saw him wince. Having no mental handicap herself, she had to ask George what the latest sound had been.

"Sounded like somebody hitting a milk bottle with a ball-peen hammer," said George.

"I'd think it would be real interesting, hearing all the different sounds," said Hazel, a little envious. "All the things they think up."

"Um," said George.

15

"Only, if I was Handicapper General, you know what I would do?" said Hazel. Hazel, as a matter of fact, bore a strong resemblance to the Handicapper General, a woman named Diana Moon Glampers. "If I was Diana Moon Glampers," said Hazel, "I'd have chimes on Sunday—just chimes. Kind of in honor of religion."

"I could think, if it was just chimes," said George.

"Well—maybe make 'em real loud," said Hazel. "I think I'd make a good Handicapper General."

"Good as anybody else," said George.

"Who knows better'n I do what normal is?" said Hazel.

20

"Right," said George. He began to think glimmeringly about his abnormal son who was now in jail, about Harrison, but a twenty-one-gun salute in his head stopped that.

"Boy!" said Hazel, "that was a doozy, wasn't it?"

It was such a doozy that George was white and trembling, and tears stood on the rims of his red eyes. Two of the eight ballerinas had collapsed to the studio floor, were holding their temples.

"All of a sudden you look so tired," said Hazel. "Why don't you stretch out on the sofa, so's you can rest your handicap bag on the pillows, honeybunch." She was referring to the forty-seven pounds of birdshot in a canvas bag, which was padlocked around George's neck. "Go on and rest the bag for a little while," she said. "I don't care if you're not equal to me for a while."

George weighed the bag with his hands. "I don't mind it," he said. "I don't notice it any more. It's just a part of me." 25

"You been so tired lately—kind of wore out," said Hazel. "If there was just some way we could make a little hole in the bottom of the bag, and just take out a few of them lead balls. Just a few."

"Two years in prison and two thousand dollars fine for every ball I took out," said George. "I don't call that a bargain."

"If you could just take a few out when you came home from work," said Hazel. "I mean—you don't compete with anybody around here. You just set around."

"If I tried to get away with it," said George, "then other people'd get away with it—and pretty soon we'd be right back to the dark ages again, with everybody competing against everybody else. You wouldn't like that, would you?"

"I'd hate it," said Hazel. 30

"There you are," said George. "The minute people start cheating on laws, what do you think happens to society?"

If Hazel hadn't been able to come up with an answer to this question, George couldn't have supplied one. A siren was going off in his head.

"Reckon it'd fall all apart," said Hazel.

"What would?" said George blankly.

"Society," said Hazel uncertainly. "Wasn't that what you just said?" 35

"Who knows?" said George.

The television program was suddenly interrupted for a news bulletin. It wasn't clear at first as to what the bulletin was about, since the announcer, like all announcers, had a serious speech impediment. For about half a minute, and in a state of high excitement, the announcer tried to say, "Ladies and gentlemen—"

He finally gave up, handed the bulletin to a ballerina to read.

"That's all right—" Hazel said of the announcer, "he tried. That's the big thing. He tried to do the best he could with what God gave him. He should get a nice raise for trying so hard."

"Ladies and gentlemen—" said the ballerina, reading the bulletin. She must have been extraordinarily beautiful, because the mask she wore was hideous. And it was easy to see that she was the strongest and most graceful of all the dancers, for her handicap bags were as big as those worn by two-hundred-pound men. 40

And she had to apologize at once for her voice, which was a very unfair voice for a woman to use. Her voice was a warm, luminous, timeless melody. "Excuse me—" she said, and she began again, making her voice absolutely uncompetitive.

"Harrison Bergeron, age fourteen," she said in a grackle squawk, "has just escaped from jail, where he was held on suspicion of plotting to overthrow the government. He is a genius and an athlete, is under-handicapped, and should be regarded as extremely dangerous."

A police photograph of Harrison Bergeron was flashed on the screen—upside down, then sideways, upside down again, then right side up. The picture showed the full length of Harrison against a background calibrated in feet and inches. He was exactly seven feet tall.

The rest of Harrison's appearance was Halloween and hardware. Nobody had ever borne heavier handicaps. He had outgrown hindrances faster than the H-G men could think them up. Instead of a little ear radio for a mental handicap, he wore a tremendous pair of earphones, and spectacles with thick wavy lenses. The spectacles were intended to make him not only half blind, but to give him whanging headaches besides.

Scrap metal was hung all over him. Ordinarily, there was a certain symmetry, a military neatness to the handicaps issued to strong people, but Harrison looked like a walking junkyard. In the race of life, Harrison carried three hundred pounds.

And to offset his good looks, the H-G men required that he wear at all times a red rubber ball for a nose, keep his eyebrows shaved off, and cover his even white teeth with black caps at snaggle-tooth random.

"If you see this boy," said the ballerina, "do not—I repeat, do not—try to reason with him."

There was the shriek of a door being torn from its hinges.

Screams and barking cries of consternation came from the television set. The photograph of Harrison Bergeron on the screen jumped again and again, as though dancing to the tune of an earthquake.

George Bergeron correctly identified the earthquake, and well he might have—for many was the time his own home had danced to the same crashing tune. "My God—" said George, "that must be Harrison!"

The realization was blasted from his mind instantly by the sound of an automobile collision in his head.

When George could open his eyes again, the photograph of Harrison was gone. A living, breathing Harrison filled the screen.

Clanking, clownish, and huge, Harrison stood in the center of the studio. The knob of the uprooted studio door was still in his hand. Ballerinas, technicians, musicians, and announcers cowered on their knees before him, expecting to die.

"I am the Emperor!" cried Harrison. "Do you hear? I am the Emperor! Everybody must do what I say at once!" He stamped his foot and the studio shook.

"Even as I stand here—" he bellowed, "crippled, hobbled, sickened—I am a greater ruler than any man who ever lived! Now watch me become what I can become!"

Harrison tore the straps of his handicap harness like wet tissue paper, tore straps guaranteed to support five thousand pounds.

Harrison's scrap-iron handicaps crashed to the floor.

Harrison thrust his thumbs under the bars of the padlock that secured his head harness. The bar snapped like celery. Harrison smashed his headphones and spectacles against the wall.

He flung away his rubber-ball nose, revealed a man that would have awed Thor, the god of thunder.

"I shall now select my Empress!" he said, looking down on the cowering people. "Let the first woman who dares rise to her feet claim her mate and her throne!"

A moment passed, and then a ballerina arose, swaying like a willow.

Harrison plucked the mental handicap from her ear, snapped off her physical handicaps with marvelous delicacy. Last of all, he removed her mask.

She was blindingly beautiful.

"Now—" said Harrison, taking her hand, "shall we show the people the meaning of the word dance? Music!" he commanded.

The musicians scrambled back into their chairs, and Harrison stripped them of their handicaps, too. "Play your best," he told them, "and I'll make you barons and dukes and earls." 65

The music began. It was normal at first—cheap, silly, false. But Harrison snatched two musicians from their chairs, waved them like batons as he sang the music as he wanted it played. He slammed them back into their chairs.

The music began again and was much improved.

Harrison and his Empress merely listened to the music for a while—listened gravely, as though synchronizing their heartbeats with it.

They shifted their weights to their toes.

Harrison placed his big hands on the girl's tiny waist, letting her sense the weightlessness that would soon be hers. 70

And then, in an explosion of joy and grace, into the air they sprang!

Not only were the laws of the land abandoned, but the law of gravity and the laws of motion as well.

They reeled, whirled, swiveled, flounced, capered, gamboled, and spun.

They leaped like deer on the moon.

The studio ceiling was thirty feet high, but each leap brought the dancers nearer to it. 75

It became their obvious intention to kiss the ceiling.

They kissed it.

And then, neutralizing gravity with love and pure will, they remained suspended in air inches below the ceiling, and they kissed each other for a long, long time.

It was then that Diana Moon Glampers, the Handicapper General, came into the studio with a double-barreled ten-gauge shotgun. She fired twice, and the Emperor and the Empress were dead before they hit the floor.

Diana Moon Glampers loaded the gun again. She aimed at the musicians and told them they had ten seconds to get their handicaps back on. 80

It was then that the Bergerons' television tube burned out.

Hazel turned to comment about the blackout to George. But George had gone out into the kitchen for a can of beer.

George came back in with the beer, paused while a handicap signal shook him up. And then he sat down again. "You been crying?" he said to Hazel.

"Yup," she said.

"What about?" he said. 85

"I forgot," she said. "Something real sad on television."

"What was it?" he said.

"It's all kind of mixed up in my mind," said Hazel.

"Forget sad things," said George.

"I always do," said Hazel.

"That's my girl," said George. He winced. There was the sound of a riveting gun in his head.

"Gee—I could tell that one was a doozy," said Hazel.

"You can say that again," said George.

"Gee—" said Hazel, "I could tell that one was a doozy."

Exploring the Text

1. The story begins, "The year was 2081, and everybody was finally equal." What does the word "finally" imply about the idea of equality? As the story goes on, equality becomes a more complicated prospect. What are some of the benefits and dangers of equality as presented in "Harrison Bergeron"?
2. In paragraph 20, Hazel says, "Who knows better'n I do what normal is?" What does "normal" mean in this context? What does she think it means, and in this society, how does it relate to being equal?
3. The tone throughout the story is ironic, but how would you characterize this type of irony? What is its purpose, and what is the narrator's attitude toward the events he describes? toward the characters he portrays?
4. How do the characters in the story—particularly George and Hazel—seem to feel about the current state of enforced total equality? Look closely at the section in which Hazel urges George to remove his heavy handicaps for a short while and rest (paras. 24–27). Why does he resist? Is it surprising that Hazel is the one who suggests this small rebellion? Explain.
5. What particular attitudes, laws, or events might Vonnegut be satirizing in this story? Consider that it was published in 1961. How does it reflect twenty-first-century attitudes or assumptions about equality, conformity, and rebellion?
6. What does it mean that Harrison Bergeron's culminating act of rebellion is to declare himself emperor? When they are dancing, free of their handicaps, he and his ballerina empress defy not only the rules of society but also "the law of gravity and the laws of motion as well" (para. 72). What might this fantastical moment suggest? Why does Harrison Bergeron present such a perceived threat to society? What is the nature of this threat, and how real is it?
7. In paragraph 73, Vonnegut writes, "They reeled, whirled, swiveled, flounced, capered, gamboled, and spun." What does each verb mean? How is each different, and what is achieved by enumerating such a long list?
8. Do you find the ending predictable or surprising? Does the narrator? Explain your answer. How do Harrison's death and his parents' reactions further comment on (and complicate) the story's take on conformity and rebellion?

T. C. BOYLE

Born Thomas John Boyle in 1948 in Peekskill, New York, Boyle changed his middle name to Coraghessan at seventeen, but now goes by T. C. After receiving his BA at the State University of New York at Potsdam, he earned an MFA at the Iowa Writers' Workshop, followed by a PhD in nineteenth-century British literature. He has been a professor of English at the University of Southern California since 1978. Boyle is known for highly inventive fiction filled with unusual and often bizarre situations and dark humor, so it comes as no surprise that his favorite short story is Flannery O'Connor's "A Good Man Is Hard to Find" (p. 1211). Boyle published his first short-story collection, Descent of Man, in 1979 and his first novel, Water Music, in 1982. He has published more than 150 short stories and a dozen novels since then, including The Tortilla Curtain (1985), World's End (1987), and Talk Talk (2006). His 1993 novel, The Road to Wellville, was made into a major motion picture the following year. "Admiral" originally appeared in Harper's magazine and is included in the 2008 edition of The Best American Short Stories.

She knew in her heart it was a mistake, but she'd been laid off and needed the cash, and her memories of the Strikers were mostly on the favorable side, so when Mrs. Striker called—Gretchen, this is Gretchen? Mrs. Striker?—she'd said yes, she'd love to come over and hear what they had to say. First, though, she had to listen to her car cough as she drove across town (fuel pump, that was her father's opinion, offered in a flat voice that said it wasn't his problem, not anymore, not now that she was grown and living back at home after a failed attempt at life), and she nearly stalled the thing turning into the Strikers' block. And then did stall it as she tried, against any reasonable expectation of success, to parallel park in front of their great rearing fortress of a house. It felt strange punching in the code at the gate and seeing how things were different and the same, how the trees had grown while the flowerbeds remained in a state of suspended animation, everything in perpetual bloom and clipped to within a millimeter of perfection. The gardeners saw to that. A whole battalion of them that swarmed over the place twice a week with their blowers and edgers and trimmers, at war with the weeds, the insects, the gophers and ground squirrels, and the very tendency of the display plants to want to grow outside the box. At least that was how she remembered it. The gardeners. And how Admiral would rage at the windows, showing his teeth and scrabbling with his claws—and if he could have chewed through glass he would have done it. "That's right, boy," she'd say, "that's right—don't let those bad men steal all your dead leaves and dirt. You go, boy. You go. That's right."

She rang the bell at the front door and it wasn't Mrs. Striker who answered it but another version of herself in a white maid's apron and a little white maid's cap perched atop her head, and she was so surprised she had to double-clutch to keep from dropping her purse. A woman of color does not clean house, that was what her mother always told her, and it had become a kind of mantra when she was growing up, a way of reinforcing core values, of promoting education and the life of the mind, but she couldn't help wondering how much higher a dog-sitter was on the socio-economic scale than a maid. Or a sous-chef, waitress, aerobics instructor, ticket puncher, and tortilla maker, all of which she'd been at one time or another. About the only thing she hadn't tried was leech-gathering. There was a poem on the subject in her college text by William Wordsworth, the poet of daffodils and leeches, and she could summon it up whenever she needed a good laugh. She developed a quick picture of an old long-nosed white man rolling up his pant legs and wading into the murk, then squeezed out a miniature smile and said, "Hi, I'm Nisha? I came to see Mrs. Striker? And Mr. Striker?"

The maid—she wasn't much older than Nisha herself, with a placid expression that might have been described as self-satisfied or just plain vacant—held open the door. "I'll tell them you're here," she said.

Nisha murmured a thank-you and stepped into the tiled foyer, thinking of the snake brain and the olfactory memories that lay coiled there. She smelled dog—smelled Admiral—with an overlay of old sock and furniture polish. The great room rose up before her like something transposed from a cathedral. It was a cold room, echoing and hollow, and she'd never liked it. "You mind if I wait in the family room?" she asked.

The maid—or rather the girl, the young woman, the young woman in the demeaning and stereotypical maid's costume—had already started off in the direction of the kitchen, but she swung round now to give Nisha a look of surprise and irritation. For a moment it seemed as if she might snap at her, but then, finally, she just shrugged and said, "Whatever."

Nothing had changed in the paneled room that gave onto the garden, not as far as Nisha could see. There were the immense old high-backed leather armchairs and the antique Stickley sofa rescued from the law offices of Striker and Striker, the mahogany bar with the wine rack and the backlit shrine Mr. Striker had created in homage to the spirits of single-malt scotch whisky, and overseeing it all, the oil portrait of Admiral with its dark heroic hues and golden patina of varnish. She remembered the day the painter had come to the house and posed the dog for the preliminary snapshots. Admiral uncooperative, Mrs. Striker strung tight as a wire, and the inevitable squirrel bounding across the lawn at the crucial moment. The painter had labored mightily in his studio to make his subject look noble, snout elevated, eyes fixed on some distant, presumably worthy, object, but to Nisha's mind an Afghan—any Afghan—looked inherently ridiculous, like some escapee from Sesame Street, and Admiral seemed a kind of concentrate of the absurd. He looked goofy, just that.

When she turned round, both the Strikers were there, as if they'd floated in out of the ether. As far as she could see, they hadn't aged at all. Their skin was flawless, they held themselves as stiff and erect as the Ituri carvings they'd picked up on their trip to Africa, and they tried hard to make small talk and avoid any appearance of briskness. In Mrs. Striker's arms—Call me Gretchen, please—was an Afghan pup, and after the initial exchange of pleasantries, Nisha, her hand extended to rub the silk of the ears and feel the wet probe of the tiny snout on her wrist, began to get the idea. She restrained herself from asking after Admiral. "Is this his pup?" she asked instead. "Is this little Admiral?" The Strikers exchanged a glance. The husband hadn't said, Call me Cliff, hadn't said much of anything, but now his lips compressed. "Didn't you read about it in the papers?"

There was an awkward pause. The pup began to squirm. "Admiral passed," Gretchen breathed. "It was an accident. We had him—well, we were in the park, the dog park . . . you know, the one where the dogs run free? You used to take him there, you remember, up off Sycamore? Well, you know how exuberant he was . . ."

"You really didn't read about it?" There was incredulity in the husband's voice.

"Well, I—I was away at college and then I took the first job I could find. Back here, I mean. Because of my mother. She's been sick." 10

Neither of them commented on this, not even to be polite.

"It was all over the press," the husband said, and he sounded offended now. He adjusted his oversized glasses and cocked his head to look down at her in a way that brought the past rushing back. "Newsweek did a story, USA Today—we were on Good Morning America, both of us."

She was at a loss, the three of them standing there, the dog taking its spiked dentition to the underside of her wrist now, just the way Admiral used to when he was a pup. "For what?" she was about to say, when Gretchen came to the rescue.

"This is little Admiral. Admiral II, actually," she said, ruffling the blond shag over the pup's eyes.

The husband looked past her, out the window and into the yard, an ironic grin pressed to his lips. "Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars," he said, "and it's too bad he wasn't a cat." 15

Gretchen gave him a sharp look. "You make a joke of it," she said, her eyes suddenly filling, "but it was worth every penny and you know it." She mustered a long-suffering smile for Nisha. "Cats are simpler—their eggs are more mature at ovulation than dogs' are."

"I can get you a cat for thirty-two thou."

"Oh, Cliff, stop. Stop it."

He moved into his wife and put an arm round her shoulders. "But we didn't want to clone a cat, did we, honey?" He bent his face to the dog's, touched noses with him, and let his voice rise to a falsetto: "Did we now, Admiral. Did we!"

At seven-thirty the next morning, Nisha pulled up in front of the Strikers' house and let her car wheeze and shudder a moment before killing the engine. She flicked the radio back on to catch the last fading chorus of a tune she liked, singing along with the sexy low rasp of the lead vocalist, feeling good about things—or better, anyway. The Strikers were giving her twenty-five dollars an hour, plus the same dental and health-care package they offered the staff at their law firm, which was a whole solid 20 towering brick wall of improvement over what she'd been making as a waitress at Johnny's Rib Shack, sans health care, sans dental, and sans any tip she could remember above 10 percent of the pre-tax total because the people who came out to gnaw ribs were just plain cheap and no two ways about it. When she stepped out of the car, there was Gretchen coming down the front steps of the house with the pup in her arms, just as she had nine years ago when Nisha was a high school freshman taking on what she assumed was going to be a breeze of a summer job.

Nisha took the initiative of punching in the code herself and slipping through the gate to hustle up the walk and save Gretchen the trouble, because Gretchen was in a hurry, always in a hurry. She was dressed in a navy-blue suit with a double string of pearls and an antique silver pin in the shape of a bounding borzoi that seemed eerily familiar—it might have been the exact ensemble she'd been wearing when Nisha had told her she'd be quitting to go off to college. I'm sorry, Mrs. Striker, and I've really enjoyed the opportunity to work for you and Mr. Striker, she'd said, hardly able to contain the swell of her heart, but I'm going to college. On a scholarship. She'd had the acceptance letter in her hand to show her, thinking how proud of her Mrs. Striker would be, how she'd take her in her arms for a hug and congratulate her, but the first thing she'd said was, What about Admiral?

As Gretchen closed on her now, the pup wriggling in her arms, Nisha could see her smile flutter and die. No doubt she was already envisioning the cream-leather interior of her BMW (a 750i in Don't-Even-Think-About-It Black) and the commute to the office and whatever was going down there, court sessions, the piles of documents, contention at every turn. Mr. Striker—Nisha would never be able to call him Cliff, even if she lived to be eighty, but then he'd have to be a hundred and ten and probably wouldn't hear her anyway—was already gone, in his matching Beemer, his and hers. Gretchen didn't say Good morning or Hi or How are you? or Thanks for coming, but just enfolded her in the umbrella of her perfume and handed her the dog. Which went immediately heavy in Nisha's arms, fighting for the ground with four flailing paws and the little white ghoul's teeth that fastened on the top button of her jacket. Nisha held on. Gave Gretchen a big grateful-for-the-job-and-the-health-care smile, no worries, no worries at all.

"Those jeans," Gretchen said, narrowing her eyes. "Are they new?"

The dog squirming, squirming. "I, well—I'm going to set him down a minute, okay?"

"Of course, of course. Do what you do, what you normally do." An impatient 25 wave. "Or what you used to do, I mean."

They both watched as the pup fell back on its haunches, rolled briefly in the grass, and sprang up to clutch Nisha's right leg in a clumsy embrace. "I just couldn't find any of my old jeans—my mother probably threw them all out long ago. Plus"—a laugh—"I don't think I could fit into them anymore." She gave Gretchen a moment to ruminate on the deeper implications here—time passing, adolescents grown into womanhood, flesh expanding, that sort of thing—then gently pushed the dog down and murmured, "But I am wearing—right here, under the jacket?—this T-shirt I know I used to wear back then."

Nothing. Gretchen just stood there, looking distracted.

"It's been washed, of course, and sitting in the back of the top drawer of my dresser where my mother left it, so I don't know if there'll be any scent or anything, but I'm sure I used to wear it because Tupac really used to drive my engine back then, if you know what I mean." She gave it a beat. "But hey, we were all fourteen once, huh?" Gretchen made no sign that she'd heard her—either that or she denied the proposition outright. "You're going to be all right with this, aren't you?" she said, looking her in the eye. "Is there anything we didn't cover?"

The afternoon before, during her interview—but it wasn't really an interview because the Strikers had already made up their minds, and if she'd refused them they would have kept raising the hourly till she capitulated—the two of them, Gretchen and Cliff, had positioned themselves on either side of her and leaned into the bar over caramel-colored scotches and a platter of ebi and maguro sushi to explain the situation.

Just so that she was clear on it. "You know what cloning is, right?" Gretchen said. 30 "Or what it involves? You remember Dolly?"

Nisha was holding fast to her drink, her left elbow pressed to the brass rail of the bar in the family room. She'd just reached out her twinned chopsticks for a second piece of the shrimp but withdrew her hand. "You mean the country singer?"

"The sheep," the husband said.

"The first cloned mammal," Gretchen put in. "Or larger mammal."

"Yeah," she said, nodding. "Sure. I guess."

What followed was a short course in genetics and the method of somatic-cell 35 nuclear transplant that had given the world Dolly, various replicated cattle, pigs, and hamsters, and now Admiral II, the first cloned dog made available commercially through SalvaPet, Inc., the genetic-engineering firm with offices in Seoul, San Juan, and Cleveland. Gretchen's voice constricted as she described how they'd taken a cell from the lining of Admiral's ear just after the accident and inserted it into a donor egg that had had its nucleus removed, stimulated the cell to divide through the application of an electric current, and then inserted the developing embryo into the uterus of a host mother—"The sweetest golden retriever you ever saw. What was her name, Cliff? Some flower, wasn't it?"

"Peony."

"Peony? Are you sure?"

"Of course I'm sure."

"I thought it was—oh, I don't know. You sure it wasn't Iris?"

"The point is," he said, setting his glass down and leveling his gaze at Nisha, "you 40 can get a genetic copy of the animal, a kind of three-dimensional Xerox, but that doesn't guarantee it'll be like the one you, well, the one you lost."

"It was so sad," Gretchen said.

"It's nurture that counts. You've got to reproduce the animal's experiences, as nearly as possible." He gave a shrug, reached for the bottle. "You want another?" he asked, and she held out her glass. "Of course we're both older now—and so are you, we realize that—but we want to come as close as possible to replicating the exact conditions that made Admiral what he was, right down to the toys we gave him, the food, the schedule of walks and play, and all the rest. Which is where you come in—”

“We need a commitment here, Nisha,” Gretchen breathed, leaning in so close Nisha could smell the scotch coming back at her. “Four years. That’s how long you were with him last time. Or with Admiral, I mean. The original Admiral.”

The focus of all this deliberation had fallen asleep in Gretchen’s lap. A single probing finger of sunlight stabbed through the window to illuminate the pale fluff over the dog’s eyes. At that moment, in that light, little Admiral looked like some strange conjunction of ostrich and ape. Nisha couldn’t help thinking of The Island of Dr. Moreau, the cheesy version with Marlon Brando looking as if he’d been genetically manipulated himself, and she would have grinned a private grin, fueled by the scotch and the thundering absurdity of the moment, but she had to hide everything she thought or felt behind a mask of impassivity. She wasn’t committing to anything for four years—four years? If she was still living here in this craphole of a town four years from now she promised herself she’d go out and buy a gun and eliminate all her problems with a single, very personal squeeze of the trigger.

That was what she was thinking when Gretchen said, “We’ll pay you twenty dollars an hour,” and the husband said, “With health care—and dental,” and they both stared at her so fiercely she had to look down into her glass before she found her voice. “Twenty-five,” she said.

And oh, how they loved that dog, because they never hesitated. “Twenty-five it is,” the husband said, and Gretchen, a closer’s smile blooming on her face, produced a contract from the folder at her elbow. “Just sign here,” she said.

After Gretchen had climbed into her car and the car had slid through the gate and vanished down the street, Nisha sprawled out on the grass and lifted her face to the sun. She was feeling the bliss of déjà vu—or no, not déjà vu, but a virtual return to the past, when life was just a construct and there was nothing she couldn’t have done or been and nothing beyond the thought of clothes and boys and the occasional term paper to hamper her. Here she was, gone back in time, lying on the grass at quarter of eight in the morning on a sunstruck June day, playing with a puppy while everybody else was going to work—it was hilarious, that’s what it was. Like something you’d read about in the paper—a behest from some crazed millionaire. Or in this case, two crazed millionaires. She felt so good she let out a laugh, even as the pup came charging across the lawn to slam headfirst into her, all feet and pink panting tongue, and he was Admiral all right.

Admiral in the flesh, born and made and resurrected for the mere little pittance of a quarter million dollars. For a long while she wrestled with him, flipping him over on his back each time he charged, scratching his belly and baby-talking him, enjoying the novelty of it, but by quarter past eight she was bored and she pushed herself up to go on into the house and find something to eat. Do what you used to do, Gretchen had told her, but what she used to do, summers especially, was nap and read and watch TV and sneak her friends in to tip a bottle of the husband’s forty-year-old scotch to their adolescent lips and make faces at one another before descending into giggles. Twice a day she'd take the dog to the doggy park and watch him squat and crap and run wild with the other mutts till his muzzle was streaked with drool and he dodged at her feet to snatch up mouthfuls of the Evian the Strikers insisted he drink. Now, though, she just wanted to feel the weight of the past a bit, and she went in the back door, the dog at her heels, thinking to make herself a sandwich—the Strikers always had cold cuts in the fridge, mounds of pastrami, capicola, smoked turkey, and Swiss, individual slices of which went to Admiral each time he did his business outside where he was supposed to or barked in the right cadence or just stuck his goofy head in the door. She could already see the sandwich she was going to make—a whole deli's worth of meat and cheese piled up on Jewish rye; they always had Jewish rye—and she was halfway to the refrigerator before she remembered the maid.

There she was, in her maid's outfit, sitting at the kitchen table with her feet up and the newspaper spread out before her, spooning something out of a cup. "Don't you bring that filthy animal in here," she said, glancing up sharply.

Nisha was startled. There didn't used to be a maid. There was no one in the house, in fact, till Mrs. Yamashita, the cook, came in around four, and that was part of the beauty of it. "Oh, hi," she said, "hi, I didn't know you were going to be—I just . . . I was going to make a sandwich, I guess." There was a silence. The dog slunk around the kitchen, looking wary. "What was your name again?"

"Frankie," the maid said, swallowing the syllables as if she weren't ready to give them up, "and I'm the one has to clean up all these paw marks off the floor—and did you see what he did to that throw pillow in the guest room?"

"No," Nisha said, "I didn't," and she was at the refrigerator now, sliding back the tray of the meat compartment. This would go easier if they were friends, no doubt about it, and she was willing, more than willing. "You want anything?" she said. "A sandwich—or, or something?"

Frankie just stared at her. "I don't know what they're paying you," she said, "but to me? This is the craziest shit I ever heard of in my life. You think I couldn't let the dog out the door a couple times a day? Or what, take him to the park—that's what you do, right, take him to the doggy park over on Sycamore?"

The refrigerator door swung shut, the little light blinking out, the heft of the meat satisfying in her hand. "It's insane, I admit it—hey, I'm with you. You think I wanted to grow up to be a dog-sitter?"

"I don't know. I don't know anything about you. Except you got your degree—you need a degree for that, dog-sitting, I mean?" She hadn't moved, not a muscle, her feet propped up, the cup in one hand, spoon in the other.

55

"No," Nisha said, feeling the blood rise to her face, "no, you don't. But what about you—you need a degree to be a maid?"

That hit home. For a moment, Frankie said nothing, just looked from her to the dog—which was begging now, clawing at Nisha's leg with his forepaws—and back again. "This is just temporary," she said finally.

"Yeah, me too." Nisha gave her a smile, no harm done, just establishing a little turf, that was all. "Totally."

For the first time, Frankie's expression changed: she almost looked as if she were going to laugh. "Yeah, that's right," she said, "temporary help, that's all we are. We're the temps. And Mr. and Mrs. Striker—dog-crazy, plain crazy, two-hundred-and-fifty-thousand-dollar-crazy—they're permanent."

And now Nisha laughed, and so did Frankie—a low rumble of amusement that made the dog turn its head. The meat was on the counter now, the cellophane wrapper pulled back. Nisha selected a slice of Black Forest ham and held it out to him. "Sit!" she said. "Go ahead, sit!" And the dog, just like his father or progenitor or donor or whatever he was, looked at her stupidly till she dropped the meat on the tile and the wet plop of its arrival made him understand that here was something to eat.

"You're going to spoil that dog," Frankie said.

Nisha went unerringly to the cabinet where the bread was kept, and there it was, Jewish rye, a fresh loaf, springy to the touch. She gave Frankie a glance over her shoulder. "Yeah," she said. "I think that's the idea."

A month drifted by, as serene a month as Nisha could remember. She was making good money, putting in ten-hour days during the week and half days on the weekends, reading through all the books she hadn't had time for in college, exhausting the Strikers' DVD collection and opening her own account at the local video store, walking, lazing, napping the time away. She gained five pounds and vowed to start swimming regularly in the Strikers' pool, but hadn't got round to it yet. Some days she'd help Frankie with the cleaning and the laundry so the two of them could sit out on the back deck with their feet up, sharing a bottle of sweet wine or a joint. As for the dog, she tried to be conscientious about the whole business of imprinting it with the past—or a past—though she felt ridiculous. Four years of college for this? Wars were being fought, people were starving, there were diseases to conquer, children to educate, good to do in the world, and here she was reliving her adolescence in the company of an inbred semi-retarded clown of a cloned Afghan hound because two childless rich people decreed it should be so. All right. She knew she'd have to move on. Knew it was temporary. Swore that she'd work up a new résumé and start sending it out—but then the face of her mother, sick from vomiting and with her scalp as smooth and slick as an eggplant, would rise up to shame her. She threw the ball to the dog. Took him to the park. Let the days fall round her like leaves from a dying tree.

And then one afternoon, on the way back from the dog park, Admiral jerking at the leash beside her and the sky opening up to a dazzle of sun and pure white tufts of cloud that made her feel as if she were floating untethered through the universe along with them, she noticed a figure stationed outside the gate of the Strikers' house. As she got closer, she saw that it was a young man dressed in baggy jeans and a T-shirt, his hair fanning out in rusty blond dreads and a goatee of the same color clinging to his chin. He was peering over the fence. Her first thought was that he'd come to rob the place, but she dismissed it—he was harmless; you could see that a hundred yards off. Then she saw the paint smears on his jeans and wondered if he was a painting contractor come to put in a bid on the house, but that wasn't it either. He looked more like an amateur artist—and here she had to laugh to herself—the kind who specializes in dog portraits. But she was nearly on him now, thinking to brush by him and slip through the gate before he could accost her, whatever he wanted, when he turned suddenly and his face caught fire. “Wow!” he said. “Wow, I can't believe it! You're her, aren't you, the famous dog-sitter? And this”—he went down on one knee and made a chirping sound deep in his throat—“this is Admiral. Right? Am I right?”

Admiral went straight to him, lurching against the leash, and in the next instant was flopping himself down on the hot pavement, submitting to the man's caresses. The rope of a tail whapped and thrashed, the paws gyrated, the puppy teeth came into play. “Good boy,” the man crooned, his dreads riding a wave across his brow. “He likes that, doesn't he? Doesn't he, boy?”

Nisha didn't say anything. She just watched, the smallest hole dug out of the canyon of her boredom, till the man rose to his feet and held out his hand even as Admiral sprang up to hump his leg with fresh enthusiasm. “I'm Erhard,” he said, grinning wide. “And you're Nisha, right?”

“Yes,” she said, taking his hand despite herself. She was on the verge of asking how he knew her name, but there was no point: she already understood. He was from the press. In the past month there must have been a dozen reporters on the property, the Strikers stroking their vanity and posing for pictures and answering the same idiotic questions over and over—A quarter-million dollars: that's a lot for a dog, isn't it?—and she herself had been interviewed twice already. Her mother had even found a fuzzy color photo of her and Admiral (couchant, lap) on the Web under the semi-hilarious rubric CLONE SITTER. So this guy was a reporter—a foreign reporter, judging from the faint trace of an accent and the blue-eyed rearing height of him, German, she supposed. Or Austrian. And he wanted some of her time.

“Yes,” he said, as if reading her thoughts. “I am from Die Weltwoche and I wanted to ask of you—prevail upon you, beg you—for a few moments? Is that possible? For me? Just now?”

She gave him a long slow appraisal, flirting with him, yes, definitely flirting.

“I've got nothing but time,” she said. And then, watching his grin widen: “You want a sandwich?”

They ate on the patio overlooking the pool. She was dressed casually in shorts and flip-flops and her old Tupac tee, and that wasn't necessarily a bad thing because the shirt—too small by half—lifted away from her hips when she leaned back in the chair, showing off her navel and the onyx ring she wore there. He was watching her, chattering on about the dog, lifting the sandwich to his lips and putting it down again, fooling with the lens on the battered old Hasselblad he extracted from the backpack at his feet. The sun made sequins on the surface of the pool. Admiral lounged beneath the table, worrying a rawhide bone. She was feeling good, better than good, sipping a beer and watching him back.

They had a little conversation about the beer. “Sorry to offer you Miller, but that's all we have—or the Strikers have, I mean.”

70

"Miller High Life," he said, lifting the bottle to his mouth. "Great name. What person would not want to live the high life? Even a dog. Even Admiral. He lives the high life, no?"

"I thought you'd want a German beer, something like Beck's or something."

He set down the bottle, picked up the camera, and let the lens wander down the length of her legs. "I'm Swiss, actually," he said. "But I live here now. And I like American beer. I like everything American."

There was no mistaking the implication, and she wanted to return the sentiment, but she didn't know the first thing about Switzerland, so she just smiled and tipped her beer to him.

"So," he said, cradling the camera in his lap and referring to the notepad he'd laid on the table when she'd served him the sandwich, "this is the most interesting for me, this idea that Mr. and Mrs. Striker would hire you for the dog? This is very strange, no?"

She agreed that it was.

He gave her a smile she could have fallen into. "Do you mind if I should ask what are they paying you?"

"Yes," she said. "I do."

Another smile. "But it is good—worth your while, as they say?"

"I thought this was about Admiral," she said, and then, because she wanted to try it out on her tongue, she added, "Erhard."

"Oh, it is, it is—but I find you interesting too. More interesting, really, than the dog." As if on cue, Admiral backed out from under the table and squatted on the concrete to deposit a glistening yellow turd, which he examined briefly and then promptly ate.

"Bad dog," she said reflexively.

Erhard studied the dog a moment, then shifted his eyes back to her. "But how do you feel about the situation, this concept of cloning a pet? Do you know anything about this process, the cruelty involved?"

"You know, frankly, Erhard, I haven't thought much about it. I don't know really what it involves. I don't really care. The Strikers love their dog, that's all, and if they want to, I don't know, bring him back—"

"Cheat death, you mean."

She shrugged. "It's their money."

He leaned across the table now, his eyes locked on hers. "Yes, but they must artificially stimulate so many bitches to come into heat, and then they must take the eggs from the tubes of these bitches, what they call 'surgically harvesting,' if you can make a guess as to what that implies for the poor animals"—she began to object but he held up a peremptory finger—"and that is nothing when you think of the numbers involved. Do you know about Snuppy?"

She thought she hadn't heard him right. "Snuppy? What's that?"

"The dog, the first one ever cloned—it was two years ago, in Korea? Well, this dog, this one dog—an Afghan, like your dog here—was the result of over a thousand embryos created in the laboratory from donor skin cells. And they put these embryos into one hundred and twenty-three bitches and only three clones resulted—and two died. So: all that torture of the animals, all that money—and for what?” He glanced down at Admiral, the flowing fur, the blunted eyes. “For this?”

A sudden thought came to her: “You’re not really a journalist, are you?”

He slowly shook his head, as if he couldn’t bear the weight of it.

“You’re what—one of these animal people, these animal liberators or whatever they are. Isn’t that right? Isn’t that what you are?” She felt frightened suddenly, for herself, for Admiral, for the Strikers and Frankie and the whole carefully constructed edifice of getting and wanting, of supply and demand and all that it implied.

“And do you know why they clone the Afghan hound,” he went on, ignoring her, “the very stupidest of all the dogs on this earth? You don’t? Breeding, that is why. This is what they call an uncomplicated genetic line, a pure line all the way back to the wolf ancestor. Breeding,” he said, and he’d raised his voice so that Admiral looked up at the vehemence of it, “so that we can have this purity, this stupid hound, this replica of nature.”

Nisha tugged down her T-shirt, drew up her legs. The sun glared up off the water so that she had to squint to see him. “You haven’t answered my question,” she said. “Erhard. If that’s even your name.”

Again, the slow rolling of the head on his shoulders, back and forth in rhythmic contrition. “Yes,” he said finally, drawing in a breath, “I am one of ‘these animal people.’” His eyes went distant a moment and then came back to her. “But I am also a journalist, a journalist first. And I want you to help me.”

That night, when the Strikers came home—in convoy, her car following his through the gate, Admiral lurching across the lawn to bark furiously at the shimmering irresistible discs of the wheels of first one car, then the other—Nisha was feeling conflicted. Her loyalties were with the Strikers, of course. And with Admiral too, because no matter how brainless and ungainly the dog was, no matter how many times he wet the rug or ravaged the flowerbed or scrambled up onto the kitchen table to choke down anything anyone had been foolish enough to leave untended even for thirty seconds, she’d bonded with him—she would have been pretty cold if she hadn’t. And she wasn’t cold. She was as susceptible as anyone else. She loved animals, loved dogs, loved the way Admiral sprang to life when he saw her walk through the door, loved the dance of his fur, his joyous full-throated bark, the feel of his wet whiskered snout in the cupped palm of her hand. But Erhard had made her feel something else altogether. What was it? A sexual stirring, yes, absolutely—after the third beer, she’d found herself leaning into him for the first of a series of deep, languid, adhesive kisses—but it was more than that. There was something transgressive in what he wanted her to do, something that appealed to her sense of rebellion, of anarchy, of applying the pin to the swollen balloon . . . but here were the Strikers, emerging separately from their cars as Admiral bounced between them, yapping out his ecstasy. And now Gretchen was addressing her, trying to shout over the dog’s sharp vocalizations, but without success. In the next moment, she was coming across the lawn, her face set.

"Don't let him chase the car like that," she called, even as Admiral tore round her like a dust devil, nipping at her ankles and dodging away again. "It's a bad habit."

"But Admiral—I mean, the first Admiral—used to chase cars all the time, remember?" 100

Gretchen had pinned her hair up so that all the contours of her face stood out in sharp relief. There were lines everywhere suddenly, creases and gouges, frown marks, little embellishments round her eyes, and how could Nisha have missed them? Gretchen was old—fifty, at least—and the realization came home to Nisha now, under the harsh sun, with the taste of the beer and of Erhard still tingling on her lips. "I don't care," Gretchen was saying, and she was standing beside Nisha now, like a figurine the gardeners had set down amid that perfect landscape.

"But I thought we were going to go for everything, the complete behavior, good or bad, right? Because otherwise—"

"That was how the accident happened. At the dog park. He got through the gate before Cliff or I could stop him and just ran out into the street after some idiot on a motorcycle . . ." She looked past Nisha a moment, to where Admiral was bent over the pool, slurping up water as if his pinched triangular head worked on a piston. "So no," she said, "no, we're going to have to modify some behavior. I don't want him drinking that pool water, for one thing. Too many chemicals."

"Okay, sure," Nisha said, shrugging. "I'll try." She raised her voice and sang out, "Bad dog, bad dog," but it was halfhearted and Admiral ignored her.

The cool green eyes shifted to meet hers again. "And I don't want him eating his own"—she paused to search for the proper word for the context, running through various euphemisms before giving it up—"shit." 105

Another shrug.

"I'm serious on this. Are you with me?"

Nisha couldn't help herself, and so what if she was pushing it? So what?

"Admiral did," she said. "Maybe you didn't know that."

Gretchen just waved her hand in dismissal. "But this Admiral," she said. "He's 110 not going to do it. Is he?"

Over the course of the next two weeks, as summer settled in with a succession of cloudless, high-arching days and Admiral steadily grew into the promise of his limbs, Erhard became a fixture at the house. Every morning, when Nisha came through the gate with the dog on his leash, he was there waiting for her, shining and tall and beautiful, with a joke on his lips and always some little treat for Admiral secreted in one pocket or another. The dog worshipped him. Went crazy for him. Pranced on the leash, spun in circles, nosed at his sleeves and pockets till he got his treat, then rolled over on his back in blissful submission. And then it was the dog park, and instead of sitting there wrapped up in the cocoon of herself, she had Erhard to sustain her, to lean into her so that she could feel the heat of him through the thin cotton of his shirt, to kiss her, and later, after lunch and the rising tide of the beer, to make love to her on the divan in the cool shadows of the pool house. They swam in the afternoons—he didn’t mind the five pounds she’d put on; he praised her for them—and sometimes Frankie would join them, shedding the maid’s habit for a white two-piece and careering through a slashing backstroke with a bottle of beer her reward, because she was part of the family too. Mama and Papa and Aunt Frankie, all there to nurture little Admiral under the beneficent gaze of the sun. Of course, Nisha was no fool. She knew there was a quid pro quo involved here, knew that Erhard had his agenda, but she was in no hurry, she’d committed to nothing, and as she lay there on the divan smoothing her hands over his back . . . she felt hope, real hope, for the first time since she’d come back home. It got so that she looked forward to each day, even the mornings that had been so hard on her, having to take a tray up to the ghost of her mother while her father trudged off to work, the whole house like a turned grave, because now she had Admiral, now she had Erhard, and she could shrug off anything. Yes. Sure. That was the way it was. Until the day he called her on it.

Cloudless sky, steady sun, every flower at its peak. She came down the walk with Admiral on his leash at the appointed hour, pulled back the gate, and there he was—but this time he wasn’t alone. Beside him, already straining at the leash, was a gangling overgrown Afghan pup that could have been the twin of Admiral, and though she’d known it was coming, known the plan since the very first day, she was awestruck.

“Jesus,” she said, even as Admiral jerked her forward and the two dogs began to romp round her legs in a tangle of limbs and leashes, “how did you—? I mean, he’s the exact, he’s totally—”

“That’s the idea, isn’t it?”

“But where did you find him?”

Erhard gave her a look of appraisal, then his eyes jumped past her to sweep the street. “Let’s go inside, no? I don’t want that they should see us here, anyone—not right in the front of the house.”

He hadn’t talked her into it, not yet, not exactly, but now that the moment had come she numbly punched in the code and held the gate open for him. What he wanted to do, what he was in the process of doing with her unspoken complicity, was to switch the dogs—just for a day, two at the most—by way of experiment. His contention was that the Strikers would never know the difference, that they were arrogant exemplars of bourgeois excess, even to the point of violating the laws of nature—and God, God too—simply to satisfy their own solipsistic desires. Admiral wouldn’t be harmed—he’d enjoy himself, the change of scenery, all that. And certainly she knew how much the dog had come to mean to him. “But these people will not recognize their own animal,” he’d insisted, his voice gone hard with conviction, “and so I will have my story and the world will know it.”

Once inside the gate, they let the dogs off their leashes and went round back of the house where they’d be out of sight. They walked hand in hand, his fingers entwined with hers, and for a long while, as the sun rode high overhead and a breeze slipped in off the ocean to stir the trees, they watched as the two dogs streaked back and forth, leaping and nipping and tumbling in doggy rhapsody. Admiral’s great combed-out spill of fur whipped round him in a frenzy of motion, and the new dog, Erhard's dog—the impostor—matched him step for step, hair for glorious hair. “You took him to the groomer, didn't you?” she said.

Erhard gave a stiff nod. “Yes, sure. What do you think? He must be exact.”

She watched, bemused, for another minute, her misgivings buried deep under the pressure of his fingers, bone, sinew, the wedded flesh, and why shouldn't she go along with him? What was the harm? His article, or exposé, or whatever it was, would appear in Switzerland, in German, and the Strikers would never know the difference. Or even if they did, even if it was translated into English and grabbed headlines all over the country, they had it coming to them. Erhard was right. She knew it. She'd known it all along. “So what's his name?” she asked, the dogs shooting past her in a moil of fur and flashing feet. “Does he have a name?”

“Fred.”

“Fred? What kind of name is that for a pedigree dog?”

“What kind of name is Admiral?”

She was about to tell him the story of the original Admiral, how he'd earned his sobriquet because of his enthusiasm for the Strikers' yacht and how they were planning on taking Admiral II out on the water as soon as they could, when the familiar tumble of the driveway gate drawing back on its runners startled her. In the next moment, she was in motion, making for the near corner of the house where she could see down the long macadam strip of the drive. Her heart skipped a beat: it was Gretchen. Gretchen home early, some crisis compelling her, mislaid papers, her blouse stained, the flu, Gretchen in her black Beemer, waiting for the gate to slide back so she could roll up the drive and exert dominion over her house and property, her piss-stained carpets, and her insuperable dog. “Quick!” Nisha shouted, whirling round. “Grab them. Grab the dogs!”

She saw Erhard plunge forward and snatch at them, the grass rising up to meet him and both dogs tearing free. “Admiral!” he called, scrambling to his knees. “Here, boy. Come!” The moment thundered in her ears. The dogs hesitated, the ridiculous sea of fur smoothing and settling momentarily, and then one of them—it was Admiral, it had to be—came to him, and he got hold of it even as the other pricked up its ears at the sound of the car and bolted round the corner of the house.

“I'll stall her,” she called.

Erhard, all six feet five inches of him, was already humping across the grass in the direction of the pool house, the dog writhing in his arms.

But the other dog—it was Fred, it had to be—was chasing the car up the drive now, nipping at the wheels, and as Nisha came round the corner she could read the look on her employer's face. A moment and she was there, grabbing for the dog as the car rolled to a stop and the engine died. Gretchen stepped out of the car, heels coming down squarely on the pavement, her shoulders thrust back tightly against the grip of her jacket. “I thought I told you . . .” she began, her voice high and querulous, but then she faltered and her expression changed. “But where's Admiral?” she said. “And whose dog is that?”

In the course of her life, short though it had been, she'd known her share of embittered people—her father, for one; her mother, for another—and she'd promised herself she'd never go there, never descend to that hopeless state of despair and regret that ground you down till you were nothing but raw animus, but increasingly now everything she thought or felt or tasted was bitter to the root. Erhard was gone. The Strikers were inflexible. Her mother lingered. Admiral reigned supreme. When the car had come up the drive and Gretchen had stood there confronting her, she'd never felt lower in her life. Until Admiral began howling in the distance and then broke free of Erhard to come careening round the corner of the house and launch himself in one wholly coordinated and mighty leap right into the arms of his protector. And then Erhard appeared, head bowed and shoulders slumped, looking abashed.

"I don't think I've had the pleasure," Gretchen said, setting down the dog (which sprang right up again, this time at Erhard) and at the same time shooting Nisha a look before stepping forward and extending her hand. 130

"Oh, this is, uh, Erhard," she heard herself say. "He's from Switzerland, and I, well, I just met him in the dog park, and since he had an Afghan too—"

Erhard was miserable, as miserable as she'd ever seen him, but he mustered a counterfeit of his smile and said, "Nice to meet you," even as Gretchen dropped his hand and turned to Nisha.

"Well, it's a nice idea," she said, looking down at the dogs, comparing them. "Good for you for taking the initiative, Nisha . . . but really, you have to know that Admiral didn't have any—playmates—here on the property, Afghans or no, and I'm sure he wasn't exposed to anybody from Switzerland, if you catch my drift?"

There was nothing Nisha could do but nod her acquiescence.

"So," Gretchen said, squaring her shoulders and turning back to Erhard. "Nice to meet you," she said, "but I'm going to have to ask that you take your dog—what's his name?" 135

Erhard ducked his head. "Fred."

"Fred? What an odd name. For a dog, I mean. He does have papers, doesn't he?"

"Oh, yes, he's of the highest order, very well-bred."

Gretchen glanced dubiously down at the dog, then back at Erhard. "Yes, well, he looks it," she said, "and they do make great dogs, Afghans—we ought to know. I don't know if Nisha told you, but Admiral is very special, very, very special, and we can't have any other dogs on the property. And I don't mean to be abrupt"—a sharp look for Nisha—"but strangers of any sort, or species, just cannot be part of this, this . . ." She trailed off, fighting, at the end, to recover the cold impress of her smile. "Nice meeting you," she repeated, and there was nowhere to go from there.

It had taken Nisha a while to put it all behind her. She kept thinking Erhard was lying low, that he'd be back, that there had been something between them after all, but by the end of the second week she no longer looked for him at the gate or at the dog park or anywhere else. And very slowly, as the days beat on, she began to understand what her role was, her true role. Admiral chased his tail and she encouraged him. When he did his business along the street, she nudged the hard little bolus with the tip of her shoe till he stooped to take it up in his mouth. Yes, she was living in the past and her mother was dying and she'd gone to college for nothing, but she was determined to create a new future—for herself and Admiral—and when she took 140 him to the dog park she lingered outside the gate, to let him run free where he really wanted to be, out there on the street where the cars shunted by and the wheels spun and stalled and caught the light till there was nothing else in the world. “Good boy,” she’d say. “Good boy.”

The Headstrong Historian

CHIMAMANDA NGOZI ADICHIE

With two novels and a short-story collection published before the age of thirty-two, Chimamanda Ngozi Adichie (b. 1977) is one of her generation's most promising African writers, as well as the winner of a 2008 MacArthur Fellowship. She currently divides her time between the United States and Nigeria, where she grew up and attended medical school at the University of Nigeria for two years before coming to America. She received an MFA in creative writing from Johns Hopkins University and an MA in African studies from Yale. Adichie describes fellow Nigerian writer Chinua Achebe as her hero, and many consider her his literary heir. Adichie's first novel, Purple Hibiscus (2003), was awarded the Commonwealth Writers' Prize for Best First Book. Half of a Yellow Sun (2006), which is set during the Biafran civil war in Nigeria (1967–1970), won the Orange Prize for Fiction in 2007; the novel is dedicated to her two grandfathers, who died in the war. Many of the stories in her collection The Thing around Your Neck (2009), including "The Headstrong Historian," appeared previously in the New Yorker. "The Headstrong Historian" showcases Adichie's skill at examining the history of Nigeria and the impact of colonization through the lens of one family's experience.

Many years after her husband had died, Nwamgba still closed her eyes from time to time to relive his nightly visits to her hut, and the mornings after, when she would walk to the stream humming a song, thinking of the smoky scent of him and the firmness of his weight, and feeling as if she were surrounded by light. Other memories of Obierika also remained clear—his stubby fingers curled around his flute when he played in the evenings, his delight when she set down his bowls of food, his sweaty back when he brought baskets filled with fresh clay for her pottery. From the moment she had first seen him, at a wrestling match, both of them staring and staring, both of them too young, her waist not yet wearing the menstruation cloth, she had believed with a quiet stubbornness that her chi and his chi had destined their marriage, and so when he and his relatives came to her father a few years later with pots of palm wine she told her mother that this was the man she would marry. Her mother was aghast. Did Nwamgba not know that Obierika was an only child, that his late father had been an only child whose wives had lost pregnancies and buried babies? Perhaps somebody in their family had committed the taboo of selling a girl into slavery and the earth god Ani was visiting misfortune on them. Nwamgba ignored her mother. She went into her father's obi and told him she would run away from any other man's house if she was not allowed to marry Obierika. Her father found her exhausting, this sharp-tongued, headstrong daughter who had once wrestled her brother to the ground. (Her father had had to warn those who saw this not to let anyone outside the compound know that a girl had thrown a boy.) He, too, was concerned about the infertility in Obierika's family, but it was not a bad family: Obierika's late father had taken the Ozo title; Obierika was already giving out his seed yams to sharecroppers. Nwamgba would not starve if she married him. Besides, it was better that he let his daughter go with the man she chose than to endure years of trouble in which she would keep returning home after confrontations with her in-laws; and so he gave his blessing, and she smiled and called him by his praise name.

To pay her bride price, Obierika came with two maternal cousins, Okafo and Okoye, who were like brothers to him. Nwamgba loathed them at first sight. She saw a grasping envy in their eyes that afternoon, as they drank palm wine in her father's obi; and in the following years—years in which Obierika took titles and widened his compound and sold his yams to strangers from afar—she saw their envy blacken. But she tolerated them, because they mattered to Obierika, because he pretended not to notice that they didn't work but came to him for yams and chickens, because he wanted to imagine that he had brothers. It was they who urged him, after her third miscarriage, to marry another wife. Obierika told them that he would give it some thought, but when they were alone in her hut at night he assured her that they would have a home full of children, and that he would not marry another wife until they were old, so that they would have somebody to care for them. She thought this strange of him, a prosperous man with only one wife, and she worried more than he did about their childlessness, about the songs that people sang, the melodious mean-spirited words: She has sold her womb. She has eaten his penis. He plays his flute and hands over his wealth to her.

Once, at a moonlight gathering, the square full of women telling stories and learning new dances, a group of girls saw Nwamgba and began to sing, their aggressive breasts pointing at her. She asked if they would mind singing a little louder, so that she could hear the words and then show them who was the greater of two tortoises. They stopped singing. She enjoyed their fear, the way they backed away from her, but it was then that she decided to find a wife for Obierika herself.

Nwamgba liked going to the Oyi stream, untying her wrapper from her waist and walking down the slope to the silvery rush of water that burst out from a rock. The waters of Oyi seemed fresher than those of the other stream, Ogalanya, or perhaps it was simply that Nwamgba felt comforted by the shrine of the Oyi goddess, tucked away in a corner; as a child she had learned that Oyi was the protector of women, the reason it was taboo to sell women into slavery. Nwamgba's closest friend, Ayaju, was already at the stream, and as Nwamgba helped Ayaju raise her pot to her head she asked her who might be a good second wife for Obierika.

She and Ayaju had grown up together and had married men from the same clan. The difference between them, though, was that Ayaju was of slave descent. Ayaju did not care for her husband, Okenwa, who she said resembled and smelled like a rat, but her marriage prospects had been limited; no man from a freedom family would have come for her hand. Ayaju was a trader, and her rangy, quick-moving body spoke of her many journeys; she had even travelled beyond Onicha. It was she who had first brought back tales of the strange customs of the Igala and Edo traders, she who had first told stories of the white-skinned men who had arrived in Onicha with mirrors and fabrics and the biggest guns the people of those parts had ever seen. This cosmopolitanism earned her respect, and she was the only person of slave descent who talked loudly at the Women's Council, the only person who had answers for everything. She promptly suggested, for Obierika's second wife, a young girl from the Okonkwo family, who had beautiful wide hips and who was respectful, nothing like the other young girls of today, with their heads full of nonsense.

As they walked home from the stream, Ayaju said that perhaps Nwamgba should do what other women in her situation did—take a lover and get pregnant in order to continue Obierika's lineage. Nwamgba's retort was sharp, because she did not like Ayaju's tone, which suggested that Obierika was impotent, and, as if in response to her thoughts, she felt a furious stabbing sensation in her back and knew that she was pregnant again, but she said nothing, because she knew, too, that she would lose it again.

Her miscarriage happened a few weeks later, lumpy blood running down her legs. Obierika comforted her and suggested that they go to the famous oracle, Kisa, as soon as she was well enough for the half day's journey. After the dibia had consulted the oracle, Nwamgba cringed at the thought of sacrificing a whole cow; Obierika certainly had greedy ancestors. But they performed the ritual cleansings and the sacrifices as required, and when she suggested that he go and see the Okonkwo family about their daughter he delayed and delayed until another sharp pain spliced her back, and, months later, she was lying on a pile of freshly washed banana leaves behind her hut, straining and pushing until the baby slipped out.

They named him Anikwenwa: the earth god Ani had finally granted a child. He was dark and solidly built, and had Obierika's happy curiosity. Obierika took him to pick medicinal herbs, to collect clay for Nwamgba's pottery, to twist yam vines at the farm. Obierika's cousins Okafo and Okoye visited often. They marvelled at how well Anikwenwa played the flute, how quickly he was learning poetry and wrestling moves from his father, but Nwamgba saw the glowing malevolence that their smiles could not hide. She feared for her child and for her husband, and when Obierika died—a man who had been hearty and laughing and drinking palm wine moments before he slumped—she knew that they had killed him with medicine. She clung to his corpse until a neighbor slapped her to make her let go; she lay in the cold ash for days, tore at the patterns shaved into her hair. Obierika's death left her with an unending despair. She thought often of a woman who, after losing a tenth child, had gone to her back yard and hanged herself on a kola-nut tree. But she would not do it, because of Anikwenwa.

Later, she wished she had made Obierika's cousins drink his mmili ozu before the oracle. She had witnessed this once, when a wealthy man died and his family forced his rival to drink his mmili ozu. Nwamgba had watched an unmarried woman take a cupped leaf full of water, touch it to the dead man's body, all the time speaking solemnly, and give the leaf-cup to the accused man. He drank. Everyone looked to make sure that he swallowed, a grave silence in the air, because they knew that if he was guilty he would die. He died days later, and his family lowered their heads in shame. Nwamgba felt strangely shaken by it all. She should have insisted on this with Obierika's cousins, but she had been blinded by grief and now Obierika was buried and it was too late.

His cousins, during the funeral, took his ivory tusk, claiming that the trappings of titles went to brothers and not to sons. It was when they emptied his barn of yams and led away the adult goats in his pen that she confronted them, shouting, and when they brushed her aside she waited until evening, then walked around the clan singing about their wickedness, the abominations they were heaping on the land by cheating a widow, until the elders asked them to leave her alone. She complained to the Women's Council, and twenty women went at night to Okafo's and Okoye's homes, brandishing pestles, warning them to leave Nwamgba alone. But Nwamgba knew that those grasping cousins would never really stop. She dreamed of killing them. She certainly could, those weaklings who had spent their lives scrounging off Obierika instead of working, but, of course, she would be banished then, and there would be no one to care for her son. Instead, she took Anikwenwa on long walks, telling him that the land from that palm tree to that avocado tree was theirs, that his grandfather had passed it on to his father. She told him the same things over and over, even though he looked bored and bewildered, and she did not let him go and play at moonlight unless she was watching.

Ayaju came back from a trading journey with another story: the women in Onicha were complaining about the white men. They had welcomed the white men's trading station, but now the white men wanted to tell them how to trade, and when the elders of Agueke refused to place their thumbs on a paper the white men came at night with their normal-men helpers and razed the village. There was nothing left. Nwamgba did not understand. What sort of guns did these white men have? Ayaju laughed and said that their guns were nothing like the rusty thing her own husband owned; she spoke with pride, as though she herself were responsible for the superiority of the white men's guns. Some white men were visiting different clans, asking parents to send their children to school, she added, and she had decided to send her son Azuka, who was the laziest on the farm, because although she was respected and wealthy, she was still of slave descent, her sons were still barred from taking titles, and she wanted Azuka to learn the ways of these foreigners. People ruled over others not because they were better people, she said, but because they had better guns; after all, her father would not have been enslaved if his clan had been as well armed as Nwamgba's. As Nwamgba listened to her friend, she dreamed of killing Obierika's cousins with the white men's guns.

The day the white men visited her clan, Nwamgba left the pot she was about to put in her oven, took Anikwenwa and her girl apprentices, and hurried to the square. She was at first disappointed by the ordinariness of the two white men; they were harmless-looking, the color of albinos, with frail and slender limbs. Their companions were normal men, but there was something foreign about them, too: only one spoke Igbo, and with a strange accent. He said that he was from Elele, the other normal men were from Sierra Leone, and the white men from France, far across the sea. They were all of the Holy Ghost Congregation, had arrived in Onicha in 1885, and were building their school and church there. Nwamgba was the first to ask a question: Had they brought their guns, by any chance, the ones used to destroy the people of Agueke, and could she see one? The man said unhappily that it was the soldiers of the British government and the merchants of the Royal Niger Company who destroyed villages; they, instead, brought good news. He spoke about their god, who had come to the world to die, and who had a son but no wife, and who was three but also one. Many of the people around Nwamgba laughed loudly. Some walked away, because they had imagined that the white man was full of wisdom. Others stayed and offered cool bowls of water.

Weeks later, Ayaju brought another story: the white men had set up a courthouse in Onicha where they judged disputes. They had indeed come to stay. For the first time, Nwamgba doubted her friend. Surely the people of Onicha had their own courts. The clan next to Nwamgba's, for example, held its courts only during the new yam festival, so that people's rancor grew while they awaited justice. A stupid system, Nwamgba thought, but surely everyone had one. Ayaju laughed and told Nwamgba again that people ruled others when they had better guns. Her son was already learning about these foreign ways, and perhaps Anikwenwa should, too. Nwamgba refused. It was unthinkable that her only son, her single eye, should be given to the white men, never mind the superiority of their guns.

Three events, in the following years, caused Nwamgba to change her mind. The first was that Obierika's cousins took over a large piece of land and told the elders that they were farming it for her, a woman who had emasculated their dead brother and now refused to remarry, even though suitors came and her breasts were still round. The elders sided with them. The second was that Ayaju told a story of two people who had taken a land case to the white men's court; the first man was lying but could speak the white men's language, while the second man, the rightful owner of the land, could not and so he lost his case, was beaten and locked up, and ordered to give up his land. The third was the story of the boy Iroegbunam, who had gone missing many years ago and then suddenly reappeared, a grown man, his widowed mother mute with shock at his story: a neighbor, whom his father had often shouted down at Age Grade meetings, had abducted him when his mother was at the market and taken him to the Aro slave dealers, who looked him over and complained that the wound on his leg would reduce his price. He was tied to others by the hands, forming a long human column, and he was hit with a stick and told to walk faster. There was one woman in the group. She shouted herself hoarse, telling the abductors that they were heartless, that her spirit would torment them and their children, that she knew she was to be sold to the white man and did they not know that the white man's slavery was very different, that people were treated like goats, taken on large ships a long way away, and were eventually eaten? Iroegbunam walked and walked and walked, his feet bloodied, his body numb, until all he remembered was the smell of dust. Finally, they stopped at a coastal clan, where a man spoke a nearly incomprehensible Igbo, but Iroegbunam made out enough to understand that another man who was to sell them to the white people on the ship had gone up to bargain with them but had himself been kidnapped. There were loud arguments, scuffling; some of the abductees yanked at the ropes and Iroegbunam passed out. He awoke to find a white man rubbing his feet with oil and at first he was terrified, certain that he was being prepared for the white man's meal, but this was a different kind of white man, who bought slaves only to free them, and he took Iroegbunam to live with him and trained him to be a Christian missionary.

Iroegbunam's story haunted Nwamgba, because this, she was sure, was the way 15 Obierika's cousins were likely to get rid of her son. Killing him would be too dangerous, the risk of misfortunes from the oracle too high, but they would be able to sell him as long as they had strong medicine to protect themselves. She was struck, too, by how Iroegbunam lapsed into the white man's language from time to time. It sounded nasal and disgusting. Nwamgba had no desire to speak such a thing herself, but she was suddenly determined that Anikwenwa would speak enough of it to go to the white men's court with Obierika's cousins and defeat them and take control of what was his. And so, shortly after Iroegbunam's return, she told Ayaju that she wanted to take her son to school.

They went first to the Anglican mission. The classroom had more girls than boys, sitting with slates on their laps while the teacher stood in front of them, holding a big cane, telling them a story about a man who transformed a bowl of water into wine. The teacher's spectacles impressed Nwamgba, and she thought that the man in the story must have had powerful medicine to be able to transform water into wine, but when the girls were separated and a woman teacher came to teach them how to sew Nwamgba found this silly. In her clan, men sewed cloth and girls learned pottery. What dissuaded her completely from sending Anikwenwa to the school, however, was that the instruction was done in Igbo. Nwamgba asked why. The teacher said that, of course, the students were taught English—he held up an English primer—but children learned best in their own language and the children in the white men's land were taught in their own language, too. Nwamgba turned to leave. The teacher stood in her way and told her that the Catholic missionaries were harsh and did not look out for the best interests of the natives. Nwamgba was amused by these foreigners, who did not seem to know that one must, in front of strangers, pretend to have unity. But she had come in search of English, and so she walked past him and went to the Catholic mission.

Father Shanahan told her that Anikwenwa would have to take an English name, because it was not possible to be baptized with a heathen name. She agreed easily. His name was Anikwenwa as far as she was concerned; if they wanted to name him something she could not pronounce before teaching him their language, she did not mind at all. All that mattered was that he learn enough of the language to fight his father's cousins.

Father Shanahan looked at Anikwenwa, a dark-skinned, well-muscled child, and guessed that he was about twelve, although he found it difficult to estimate the ages of these people; sometimes what looked like a man would turn out to be a mere boy.

It was nothing like in Eastern Africa, where he had previously worked, where the natives tended to be slender, less confusingly muscular. As he poured some water on the boy's head, he said, "Michael, I baptize you in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit."

He gave the boy a singlet and a pair of shorts, because the people of the living God did not walk around naked, and he tried to preach to the boy's mother, but she looked at him as if he were a child who did not know any better. There was something troublingly assertive about her, something he had seen in many women here; there was much potential to be harnessed if their wildness were tamed. This Nwamgba would make a marvellous missionary among the women. He watched her leave. There was a grace in her straight back, and she, unlike others, had not spent too much time going round and round in her speech. It infuriated him, their overlong talk and circuitous proverbs, their never getting to the point, but he was determined to excel here; it was the reason he had joined the Holy Ghost Congregation, whose special vocation was the redemption of black heathens.

Nwamgba was alarmed by how indiscriminately the missionaries flogged students: 20 for being late, for being lazy, for being slow, for being idle, and once, as Anikwenwa told her, Father Lutz put metal cuffs around a girl's hands to teach her a lesson about lying, all the time saying in Igbo—for Father Lutz spoke a broken brand of Igbo—that native parents pampered their children too much, that teaching the Gospel also meant teaching proper discipline. The first weekend Anikwenwa came home, Nwamgba saw welts on his back, and she tightened her wrapper around her waist and went to the school and told the teacher that she would gouge out the eyes of everyone at the mission if they ever did that to him again. She knew that Anikwenwa did not want to go to school and she told him that it was only for a year or two, so that he could learn English, and although the mission people told her not to come so often, she insistently came every weekend to take him home. Anikwenwa always took off his clothes even before they had left the mission compound. He disliked the shorts and shirt that made him sweat, the fabric that was itchy around his armpits. He disliked, too, being in the same class as old men, missing out on wrestling contests.

But Anikwenwa's attitude toward school slowly changed. Nwamgba first noticed this when some of the other boys with whom he swept the village square complained that he no longer did his share because he was at school, and Anikwenwa said something in English, something sharp-sounding, which shut them up and filled Nwamgba with an indulgent pride. Her pride turned to vague worry when she noticed that the curiosity in his eyes had diminished. There was a new ponderousness in him, as if he had suddenly found himself bearing the weight of a heavy world. He stared at things for too long. He stopped eating her food, because, he said, it was sacrificed to idols. He told her to tie her wrapper around her chest instead of her waist, because her nakedness was sinful. She looked at him, amused by his earnestness, but worried nonetheless, and asked why he had only just begun to notice her nakedness.

When it was time for his initiation ceremony, he said he would not participate, because it was a heathen custom to be initiated into the world of spirits, a custom that Father Shanahan had said would have to stop. Nwamgba roughly yanked his ear and told him that a foreign albino could not determine when their customs would change, and that he would participate or else he would tell her whether he was her son or the white man's son. Anikwenwa reluctantly agreed, but as he was taken away with a group of other boys she noticed that he lacked their excitement. His sadness saddened her. She felt her son slipping away from her, and yet she was proud that he was learning so much, that he could be a court interpreter or a letter writer, that with Father Lutz's help he had brought home some papers that showed that their land belonged to them. Her proudest moment was when he went to his father's cousins Okafo and Okoye and asked for his father's ivory tusk back. And they gave it to him.

Nwamgba knew that her son now inhabited a mental space that she was unable to recognize. He told her that he was going to Lagos to learn how to be a teacher, and even as she screamed—How can you leave me? Who will bury me when I die?—she knew that he would go. She did not see him for many years, years during which his father's cousin Okafo died. She often consulted the oracle to ask whether Anikwenwa was still alive, and the dibia admonished her and sent her away, because of course he was alive. Finally, he returned, in the year that the clan banned all dogs after a dog killed a member of the Mmangala Age Grade, the age group to which Anikwenwa would have belonged if he did not believe that such things were devilish.

Nwamgba said nothing when Anikwenwa announced that he had been appointed catechist at the new mission. She was sharpening her aguba on the palm of her hand, about to shave patterns into the hair of a little girl, and she continued to do so—flick-flick-flick—while Anikwenwa talked about winning the souls of the members of their clan. The plate of breadfruit seeds she had offered him was untouched—he no longer ate anything at all of hers—and she looked at him, this man wearing trousers and a rosary around his neck, and wondered whether she had meddled with his destiny. Was this what his chi had ordained for him, this life in which he was like a person diligently acting a bizarre pantomime?

The day that he told her about the woman he would marry, she was not surprised. He did not do it as it was done, did not consult people about the bride's family, but simply said that somebody at the mission had seen a suitable young woman from Ifite Ukpo, and the suitable young woman would be taken to the Sisters of the Holy Rosary in Onicha to learn how to be a good Christian wife. Nwamgba was sick with malaria that day, lying on her mud bed, rubbing her aching joints, and she asked Anikwenwa the young woman's name. Anikwenwa said it was Agnes. Nwamgba asked for the young woman's real name. Anikwenwa cleared his throat and said she had been called Mgbeke before she became a Christian, and Nwamgba asked whether Mgbeke would at least do the confession ceremony even if Anikwenwa would not follow the other marriage rites of their clan. He shook his head furiously and told her that the confession made by women before marriage, in which, surrounded by female relatives, they swore that no man had touched them since their husband declared his interest, was sinful, because Christian wives should not have been touched at all.

The marriage ceremony in the church was laughably strange, but Nwamgba bore it silently and told herself that she would die soon and join Obierika and be free of a world that increasingly made no sense. She was determined to dislike her son's wife, but Mgbeke was difficult to dislike, clear-skinned and gentle, eager to please the man to whom she was married, eager to please everyone, quick to cry, apologetic about things over which she had no control. And so, instead, Nwamgba pitied her. Mgbeke often visited Nwamgba in tears, saying that Anikwenwa had refused to eat dinner because he was upset with her, that Anikwenwa had banned her from going to a friend's Anglican wedding because Anglicans did not preach the truth, and Nwamgba would silently carve designs on her pottery while Mgbeke cried, uncertain of how to handle a woman crying about things that did not deserve tears.

Mgbeke was called "missus" by everyone, even the non-Christians, all of whom respected the catechist's wife, but on the day she went to the Oyi stream and refused to remove her clothes because she was a Christian the women of the clan, outraged that she had dared to disrespect the goddess, beat her and dumped her at the grove. The news spread quickly. Missus had been harassed. Anikwenwa threatened to lock up all the elders if his wife was treated that way again, but Father O'Donnell, on his next trek from his station in Onicha, visited the elders and apologized on Mgbeke's behalf, and asked whether perhaps Christian women could be allowed to fetch water fully clothed. The elders refused—if a woman wanted Oyi's waters, then she had to follow Oyi's rules—but they were courteous to Father O'Donnell, who listened to them and did not behave like their own son Anikwenwa.

Nwamgba was ashamed of her son, irritated with his wife, upset by their rarefied life in which they treated non-Christians as if they had smallpox, but she held out hope for a grandchild; she prayed and sacrificed for Mgbeke to have a boy, because she knew that the child would be Obierika come back and would bring a semblance of sense again into her world. She did not know of Mgbeke's first or second miscarriage; it was only after the third that Mgbeke, sniffing and blowing her nose, told her. They had to consult the oracle, as this was a family misfortune, Nwamgba said, but Mgbeke's eyes widened with fear. Michael would be very angry if he ever heard of this oracle suggestion. Nwamgba, who still found it difficult to remember that Michael was Anikwenwa, went to the oracle herself, and afterward thought it ludicrous how even the gods had changed and no longer asked for palm wine but for gin. Had they converted, too?

A few months later, Mgbeke visited, smiling, bringing a covered bowl of one of those concoctions that Nwamgba found inedible, and Nwamgba knew that her chi was still wide awake and that her daughter-in-law was pregnant. Anikwenwa had decreed that Mgbeke would have the baby at the mission in Onicha, but the gods had different plans, and she went into early labor on a rainy afternoon; somebody ran in the drenching rain to Nwamgba's hut to call her. It was a boy. Father O'Donnell baptized him Peter, but Nwamgba called him Nnamdi, because he would be Obierika come back. She sang to him, and when he cried she pushed her dried-up nipple into his mouth, but, try as she might, she did not feel the spirit of her magnificent husband, Obierika. Mgbeke had three more miscarriages, and Nwamgba went to the oracle many times until a pregnancy stayed, and the second baby was born at the mission in Onicha. A girl. From the moment Nwamgba held her, the baby's bright eyes delightfully focussed on her, she knew that the spirit of Obierika had finally returned; odd, to have come back in a girl, but who could predict the ways of the ancestors? Father O'Donnell baptized the baby Grace, but Nwamgba called her Afamefuna—"my name will not be lost"—and was thrilled by the child's solemn interest in her poetry and her stories, by the teen-ager's keen watchfulness as Nwamgba struggled to make pottery with newly shaky hands. Nwamgba was not thrilled that Afamefuna was sent away to secondary school in Onicha. (Peter was already living with the priests there.) She feared that, at boarding school, the new ways would dissolve her granddaughter's fighting spirit and replace it with either an incurious rigidity, like her son's, or a limp helplessness, like Mgbeke's.

The year that Afamefuna left for secondary school, Nwamgba felt as if a lamp had been blown out in a dim room. It was a strange year, the year that darkness suddenly descended on the land in the middle of the afternoon, and when Nwamgba felt the deep-seated ache in her joints she knew that her end was near. She lay on her bed gasping for breath, while Anikwenwa pleaded with her to be baptized and anointed so that he could hold a Christian funeral for her, as he could not participate in a heathen ceremony. Nwamgba told him that if he dared to bring anybody to rub some filthy oil on her she would slap them with her last strength. All she wanted before she joined the ancestors was to see Afamefuna, but Anikwenwa said that Grace was taking exams at school and could not come home.

But she came. Nwamgba heard the squeaky swing of her door, and there was Afamefuna, her granddaughter, who had come on her own from Onicha because she had been unable to sleep for days, her restless spirit urging her home. Grace put down her schoolbag, inside of which was her textbook, with a chapter called "The Pacification of the Primitive Tribes of Southern Nigeria," by an administrator from Bristol who had lived among them for seven years.

It was Grace who would eventually read about these savages, titillated by their curious and meaningless customs, not connecting them to herself until her teacher Sister Maureen told her that she could not refer to the call-and-response her grandmother had taught her as poetry, because primitive tribes did not have poetry. It was Grace who would laugh and laugh until Sister Maureen took her to detention and then summoned her father, who slapped Grace in front of the other teachers to show them how well he disciplined his children. It was Grace who would nurse a deep scorn for her father for years, spending holidays working as a maid in Onicha so as to avoid the sanctimonies, the dour certainties, of her parents and her brother. It was Grace who, after graduating from secondary school, would teach elementary school in Agueke, where people told stories of the destruction of their village by the white men with guns, stories she was not sure she believed, because they also told stories of mermaids appearing from the River Niger holding wads of crisp cash. It was Grace who, as one of a dozen or so women at the University College in Ibadan in 1953, would change her degree from chemistry to history after she heard, while drinking tea at the home of a friend, the story of Mr. Gboyega. The eminent Mr. Gboyega, a chocolate-skinned Nigerian, educated in London, distinguished expert on the history of the British Empire, had resigned in disgust when the West African Examinations Council began talking of adding African history to the curriculum, because he was appalled that African history would even be considered a subject. It was Grace who would ponder this story for a long time, with great sadness, and it would cause her to make a clear link between education and dignity, between the hard, obvious things that are printed in books and the soft, subtle things that lodge themselves in the soul. It was Grace who would begin to rethink her own schooling: How lustily she had sung on Empire Day, “God save our gracious king. Send him victorious, happy and glorious. Long to reign over us.” How she had puzzled over words like “wallpaper” and “dandelions” in her textbooks, unable to picture them. How she had struggled with arithmetic problems that had to do with mixtures, because what was “coffee” and what was “chicory,” and why did they have to be mixed? It was Grace who would begin to rethink her father’s schooling and then hurry home to see him, his eyes watery with age, telling him she had not received all the letters she had ignored, saying amen when he prayed, and pressing her lips against his forehead. It was Grace who, driving past Agueke on her way to the university one day, would become haunted by the image of a destroyed village and would go to London and to Paris and to Onicha, sifting through moldy files in archives, reimagining the lives and smells of her grandmother’s world, for the book she would write called “Pacifying with Bullets: A Reclaimed History of Southern Nigeria.” It was Grace who, in a conversation about the book with her fiancé, George Chikadibia—stylish graduate of King’s College, Lagos, engineer-to-be, wearer of three-piece suits, expert ballroom dancer, who often said that a grammar school without Latin was like a cup of tea without sugar—understood that the marriage would not last when George told her that it was misguided of her to write about primitive culture instead of a worthwhile topic like African Alliances in the American-Soviet Tension. They would divorce in 1972, not because of the four miscarriages Grace had suffered but because she woke up sweating one night and realized that she would strangle George to death if she had to listen to one more rapturous monologue about his Cambridge days. It was Grace who, as she received faculty prizes, as she spoke to solemn-faced people at conferences about the Ijaw and Ibibio and Igbo and Efik peoples of Southern Nigeria, as she wrote common-sense reports for international organizations, for which she nevertheless received generous pay, would imagine her grandmother looking on with great amusement. It was Grace who, feeling an odd rootlessness in the later years of her life, surrounded by her awards, her friends, her garden of peerless roses, would go to the courthouse in Lagos and officially change her first name from Grace to Afamefuna.

But on that day, as she sat at her grandmother’s bedside in the fading evening light, Grace was not contemplating her future. She simply held her grandmother’s hand, the palm thickened from years of making pottery.

Exploring the Text

1. To whom does the title refer? Is it Nwamgba, Afamefuna/Grace, or both? How does the title influence your reading of the story? Is “headstrong” a negative description?
2. Descriptions of traditional Igbo culture are essential to the story. What specific information about traditions, practices, and beliefs did you glean? Explain whether you think Adichie idealizes the culture or criticizes it.
3. Suppose that everything you know about colonialism in Nigeria you learned from the story; how then would you characterize colonialism’s intent and impact? Why is Nwamgba “amused by these [Anglican] foreigners” (para. 16)? What role do names play in depicting the colonial influence?
4. What is the role of education in this story? In what ways does it occasion a clash of values? How does Adichie depict Anikwenwa’s/Michael’s education as both a blessing and a curse?
5. Compare and contrast the characters of Nwamgba and Ayaju. Explain how their perspectives on women’s roles differ.
6. In what ways are Nwamgba and her granddaughter kindred spirits? Cite specific passages that depict their spiritual connection.
7. Read the second-to-last paragraph aloud and consider its effect. How does the style change from that of the rest of the story? (Pay special attention to the repetition of “It was Grace.”) Why do you think Adichie uses the granddaughter’s English name rather than her Igbo name in this paragraph?
8. In this relatively brief story, Adichie takes us through three generations, a time frame usually reserved for novels. Is she successful? Explain why you find the concentration of time either effective or unsatisfying.
9. What is the narrative viewpoint in this story? Consider passages that seem to be from Nwamgba’s perspective as well as others that represent the view of different characters (for example, when Father Shanahan notes “a grace in [Nwamgba’s] straight back” [para. 19]). Why do you think Adichie did not tell the story in first person using Nwamgba’s or Afamefuna’s voice?
10. Adichie, a contemporary author, sets most of the story in an earlier time period. What evidence do you find in the story to suggest that she brings a more contemporary sensibility or perspective to the characters and situations she is describing?
11. At the tragic end of Things Fall Apart by Chinua Achebe, the central character, Okonkwo, a leader of his people, has been driven to suicide by the encroachment of colonialism and thus, according to tribal custom, cannot be buried because he has disgraced himself and his family. Achebe ends the novel ironically as the district commissioner, who “had toiled to bring civilization to different parts of Africa,” returns to England with the intent to write a book entitled The Pacification of the Primitive Tribes of the Lower Niger. Okonkwo’s best friend, who survives him, is Obierika. What do these links—the character of Obierika and the title of his granddaughter’s book—add to your understanding of Adichie’s story?

The Collar

GEORGE HERBERT

Known for his religious poetry, George Herbert (1593–1633), brother to the philosopher Edward Herbert, was born in Wales. He earned his BA and MA degrees at Trinity College. Though he intended to pursue a career in the church, Herbert's scholarship won the attention and favor of King James I, which led to a prestigious post at Cambridge, followed by service as a member of Parliament. He took orders as an Anglican priest in 1630 and served as rector of a small parish in rural Bemerton until his death in 1633. Herbert's most famous poem is probably the pattern poem "Easter Wings" (1633), written in the shape of wings. His one book of poetry, The Temple—a collection of 160 religious poems—was published soon after his death. Herbert's work continues to be admired for its structural inventiveness and wealth of imagery; he is often considered, with John Donne, one of the foremost metaphysical poets. "The Collar," a poem about rebellion and reconciliation, expresses Herbert's inner conflict regarding his service to God.

I struck the board<sup>1</sup> and cried, "No more;
I will abroad!
What? shall I ever sigh and pine?
My lines and life are free, free as the road,
Loose as the wind, as large as store.
Shall I be still in suit?<sup>2</sup>
Have I no harvest but a thorn
To let me blood, and not restore
What I have lost with cordial<sup>3</sup> fruit?
Sure there was wine
Before my sighs did dry it; there was corn
Before my tears did drown it.
Is the year only lost to me?
Have I no bays<sup>4</sup> to crown it,
No flowers, no garlands gay? All blasted?
All wasted?
Not so, my heart; but there is fruit,
And thou hast hands.
Recover all thy sigh-blown age

On double pleasures: leave thy cold dispute
Of what is fit, and not. Forsake thy cage,
Thy rope of sands,
Which petty thoughts have made, and made to thee
Good cable, to enforce and draw,
And be thy law,
While thou didst wink and wouldst not see.
Away! take heed;
I will abroad.
Call in thy death's-head there; tie up thy fears.
He that forbears
To suit and serve his need,
Deserves his load.”
But as I raved and grew more fierce and wild
At every word,
Methought I heard one calling, Child!
And I replied, My Lord.

Exploring the Text

1. Who is the speaker? What is his profession, and what is his central complaint or dilemma?
2. What are the denotations and connotations of the word collar in this poem? How does your awareness of these various meanings affect your reading? Might Herbert also be playing with multiple meanings of the word suit? Explain.
3. In lines 18 through 29, the speaker directly addresses a second party—thou, thy, and thee. Who or what does the speaker address? Does each mention have the same reference? Explain, using textual evidence to support your answer.
4. The speaker’s “cry” consists largely of a series of questions until line 17. How does the poem change from that point, in terms of both style and content?
5. How would you describe the “petty thoughts” (l. 23) that the speaker refers to but does not name? How do these thoughts connect to the forbearance that the speaker seems to scorn in line 30?
6. What is the emotional impact of the poem’s sudden resolution (ll. 33–36)? In what way does this brief exchange address or not address the problem contained in the speaker’s long complaint?
7. If you have read John Milton’s poem “When I consider how my light is spent” in Chapter 6 (p. 495), compare the voices of complaint in each poem. Which is the more restive? Would you say that either is petulant? Which one rebels more strongly? Which has the more peaceful reconciliation?

Song: To the Men of England

PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY

The son of an English landowner and member of Parliament, Percy Bysshe Shelley (1792–1822) is considered one of the greatest lyric poets in English literature. Shelley fared poorly at Oxford, where he was said to have attended only a single lecture. Instead, he pursued his own interests, reading up to sixteen hours a day and writing pamphlets, gothic novels, and poetry. His controversial views, expounded in such pamphlets as The Necessity of Atheism, led to his expulsion from Oxford in 1811. After the suicide of his first wife in 1816, Shelley married Mary Wollstonecraft Godwin, who would later write Frankenstein (1818). In 1818, the couple moved to Italy, where Shelley maintained a tempestuous friendship with Lord Byron—a relationship that encouraged Shelley to vigorously pursue his writing. While in Italy, Shelley completed the verse drama Prometheus Unbound, based on the lost play by Aeschylus; Adonais, a pastoral elegy for John Keats; the essay The Philosophical View of Reform; and many poems, both lyrical and political. This poem, “Song: To the Men of England,” contains many of the political sentiments that made Shelley such a controversial figure during his lifetime.

Men of England, wherefore plough For the lords who lay ye low? Wherefore weave with toil and care The rich robes your tyrants wear?
Wherefore feed and clothe and save From the cradle to the grave Those ungrateful drones who would Drain your sweat—nay, drink your blood?	5
Wherefore, Bees of England, forge Many a weapon, chain, and scourge, That these stingless drones may spoil The forced produce of your toil?	10
Have ye leisure, comfort, calm, Shelter, food, love’s gentle balm? Or what is it ye buy so dear With your pain and with your fear?	15
The seed ye sow, another reaps; The wealth ye find, another keeps; The robes ye weave, another wears; The arms ye forge, another bears.	20

Sow seed—but let no tyrant reap;
 Find wealth—let no impostor heap;
 Weave robes—let not the idle wear;
 Forge arms—in your defence to bear.

Shrink to your cellars, holes, and cells— 25
 In halls ye deck another dwells.
 Why shake the chains ye wrought? Ye see
 The steel ye tempered glance on ye.

With plough and spade and hoe and loom
 Trace your grave and build your tomb 30
 And weave your winding-sheet—till fair
 England be your Sepulchre.

Exploring the Text

1. Who are the “Men of England” Shelley is speaking to, and what is his purpose in addressing them? How does Shelley characterize the “Men of England”?
2. The first half of this poem consists of four questions. Do you think they are rhetorical? Explain.
3. Drones, or male honeybees, do not collect nectar or pollen, but only mate with queens and perform secondary functions within the hive. Who do you think the “drones” in the poem represent? What other connotations of the word drone do you think apply?
4. Consider the series of objects that the speaker says are forged by the “Bees of England”: “weapon, chain, and scourge” (l. 10). What do these items have in common? How do they differ?
5. Some of Shelley’s language in the poem—“wherefore” and “ye,” for example—was already archaic by the year of its composition. What effect do you think these word choices have on the tone and rhetorical impact of the poem?
6. Stanza 6 reverses the parallels of the declarative statements in the fifth stanza, making them imperative. How would you describe the speaker’s tone in these stanzas?
7. How would you describe the poem’s overall tone? How does the tone shift in the closing four stanzas?
8. “Song: To the Men of England” has been set to music and adopted as an anthem of the English labor movement. What elements of the poem make it especially suitable as a hymn or rallying cry? Do you think Shelley is advocating an armed rebellion or a more ambiguous refusal of the status quo?

Much Madness is divinest Sense—

EMILY DICKINSON

Born into a prominent family in Amherst, Massachusetts, Emily Dickinson (1830–1886) received some formal education at Amherst Academy and Mount Holyoke Female Seminary (which became Mount Holyoke College). Throughout her lifetime, Dickinson was a shy and reclusive person, who preferred to remain within her close family circle. In 1862, she enclosed four poems in a letter to literary critic and abolitionist Thomas Wentworth Higginson, who had written a piece in the Atlantic Monthly that included practical advice for young writers. Her letter began, “Mr. Higginson,—Are you too deeply occupied to say if my verse is alive? The mind is so near itself it cannot see distinctly, and I have none to ask. Should you think it breathed, and had you the leisure to tell me, I should feel quick gratitude.” Dickinson didn’t sign the letter, but instead enclosed her name on a card inside a smaller envelope. Dickinson wrote over seventeen hundred poems, but only ten were published in her lifetime. She defied traditional rules of poetry, never breaking rules out of mere carelessness. She was a master of whimsy, especially when dealing with serious topics, as in the following poem, “Much Madness is divinest Sense.”

Much Madness is divinest Sense—
 To a discerning Eye—
 Much Sense—the starkest Madness—
 ’Tis the Majority
 In this, as All, prevail—
 Assent—and you are sane—
 Demur—you’re straightway dangerous—
 And handled with a Chain—

[c. 1862]

Exploring the Text

1. This poem relies on an inversion of the expected meanings of “sense” and “madness.” Though the speaker does not explicitly tie the terms to any specific behavior or beliefs, can you find evidence indicating how the poem defines madness?
2. Do you think the poem presents an unresolvable paradox regarding “sense” and “madness”? How would you characterize the “discerning Eye” mentioned in line 2? Contrast this with the method of discernment practiced by the “Majority” in the poem.
3. Consider Dickinson’s choice of the word demur in line 7. How does choosing such a gentle term affect the meaning of the line? What do you make of the contrast between that word and the rest of the line?

4. To what extent does this poem speak to contemporary times? Are those who assent, or conform, regarded as sane; and those who rebel, or dissent, seen as dangerous? Use examples from current events to support your answer.
5. This poem could serve as an epigraph to one of the stories you have read in this chapter. Choose which story would be most appropriate, and explain why.

Disillusionment of Ten O'clock

WALLACE STEVENS

Wallace Stevens (1879–1955) is considered one of the most important American modernist poets. Born in Reading, Pennsylvania, Stevens studied at Harvard University and graduated from New York Law School. He worked as a lawyer in New York and became vice president of one of the largest insurance businesses in Hartford, Connecticut. In addition to being a successful businessman, Stevens is regarded as one of the great poets of the twentieth century. His poetry collections include Harmonium (1923), The Man with the Blue Guitar and Other Poems (1937), Transport to Summer (1947), and A Primitive like an Orb (1948). Collected Poems (1954) brought Stevens both a Pulitzer Prize and the National Book Award. Stevens's work is often described as meditative and philosophical. He was a poet of ideas, with a strong belief in the poet as someone with heightened powers. Stevens favored precision of imagery and clear, sharp language, rejecting the sentiment favored by the Romantic and Victorian poets.

The houses are haunted
By white night-gowns.
None are green,
Or purple with green rings,
Or green with yellow rings, 5
Or yellow with blue rings.
None of them are strange,
With socks of lace
And beaded ceintures.<sup>1</sup>
People are not going 10
To dream of baboons and periwinkles.
Only, here and there, an old sailor,
Drunk and asleep in his boots,
Catches tigers
In red weather. 15

Exploring the Text

1. How do you interpret the poem's title? Consider Stevens's choice of words; why ten o'clock specifically? What are the connotations of disillusionment, particularly with regard to Stevens's belief in the power and importance of imagination?
2. How would you characterize the speaker of the poem? What is his purpose, and to whom might he be speaking? Use textual evidence to support your analysis.
3. What do you think is the poem's unstated setting? What evidence in the text leads you to your conclusion?
4. Why don't the people in the poem dream? Why are they disillusioned? What are their lives like?
5. The speaker discusses various colors that the nightgowns are not; in fact, lines 3–11 are primarily about what is not found in these houses. What does this approach achieve in terms of the poem's mood and theme? How does it connect to the idea of haunting introduced in the opening line?
6. What do you think the poet is suggesting with the sudden leap from fairly mundane images of nightgowns to the absence of dreams of "baboons and periwinkles" (l. 11)?
7. In his poem "Someone Puts a Pineapple Together," Stevens proclaims, "Divest reality / Of its propriety." What does this statement mean? How does it apply to "Disillusionment of Ten O'clock"?

anyone lived in a pretty how town

E. E. CUMMINGS

Edward Estlin (E. E.) Cummings (1894–1962) was an enormously prolific and experimental poet. Born and raised in an affluent family in Cambridge, Massachusetts, he graduated from Cambridge Latin High School and received both a BA and an MA in English and classical studies from Harvard University. Before the United States entered World War I, Cummings, an avowed pacifist, volunteered as an ambulance driver in France, where he was held for a time in a detention camp—an experience that deepened his distrust of authority. The Enormous Room (1922), his first published work, is a fictional account of his imprisonment, followed in 1923 by his first collection of poems, Tulips and Chimneys. Cummings defied traditional rules of typography and punctuation in the pursuit of poetry that was both critical and whimsical. An immensely popular poet, he produced an extensive body of work including over nine hundred poems. Critic Jenny Penberthy describes Cummings as "an unabashed lyricist, a modern cavalier love poet. But alongside his lyrical celebrations of nature, love, and the imagination are his satirical denouncements of tawdry, defiling, flat-footed, urban and political life—open terrain for invective and verbal inventiveness." Each of these verbal rebellions is on display in "anyone lived in a pretty how town," one of his most enduring poems, which blends wordplay, whimsy, and romance with sly criticism of the status quo.

Exploring the Text

1. Who are the main characters in this poem? What are their names, and what is their relationship? Who is the “he” referred to in line 4 and the “him” in line 12? Who is the “she” referred to in line 14 and the “her” in line 16? Identify a passage in which the ambiguity of their identities results in multiple meanings. How does such ambiguity reinforce the poem’s central themes?
2. Who are the other characters in the poem? Who are the conformists, and who are the nonconformists? What seems to be the difference in how they lived their lives? Use specific lines as evidence.
3. The poem exemplifies Cummings’s experiments with syntax from its title onward. On first reading, a line such as “he sang his didn’t he danced his did” (l. 4) can seem daunting, even unintelligible. How would additional punctuation or emphasis (e.g., “He sang his didn’t; he danced his did”) alter your reading of the line? Select another dense or challenging passage from the poem and try standardizing the punctuation or syntax, explaining your sense of the passage’s meaning.
4. In the third stanza, which refers to the children growing up, the progression of the seasons begins with autumn. Why? Is the order of the seasons important in the first and last stanzas as well? Explain your response.
5. Discuss how the repeated phrase “with up so floating many bells down” mimics, through its unconventional syntax and word order, the image that it describes. Along with the repetition of the changing seasons, the poem contains many other images suggesting the passage of time. Which images most powerfully suggest change, aging, or other forms of transience? Which passages imply stasis?

On Living

NAZIM HIKMET

TRANSLATED BY RANDY BLASING AND MUTLU KONUK

Nazim Hikmet (1902–1963), Turkey’s most famous poet, was born in the westernmost city of the Ottoman Empire (now Thessaloníki, Greece). After attending secondary school in Istanbul, he studied economics and sociology at Oriental University in Moscow. Hikmet returned to Turkey in 1928 and began to publish poetry, drama, journalism, and fiction. His stay in the Soviet Union had deeply influenced both his work and his political beliefs; after his return to Turkey, Hikmet’s political activities—especially his vocal support of communism—led to his arrest for sedition in 1938, for which he was sentenced to twenty-eight years in prison. When he was released in 1950, he returned to the Soviet Union, where he continued to write until his death in 1963. He became known posthumously in the West for his book Things I Didn’t Know I Loved: Selected Poems of Nazim Hikmet, which was published in English in 1975. While versions of Hikmet’s selected poetry have been published in English, most of his books have not been translated from the Turkish. “On Living” was written from his prison cell in 1948.

I

Living is no laughing matter:
    you must live with great seriousness like a squirrel, for example—
I mean without looking for something beyond and above living, 5
I mean living must be your whole occupation.
Living is no laughing matter:
    you must take it seriously,
        so much so and to such a degree that, for example, your hands tied behind your back, 10 your back to the wall,
or else in a laboratory
    in your white coat and safety glasses, you can die for people—
even for people whose faces you've never seen, 15 even though you know living is the most real, the most beautiful thing.
I mean, you must take living so seriously that even at seventy, for example, you'll plant olive trees— 20
and not for your children, either, but because although you fear death you don't believe it,
because living, I mean, weighs heavier.

II

Let's say we're seriously ill, need surgery— 25 which is to say we might not get up from the white table.
Even though it's impossible not to feel sad about going a little too soon, we'll still laugh at the jokes being told, 30
we'll look out of the window to see if it's raining, or still wait anxiously for the latest newscast . . .
Let's say we're at the front—
    for something worth fighting for, say. 35
There, in the first offensive, on that very day,
    we might fall on our face, dead.
We'll know this with a curious anger,
    but we'll still worry ourselves to death about the outcome of the war, which could last years. 40

Let's say we're in prison and close to fifty,
 and we have eighteen more years, say,
                     before the iron doors will open.
 We'll still live with the outside, 45 with its people and animals, struggle and wind—
                     I mean with the outside beyond the walls.
 I mean, however and wherever we are,
                     we must live as if we will never die.

III

This earth will grow cold, 50
 a star among stars
                     and one of the smallest,
 a gilded mote on blue velvet—
                     I mean this, our great earth.
 This earth will grow cold one day, 55 not like a block of ice or a dead cloud even but like an empty walnut it will roll along in pitch-black space . . .
 you must grieve for this right now 60
 —you have to feel this sorrow now—for the world must be loved this much if you're going to say "I lived" . . .

[1948]

Exploring the Text

1. What is accomplished through the poem's many repetitions ("Living is no laughing matter," "I mean," "you must," "let's say")? Consider the poet's possible intentions in writing the poem, and the sound of the poem when read aloud.
2. Imagine "On Living" as a speech or monologue. How would you characterize the speaker? To whom is he giving this advice? What kind of response would he get? What are the three conjectured situations posited in section II of the poem? How effectively do these examples support the meaning of section I? Rereading the poem with these strategies in mind, why do you think the speaker offers so many examples to support his point?
3. How do you understand the "seriousness" that Hikmet is, in essence, attempting to redefine in the first section? Why, for instance, would Hikmet choose a squirrel as the vehicle for a simile about seriousness in lines 2 and 3? What is the basic irony underlying section I of the poem? Can you think of an image or example from your own experience that would fit his description?

4. Hikmet spent many years of his life either in prison or in exile. How does this knowledge affect your understanding of the imagery in section II? How does it impact your experience of the poem as a whole?
5. How would you characterize the progression of images (or types of images) from the first stanza to the last? How does this shift relate to the poem's themes? What do you make of the poem's equation of love with grieving in the final stanza? Do you find this vision optimistic or pessimistic? What do you think the poet wishes to affirm or deny with this definition? How would you compare the speaker's voice in this poem to that of "Do not go gentle into that good night" below?

Do not go gentle into that good night

DYLAN THOMAS

Dylan Thomas (1914–1953) was born in Wales, spent much of his life in London, and gained a following in the United States, where he often lectured and gave readings. He wrote his first volume of poetry when he was only twenty and published steadily throughout his lifetime. His works include The Map of Love (1939); Portrait of the Artist as a Young Dog (1940); Deaths and Entrances (1946); In Country Sleep (1952); and the posthumous Under Milk Wood: A Play for Voices (1954), which features characters from the fictional Welsh fishing village of Llareggub. During World War II, Thomas wrote scripts for documentary films, and after the war he was a literary commentator for BBC radio. He died in New York City at the age of thirty-nine of complications from alcoholism. Thomas was a popular and flamboyant figure, known for his spirited readings—especially his famous reading of "Do not go gentle into that good night," a poem addressed to his dying father.

Do not go gentle into that good night,
Old age should burn and rave at close of day;
Rage, rage against the dying of the light.

Though wise men at their end know dark is right,
Because their words had forked no lightning they      5
Do not go gentle into that good night.

Good men, the last wave by, crying how bright
Their frail deeds might have danced in a green bay,
Rage, rage against the dying of the light.

Wild men who caught and sang the sun in flight,      10
And learn, too late, they grieved it on its way,
Do not go gentle into that good night.

Grave men, near death, who see with blinding sight
 Blind eyes could blaze like meteors and be gay,
 Rage, rage against the dying of the light.

15

And you, my father, there on the sad height,
 Curse, bless, me now with your fierce tears, I pray.
 Do not go gentle into that good night.
 Rage, rage against the dying of the light.

[1952]

Exploring the Text

1. Much of the power of a villanelle, the form in which this poem is composed, resides in its repeated lines and their subtly shifting meaning over the course of the piece. How do Thomas's repeated lines change from stanza to stanza? You may consider theme, mood, imagery, and even grammatical structure to support your answer.
2. How do you interpret the images of natural forces that Thomas connects to the men described in the middle stanzas? Choose a stanza and explain how the particular metaphor develops the poem's themes.
3. Discuss the recurring images of light and darkness in the poem. What multiple meanings might these motifs convey? Explain, focusing on a specific passage or set of images.
4. Do you think the speaker's urgings are more for his father's benefit or for his own? How do you think the argument aids or harms them in dealing with the father's impending mortality?
5. Stanzas 2 through 5 are about "wise men," "good men," "wild men," and "grave men." How do they differ from one another in their response to death?
6. Thomas withholds the identity of the poem's subject until the final stanza. Why?
7. The rebellion embodied in the poem is not directed against any human authority or tradition but against death itself. Are there aspects of life that the speaker rejects as well in making his argument? Support your answer using specific passages from the text.

Her Kind

ANNE SEXTON

Anne Sexton (1928–1974) was one of the most celebrated confessional poets to emerge in America during the 1960s and 1970s. Born in Newton, Massachusetts, she struggled through a childhood marked by family discord and, by some accounts, periodic abuse. Sexton grappled with depression and suicidal urges for much of her adult life. In 1957, at the suggestion of her therapist, she began attending meetings of poetry groups in Boston, where she met such poets as Robert Lowell, Maxine Kumin, and Sylvia Plath. Her work progressed very rapidly, and her first volume of poetry, To Bedlam and Part Way Back (1960), was published only a few years afterward. Her subsequent work gained considerable acclaim and a number of awards, culminating in the Pulitzer Prize for Live or Die (1967). Though much criticism of Sexton's poetry revolves around her mental illness and eventual suicide, the body of her work comprises a much broader range, including Transformations (1971), a collection of prose poems reimagining the Grimm brothers' fairy tales. "Her Kind," from To Bedlam and Part Way Back, is a daring experiment in point of view, exploring images of women as outcasts.

I have gone out, a possessed witch,
haunting the black air, braver at night;
dreaming evil, I have done my hitch
over the plain houses, light by light:
lonely thing, twelve-fingered, out of mind. 5
A woman like that is not a woman, quite.
I have been her kind.

I have found the warm caves in the woods, filled them with skillets, carvings, shelves, closets, silks, innumerable goods; 10
fixed the suppers for the worms and the elves:
whining, rearranging the disaligned.
A woman like that is misunderstood.
I have been her kind.

I have ridden in your cart, driver, 15 waved my nude arms at villages going by, learning the last bright routes, survivor where your flames still bite my thigh and my ribs crack where your wheels wind.
A woman like that is not ashamed to die. 20
I have been her kind.

Exploring the Text

1. How would you characterize the speaker? Is the "I" referred to the same throughout the poem? Explain.
2. What is the speaker's attitude toward the "witch" in the opening lines? What particular descriptions seem the most sympathetic or unsympathetic?
3. Trace the point of view throughout this poem. Where does it shift? What perspectives are we offered?

4. Reading the poem in the context of this chapter's theme, what is the speaker—as well as the “kinds” of women with whom she identifies—rebelling against? What or whom do you think the speaker would identify with the notion of conformity?
5. This poem is rich in imagery. Analyze how the patterns of imagery in the first stanza relate to the meaning. How and why does the imagery shift in the third stanza?
6. Compare the scene described in lines 8–12 with that described in “Sonnet: The Ladies’ Home Journal” (p. 931). What parallels do you find? How do the poems differ?

Booker T. and W.E.B.

DUDLEY RANDALL

Born in Washington, D.C., Dudley Randall (1914–2000) was an editor, a publisher, and a poet. After returning from a Pacific tour of duty in World War II, Randall worked his way through a degree in English from Wayne University and a master's in library science from the University of Michigan, supporting himself as a postal worker. Randall is best known for his poem "The Ballad of Birmingham," written in response to the racially motivated 1963 bombing of a church in Birmingham, Alabama. In 1965, Randall founded Broadside Press, which published poems by African American writers. He served as librarian and poet-in-residence at the University of Detroit from 1969 until his retirement in 1974. Among his published books are Cities Burning (1968), More to Remember (1971), and After the Killing (1973). He also translated Latin, French, and Russian poems into English. One of his most well-known poems, "Booker T. and W.E.B.," contrasts the political views of two historical figures who were famously at odds: Booker T. Washington and W. E. B. DuBois.

“It seems to me,” said Booker T.,
 “It shows a mighty lot of cheek
 To study chemistry and Greek
 When Mister Charlie needs a hand
 To hoe the cotton on his land,
 And when Miss Ann looks for a cook,
 Why stick your nose inside a book?”

"I don't agree," said W.E.B.,
 "If I should have the drive to seek
 Knowledge of chemistry or Greek,
 I'll do it. Charles and Miss can look
 Another place for hand or cook.
 Some men rejoice in skill of hand,
 And some in cultivating land,

But there are others who maintain
The right to cultivate the brain.” 15

“It seems to me,” said Booker T.,
“That all you folks have missed the boat
Who shout about the right to vote,
And spend vain days and sleepless nights 20
In uproar over civil rights.
Just keep your mouths shut, do not grouse,
But work, and save, and buy a house.”

“I don’t agree,” said W.E.B.,
“For what can property avail 25
If dignity and justice fail.
Unless you help to make the laws,
They’ll steal your house with trumped-up clause.
A rope’s as tight, a fire as hot,
No matter how much cash you’ve got. 30
Speak soft, and try your little plan,
But as for me, I’ll be a man.”

“It seems to me,” said Booker T.—

“I don’t agree,”
Said W.E.B. 35

Exploring the Text

1. How do the repeated opening statements (“It seems to me” and “I don’t agree”) of the characters anticipate their positions?
2. “Booker T. and W.E.B.” deals specifically with the disagreement among civil rights leaders in the early to mid-twentieth century about how best to secure dignity, prosperity, and social justice for African Americans in America. Its basic conflict, however, is more universal. How would you characterize this essential clash of philosophies?
3. Given the grave nature of the subject matter, the simplicity of the poem’s structure and style may be surprising. Does the simple rhyme scheme and singsong rhythm fit the poem? Why or why not?
4. In the fourth stanza, W.E.B. makes the argument that financial prosperity (or, more broadly, capitalism) is meaningless without individual liberty. How do you think this conviction would be viewed today?
5. Which character in the poem do you consider to be the nonconformist? How would your answer change depending on where you imagined the debate taking place, who was listening, and under what circumstances?

Sonnet: The Ladies' Home Journal

SANDRA GILBERT

Born in 1936 in New York City, poet and critic Sandra Gilbert was educated at Cornell University, New York University, and Columbia University, where she received her PhD in 1968. Her most famous piece of writing is The Madwoman in the Attic: The Woman Writer and the Nineteenth-Century Literary Imagination (1979), a highly influential work of feminist literary criticism that she wrote with Susan Gubar. She has published several collections of poetry, including Emily's Bread (1984) and Belongings (1995), as well as Wrongful Death: A Medical Tragedy (1995), a memoir about her late husband. Gilbert has received fellowships from the Guggenheim Foundation, the National Endowment for the Humanities, and the Rockefeller Foundation, among others. She is currently a professor of English at the University of California, Davis, and was named "Woman of the Year" by Ms. magazine in 1986. "Sonnet: The Ladies' Home Journal" is from Emily's Bread. The Ladies' Home Journal, one of the oldest magazines in the United States, covers such topics as women's health, beauty, celebrity news, and recipes.

The brilliant stills of food, the cozy glossy, bygone life—mashed potatoes posing as whipped cream, a neat mom conjuring shapes from chaos, trimming the flame—how we ached for all that, 5 that dance of love in the living room, those paneled walls, that kitchen golden as the inside of a seed: how we leaned on those shiny columns of advice, stroking the thank yous, the firm thighs, the wise 10
closets full of soap.

But even then we knew it was the lies we loved, the lies we wore like Dior coats, the clean-cut airtight lies that laid out our lives in black and white.

[1984]

Exploring the Text

1. What is the speaker's attitude toward the Ladies' Home Journal? How can you tell?
2. The scene Gilbert describes in the bulk of the poem is, on the surface, serene. Note the adjectives she uses throughout, such as brilliant, cozy, glossy, neat, golden, firm, wise, clean-cut, and airtight. What is the effect of such language? What techniques does the poet use to undercut this idyllic image?

3. Consider the pictures described in lines 1 through 8 and the ambiguity created by the diction in lines 8–9: “how we leaned / on those shiny columns of advice.” What are those images meant to evoke for readers of the magazine? Are there early hints that they might present a false or hollow representation? Explain.
4. This poem is called a sonnet, but other than the requisite fourteen lines, it conforms to very few of the sonnet’s characteristics—until the end, that is. Why did Gilbert write it this way?
5. In a certain sense, this poem deals with the power of (false) advertising. Can you think of an advertisement that comprised an image or idea that seemed appealing, but on examination proved to be false or misleading? How did the ad achieve its appeal? Compare this effect with the one described in the poem.

Homage to My Hips

LUCILLE CLIFTON

Lucille Clifton (1936–2010) was born in Depew, New York, and graduated from the State University of New York at Fredonia in 1955. Her first book, the poetry collection Good Times, was named by the New York Times as one of the Ten Best Books of 1969. Clifton was a visiting writer at Columbia University’s School of the Arts and at George Washington University, and taught literature and creative writing at both the University of California at Santa Cruz and St. Mary’s College of Maryland. In 1979, she was named Maryland’s poet laureate. Her other books of poetry include Quilting: Poems 1987–1990 (1991) and The Terrible Stories (1996). Clifton also wrote more than twenty books for children, including My Friend Jacob (1980) and Three Wishes (1992). The following poem, “Homage to My Hips,” typifies the feminist celebration of the female body that runs through Clifton’s most famous work.

these hips are big hips.
 they need space to move around in.
 they don’t fit into little petty places. these hips 5 are free hips.
 they don’t like to be held back.
 these hips have never been enslaved, they go where they want to go they do what they want to do. 10 these hips are mighty hips.
 these hips are magic hips.

i have known them
to put a spell on a man and spin him like a top!

Exploring the Text

1. How would you characterize the speaker of the poem? How does she wish to be viewed? Who is her intended audience?
2. What other elements of the speaker's identity might she be extolling through her celebration of her hips? Choose a specific passage, and explain how the particular description might apply to a larger context of selfhood or personality.
3. What is the speaker rebelling against? Use specific passages to support your answer.
4. In the body of this very short poem, Clifton uses the word "hips" nine times—sometimes twice in one line. She also begins most lines with the word "they" or "these." Why does she use so much repetition, and how does this choice impact the poem's meaning and overall effect?
5. Why might the lines break where they do, and how does the poem's shape contribute to its meaning? Why do you think Clifton uses no capital letters in the poem?

Is About

ALLEN GINSBERG

Allen Ginsberg (1926–1997) was born in Newark, New Jersey. As a teenager, he began to read Walt Whitman, who, along with William Carlos Williams and William Blake, exerted an enormous influence on his writing. Ginsberg went to Columbia University on a scholarship to study law but changed his major to English. He became a major voice in the Beat movement, which included poets Gregory Corso and Lawrence Ferlinghetti, and novelists William S. Burroughs and Jack Kerouac, author of On the Road (1957). Ginsberg led a varied, unconventional life: he worked as a dishwasher, welder, and university professor; he was arrested several times for political protests; he spent time in a psychiatric institution; and he toured with Bob Dylan's band. Ginsberg's work is notable for its free expression and rejection of conformity and materialism. Howl (1955) created intense interest and controversy for both its style and its content. In 1957, the poem's publisher was charged with obscenity; however, the case was thrown out when the presiding judge ruled that Howl was of "redeeming social consequence." Ginsberg's other works include Kaddish and Other Poems (1961), which many regard as his finest, and the mixed-genre collection The Fall of America, which won a National Book Award in 1973. Collected Poems 1947–1980 was published in 1984. "Is About," a poem that explains it all in quintessential Beat style, was first published in the New Yorker.

Exploring the Text

1. “Is About” is, in a sense, a definition poem. Which definition seems most persuasive to you? How do you think the poem defines the title itself?
2. From among the characters who populate the poem (Dylan, Beethoven, the Pope, Poe, Buddha, Hitler, Stalin, Roosevelt, Churchill, and Shelley), select one you know well. Is the reference accurate, as you see it? How does it contribute to the meaning or effect of the poem?
3. What techniques does Ginsberg employ to affect the tempo of each line? Consider line length, punctuation, and the sound of the words. How does the resulting pace inform your understanding of the poet’s intentions or mood? Identify a list or a series of images or concepts in the poem that you find particularly striking. How does the juxtaposition of items in this list or series develop tension or resonance within the poem?
4. How does the element of surprise function in the poem? Identify an unexpected association or definition that particularly affected your reading or understanding of the speaker’s intentions or ideas.
5. How would you describe the tone of the poem? How does Ginsberg create that tone?
6. How would you answer the last two questions of the poem (ll. 23–24)?
7. If asked, what would you say “Is About” is about?

CAROL ANN DUFFY

The first woman to be named poet laureate of England, Carol Ann Duffy was born to Irish Catholic parents in Glasgow, Scotland, in 1955. She grew up in England, earning a degree in philosophy in 1977, and published her first collection of poetry in 1985. Mean Time won the Whitbread Poetry Award in 1990, and Rapture won the T. S. Eliot Prize in 2005. Duffy has also edited many anthologies and written books for children, including The Oldest Girl in the World (2000) and The Hat (2007). Her work continues to be very popular; in fact, in 2005 the Guardian called her “the most popular living poet in Britain.” She is currently the creative director of the Writing School at Manchester Metropolitan University. “Penelope” is from The World’s Wife, Duffy’s 1999 collection based on stories from history and mythology but written in the voice of the women behind the men. Penelope is Odysseus’s wife in Homer’s Odyssey.

At first, I looked along the road hoping to see him saunter home among the olive trees,
 a whistle for the dog who mourned him with his warm head on my knees.      5
 Six months of this and then I noticed that whole days had passed without my noticing.

I sorted cloth and scissors, needle, thread, thinking to amuse myself, 10

but found a lifetime's industry instead.

I sewed a girl

under a single star—cross-stitch, silver silk—running after childhood's bouncing ball.

I chose between three greens for the grass; 15

a smoky pink, a shadow's grey to show a snapdragon gargling a bee.

I threaded walnut brown for a tree,

my thimble like an acorn pushing up through umber soil. 20

Beneath the shade

I wrapped a maiden in a deep embrace with heroism's boy

and lost myself completely in a wild embroidery of love, lust, loss, lessons learnt; 25

then watched him sail away into the loose gold stitching of the sun.

And when the others came to take his place,
disturb my peace,

I played for time. 30

I wore a widow's face, kept my head down,

did my work by day, at night unpicked it.

I knew which hour of the dark the moon would start to fray,

I stitched it. 35

Grey threads and brown

pursued my needle's leaping fish to form a river that would never reach the sea.

I tricked it. I was picking out the smile of a woman at the centre 40 of this world, self-contained, absorbed, content, most certainly not waiting,

when I heard a far-too-late familiar tread outside the door.

I licked my scarlet thread and aimed it surely at the middle of the needle's eye once more. 45

Exploring the Text

1. How does the speaker of the poem characterize herself in the first stanza? How is her missing husband, Odysseus, characterized?
2. What changes in the speaker's attitude in the second stanza?
3. How does figurative language contribute to the poem's meaning? Consider the effects of the simile that begins on line 19 and the metaphor developed in lines 21–27. How literal or figurative is her “embroidery”? Is she depicting the world she's living in? Is she creating a fictional world in which to live? Is she affecting the world itself? Explain with specific reference to the text.
4. Stanza 4 presents the suitors and Penelope's trick. How dependent on a reading of Homer's Odyssey is your understanding of this part of the poem? How dependent is the poem as a whole on that knowledge? If you are familiar with the Odyssey, how does this poem comment on and inform your reading of it?
5. Why is the “familiar tread” “far-too-late” (l. 43)?

PAIRED POEMS

An Epitaph

MATTHEW PRIOR

English poet and diplomat Matthew Prior (1664–1721) was born in Wimborne Minster, East Dorset. He earned his BA at St John's College, Cambridge, in 1686. He served England as under-secretary of state and as commissioner of trade, and became a member of Parliament in 1700. In 1713, he helped negotiate the Treaty of Utrecht, which became known as “Matt's Peace.” He also served as ambassador in Paris. After the death of Queen Anne, he returned to England, where he was impeached by the Whigs and imprisoned for two years. He continued to write in confinement, composing his most famous work, Alma; or, The Progress of the Mind. He is buried in Poets' Corner in Westminster Abbey. Today, Prior is remembered chiefly for his satires, of which “An Epitaph” is a prime example.

Interred beneath this marble stone
Lie sauntering Jack and idle Joan.
While rolling threescore years and one
Did round this globe their courses run;
If human things went ill or well;
If changing empires rose or fell;
The morning passed, the evening came,

And found this couple still the same.
 They walked and ate, good folks: what then?
 Why then they walked and ate again. 10
 They soundly slept the night away;
 They did just nothing all the day;
 And having buried children four,
 Would not take pains to try for more.
 Nor sister either had, nor brother: 15
 They seemed just tallied for each other.
 Their moral and economy
 Most perfectly they made agree:
 Each virtue kept its proper bound,
 Nor trespassed on the other's ground. 20
 Nor fame, nor censure they regarded:
 They neither punished, nor rewarded.
 He cared not what the footmen did;
 Her maids she neither praised, nor chid:
 So every servant took his course; 25
 And bad at first, they all grew worse.
 Slothful disorder filled his stable,
 And sluttish plenty decked her table.
 Their beer was strong; their wine was port;
 Their meal was large; their grace was short. 30
 They gave the poor the remnant-meat
 Just when it grew not fit to eat.
 They paid the church and parish rate,<sup>1</sup>
 And took, but read not the receipt;
 For which they claimed their Sunday's due 35
 Of slumbering in an upper pew.
 No man's defects sought they to know,
 So never made themselves a foe.
 No man's good deeds did they commend,
 So never raised themselves a friend. 40
 Nor cherished they relations poor:
 That might decrease their present store;
 Nor barn nor house did they repair:
 That might oblige their future heir.
 They neither added, nor confounded; 45
 They neither wanted, nor abounded.
 Each Christmas they accompts did clear;
 And wound their bottom<sup>2</sup> round the year.

<sup>2</sup>A ball of thread or yarn is sometimes called a bottom, here meaning they wrapped their affairs up tidily.—EDs.

Nor tear nor smile did they employ
 At news of public grief or joy. 50
 When bells were rung and bonfires made,
 If asked, they ne'er denied their aid;
 Their jug was to the ringers carried,
 Whoever either died, or married.
 Their billet<sup>3</sup> at the fire was found, 55
 Whoever was deposed, or crowned.
 Nor good, nor bad, nor fools, nor wise;
 They would not learn, nor could advise;
 Without love, hatred, joy, or fear,
 They led—a kind of—as it were; 60
 Nor wished, nor cared, nor laughed, nor cried;
 And so they lived; and so they died.

Exploring the Text

1. How are Jack and Joan characterized in the poem? What is meant by the couplet, “Their moral and economy / Most perfectly they made agree” (ll. 17–18)? What are the effects of their mildness toward others and their conformity as expressed in lines 19–32?
2. Consider the different meanings of the word “grace” in line 30. Where else in the poem are wealth or plenty placed at odds with spirituality?
3. Line 60 says, “They led—a kind of—as it were.” How might this line serve as a fitting summary of the poem? Explain.
4. What might have improved the lives of Jack and Joan?
5. “An Epitaph” is composed entirely of rhyming couplets with a steady rhythm. How does this form reinforce the themes of the poem?
6. This poem was written in part to satirize the landed gentry in early eighteenth-century England, as well as the conservative elected officials who supported them. How do you think the poem relates to the present day? If you were to imagine a contemporary Jack and Joan, how would you describe them?

The Unknown Citizen

W. H. AUDEN

Born in northern England to a doctor and a nurse, Wystan Hugh Auden (1907–1973) earned a scholarship to Oxford to study engineering. While there, he became interested in poetry—especially the modernist poetry of T. S. Eliot—and studied English instead. He was part of a group of poets known as the Oxford Group (and later, the Auden Generation), which included Stephen Spender and Louis MacNeice. During the 1930s, Auden traveled to Spain and China; became involved in political causes; and wrote prose, poetry, and plays. In 1939, Auden left England and became a United States citizen. Another Time (1940), the first book he wrote in America, contains some of his most famous poems, including "Musée des Beaux Arts." He won a Pulitzer Prize for The Age of Anxiety (1947) and a National Book Award for The Shield of Achilles (1955). "The Unknown Citizen" appears in his Collected Poems (1940).

(To JS/07 M 378
This Marble Monument Is Erected by the State)

He was found by the Bureau of Statistics to be
 One against whom there was no official complaint,
 And all the reports on his conduct agree
 That, in the modern sense of an old-fashioned word, he was a saint,
 For in everything he did he served the Greater Community. 5
 Except for the War till the day he retired,
 He worked in a factory and never got fired,
 But satisfied his employers, Fudge Motors Inc.
 Yet he wasn't a scab or odd in his views.
 For his Union reports that he paid his dues, 10
 (Our report on his Union shows it was sound)
 And our Social Psychology workers found
 That he was popular with his mates and liked a drink.
 The Press are convinced that he bought a paper every day
 And that his reactions to advertisements were normal in every way. 15
 Policies taken out in his name prove that he was fully insured,
 And his Health-card shows he was once in a hospital but left it cured.
 Both Producers Research and High-Grade Living declare
 He was fully sensible to the advantages of the Instalment Plan
 And had everything necessary to the Modern Man, 20
 A phonograph, a radio, a car and a frigidaire.
 Our researchers into Public Opinion are content
 That he held the proper opinions for the time of year;
 When there was peace, he was for peace: when there was war, he went.
 He was married and added five children to the population, 25
 Which our Eugenist says was the right number for a parent of his generation.
 And our teachers report that he never interfered with their education.
 Was he free? Was he happy? The question is absurd:
 Had anything been wrong, we should certainly have heard.

Exploring the Text

1. How do you interpret the modern definition of sainthood offered in line 4? How does the modern sense differ from the old-fashioned one?
2. Reread the poem, looking specifically for adjectives related to value judgments (i.e., good/bad, beautiful/ugly). How would you characterize the values Auden describes? What is missing from them?
3. What is suggested by the words “our” in lines 11, 12, 22, 26, and 27, and “we” in the final line of the poem?
4. Note the list of possessions given in line 21: “A phonograph, a radio, a car and a frigidaire.” What would that list consist of if the poem were written today?
5. Note that some of the lines of the poem run on as if they’re out of control; they seem too long. Why might the poet have chosen to write this way?
6. Do you find the poem humorous? Which is the most comical line? Which is the most ironic? Why?
7. What is Auden satirizing in this poem?

Focus on Comparison and Contrast

1. Compare and contrast the characters of Jack and Joan with the unknown citizen. What qualities do they share? What makes them different?
2. What is Prior’s attitude toward conformity and rebellion? What is Auden’s? Which attitude more nearly resembles your own? Support your position with textual evidence.
3. Prior’s poem was written about three hundred years ago; Auden’s, about seventy. While each speaks to its own time, they both seem highly relevant today. Which one feels more contemporary in style? Which one feels more current in content? Explain.

Writing Assignment

Write an essay that compares how Prior and Auden create mock elegies and epitaphs to satirize their subjects. As you write your essay, consider how each writer uses elements of style to achieve his purpose.

Book Covers for Hamlet

Hamlet has been published in so many editions by so many publishers that counting them would be a fool’s errand. For each edition, the publisher has to either design a new cover using existing art, or commission a piece specifically for that edition. The following images are from the Dover Thrift and Bantam Classic editions of Hamlet.

Exploring the Text

1. Note how very different each cover is from the other. Who are the characters depicted? What do the pictures share? What is different?
2. What is the central event in Hamlet suggested by each illustration? Identify the act and scene in the play that each picture best represents. Using direct evidence from the text of the play, explain the interpretation presented by each picture. Which one presents the more compelling and cogent interpretation of a major theme of the play as a whole?
3. Consider the old saying, “You can’t judge a book by its cover.” Is that true? How does that statement relate to these two covers? What expectations does each suggest for prospective readers? Does the play fulfill those expectations? Explain. Which cover do you prefer? If you were to walk into a bookstore and had to choose between the two (at the same price), which one would you buy? Why?

The Metamorphosis: Interpretations and Transformations

First published in 1915, The Metamorphosis by Franz Kafka has become a classic tale of modern life, in which conformity is alienating and dehumanizing, and even the mildest rebellion is threatening. Kafka’s fantastical story of the transformation of traveling salesman Gregor Samsa—his family’s meek breadwinner—into an insect has captured the imagination of generations of readers, and today we use the word Kafkaesque to describe a situation that is complex, surreal, disorienting, and thus menacing. Writer Vladimir Nabokov began his famous lecture on Kafka’s novella with this observation: “If Kafka’s The Metamorphosis strikes anyone as something more than an entomological fantasy, then I congratulate him on having joined the ranks of good and great readers.” Many critics, visual artists, and other writers have joined these ranks with interpretations and commentaries running the gamut from serious to playful. The following Conversation includes the full text of Kafka’s novella, originally written in German, along with letters from Kafka, and recent responses by “good and great readers,” who are, in this case, visual artists.

FRANZ KAFKA

TRANSLATED BY ALEXIS WALKER

Born in Prague, Czechoslovakia, to middle-class Jewish parents, Franz Kafka (1883–1924) spoke Czech in his childhood but studied in German-speaking schools. He graduated from the Charles-Ferdinand University in Prague with a law degree. Kafka was employed for many years at the Workers' Accident Insurance Institute, and he wrote after his working hours. He published The Metamorphosis (1915) and The Penal Colony (1919) during his lifetime. After his death from tuberculosis, three other novels were published, despite his request that the manuscripts be destroyed: The Trial (1925), The Castle (1926), and Amerika (1927).

I

When Gregor Samsa awoke in his bed one morning from unquiet dreams, he found himself transformed into an enormous insect.* He lay on a back as hard as armor and saw, when he raised his head slightly, a jutting brown underbelly divided into arching segments. The bedcovers could barely cover it; they threatened to slide off altogether. His many legs, pitifully thin in comparison with the rest of his bulk, fluttered helplessly before his eyes.

“What has happened to me?” he thought. It wasn’t a dream. His room—a decent enough room for a person, if slightly too small—lay quietly between the four familiar walls. Over the table on which was spread his unpacked collections of fabric samples—Samsa was a traveling salesman—hung the picture that he had recently cut out of an illustrated magazine and fit into an attractive gilt frame. The picture was of a woman clad in a fur hat and a fur stole; she sat upright and held out to the viewer a thick fur muff into which her entire forearm disappeared.

Gregor’s gaze then directed itself to the window. The dreary weather—one could hear raindrops hit the metal awning over the window—made him quite melancholy. "What if I slept a bit longer and forgot all this foolishness," he thought. But that was altogether impossible, because he was used to sleeping on his right side, and his current condition made working himself into this position impossible. No matter how vigorously he swung himself over to the right, he immediately rolled again onto his back. He tried what seemed hundreds of times, closing his eyes in order to avoid having to see his wriggling legs. He finally gave up only when he began to feel in his side a small dull ache that he had never felt before.

"Oh, God," he thought, "what a strenuous profession I've chosen—traveling day in, day out! The demands of business are far greater on the road than they are at the home office, and I'm burdened with the annoyances of travel besides: the worry about train connections; the irregular, bad meals; a social life limited to passing acquaintances who never become real friends. To hell with it!" He felt an itch on his belly, and he shoved himself back against the bedpost so he could lift his head more easily. He found the spot that itched: it was covered with small white dots that he couldn't identify. He went to touch the spot with one of his legs but drew it back immediately, because the touch made him shudder.

He slid back into his former position. "This early rising," he thought, "can make you into a complete idiot. A man needs his sleep. Other travelers live like women in a harem. When, for example, I go back to my hotel during the course of the morning to write up orders, these gentlemen are just sitting down to breakfast. I should try that with the Director: I'd be fired on the spot. Who knows, though—that might be good for me. If it weren't for my parents, I would have given notice long ago: I would have confronted the Director and given him a piece of my mind. He would have fallen off his chair! It's incredible the way he has of sitting perched at his reading desk and speaking from on high to employees who, on top of everything, have to draw very near owing to his slight deafness. Oh well, I shouldn't give up hope altogether: once I have the money to pay off my parents' debt—it should only be another five or six years—I'll definitely do it. Then I'll make my big break. In the meantime, I have to get up—my train leaves at five."

And he looked over at the alarm clock that ticked on the bureau. "God in heaven!" he thought. It was six-thirty, and the hands of the clock went quietly on; it was even later than six-thirty—it was closer to six-forty-five. Shouldn't the alarm have gone off? He could see from the bed that it was correctly set for four o'clock; it must have gone off. But was it possible to sleep peacefully through that furniture-rattling noise? Of course, he hadn't actually slept peacefully, but he had no doubt for that reason slept more deeply. But what should he do now? The next train left at seven o'clock. In order to catch that one, he'd have to rush like a madman, and his samples weren't packed up yet. He hardly felt alert or energetic enough. And even if he caught the train, he wouldn't avoid the Director's wrath, because the office porter had been waiting at the five-o'clock train and would long since have reported his failure to appear. The porter was completely under the Director's thumb—he had neither a backbone nor brains. What if Gregor were to report himself sick? But that would be highly awkward and suspicious, because he had not been sick once in five years of service. The Director would certainly come with the insurance doctor. He would reproach his parents for their lazy son and dismiss all rejoinders by referring them to the doctor, who considered all people completely healthy, but work-averse. And would he be so wrong in this case? Gregor actually felt completely fine, despite a fatigue completely unwarranted after such a long sleep. He even had a powerful appetite.

As he thought all this over hurriedly, without being able to decide whether to leave his bed—the clock had just struck six-forty-five—there was a knock on the door near the head of his bed. “Gregor,” he heard—it was his mother—“it’s a quarter to seven. Weren’t you going on a trip?” What a gentle voice! Gregor was terrified when he heard his answer. It was unmistakably in his old voice, but had mixed in, as if from down deep, an irrepressible, painful, squeaking noise, which allowed words to be heard clearly when first uttered, but as they resonated, distorted them to such an extent that they were difficult to understand. Gregor had wanted to answer in detail and explain everything, but in light of the circumstances he limited himself to saying: “Yes, yes, thanks, Mother, I’m getting up.” The wooden door seemed to make the change in Gregor’s voice imperceptible outside the room, because his mother was satisfied with his explanation and shuffled away. But through this brief exchange the other family members had become aware that Gregor was unexpectedly still at home, and his father was already knocking on one side door—lightly, but with his fist. “Gregor, Gregor,” he called, “What’s going on?” And after a short pause he urged again, with a deeper voice: Gregor! Gregor!” At the other side door, his sister fretted softly: “Gregor? Are you ill? Do you need something?” To both sides, Gregor answered, “I’m just about ready to go,” and he made an effort to ban anything conspicuous from his voice by the most painstaking enunciation and by inserting long pauses between individual words. His father returned to his breakfast, but his sister whispered: “Gregor, open up, I beg you.” Gregor had no intention of opening the door, however—instead he gave thanks for his habitual precaution, born of much travel, of locking all doors during the night, even at home.

First he wanted to get up, quietly and undisturbed, get dressed, and above all eat breakfast—only then did he want to think over what came next, because he could see that he would come to no reasonable conclusions as long as he lay in bed. In the past he had often felt one mild pain or another while lying in bed, possibly from lying in an awkward position, that proved to be sheer imagination once he got up. He was eager to see how today’s fantasies would gradually resolve themselves. He didn’t doubt in the least that the change in his voice was nothing more than the harbinger of a hearty cold, one of the occupational hazards of traveling salesmen.

Throwing off the covers was perfectly simple: he only needed to puff himself up a bit and they fell off on their own. But doing more than that was difficult, especially because he was so strangely broad. He would normally have used his arms and hands to get up; now, he had only the many little legs which were continuously moving in every direction and which he could not seem to control. If he meant to bend one, it would be the first one to stretch itself out, if he finally succeeded in enforcing his will with one leg, all the rest of them worked furiously, as if liberated, in extreme, painful agitation. “You can’t just lie here in bed doing nothing,” Gregor said to himself.

At first he intended to get out of the bed with the lower part of his body foremost, but this lower part, which he had moreover not yet seen and of which he could not form a proper mental image, proved too difficult to move. It went extremely slowly. When, nearly frantic, he finally gathered his strength and recklessly shoved himself forward, he misjudged the direction and violently struck the lower bed post. The burning pain he felt convinced him that the lower part of his body was at least at the moment the most sensitive part.

He afterwards attempted to get his upper body out of bed and carefully turned his head towards the edge of the bed. This he could do easily, and in spite of its bulk and weight, the mass of his body finally slowly followed the direction of his head. But when he held his head at last free of the bed, he became afraid to shift further in this direction, because if he ultimately let himself fall like that, it would be a miracle if his head were not injured. And now, of all times, he could not afford to lose consciousness; he would rather remain in bed.

After continued effort, however, he found himself lying exactly as before, and heaved a sigh. He saw his little legs struggling against one another even more furiously, if that were possible, and he saw no way of introducing calm and order to this anarchy. At this point he repeated to himself that he could not possibly lie in bed any longer and that it would be most sensible to risk everything, even if there were only the smallest hope of thereby freeing himself from bed. At the same time, however, he kept reminding himself that calm deliberation was always better than rash decision-making. All the while he tried hard to focus on the view from the window, but unfortunately there was little encouragement or cheer to gain from the sight of the morning fog, which shrouded even the opposite side of the narrow street. "Already seven o'clock," he said to himself with the latest striking of the alarm clock, "already seven o'clock and still such fog." And he lay quiet a short while, breathing shallowly, as if he thought complete stillness might restore things to their true and natural state.

After a bit, however, he said to himself, "Before it strikes seven-fifteen, I must without fail be completely out of bed. For one thing, someone from the company will have come by then to inquire after me, because the office opens before seven." And he concentrated his efforts toward swinging his entire body out of the bed all at the same time. If he let himself fall out of bed in this manner, his head, which he would raise sharply during the fall, would presumably remain uninjured. His back seemed to be hard; nothing would happen to it in the fall onto the carpet. His greatest source of misgiving was anticipation of the loud crash that would follow, which would probably arouse anxiety, if not terror, beyond the doors. That would have to be risked, however.

When, by rocking back and forth, Gregor moved halfway off of the bed—the new method was more a game than an exertion—it occurred to him how simple everything would be if someone would come help him. Two strong people—he thought of his father and the servant girl—would be more than adequate. They would only have to shove their arms under his domed back, pry him up out of bed, prop up his bulk by crouching low, and then help him complete the turn over onto the floor, where hopefully his little legs would gain some sense of purpose. Quite apart from the fact that the doors were locked, though, should he really call for help? In spite of his predicament he couldn't suppress a smile at the thought.

He was already so far along that he could hardly maintain his balance when he rocked forcefully. Very soon he would have to make a final decision, because in five minutes it would be seven-fifteen. Just then the front doorbell rang. "That's someone from the company," he said to himself and virtually froze, though his little legs only danced more hurriedly. Everything remained quiet for a moment. "They're not opening the door," Gregor said to himself, momentarily carried away by some absurd hope. But then, naturally, as always, the servant girl directed her firm step to the door and opened it. Gregor needed to hear only the first word of greeting from the visitor and he already knew who it was—the Deputy Director himself. Why was Gregor condemned to work at a company where the least infraction immediately attracted the greatest suspicion? Were all employees then without exception scoundrels; were there among them no loyal, devoted individuals who, when they had merely missed a few morning hours of service, would become so tormented by pangs of conscience that they would be frankly unable to leave their beds? Wouldn't it really have been enough to send an apprentice to inquire—if indeed this inquiry were necessary at all? Did the Deputy Director himself have to come, thereby showing the entire innocent family that the investigation of this suspicious situation could only be entrusted to the Deputy Director himself? And more as a result of the agitation into which this line of thought transported Gregor, than as a result of a proper decision, he swung himself with all his might out of the bed. There was a loud thump, but no actual crash. The fall was muffled a bit by the carpet, and his back was more elastic than Gregor had thought—these things accounted for the fairly inconspicuous dull thump. He had failed only to raise his head carefully enough and had struck it. He twisted it back and forth and rubbed it into the carpet out of anger and pain.

"Something happened inside there," said the Deputy Director in the room to the left. Gregor tried to imagine something similar to what had happened to him today happening to the Deputy Director; it really was possible, after all. But as if in cruel response to this question the Deputy Director took a few decisive steps in the next room, making his patent leather boots creak. From the room to the right Gregor's sister whispered to inform him: "Gregor, the Deputy Director is here." "I know," said Gregor to himself; but he did not dare to raise his voice loud enough for his sister to hear.

"Gregor," his father now said from the room to the left, "the Deputy Director has come and inquires as to why you did not leave with the early morning train. We don't know what we should say to him. Furthermore, he wants to speak to you directly. So please open the door. He will surely have the goodness to excuse the disorder of your room." "Good morning, Mr. Samsa," the Deputy Director called out at the same time in a friendly manner. "He is not well," his mother said to the Deputy Director, while his father still spoke at the door, "he is not well, believe me, sir. Why would Gregor otherwise miss a train? The boy has nothing in his head but the company. I almost worry that he never goes out at night; he has been in the city eight days now, but he was at home every night. He sits with us at the table and quietly reads the newspaper or studies train schedules. Busying himself with woodworking is as far as he goes in the way of amusement. In the course of two, three evenings, for example, he cut himself a small frame; you would be astounded at how pretty it is. It's hanging in his room; you will see it right away, when Gregor opens up. I am happy, in any case, that you're here, Deputy Director. We could not have persuaded Gregor to open the door alone; he is so stubborn; and there's certainly something wrong with him, although he denied it this morning." "I'm coming right away," said Gregor slowly and carefully, while not moving at all, in order not to miss a word of the conversation. "Otherwise, dear woman, I can't explain it myself, either," said the Deputy Director. "Hopefully it's nothing serious. Though I must say, that we businessmen—either fortunately or unfortunately, as you will—must often ignore a trivial indisposition in the interest of business." "So can the Deputy Director come in to see you?" asked his impatient father, knocking again at the door. "No," said Gregor. In the room to the left there arose an awkward silence; in the room to the right, his sister began sobbing.

Why didn't his sister join the others? She had most likely just now arisen from bed and had not yet begun to get dressed. And why was she crying? Because he did not stand up and let the Deputy Director in; because he was in danger of losing his position and because the Director would then persecute his parents with the old demands? Those were unnecessary worries, for the time being. Gregor was still here and did not in the least contemplate leaving his family. At the moment he was lying on the carpet, and no one who was aware of his condition would seriously request that he let the Deputy Director in. Gregor could not possibly be dismissed just for this minor breach of politeness; he could easily find a suitable excuse later. And it seemed to Gregor far more reasonable to leave him in peace now, instead of disturbing him with tears and entreaties. But it was the uncertainty of it all that distressed the others and so excused their behavior.

"Mr. Samsa," the Deputy Director now called in a raised voice, "what's the matter? You barricade yourself there in your room, answer merely with yes and no, burden your parents with profound, unnecessary worries and—this only mentioned incidentally—neglect your business responsibilities in an unheard-of way. I speak here in the name of your parents and your Director and earnestly request of you an immediate, clear explanation. I am amazed; I am amazed. I thought I knew you as a quiet, reasonable person, and now you suddenly begin to exhibit extraordinary capriciousness. The Director told me early this morning of a possible explanation for your dereliction—it related to the cash account recently entrusted to you—but I actually almost gave him my word of honor that this explanation could not be accurate. Now, however, I see your incomprehensible stubbornness here, and I lose any desire to vouch for you in the least. And your position is not the most secure. I originally had the intention of saying all of this just between the two of us, but since you force me to waste my time here needlessly, I don't know why your parents should not also hear it. Your performance recently has been very unsatisfying. It is not the time of the year, of course, to do extraordinary business, we recognize that; but there is no time of year in which to do no business, Mr. Samsa—there cannot be."

"But, sir," called out Gregor, beside himself, forgetting everything else in his agitation, "I'll open up immediately, this instant. A mild indisposition — an attack of dizziness — has kept me from getting up. I'm still lying in bed. I'm completely recovered now, though. I'm climbing out of bed right now. Just one moment of patience! I thought things were not quite back to normal yet. But I'm already well again. How it can suddenly come over a person! I was fine yesterday evening, my parents know that, or perhaps I should say that yesterday evening I had a slight premonition of it. It must have been easy to see in me. Why didn't I report it to the office yesterday! But one always thinks that one can ride out illness without having to stay home. Sir! Spare my parents! There is no basis for all the reproaches you've made against me; no one said anything about them to me before now. Perhaps you haven't seen the latest orders that I sent in. In any case, I will be starting my trip on the eight o'clock train. These few hours of rest have strengthened me. Don't let me hold you up, though, sir; I'll soon be in the office myself, and please have the goodness to say so, and to send my greetings to the Director."

And while Gregor hurriedly blurted all this out, hardly knowing what he said, he moved effortlessly closer to the chest, thanks to the practice he had had in bed, and attempted to raise himself against it to an upright position. He actually wanted to open the door, actually wanted to let them see him and to speak with the Deputy Director. He was eager to know what they all would say to him when they finally saw him, after so much urging. Would they be afraid? If so, Gregor would be absolved of responsibility and could relax. If they took it all in stride, however, then, too, he would have no cause for worry, and he really could be at the train station at eight, if he hurried. At first he simply slid a few times down the side of the slippery chest; finally, however, he gave himself one last swing and stood upright. He ignored the pain in his lower body, despite the fact that it burned. Now he let himself fall against the back of a nearby chair and held tight to its sides with his legs. This helped him regain his self-control, and he stayed quiet, so that he could hear the Deputy Director speak.

"Did you understand one word?" the Deputy Director asked his parents. "Surely he's making fun of us?" "For God's sake," cried his mother in the midst of tears, "he might be seriously ill, and we're all plaguing him. Grete! Grete!" she then screamed. "Mother?" called his sister from the other side. They were communicating through Gregor's room. "You must go fetch the doctor this minute. Gregor is ill. Quickly, to the doctor. Did you hear Gregor speak just now?" "That was the voice of an animal," said the Deputy Director, noticeably quiet, by contrast with the screaming of his mother. "Anna! Anna!" called his father towards the kitchen, clapping his hands, "Get a locksmith immediately!" And the two girls ran, their skirts rustling, through the foyer — how had his sister gotten dressed so quickly? — and flung the apartment door open. There was no noise of the door slamming; they had probably left it open, as was usual in apartments where some great misfortune had occurred.

Gregor had become much calmer, however. It was true that they didn't understand his speech, but it sounded clear enough to him, clearer than previously, perhaps because his ear had adjusted to it. But they did still believe that something was wrong with him, and they were prepared to help him. He was pleased by the confidence and certainty with which the first arrangements had been made. He felt drawn once again into the circle of humanity and expected great things from both the doctor and the locksmith, without really making a distinction between them. In order to develop the clearest possible voice for the decisive discussions to come, he coughed a bit, although he tried to do this in a muted fashion, because this, too, might sound very different from a human cough—he no longer trusted himself to judge. It had now fallen completely silent in the next room. His parents might have been sitting at the table, whispering with the Deputy Director, or perhaps they were all pressed against the door, listening.

Using the chair, Gregor slowly shoved himself forward, and then let go, throwing himself against the door, and holding himself upright against it. The balls of his feet had some sticky substance on them. He took a moment to recover from the exertion. Then he applied himself to turning the key in the lock. Unfortunately, it seemed as if he had no real teeth—what then could he grip the key with?—but his jaws, on the other hand, were powerful. With their help he started to turn the key. He paid no attention to the fact that he obviously did some harm to himself in the process—a brown discharge came out from his mouth, flowing over the key and dripping on the floor. “Listen now,” said the Deputy Director in the next room, “he’s turning the key.” That encouraged Gregor greatly, but all of them should have cheered him on, his father and mother, too: “Come on, Gregor,” they should have called, “keep at it, keep working the lock!” And imagining that all his efforts were being watched with rapt attention, he recklessly bit down on the key with all his might. He danced around the lock, following the key as it turned; holding himself upright entirely with his mouth, he either pulled up on the key or forced it down with the full weight of his body, as necessary. The crisp click of the lock finally snapping back elated him. Breathing a sigh of relief he said to himself, “I didn’t even need the locksmith,” and he laid his head on the door handle, in order to open the door.

Because he had to open the door in this way, he was not yet visible even when it was opened wide. If he didn’t want to fall flat on his back just before his entrance into the next room, he would first have to slowly make his way around the open panel of the double door. He was still busy with this difficult maneuver and had not yet had a moment to think of the others, when he heard the Deputy Director force out a loud “Oh!” It sounded like a gust of wind. Now he could also see the Deputy, who was nearest the door—he pressed his hand to his open mouth and slowly shrank back, as if an invisible, irresistible force drove him. His mother—who stood, despite the presence of the Deputy Director, with her hair still loose, and sticking up in parts from her night’s sleep—first looked at his father with her hands clasped; then she walked two steps towards Gregor and sank to the ground in the midst of her billowing skirts, her face completely hidden, sunk upon her breast. His father balled his fist with a fierce expression, as if he wanted to knock Gregor back into his room; then he looked uncertainly around the living room, covered his eyes with his hands, and sobbed so that his powerful chest shook.

Gregor had not yet entered the outer room; instead, he leaned from within against the door panel that was still fastened, so that only half of his body and his head, craned to one side in order to see them, were visible. It had become much brighter outside in the meantime: one could clearly see a section of the endless, gray-black building—it was a hospital—that stood across the street, its severe, uniform windows breaking up its facade. The rain still fell, but only in large, singly visible and singly plummeting drops. The table teemed with breakfast dishes; his father considered breakfast the most important meal of the day, and he protracted it for hours reading various periodicals. On the wall just opposite hung a photograph of Gregor from his military days, which showed him dressed as a lieutenant, with a carefree smile, his hand on his dagger, his bearing and his uniform commanding respect. The door to the foyer was open, and because the door to the apartment was open as well, one could see the outer hall and the top of the staircase leading downwards.

“Now,” said Gregor—and he was well aware that he was the only one remaining calm—“I will just get dressed, pack my samples up, and be off. Will you all allow me to go? Deputy Director, you see that I’m not obstinate and that I want to work. Traveling is demanding, but I couldn’t live without it. Where do you intend to go now, Deputy Director? To the office? Yes? Will you report everything accurately? A person might be unable to work for a time, but it is precisely then that one must consider his past accomplishments and keep in mind that once the hindrance is past, he will certainly work even harder and more efficiently. I owe a great deal to the Director—you know that only too well. On the other hand, I have the care of my parents and sister. I’m in a fix, but I’ll work my way out again. But please don’t make it more difficult for me than it already is. Take my part in the office! I know the traveling salesmen aren’t popular. People think we earn a huge amount of money and lead grand lives. People just don’t have any particular reason to think this prejudice through carefully. You, however, Deputy Director, you have a better perspective on how things work than most of the staff—I might say, confidentially, a better perspective than even the Director himself, who, in his capacity as owner, can easily be misled in his judgment about an employee. You know very well that the traveling salesman, because he is away from the office the better part of the year, easily falls victim to gossip, to chance misfortune, and groundless complaints. It’s impossible for him to defend himself against these complaints, as he ordinarily learns nothing of them; it’s only when he comes home at the end of a trip completely exhausted that he feels the terrible consequences, whose origins he can’t divine, in his very body. Deputy Director, don’t leave without saying one word that shows me that you agree with me at least in part!”

But the Deputy Director had turned away at Gregor’s first words, and was staring back at Gregor over one twitching shoulder, his mouth agape. During Gregor’s speech he had not stood still for a moment, but, never taking his eyes off of Gregor, moved steadily but surreptitiously towards the door, as if there were some secret prohibition against leaving the room. He had already reached the foyer, and judging by the sudden movement with which he pulled his foot out of the room at his last step, one would have thought his sole was on fire. Once in the foyer, he stretched his hand out towards the staircase as if divine deliverance awaited him there.

Gregor realized that the Deputy Director could under no circumstances be allowed to leave this way, if his position at the company were not to be endangered.

His parents didn't understand this as well as he did. They had over the years persuaded themselves that he was guaranteed permanent employment in the company, and besides, they had so much to do in dealing with their own distress at the moment, that their foresight had vanished. But Gregor had this foresight. The Deputy Director must be detained, calmed, persuaded, and finally won over—the future of Gregor and his family depended on it. If only his sister were here! She was clever: she was already crying when Gregor was still calmly lying on his back. And the Deputy Director, that ladies' man, would surely have let her sway him: she would have closed the apartment door and talked him out of his fear in the foyer. But his sister was not there, so Gregor would have to handle it himself. And without thinking about the fact that he had no idea yet how well he could move, without thinking that his speech was possibly—well, very probably—incomprehensible, he let go of the door panel, forcing himself through the opening, and headed for the Deputy Director, who was already at the landing in the hall and hugging himself in a comical manner. With a small cry, scrambling in vain for something to hold on to, Gregor immediately fell down onto his many little legs. This had hardly happened, when for the first time that morning he felt a sense of physical well-being. His little legs had solid ground beneath them; they obeyed him completely, as he noted to his delight. They even strove to carry him where he wanted to go. Suddenly, he believed that the ultimate relief of all his suffering was at hand. But at that moment, as he lay on the floor trembling with suppressed energy, close to his mother and directly opposite her, she sprang up—she who had seemed so lost in thought—with her arms outstretched, her fingers splayed, and cried out: "Help, for God's sake, help!" She kept her head turned towards him, as if she wanted to be able to see him better, but, following a contradictory impulse, she ran heedlessly backwards, forgetting that the table full of dishes lay behind her. She quickly sat down when she reached it, as if absent-mindedly, seeming not to notice that next to her the coffeepot had been knocked over and coffee was streaming freely out onto the carpet.

"Mother, Mother," Gregor said softly, and looked up at her. The Deputy Director vanished from his mind momentarily, and he couldn't stop himself from snapping his jaws at the empty air several times at the sight of the flowing coffee. His mother began screaming again over this, fled from the table, and fell into the arms of his father, who was hurrying towards her. But Gregor had no time then for his parents. The Deputy Director was already on the stairs. His chin on the railing, he looked back one last time. Gregor took a running start, in order to have the best chance of catching up to him. The Deputy Director must have sensed something, as he sprang down several steps and then disappeared. "Ahh!" he screamed; it echoed throughout the entire stairwell.

Unfortunately, the flight of the Deputy Director seemed to have completely unhinged his father, who up until then had been relatively self-controlled. Instead of running after the Deputy Director or at least not restraining Gregor from pursuing him, with his right hand he grabbed the walking stick that the Deputy Director had left behind on an armchair together with his hat and coat; with his left hand he picked up a large newspaper from the table; then, stamping his feet, he began to drive Gregor back into his room by swatting at him with the stick and the newspaper. None of Gregor's pleas helped—none of his pleas were understood. The more submissively he bowed his head, the more vigorously his father stamped his feet. Across the room, despite the cool weather, his mother had thrown open a window and, leaning far out of the window, pressed her face into her hands. Between the street and the stairwell there arose a strong cross-draft: the window curtains flew up; the newspapers on the table rustled, and a few pages fluttered to the floor. His father drove him back mercilessly, spitting out hissing noises like a wild beast. Gregor, however, still was unpracticed in moving backwards, so he went very slowly. If he had only been allowed time to turn around, he would have gone immediately back into his room, but he was afraid of making his father impatient. At every moment the stick in his father's hand threatened to deal him a fatal blow to his back or head. Finally, however, Gregor found he had no choice, as he noted with terror that he seemed unable to keep going in the right direction when he moved backwards. He therefore began, with frequent side-glances at his father, to turn around as quickly as he could, which was actually very slowly. His father might have understood his good intentions, because he did not disturb him while he was doing this; in fact, he actually directed him here and there from a distance with the point of his stick. If only there weren't this unbearable hissing from his father! It unnerved Gregor completely. He was already almost completely turned around when, listening to his hissing, he made a mistake and turned a bit in the wrong direction. When he was finally, fortunately, headfirst at the opening of the door, it appeared that his body was too wide to go through without further ado. In his present state of mind it was naturally far from occurring to his father to open the other door panel in order to make a wide enough passageway for Gregor. He was obsessed merely with getting Gregor into his room as quickly as possible. He would never have allowed the preparations necessary for Gregor to raise himself up and possibly go through the door that way. Instead, making a great deal of noise, he drove Gregor forward as if there were no obstacle before him. The noise coming from behind Gregor didn't sound any longer like the voice of his father. It was clearly no laughing matter, so Gregor forced himself—happen what would—through the door. One side of his body was hoisted upwards. He lay crookedly in the doorway. One of his flanks was rubbed raw, and on the white door ugly smears remained behind. He was soon stuck fast, and couldn't move at all anymore. His little legs hung twitching on one side, and those on the other side were pressed painfully against the floor. Then his father liberated him with a powerful shove from behind, and he flew, bleeding heavily, a long way into his room. The door was slammed shut with the stick, and then it was finally quiet.

II

It was already twilight when Gregor awoke from a deep, dreamless sleep. He would not have arisen much later even without having been disturbed, for he felt well rested and no longer sleepy, but it seemed to him that he had been awakened by the sounds of a fleeting footstep and of the door to the foyer carefully being shut. The glare from the electric street lamp outside lay palely here and there on the ceiling of his room and on the upper surfaces of the furniture, but down by Gregor it was dark. He shoved himself slowly towards the door, awkwardly groping with the feelers he had just then come to appreciate, in order to see what had happened there. His left side seemed to be a single, long, unpleasantly taut scar, and he had to positively limp on his row of legs. One leg had been seriously injured during the events of the morning: it dragged limply behind him.

It was only when he was at the door that he realized what had actually lured him there: it was the smell of something edible. Standing there was a basin filled with fresh milk, swimming with small pieces of white bread. He could almost have laughed for joy, for he was even hungrier than he had been that morning. He immediately dunked his head in the milk nearly up to his eyes. But he soon pulled back, disappointed. It wasn't only that his tender left side made it hard for him to eat—for it seemed he was able to eat only if his entire panting body cooperated—it was rather that the milk, which had always been his favorite drink, and which his sister certainly placed here for that reason, didn't taste good to him at all. He turned away from the basin with something like revulsion and crept back into the middle of the room.

The gas lamps had been turned on in the living room, as Gregor saw through the crack in the door. Whereas ordinarily at this hour his father would read the afternoon paper out loud to his mother and sometimes to his sister, now there wasn't a sound. Perhaps the reading, which his sister had frequently told him and wrote him about, had lately dropped out of their routine. It was completely quiet, though the apartment was certainly not empty. "What a quiet life the family leads," Gregor said to himself and felt great pride, as he stared into the darkness before him, that he had been able to provide his parents and his sister with such a life, in such a nice apartment. But what if terror now drove away all quiet, all prosperity, all contentment? Rather than surrender to such thoughts, Gregor preferred to move about, so he crawled back and forth in the room.

Once during the long evening one of the side doors and later the other was opened a crack and then hastily shut again. Someone had probably needed to come in, but had then thought better of it. Gregor now stopped directly in front of the door to the living room, determined somehow to get the hesitant visitor to come in, or at least to find out who it was, but the doors were not opened again and Gregor waited in vain. Early on, when the doors were locked, everyone had wanted to come in; now, when he had unlocked one door and the others had clearly been unlocked during the day, no one came, and the keys had been moved to the outside.

It was late at night before the light in the living room was turned out, and it was now clear that his parents and sister had been awake until then, for all three could clearly be heard departing on tiptoes. Now surely no one would come to see Gregor until morning; he therefore had quite a while in which to consider undisturbed how he should newly arrange his life. But he was uneasy lying flat on the ground in the high-ceilinged open room. He did not know why this should be, for he had lived in the room for five years already. Half unconsciously, and not without some shame, he scurried under the sofa where, despite the fact that his back was a bit crushed and he could no longer lift his head, he immediately felt more comfortable, regretting only that his body was too broad to fit completely underneath.

He remained there the entire night. He spent part of it in a light sleep, out of which hunger kept jolting him awake, and part of it awake, consumed by worries and by vague hopes that all led to the same conclusion: that for the time being he should keep calm and, by exercising patience and the greatest consideration for his family, try to make bearable the unpleasantness that he would in his present condition inevitably cause them.

Early the next morning—it was nearly still night—Gregor had a chance to test the firmness of his resolve, for his sister, already half-dressed, opened the door leading from the foyer and looked tensely inside. She couldn't find him right away, but when she noticed him under the sofa—God, he had to be someplace, he couldn't have just flown away—she was so shocked that without being able to stop herself, she slammed the door shut again. But as if she regretted her behavior, she opened the door again immediately, and came inside on tiptoe, as if she were in the presence of someone severely ill, or even a complete stranger. Gregor shoved his head forward just to the edge of the sofa and watched her. He wondered whether she would notice that he had left the milk standing, though not from lack of hunger, and whether she would bring him some other food that suited him better. If she didn't do it on her own, he would rather starve than make her aware of it, although he felt a strong urge to shoot out from beneath the sofa, throw himself at her feet, and beg her for something good to eat. But his sister, with some amazement, right away noticed the still full basin: only a bit of milk had been spilled around its edges. She picked it up immediately, though with a rag, not with her bare hands, and took it away. Gregor was extremely curious to see what she would bring as a replacement and thought a great deal about it. He could never have guessed, however, what his sister in her goodness actually did. In order to test his preferences, she brought him an entire assortment of foods spread out on an old newspaper. There were old, half-rotten vegetables; bones from last night's meal, covered with congealed white sauce; a few raisins and almonds; a cheese that Gregor had declared inedible two days before; a piece of dry bread, a piece of bread smeared with butter, and a piece with butter and salt. Beside this she placed the basin that seemed now to be designated permanently for Gregor, which she had filled with water. And out of tact, because she knew Gregor would not eat in front of her, she departed hastily, even going so far as to turn the key in the lock, just so that Gregor would know that he could make himself as comfortable as he wanted. Gregor's legs quivered, now that the meal lay waiting. His wounds must moreover have completely healed. He felt no impairment now, and was astonished at this, thinking of how he had cut himself very slightly with a knife more than a month ago, and how the wound had still hurt him considerably the day before yesterday. "Am I less sensitive than before?" he wondered, and sucked greedily at the cheese, to which he had found himself urgently drawn, before everything else. In rapid succession, amidst tears of joy, he devoured the cheese, the vegetables, and the sauce. He didn't like the taste of the fresh foods, however—he couldn't even bear their smell, and dragged the foods that he wanted to eat a bit farther away. He had long since finished everything and lay lazily in the same spot when his sister slowly turned the key in the lock, as a sign that he should withdraw. That jolted him awake immediately, though he was almost dozing, and he hurried back under the sofa. But it took great self-control for him to remain under the sofa even for the brief time that his sister was in the room, for his body had swelled a bit with the ample meal, and he could hardly breathe in the narrow space. Half-suffocating, he looked out with slightly bulging eyes as his sister, who noticed nothing, swept up with a broom not just the remainder of the food Gregor had eaten, but also the food that he had not even touched, as if this were no longer useable. She put it all in a container that she closed with a wooden lid, and then carried everything out. She had hardly turned around when Gregor pulled himself out from under the sofa and exhaled.

In this way Gregor now received his daily meals: the first in the morning, while his parents and the servant girl still slept, and the second after the common midday meal, for his parents slept a bit afterwards, and his sister sent the serving girl away on one errand or another. It was not that the others wanted him to starve, but experiencing his meals at secondhand might have been all they could bear; or perhaps his sister simply wanted to spare them even this minor source of sorrow, since they were already suffering enough.

With what kinds of excuses they had managed to get the doctor and the locksmith out of the apartment the first morning, Gregor didn't manage to find out. Because no one could understand him, it didn't occur to anyone—not even to his sister—that he could understand them, so he had to content himself, when his sister was in his room, with listening to her occasional sighs and appeals to the saints. It was only later, when she had gotten used to things a bit—getting used to them completely was out of the question, of course—that Gregor sometimes seized on a remark that was meant in a friendly way or that could be taken that way. “Today he liked it,” she said, if he had made a real dent in the meal, while in the contrary case, which occurred ever more frequently of late, she used to say almost sadly: “Everything untouched again.”

Though Gregor could not learn any news directly, he overheard some from the rooms next door. The moment he heard voices, he immediately ran to the door and pressed his entire body up against it. Especially in the early days, there was no conversation that did not somehow, if only indirectly, relate to him. For two days there were consultations at every meal about what they should do; between meals, too, they discussed the same thing. There were always at least two family members at home, because no one wanted to remain home alone, and they couldn't under any circumstances all leave the apartment at the same time. On the very first day the girl who cooked for them had begged his mother on bended knee—it wasn't exactly clear what and how much she knew of what had happened—to dismiss her. As she departed fifteen minutes later, she tearfully thanked them for her dismissal, as if for the greatest favor that had ever been done her, and swore a terrible oath, without anyone having asked her to do so, not to betray the least of what she knew to anyone.

Now his sister had to do the cooking, together with his mother. This didn't take much effort, however, because they ate practically nothing. Gregor heard them again and again urge each other to eat and receive no other answer than “Thanks, I've had enough,” or something similar. It seemed they didn't drink anything, either.

His sister often asked his father if he would like a beer, cheerfully offering to get it herself. When his father said nothing, she offered to send the porter for it, in case he didn't want to trouble her. When his father finally uttered a firm "No," the subject was dropped.

In the course of the first few days his father explained their entire financial situation and their prospects to his mother and to his sister. Now and then he stood up from the table and took various documents and notebooks out of the small safe that he had rescued from the bankruptcy of his business five years before. He could be heard opening the complicated lock and closing it again after removing what he sought. His father's explanations contained the first heartening news that Gregor had heard since his imprisonment. He had been under the impression that his father had absolutely nothing left over from his business. At least, he had said nothing to the contrary, and Gregor had certainly never asked him about it. Gregor's concern at the time of the bankruptcy had been to arrange everything so that the family could forget as soon as possible the financial misfortune that had brought them to a state of complete despair. And so he had begun to work with pronounced fervor. Practically overnight he was elevated from a minor clerk into a traveling salesman, which naturally gave him completely different financial prospects. His successes at work translated directly into cash that he could lay on the table at home before his astonished and pleased family. Those had been fine times, but they had never recurred, at least not with the same warm feelings, although Gregor later earned so much money that he was in a position to support the entire family, and he did so. They simply got used to it—the family, as well as Gregor. They gratefully accepted his money, and he gladly offered it, but that special warmth did not reappear. Only his sister remained close to Gregor. Because she loved music very much, unlike Gregor, and could play the violin movingly, he secretly planned to send her to the conservatory next year, despite the great cost, which would have to be made up somehow. The conservatory came up often in conversations with his sister during Gregor's brief stays in the city, but only as a beautiful dream whose realization was unthinkable. His parents didn't even like to hear them utter those innocent musings. But Gregor had given it a good deal of thought and intended to announce his decision with due ceremony on Christmas Eve.

These thoughts, completely futile in his present situation, went through his head while he clung to the door and listened. Sometimes, from sheer exhaustion, he could listen no more and would let his head fall against the door, but then immediately catch himself, for even the faint noise that he made in doing so was heard next door and caused them all to fall silent. "What's he doing now?" said his father after a pause, obviously turned towards the door. Only then was the interrupted conversation gradually taken up again.

Gregor now learned—for his father tended to repeat himself often in his explanations, partly because he had not concerned himself with these matters for a long while, and partly, too, because his mother didn't immediately understand everything the first time—that despite all their misfortunes, a certain sum, though a very small one, was left over from the old days. The untouched interest on the sum had moreover in the meantime allowed it to grow a bit. Besides this, the money that Gregor had brought home every month—he had only kept a few florins for himself—had not been completely exhausted and had accumulated into a small amount of capital. Gregor, behind the door, nodded eagerly, overjoyed at this unexpected foresight and thriftiness. It occurred to him that he might have used that extra money to further pay down the debt his father owed the Director, bringing closer the day that he could quit his job, but the way his father had arranged things was no doubt better.

The sum that had been saved was not, however, large enough to allow his family to live off of the interest. It would have been enough to support them for a year, or at most two years, but no longer. The sum really shouldn't be touched: it should be set aside for emergencies. To live, money would have to be earned. His father was a healthy but old man, who had not worked now for five years and couldn't in any case take on too much. During these five years, which had been the first free time of his hardworking but unsuccessful life, he had put on a great deal of weight and had become downright sluggish. But was his elderly mother supposed to earn money now—his mother, who suffered from asthma, for whom even a stroll through the apartment was considerable exertion, and who spent every other day on the sofa by the open window, gasping for breath? Or his sister, who at seventeen was still a child, and whose lifestyle up to that point had consisted of dressing herself neatly, sleeping late, helping out in the household, taking part in a few modest pleasures, and above all playing the violin? Whenever the conversation turned towards the necessity of earning money, Gregor left the door and threw himself on the leather sofa that stood nearby, for he burned with shame and sorrow.

Often he lay there the long night through, though he was unable to sleep for a moment and just scratched for hours at the leather. Or he would go to great pains to shove an armchair to the window, then crawl up to the windowsill and, bolstered by the armchair, lean against the window. He did so only in some kind of nostalgia for the feeling of freedom he had previously found in looking out the window, for the fact was that every day he saw things that were even a short distance away less and less clearly. He could no longer see the hospital that lay across the way, whose all too massive prospect he had earlier cursed. If he had not known very well that he lived in the quiet, but distinctly urban Charlotte Street, he could have believed that he looked out of his window into a desert in which the gray sky and the gray earth merged indistinguishably. His alert sister only had to see the armchair standing by the window twice before she began to shove the chair precisely back to the spot by the window after she straightened up the room. She even left the inner casement open from then on.

If Gregor had been able to speak to his sister and thank her for everything she had to do for him, he would have been able to bear her assistance more easily; as it was, however, it caused him some pain. His sister tried to hide the awkwardness of the whole thing as much as possible, and the longer it went on, the better she succeeded, but Gregor felt everything more acutely as time went on. Even her entrance was terrible for him. She had hardly entered, when, without even taking the time to shut the doors, though she otherwise took such pains to spare everyone the sight of Gregor's room, she ran to the window and hastily flung it open, as if she were suffocating. Then she remained for a time by the window, cold as it still was, and breathed deeply. With this running and commotion she alarmed Gregor twice daily. He trembled under the sofa the entire time and yet he knew very well that she would gladly have spared him, if only it had been possible to stay in a room where Gregor was with the windows closed.

Once—one month had already passed since Gregor's transformation, and there was no longer any reason for his sister to be astonished by his appearance—she came a bit earlier than usual and encountered Gregor as he was staring out the window, motionless and perfectly positioned to frighten someone. Gregor would not have been surprised if she had not come in, since his position hindered her from immediately opening the window, but she not only refrained from coming in, she actually turned around and locked the door. A stranger would have thought that Gregor had lain in wait for her and tried to bite her. Gregor naturally hid himself immediately under the sofa, but he had to wait until midday for her return, and she seemed then more agitated than usual. He realized from this that his appearance was still unbearable to her and that it would remain so—that she had to steel herself to keep from running at the sight of even the small portion of his body that jutted out from beneath the sofa. In order to spare her the sight, one day he dragged a sheet onto the sofa—it took him four hours to do so—and arranged it in such a way that he was completely covered. His sister could not have seen him even if she bent down. If the sheet had not been necessary, in her opinion, she could have removed it, for it obviously couldn't be pleasant for Gregor to block himself off so completely. But she left the sheet where it was, and Gregor thought he even noticed a grateful glance when he once carefully lifted the sheet with his head in order to see how his sister liked the new arrangement.

In the first two weeks his parents could not bring themselves to come in to see him, and he often heard them praise his sister's current industry, whereas they had previously complained a great deal about her, as she had then seemed to them a rather idle girl. In those early days, both his father and his mother often waited in front of Gregor's room while his sister straightened up, and as soon as she came out, she had to tell them precisely what it looked like in the room, what Gregor had eaten, how he had behaved, and whether there were perhaps any slight improvement in his condition. His mother also wanted to visit Gregor early on, but his father and sister dissuaded her with sound reasons to which Gregor listened very attentively, and which he completely supported. Later, however, she had to be restrained with force. When she cried out, "Let me in to see Gregor; he's my poor son! Don't you understand that I must go to him?" Gregor thought that it might be good if his mother did come in—not every day, of course, but perhaps once a week. After all, she knew how to do things much better than his sister, who, despite her courage, was still only a child, and who likely took on such a heavy burden only out of childish thoughtlessness.

Gregor's wish to see his mother was soon fulfilled. During the day, for his parents' sake, Gregor did not want to show himself at the window, but he did not have much room to crawl in the few square meters of floor space. It was hard enough for him to bear lying quietly during the night, and eating soon gave him not the least bit of pleasure, so in order to distract himself, he had adopted the habit of crawling across the walls and ceiling. He especially liked hanging upside down from the ceiling. It was completely different from lying on the floor: he could breathe more freely; his entire body swayed gently; and in the nearly happy distraction in which he found himself above, it sometimes happened that he unexpectedly let himself fall and crashed to the ground. But these days he had better control of his body, so he did not hurt himself even in a great fall. His sister immediately noticed the new amusement that Gregor had found for himself—he left a trace of stickiness behind him here and there while crawling—and so she got it in her head to allow him to crawl to his utmost by removing the furniture that hindered it, especially the chest of drawers and desk. She was not capable of doing this herself, however. She didn't dare ask her father for help. The servant girl would certainly not help her: this roughly sixteen-year-old girl had stuck it out quite bravely since the dismissal of the former cook, but she had asked for the privilege of keeping the kitchen door always locked and only having to open it when specifically asked. So his sister had no choice but to enlist her mother one time when her father was absent. With cries of great joy his mother approached, but fell silent at the door of Gregor's room. His sister checked first, of course, to see that the room was in order; only then did she let her mother enter. In great haste, Gregor pulled the sheet lower and gathered more material around him. It looked like a sheet had merely been carelessly thrown over the sofa. Gregor also refrained from spying out from under the sheet. He deprived himself of the sight of his mother and took his pleasure entirely from the fact that she had come. "Come on, you can't see him," said his sister, and she apparently led her mother in by the hand. Gregor then heard the two frail women shove the heavy old chest of drawers from its place. His sister reserved the greatest part of the labor for herself, ignoring the warnings of her mother, who feared that she would overexert herself. It took a very long time. After fifteen minutes of work, his mother said that they should just leave the chest where it was, first, because it was too heavy—they wouldn't be finished before his father returned, and so would end up leaving the chest in the middle of the room, where it would block Gregor at every turn—and second, because it was not at all certain that they were doing Gregor a favor by removing the furniture. It seemed to her rather the opposite: the sight of the empty wall oppressed her heart. Why should Gregor not feel the same way? He had been used to the room's furniture for so long, that he would surely feel lost in an empty room. "And isn't it so," concluded his mother very softly—almost whispering, as if she wanted to keep Gregor, of whose precise whereabouts she wasn't certain, from hearing even the sound of her voice, for she was convinced that he could not understand the words—"isn't it so, that by removing the furniture we seem to be saying that we give up all hope of his recovery, and abandon him absolutely? I think it would be best if we left the room in exactly the same condition it was in before, so that when Gregor returns to us, he'll find everything unchanged, and so more easily forget what's happened in the meantime."

In listening to his mother's words, Gregor realized that the lack of any direct human communication over the course of the past two months, together with the monotonous life he led in the midst of the family, must have deranged his mind; otherwise he couldn't explain why he had earnestly desired that his room be emptied. Did he really want to let them transform the warm room, comfortably outfitted with inherited furnishings, into a cave? Granted, he would be able to crawl undisturbed in all directions, but he would at the same time forget, quickly and completely, his human past. He was already close to forgetting it, but his mother's voice, so long unheard, had roused him. Nothing should be removed; everything had to stay. He could not afford to lose the good influence the furniture had on his condition. If the furniture hindered him from carrying on his mindless crawling about, that was no drawback, it was rather a great advantage.

But his sister was unfortunately of a different opinion. She had become accustomed, not completely without justification, to playing the expert when it came to discussing anything that concerned Gregor with her parents. And so her mother's advice now led her to insist on the removal not only of the chest and the desk, which was all she had first intended, but of all of the furniture, with the exception of the indispensable sofa. Of course, it was not just childish stubbornness and the hard-won self-confidence she had recently and unexpectedly acquired that determined her on this course: she had actually observed that Gregor needed a great deal of room to crawl around in, and that he did not use the furniture at all, as far as she could see. It might also have been the romantic nature of girls of her age, which sought some outlet at every opportunity, and made her want Gregor's situation to be even more terrifying, so that she could do even more than before to help him. For in a space in which Gregor, completely alone, ruled the empty walls, no person but Grete would dare to enter.

And so she did not allow herself to be swayed by her mother, who faltered from sheer uneasiness at being in the room, soon fell silent, and finally helped his sister as much as she was able in shoving the chest out of the room. Gregor could spare the chest if he must, but the desk had to stay. The women had hardly left the room with the chest, pushing at it and gasping for air, when Gregor stuck his head out from under the sofa, in order to see where he could intervene, as carefully and as considerately as possible. But unfortunately it was his mother who returned first, while Grete in the next room gripped the chest and rocked it back and forth alone, without, naturally, being able to move it from its spot. His mother was not, however, used to the sight of Gregor—he might have made her sick—so Gregor, alarmed, rushed back to the opposite end of the sofa. He could not, however, prevent the sheet from moving a bit at the front. That was enough to put his mother on the alert. She froze, stood still a moment, and then returned to Grete.

Though Gregor kept telling himself that nothing extraordinary was happening—a few pieces of furniture were merely being moved around—he soon realized that this continual back and forth on the part of the women, their soft calls to one another, and the scraping of the furniture on the floor affected him like the greatest of commotions closing in on him from all sides. However closely he drew in his head and legs and however firmly he pressed his body to the floor, he realized he couldn't stand it much longer. They were emptying out his room; they were taking from him everything that he held dear. They had carried out the chest which held his fret saw and other tools; they were already working free the desk from the grooves it had worn into the floor—the desk at which he had written his exercises as a student at trade school, at secondary school, and even at primary school. At this point he did not have the patience to contemplate the women's good intentions, the existence of which he had at any rate almost forgotten. Exhausted, they worked now in complete silence, and only the heavy tread of their feet could be heard.

And so he burst forth from under the sofa—the women were just leaning against the desk in the next room, in order to catch their breath—though he changed the direction of his charge four times, for he really did not know what to save first. On one otherwise empty wall he distinctly saw the picture of the woman dressed entirely in furs. He crept hurriedly up to it and pressed himself against the glass, which held him fast and soothed his hot belly. At least no one could take away this picture, which Gregor now completely covered with his body. He turned his head towards the door of the living room in order to observe the women on their return.

They weren't allowing themselves much rest and so came back directly. Grete had put her arm around her mother and seemed practically to carry her. "Well, what should we take now?" said Grete and looked around. Then her glance met Gregor's as he clung to the wall. She maintained her composure—surely only due to her mother's presence—bent her face to her mother, in order to keep her from looking around, and said hastily, a tremor in her voice, "Come, let's go back in the living room for a moment." Grete's intention was clear to Gregor: she wanted to bring her mother to safety and then chase him down off of the wall. Well, she could try! He would sit on the picture and not give it up. He would rather spring in Grete's face.

But Grete's words had for the first time really unsettled his mother. She moved to the side, spotted the giant brown fleck on the flowered wallpaper, and cried out in a screeching, raw voice, before she was really fully conscious that it was Gregor that she saw, "Oh my God; oh my God!" She then fell onto the sofa with widespread arms, as if she were altogether giving up, and didn't move. "Gregor, you—!" cried his sister with a raised fist and piercing gaze. They were the first words she had directly addressed to Gregor since his transformation. She ran into the next room in order to get some scent with which she could wake her mother out of her faint. Gregor wanted to help, too—there was still time to save the picture—but he was stuck to the glass and had to tear himself free. He, too, ran into the next room, as if he could give his sister some advice, as in earlier days, but then he had to stand helplessly behind her while she rummaged through various bottles. She was startled when she turned around; a bottle fell to the floor and broke. A sliver of glass cut Gregor's face, and some burning medicine spilled over him. Grete took as many bottles as she could carry and ran with them in to her mother. She then slammed the door shut with her foot. Gregor was now shut off from his mother, who was through his fault possibly near death. He couldn't open the door, if he did not want to chase away his sister, who had to remain with his mother. He had nothing left to do but wait. Oppressed by self-reproaches and worry, he began to crawl. He crawled over everything—walls, furniture, and ceiling—and finally, in his despair, he fell, the entire room spinning around him, onto the center of the large table.

A short time passed, and Gregor lay limply there. All around was quiet. Perhaps that was a good sign. Then the bell rang. The servant girl was naturally locked into her kitchen, and so Grete had to go open the door. His father had returned. “What happened?” were his first words. The look on Grete’s face betrayed everything to him. Grete answered with a muffled voice—she was obviously pressing her face against her father’s chest. “Mother fainted, but she’s already better. Gregor broke out.” “I was waiting for this,” said his father, “I always said it would happen, but you women didn’t want to hear it.” It was clear to Gregor that his father had interpreted Grete’s all-too-brief announcement in the worst possible way, and assumed that Gregor had been guilty of some act of violence. Therefore Gregor had to try to mollify his father, for he had neither the time nor the ability to enlighten him. And so he fled to the door of his room and pressed against it, so that his father could see immediately on leaving the hallway that Gregor had every intention of returning right away to his room. It would not be necessary to drive him back, just to open the door, and he would disappear instantly.

But his father was not in the mood to notice such subtleties: “Ah!” he cried out on entering, in a tone that made him seem at once furious and glad. Gregor drew his head back from the door and turned it toward his father. His father’s appearance was different from the way he remembered it. Lately, due to his new habit of crawling about, Gregor had concerned himself less with the goings-on in the rest of the apartment; he should therefore really have been prepared to encounter new developments. But still, still, was this really his father? The same man who lay, tired out, buried deep in his bed, when Gregor was all set to go on a business trip? The man who, dressed in a nightshirt, had greeted him when he returned in the evenings from an easy chair, and, unable to stand up, only raised his arms to show his joy at his return? The man who, on the rare walks he took together with Gregor and his mother on a few Sundays and the most important holidays of the year, walked packed into his old coat even more slowly than they did, though they walked slowly enough, laboring forward with a deliberately placed cane, and who nearly always stopped when he wanted to say something, gathering his companions around him? Now, he was quite well put together. He was dressed in the kind of close-fitting blue uniform with gold buttons that doormen at the banking houses wore; over the high stiff collar of the coat his pronounced double chin protruded; under his bushy eyebrows the glance of his dark eyes sprang forth fresh and alert; the formerly disheveled white hair was combed flat into a painfully exact, shining part. He threw his hat, which bore a gold monogram—probably that of a bank—in an arc across the room and onto the sofa. He moved towards Gregor, the ends of his long coat pushed back, his hands in his pants pockets, his face grim. He probably did not know himself what he planned to do. In any case he lifted his feet unusually high, and Gregor was astonished at the gigantic size of the soles of his boots. But he didn’t let his astonishment distract him. He had known from the first day of his new life that his father considered the greatest severity appropriate in dealing with him. And so he ran away from his father. He froze when his father stood still and hurried forward again when his father moved a muscle. In this way they circled the room several times, without anything decisive happening; the whole thing moved at such a slow tempo that it didn't even look like a pursuit. For the time being, Gregor stayed on the floor. He was afraid that his father might consider flight toward the walls or the ceiling as particular wickedness. But Gregor realized that he couldn't keep up even this pace for long, for when his father took a single step, he had to carry out myriad movements. He soon felt short of breath; his lungs had not been reliable even in the old days. As he staggered forward, he could barely keep his eyes open, so hard did he try to concentrate his energy for running. In his dullness he was simply unable to think of any other means of deliverance. He had almost forgotten already that the walls were open to him, though they were obstructed here by painstakingly carved furniture full of points and sharp edges. Suddenly something lightly thrown flew just past him and rolled ahead. It was an apple. Another immediately followed. Gregor froze in fear. Running further was pointless, for his father had decided to bombard him. He had filled his pockets from the fruit bowl on the credenza and now threw apple after apple, without for the time being aiming very carefully. These small red apples rolled around on the ground, knocking into each other as if charged with electricity. A weakly thrown apple strafed Gregor's back, but glanced off without doing any harm. One that flew immediately in its wake actually embedded itself in his back, however. Gregor tried to drag himself forward, as if he could outrun the unbelievable pain by changing position, but he felt as if he were nailed to the spot and lay sprawled upon the ground, in complete distraction of all of his senses. With his last conscious glance he watched as the door to his room was ripped open and, ahead of his screaming sister, his mother ran out of the room in her slip—for his sister had undressed her to let her breathe freely while in her faint—and raced towards his father, her untied skirts slipping down to the floor one after another; he watched as, stumbling on the skirts, she embraced his father, fully at one with him—but Gregor's vision now failed him utterly—and, with her hands clasped around the back of his head, begged him to spare Gregor's life.

III

The deep injury from which Gregor had suffered for over a month—the apple remained embedded in his flesh as a visible memento, as no one dared to remove it—seemed to have reminded even his father that despite his present sad and repulsive state, Gregor was a member of the family who should not be treated as an enemy. The law of familial obligation dictated, rather, that one had to swallow one's revulsion and be tolerant, simply be tolerant.

And though Gregor had probably permanently lost some mobility through his injury, and now, like an invalid, took many, many minutes to cross his room—crawling on high was out of the question—this degeneration in his condition brought with it a compensation that was to his mind completely satisfactory. Toward evening they now opened the living room door so that, lying in the darkness of his room and invisible from the living room, he could watch the entire family at the lighted table and listen to their conversation by general consent, as it were—a complete change from the early days when he used to watch the door like a hawk an hour or two before they gathered.

Of course, the conversations were not as lively as in earlier days. Gregor used to recall them longingly in the small hotel rooms where he had had to throw himself, exhausted, into the damp bedclothes. These days everything was mostly very quiet. His father fell asleep in his armchair soon after the evening meal; his mother and sister urged one another to silence. His mother now sewed fine lingerie for a boutique, bending close to her work under the light. His sister, who had taken a job as a sales-clerk, studied stenography and French at night, in order to find a better position one day. Sometimes his father awoke and, as if he didn't realize that he had been sleeping, would say to his mother: "How long you're sewing again today!" Then he would fall asleep again immediately, while his mother and sister exchanged tired smiles.

With a kind of stubbornness his father refused to take off his work uniform when he returned home, and while his nightshirt hung, useless, on a clothes hook, he dozed at his place fully clothed, as if he were always on duty and awaited the call of his superiors. As a result, the uniform, which hadn't been new in the first place, became less than pristine, despite the care his mother and sister took with it. Gregor often spent whole evenings looking at the badly stained coat, its oft-polished gold buttons shining, in which the old man slept highly uncomfortably, but quietly.

As soon as the clock struck ten, his mother tried to wake his father by speaking softly to him, and tried to persuade him to go to bed, for he couldn't sleep well there, and a good sleep was absolutely essential, since he had to be at work by six. But in the stubbornness that had come over him since he became a bank employee, he always insisted on remaining longer where he was, although he regularly fell asleep again, and required much effort to persuade in exchanging the armchair for his bed. His mother and sister could press him with gentle remonstrances as much as they liked—for a quarter of an hour at a time he slowly shook his head, his eyes closed, and refused to stand up. His mother plucked at his sleeve, and whispered endearments in his ear; his sister left her work in order to help her mother, but got nowhere with him. He only sank deeper into his armchair. Only when the women grasped him under the arms would he open his eyes, look in turn at Gregor's mother and sister, and say, "What a life. This is the peace and quiet of my old age." And bracing himself against the women, he hoisted himself up laboriously, as if he were his own greatest burden, and allowed himself to be led to the door. He waved them off then and went on under his own power, but Gregor's mother would hastily throw down her sewing and his sister her quill in order to run after him and be of further help to him.

Who in this overworked and overtired family had time to worry about Gregor more than was absolutely necessary? The household was ever more reduced in circumstances. The servant girl had been dismissed, and a gigantic, bony servant with white hair that fluttered about her head came in the mornings and the evenings to do the hardest labor. Everything else his mother took care of, in addition to her abundant sewing work. It even came to pass that various pieces of family jewelry, which his mother and sister had previously worn with pleasure at parties and celebrations, were sold, as Gregor learned one evening from a general conversation about the prices obtained. Their greatest source of complaint, however, was that the apartment, far too large for them under the circumstances, could not be left, because it was unthinkable that Gregor be relocated. But Gregor realized that it was not consideration for him that hindered a relocation, for they could have transported him easily in a suitable carton with a few air holes. What really kept the family from changing apartments was despair, and the thought that they had been afflicted by misfortune such as had struck no one in their circle of relatives and acquaintances. They did everything that the world demanded of poor people—his father fetched breakfast for the junior bank clerks; his mother dedicated herself to making underwear for strangers; his sister ran back and forth behind the counter at the beck and call of customers—but they could do no more than that. And the wound in his back began to hurt Gregor anew when his mother and sister would return from putting his father to bed, let their work lie, and huddle close together, cheek to cheek. His mother, gesturing towards Gregor's room, said, "Close the door, Grete," and Gregor was in the dark again, while next door the women mingled tears or stared, dry-eyed and numb, down at the table.

Gregor passed the days and nights nearly without sleep. Sometimes he considered taking the affairs of the family in hand again, the next time the door was opened. After some time, he thought again about the Director and the Deputy Director, the clerks and the apprentices, the slow-witted porter, two or three friends from other companies, a chambermaid from a hotel in the provinces—a dear, fleeting memory—and a cashier from a hat store whom he had courted seriously, though too slowly. They reappeared in his thoughts together with strangers or people he had already forgotten, but instead of helping him and his family, they all remained detached, and he was glad when they disappeared. At other times, however, he was not in the mood to worry about his family. He was filled with rage at the poor care they took of him, and though he could think of nothing for which he had an appetite, he made plans to reach the pantry and take what was due him, even if he were not hungry. Without considering any longer what might especially please Gregor, mornings and afternoons before returning to the store his sister hurriedly shoved any old kind of food into his room with her foot, only in order to sweep it out with a whisk of the broom in the evenings, indifferent as to whether it might have been merely tasted or—as was usually the case—it remained completely untouched. Her cleaning of the room, which she now always did in the evening, could not have been done any more hastily. Smears of dirt ran along the walls, and here and there lay balls of dust and filth. In the early days Gregor used to position himself upon the arrival of his sister in a particularly grubby corner, in order to reproach her. But he could have remained there for weeks, and his sister would still not have changed her ways. She saw the dirt as well as he did, but she had simply decided to leave it there. At the same time, with a touchiness entirely new to her that had now possessed the entire family, she was vigilant in making sure that the straightening of Gregor's room was left to her. His mother once undertook a thorough cleaning of Gregor's room, which had required several buckets of water—the moisture bothered Gregor, and he lay broad, embittered, and unmoving on top of the sofa—but his mother did not go unpunished. That evening his sister had hardly registered the change in Gregor's room when, highly insulted, she ran into the living room, and despite her mother's beseechingly raised hands, broke into a spasm of tears that his parents—his father had naturally been frightened out of his seat—at first simply watched, helpless with astonishment. Then they, too, were affected: on one side, his father reproached his mother for not leaving the cleaning of Gregor's room to his sister; on the other side, he shouted at his sister that she would never be allowed to clean Gregor's room again. In the meantime, his mother tried to drag his father, who was beside himself with agitation, into the bedroom; his sister, racked by sobs, hammered the table with her small fists; and Gregor hissed loudly with fury that no one thought to close the door and so spare him the scene and the noise.

But even if his sister, exhausted from her work, could no longer manage to care for Gregor as she had earlier, his mother would still not have had to intervene in order to keep Gregor from being neglected. For there was still the servant. This old widow, who had weathered the worst in her long life with the help of a powerful frame, felt no especial revulsion towards Gregor. Without exactly being curious, she had once by chance opened the door to Gregor's room and stood staring at the sight of him, her hands folded across her chest. Gregor was completely taken by surprise, and despite the fact that no one was chasing him, he began to run back and forth. Since that time, she hadn't missed a chance to open the door quickly in the morning and the evening to look in at Gregor. At first she called him over to her with words that she probably considered friendly, like "Come on over here, you old dung beetle!" or "Look at the old dung beetle!" Gregor did not respond to such overtures, but remained motionless in his place, as if the door had not even been opened. If only they would order this servant to clean his room daily, instead of letting her needlessly disturb him at will! Once in the early morning—a hard rain, perhaps already a sign of the coming spring, beat on the windowpanes—Gregor became so embittered when the servant began to speak that he turned towards her, as if to attack, though slowly and feebly. Instead of being afraid, however, the servant simply lifted high into the air a chair that stood in reach of the door. As she stood there with her mouth opened wide, it was clear that she intended to shut her mouth only after the chair in her hands had come down on Gregor's back. "That's it, then?" she asked, as Gregor turned around again, and she put the chair quietly back in its corner.

Gregor now ate almost nothing. When he happened to pass by the food prepared for him, he sometimes idly took a bite and held it in his mouth for an hour or so, only to spit most of it out again. At first he thought that his sorrow over the state of his room kept him from eating, but he had actually reconciled himself very soon to the changes. The family had gotten into the habit of putting into his room things that wouldn't fit anywhere else: there were now many such things, as they had rented one room in the apartment out to three lodgers. These three serious gentlemen—all three had full beards, as Gregor discovered once by looking through the crack in the door—were painfully focused on order, not only in their room, but, simply because they had taken lodgings there, in the entire household, especially in the kitchen. They would not put up with useless or dirty things. And in any case, they had brought with them most of their own furnishings. For this reason, many things that were not saleable, but that the family did not want to throw away, had become superfluous. All of this made its way into Gregor's room—even, eventually, the ash bin and the rubbish bin from the kitchen. The servant, who was always in a rush, simply slung anything that was at the moment unuseable into Gregor's room. Fortunately Gregor usually saw only the relevant object and the hand that held it. The servant might once have intended to take the things out again when time and opportunity permitted, or perhaps to throw them all out together once and for all, but in practice they lay wherever they were tossed, unless Gregor wound his way through the clutter and stirred it up—first because he had no other place to crawl, and later with growing pleasure, although after such forays, tired to death and full of sorrow, he could not stir for hours.

Because the lodgers sometimes took their evening meal in the common living room, the living room door remained closed on some evenings. Gregor managed without it very well. On some evenings when it was open he did not even take advantage of it, but without the family's knowing it, lay in the darkest corner of his room. Once, however, the servant left the door to his room open a bit, and it remained open, even as the lodgers came in that evening and the light was turned on. They sat at the head of the table, where in former days his father, mother, and Gregor had eaten, unfolded their napkins, and took their knives and forks in hand. His mother immediately appeared in the doorway with a dish of meat and his sister directly behind her with a dish piled high with potatoes. The steaming food gave off a rich smell. The lodgers bent over the dishes placed before them as if they wanted to check them before eating, and the one in the middle, whom the other two appeared to consider an authority, actually cut off a piece of meat still in the serving dish, obviously to test whether it were tender enough, or whether it might perhaps need to be sent back to the kitchen. He was satisfied, and mother and sister, who had watched the proceedings tensely, breathed again and smiled.

The family themselves ate in the kitchen. Nevertheless, his father, before he went into the kitchen, came into the room and made a single long bow while circling the table, cap in hand. The lodgers all rose together and murmured something into their beards. When they were alone again, they ate in near total silence. It seemed strange to Gregor that, among all the various sounds of eating, he could pick out the sound of their chewing teeth—it was as if Gregor were thereby reminded that one needed teeth in order to eat, and that one could do nothing with even the most beautiful toothless jaws. "I do have an appetite," said Gregor sorrowfully to himself, "but not for these things. How these lodgers feed themselves, while I'm dying of hunger!"

On this very evening, though Gregor did not remember having heard it once before during that whole time, the violin sounded from the kitchen. The lodgers had already finished their meal. The middle one had pulled out a newspaper and given each of the others one page. They now read, leaning back, and smoked. As the violin began to play, they became alert, arose and went on tiptoes to the hall door, where they stood pressed up against one another. They must have heard them in the kitchen, for his father called out: "Do you gentlemen perhaps dislike the playing? It can be stopped immediately." "On the contrary," said the lodger in the middle, "wouldn't the young lady like to come out and play here in this room, where it's much more comfortable and convenient?" "Oh, please!" called his father, as if he were the violin player. The lodgers moved back into the room and waited. His father soon came in with the music stand, his mother with the music, and his sister with the violin. His sister quietly prepared to play. His parents, who had never rented a room out before and so exaggerated the courtesy due the lodgers, did not dare to sit on their own chairs. His father leaned against the door, his right hand stuck between two buttons of his fastened livery coat. His mother, however, accepted a chair offered by one of the lodgers, and sat off in the corner where he had happened to place the chair.

His sister began to play. His father and mother, on either side of her, followed every note, attentive to the movements of her hands. Gregor, drawn by the music, had ventured a bit further forward. His head was already in the living room. He hardly wondered at himself for being so inconsiderate towards the others of late; earlier, this consideration had been a great source of pride. And just now he had more reason than before to hide himself. Because of the dust everywhere in his room that flew up at the least movement, he was himself covered in dust. Threads, hairs, and bits of leftover food stuck to his back and sides. His general apathy was much too great for him now to lie on his back and scrub himself on the carpet, as he used to do several times a day. Despite his condition, however, he had no qualms about advancing a bit onto the immaculate living room floor.

But no one paid any attention to him. His family was entirely absorbed in the playing of the violin. The lodgers, on the other hand, who had at first, their hands in their pants pockets, taken up positions inconveniently close to his sister's music stand, in order to see all the notes, soon withdrew to the window, their heads bowed amidst whispered conversation, and remained there with Gregor's father worriedly observing them. It was now painfully obvious that they were disappointed in what they had assumed would be a beautiful or entertaining performance, and that they were sick of the entire production and now allowed their quiet to be disturbed only out of politeness. The way they all blew their cigar smoke out of their mouths and noses indicated great irritation. But his sister played so beautifully! Her face was turned to the side; her gaze followed the lines of notes, searching and sorrowful. Gregor crept further forward and held his head close to the floor, in order to meet her gaze if possible. The music gripped him—was he then an animal? He felt as if he were being guided to the sustenance he had unknowingly desired. He was determined to press on all the way to his sister, to pull on her skirt and let her know that she could come into his room with her violin. No one here knew how to appreciate her playing the way he did. He wanted never to let her out of his room again, at least not as long as he lived. His terrifying shape would finally be of some use to him: he would be at all doors of his room at once, hissing at all intruders. His sister, though, would not be forced, but would rather stay with him willingly. She would sit next to him on the sofa, her ear inclined towards him, and he would confide in her that he had intended to send her to the conservatory, and that, were it not for the misfortune that had occurred, he had intended to announce it to everyone last Christmas — Christmas had surely passed already? — ignoring any possible objections. After this declaration, his sister would surely burst into tears of emotion, and Gregor would lift himself up to her shoulder and kiss her neck, which she now left uncovered, without ribbon or collar, since she had begun working at the store.

“Mr. Samsa!” called the middle lodger and without wasting another word, pointed at Gregor, who was slowly inching his way forward. The violin fell silent. The middle lodger smiled at first, shaking his head at his friends, and then looked down again at Gregor. His father seemed to consider it more urgent to reassure the lodgers than to drive Gregor back, despite the fact that they seemed calm and more entertained by Gregor than by the violin. He hurried over to them and tried with outspread arms to urge them into their room; at the same time, he wanted to block their view of Gregor with his body. They actually became a bit angry now, though it was unclear whether this was over his father’s behavior or over the dawning recognition that, unbeknownst to them, they had all the while had a neighbor like Gregor. They asked his father for an explanation, raised their arms, pulled agitatedly at their beards and only reluctantly retreated into their room. In the meantime his sister had come out of the trance into which she had fallen after her playing had been so suddenly broken off. For a time she had held her violin and bow in her limply hanging hands and continued to stare at the music, as if she were still playing. Now, all at once, she pulled herself together, laid the instrument in the lap of her mother, who, short of breath and gasping for air, was still seated, and ran into the next room, which the lodgers were now approaching more quickly at the urging of her father. Under her practiced hands, the covers and pillows flew high in the air and arranged themselves. Before the lodgers had reached the room, she was finished readying the beds and had slipped out. His father’s stubbornness seemed to have returned to the extent that he forgot all respect that he owed his lodgers. He kept urging them and urging them, until finally at the threshold the gentleman in the middle resoundingly stamped his foot and so brought his father to a standstill. “I hereby declare,” he said, and, raising his hand, sought the gaze of Gregor’s mother and sister, as well, “that, in consideration of the revolting conditions existing in this apartment and this family” — and here, without a moment’s hesitation, he spat on the ground — “I give notice this instant. I will naturally pay absolutely nothing for the days I have lived here; on the contrary, I will consider bringing charges against you, which will — believe me — be very easy to prove.” He fell silent and stared straight ahead, as if he were waiting for something. His two friends then obliged him by chiming in with the words: “We, too, give notice this instant.” At that, he seized the door handle and shut the door with a crash.

His father staggered to his chair, his hands stretched out before him, and fell into it. It looked as if he were stretching himself out for his usual evening nap, but his head, sharply, ceaselessly nodding, showed that he was not sleeping at all. Gregor had lain all this time in the same spot where the lodgers had discovered him. His disappointment at the failure of his plans—perhaps, though, too, the weakness caused by his long hunger—made it impossible for him to move. He was distinctly afraid that in the next moment everything was going to come crashing down on top of him. He waited. Not even the violin roused him, which slipped from his mother's trembling fingers and fell from her lap, emitting a ringing tone.

"My dear parents," said his sister and struck her hand on the table by way of preamble, "we can't go on like this. If you can't see it, I can. I don't want to use the name of my brother in front of this monster, so let me just say this: we have to try to get rid of it. We have tried as much as humanly possible to care for it and to put up with it. I don't think it could reproach us in the least."

"She is absolutely right," said his father under his breath. His mother, who seemed not to have caught her breath yet, began to emit a muffled cough into the hand she held before her, a crazed expression in her eyes.

His sister hurried to his mother and put her hand to her forehead. His sister's words seemed to have put his father's thoughts in a surer course. He sat up straight, fiddling with his uniform cap amongst the plates that still sat on the table from the lodgers' evening meal, and looked for a time down at the quiet Gregor.

"We must try to get rid of it," his sister finally said to his father, for his mother heard nothing in the midst of her coughing. "It's going to kill you both; I can see it coming. When people have to work as hard as we do, they can't bear this kind of constant torture at home. I can't bear it any more." And she began crying so hard that her tears flowed down her mother's face, where she began mechanically wiping them away with her hand.

"But my child," said his father, sympathetically and with striking compassion, "what should we do?"

His sister only shrugged her shoulders as a sign of the helplessness that had during her crying spell taken the place of her former certainty. "But if he understood us—" his father said, half questioningly. His sister, in the midst of her tears, waved her hand violently as a sign that that was out of the question.

"If he understood us," his father repeated, and by closing his eyes, tried to absorb her certainty that it was impossible, "then we might be able to arrive at some arrangement with him. But as things stand—"

"It has to go," cried his sister. "That is the only way, father. You must simply try to rid yourself of the thought that it's Gregor. Our real misfortune is that we believed it for so long. But how can it be Gregor? If it were Gregor, he would have seen long ago that such an animal cannot live with people and he would have left voluntarily. We would then have had no brother, but we could have lived on and honored his memory. But this beast persecutes us, drives off the lodgers, and obviously wants to take over the apartment and force us to sleep out in the alley. Just look, Father," she suddenly screamed, "he's starting again!" And in a state of terror totally incomprehensible to Gregor, his sister abandoned his mother and practically vaulted off her chair, as if she would rather sacrifice her than remain in Gregor's vicinity. She hurried behind her father who, agitated entirely through her behavior, stood up as well and half raised his arms as if to protect her.

But it wasn't at all Gregor's intent to upset anyone, especially not his sister. He had just begun to turn himself around in order to make his way back into his room. Of course, that procedure looked peculiar enough, because his ailing condition meant that in order to turn even with difficulty he had to help with his head, which he lifted repeatedly and braced against the ground. He paused and looked around. His good intentions seemed to be recognized: it had only been a momentary fright. They all looked at him, silent and sorrowful. His mother lay in her chair, her legs stretched before her and pressed together; her eyes were nearly falling shut from exhaustion. His father and sister sat next to one another, his sister with her hand laid around her father's neck.

"Maybe they'll allow me to turn around now," thought Gregor, and started to work on it again. He could not suppress the wheezing caused by his exertion, and he had to stop and rest now and then. No one rushed him: he was left to his own devices. When he had completed the turn, he immediately headed straight back. He was astonished by the vast distance that divided him from his room, and he could not grasp how in his weakened condition he had put the entire distance behind him, almost without noticing it. Focused solely on crawling as quickly as possible, he hardly noticed that no word and no outcry from his family disturbed him. He turned his head only when he was already at the door—not all the way, for he felt his neck getting stiff, but enough to see that nothing had changed behind him, except for the fact that his sister had stood up. His last glance fell on his mother, who was now fast asleep.

He was hardly in his room when the door was hastily pushed to, bolted fast and locked. The sudden noise behind him frightened Gregor so much that his legs buckled beneath him. It was his sister who had rushed to do it. She had stood, waiting, and had suddenly sprung forward, light-footed—Gregor had not even heard her coming—crying out to her parents "Finally!" as she turned the key in the lock.

"And now?" Gregor asked himself, and looked around in the dark. He soon discovered that he could no longer move at all. He didn't wonder at this; on the contrary, it had seemed unnatural to him that he had actually been able to move before on such thin legs. Besides that, however, he felt relatively comfortable. He did have pains all over his body, but it seemed to him that they were becoming weaker and weaker and would finally die away altogether. He could hardly feel the rotten apple in his back or the inflamed surrounding area, which was now completely covered in moist dust. He thought of his family with compassion and love. His conviction that he had to disappear was even more definite than his sister's. He remained in this state of empty and peaceful contemplation until the clock tower struck three. He experienced once more the approach of daylight outside the window. Then, unwilling, his head sank fully down, and from his nostrils his last breath weakly streamed forth.

When the servant came in the early morning—though she had often been asked to refrain from doing so, she slammed all the doors out of sheer vigor and haste, to such an extent that it was not possible to sleep quietly anywhere in the apartment once she had arrived—she noticed nothing unusual at first in her morning visit to Gregor. She thought that he intentionally lay there motionless because he found her behavior insulting; she credited him with all manner of intelligence. As she happened to be holding her long broom in her hand, she tried to tickle Gregor with it from the door. When she met with no response, she became irritated and poked him a bit. Only when she had shoved him from his spot without meeting any resistance did she become alert. She soon understood the situation. Her eyes widened, and she whistled out loud. It wasn't long before she had flung the door of the master bedroom open and called loudly into the darkness: "Look, everyone, it's kicked the bucket; it's lying there, dead as a doornail!"

The Samsas sat bolt upright in bed and had first to overcome their alarm at the servant's behavior before they could understand her report. Then, however, they climbed hurriedly out of bed, one on each side. Mr. Samsa threw the blanket over his shoulders; Mrs. Samsa emerged in her nightgown. In this manner they entered Gregor's room. In the meantime Grete had opened the door to the living room, where she had been sleeping since the arrival of the lodgers. She was completely dressed, as if she had not slept; her pale face confirmed the impression. "Dead?" said Mrs. Samsa, and looked questioningly up at the servant, although she could have made her own investigation or even have recognized the fact without making any investigation. "I'd say so," said the servant, and as proof, she pushed Gregor's corpse further to one side with the broom. Mrs. Samsa moved as if she wanted to hold her back, but she didn't. "Well," said Mr. Samsa, "now we can thank God." He crossed himself, and the three women followed his example. Grete, who did not take her eyes from the corpse, said: "Just look at how thin he was. He hadn't eaten anything for so long. The food came out just the way it went in." Gregor's body was indeed completely flat and dry; it was really only possible to see it now that he was off his legs and nothing else distracted the eye.

"Come, Grete, come sit with us for a bit," said Mrs. Samsa with a wistful smile, and Grete followed her parents into their bedroom, though not without looking back at the corpse. The servant shut the door and opened the window wide. Despite the early morning the fresh air already had something mild mixed in it. It was, after all, already the end of March.

The three lodgers emerged from their room and looked in amazement for their breakfast. It had been forgotten. "Where is breakfast?" the middlemost of the men asked the servant sullenly. She laid a finger to her lips and then silently and hastily signaled to the men that they might come into Gregor's room. They came and stood around Gregor's corpse in the now completely bright room, their hands in the pockets of their somewhat shabby coats.

The door to the bedroom opened then, and Mr. Samsa appeared in his livery with his wife on one arm and his daughter on the other. They had all been crying; Grete pressed her face from time to time to her father's arm.

"Leave my apartment immediately!" said Mr. Samsa and pointed to the door, without letting the women leave his side. "What do you mean?" said the middle lodger, somewhat dismayed, and smiled mawkishly. The two others held their hands behind their backs and rubbed them together continuously, as if in joyful expectation of a great fight, which would, they were sure, end favorably for them. "I mean exactly what I say," answered Mr. Samsa, and advanced in a line with his companions toward the lodger. He stood quietly, at first, and looked at the ground, as if the things in his head were arranging themselves in a new order. "Then we'll go," he said and looked up at Mr. Samsa, as if a sudden access of humility required him to seek renewed approval even for this decision. Mr. Samsa merely nodded shortly several times, his eyes wide and staring. At this, the man immediately walked with long strides into the foyer. His two friends had listened at first, their hands completely still, and they now skipped after him directly, as if in fear that Mr. Samsa could step in front of them in the foyer and disrupt their connection to their leader. In the hall all three of them took their hats from the rack, drew their walking sticks from the stand, bowed mutely, and left the apartment. In what proved to be a completely unnecessary precaution, Mr. Samsa walked out with the two women onto the landing. Leaning on the railing, they watched as the three men slowly but steadily descended the stairs, disappearing on every floor at the turning of the stairwell, and emerging again after a few moments. The lower they went, the more the Samsa family lost interest in them, and as a butcher's boy carrying his burden on his head with dignity passed them and then climbed high above them, Mr. Samsa left the landing with the women and they all returned, as if freed from a burden, to their apartment.

They decided to spend the day resting and taking a stroll. They had not only earned this rest from work, they absolutely needed it. And so they sat at the table and wrote three letters of excuse, Mr. Samsa to the bank directors, Mrs. Samsa to her employer, and Grete to her supervisor. While they were writing the servant entered in order to say that she was leaving, as her morning work was finished. Writing, the three of them merely nodded at first, without looking up; only when the servant failed to depart did they look up angrily. "Well?" asked Mr. Samsa. The servant stood in the door, smiling, as if she had some great piece of good news to report to the family, but would only do so if she were thoroughly interrogated. The nearly upright little ostrich feather on her hat, which had annoyed Mr. Samsa the entire time she had been employed there, waved freely in all directions. "Well, what do you want?" asked Mrs. Samsa, for whom the servant had the most respect. "Well," the servant answered, and could not say more right away, fairly bursting with friendly laughter, "well, you needn't worry about getting rid of that thing next door. It's all been taken care of." Mrs. Samsa and Grete bent to their letters again, as if they wanted to continue writing. Mr. Samsa, who saw that the servant was about to begin describing everything in great detail, decisively headed this off with an outstretched hand. Since she was not going to be allowed to tell her story, she suddenly remembered her great haste, and, obviously deeply insulted, called out, "'Bye, everyone," then spun around wildly and left the apartment amidst a terrific slamming of doors.

"Tonight we're firing her," said Mr. Samsa, but received no answer either from his wife or from his daughter, for the servant seemed to have disturbed their but newly restored calm. They rose, went to the window, and remained there, their arms around each other. Mr. Samsa turned in his chair as they went and quietly observed them for a while. Then he called out, "Well, come over here. Let what's past be past. And take some care of me, for once." The women obeyed immediately, hurrying over to him and caressing him, and then quickly finished their letters.

Then all three of them left the apartment together, which they had not done for months, and took a trolley to the open air beyond the city. The car they sat in was drenched with warm sunlight. Leaning back comfortably in their seats, they discussed their future prospects, and it emerged that these were not at all bad on closer inspection, for all three of their positions were altogether favorable at present and, most importantly, had great potential for the future. The greatest improvement of their present situation would have to come, naturally, from a change of apartments. They would want a smaller and cheaper apartment, but one that was better located and generally more convenient than their current apartment, which Gregor had originally found for them. While they conversed in this way, it occurred to both Mr. and Mrs. Samsa in the same moment in looking at their ever more lively daughter that despite the recent ordeals that had made her cheeks so pale, she had blossomed into a pretty and well-developed young woman. Becoming quieter and almost unconsciously communicating through glances, they realized that it would soon be time to look for a good husband for her. And it seemed to them a confirmation of their new dreams and good intentions, when, at the end of their journey, their daughter rose first and stretched her young body.

Questions

1. The story opens, "When Gregor Samsa awoke in his bed one morning from unquiet dreams, he found himself transformed into an enormous insect." When you first read those lines, did you find them humorous? When did you begin to understand the serious intent, or did the fantastic or surreal situation make it difficult for you to take the story seriously?
2. How does Gregor's family treat him both before his metamorphosis and after? Consider how some things change and others stay the same.
3. How does Kafka's choice in making Gregor a traveling salesman contribute to a theme of the story? What details of Gregor's professional life do we learn? How might his profession connect to his turning into a bug? Consider Kafka's description of Gregor being "condemned to work at a company where the least infraction immediately attracted the greatest suspicion" (para. 15).
4. Among Gregor's responses to his transformation, we see anxiety, frustration, and surprise, but not shock. Why doesn't Kafka present Gregor as being horrified by the discovery that he is an insect?
5. How does each character react to Gregor? Discuss how those reactions help develop each character.
6. Speech—language—is central to the story. When Gregor first tries to speak, he is "terrified" because his "old voice" is mixed with "an irrepressible, painful, squeaking noise" (para. 7). How does Kafka develop this relationship between voice and power (or the lack of both)?
7. As Gregor listens to his sister playing the violin for the lodgers, he is "drawn by the music" (para. 73). Kafka writes, "The music gripped him—was he then an animal? He felt as if he were being guided to the sustenance he had unknowingly desired” (para. 74). How do you interpret this episode?

8. The story has powerfully moving and poignant scenes as well as humorous ones. What examples of humor do you perceive, and how do they contribute to the themes Kafka is developing?
9. Does the story end with an emotionally satisfying resolution? Is it a happy ending? Does Gregor’s life achieve meaning because he sacrifices himself for the family’s greater good? How do you interpret the last scene?
10. This story includes several transformations in addition to Gregor’s obvious one. What are they, and how do they contribute to the meaning of the story?
11. This story is divided into three sections, or segments, which might be considered chapters. What is the nature of these divisions? Are they chronological or something more complex?

To Max Brod

FRANZ KAFKA

Max Brod (1884–1968), born in Prague, met Kafka when the two were university students and became his lifelong friend, biographer, and literary executor. Defying Kafka’s instructions to destroy all of his papers upon his death, Brod later stated that he had told Kafka he would not honor this wish, thus reasoning that if Kafka had really wanted his papers destroyed, he would have appointed someone else as executor. Brod was a prolific writer himself but is primarily remembered as the biographer of Kafka and the editor of his collected letters and diaries.

To Max Brod

[Prague, October 7, 1912]

My dearest Max,

After writing well Sunday night—I could have written all through the night and the day and the night and the day, and finally have flown away, and could certainly have written well today also—one page, really just an exhalation of yesterday’s ten, is actually finished—I had to stop for the following reason: my brother-in-law, the manufacturer, this morning left for a business trip which is going to take from ten to fourteen days. (In my happy distraction I had scarcely noticed that this was impending.) During this period, the factory is actually left to the foreman alone, and no investor, especially so nervous a one as my father, would have any doubts that fraud must now be running rampant in the factory. For that matter, I think the same, though not so much because I am worried about the money as because I am uninformed and uneasy in conscience. But actually, even a neutral person, insofar as I can imagine one such, might see a certain justification for my father’s anxiety, although I should not forget that in the final analysis I do not at all see why a foreman from Germany would not be able to run everything with his usual efficiency even in the absence of my brother-in-law, to whom he is inordinately superior in all technical and organizational matters, for after all we are human beings and not thieves.

Now in addition to the foreman, my brother-in-law's younger brother is also here. Granted, he is a fool in all matters except business, and even in business matters to a considerable extent. But still he is competent, hard-working, attentive, a livewire, I might say. But of course he has to be in his office a great deal, and in addition manage the agency, for which purpose he has to run around the city half the day and therefore has little time left for the factory.

Recently, when I told you that nothing coming from outside could disturb my writing now (that, of course, was not so much boasting as an attempt to comfort myself), I was thinking only of how my mother whimpers to me almost every evening that I really should look in on the factory now and then to reassure Father, and of how my father has also said it to me much more strongly by looks and in other roundabout ways. In large part such pleas and reproofs were not without a certain rationale, for supervising Brother-in-law would certainly do him and the factory a great deal of good; except that I—and herein lay the irreducible irrationality of such talk—cannot perform any such supervision, even in my clearest states of mind.

For the next two weeks, however, that is not what is really involved. For this period, no more really is needed than any pair of eyes going about the factory, and even mine will do. There cannot be the slightest objection to this demand's being directed to me in particular, for in everybody's opinion I bear the chief blame for the establishment of the factory—though I must have assumed this blame in a dream—and in addition there is no one else around who could look into the factory, for my parents, who in any case would be out of the question, are in the midst of the busiest season at the store (the store also seems to be going better in its new location), and this afternoon, for example, my mother was not even home for dinner.

This evening, therefore, when my mother once again began with the old lament and, aside from blaming me for my father's bitterness and sickness, also brought up this new argument about Brother-in-law's departure and the orphaned state of the factory, and my youngest sister, who ordinarily sides with me, correctly sensing the change of feeling that I have recently had on this subject, and simultaneously displaying monstrous obtuseness, deserted me in my confrontation with Mother, and while bitterness—I don't know whether it was only gall—passed through my whole body—I realized with perfect clarity that now only two possibilities remain open to me, either to jump out of the window once everyone has gone to sleep, or in the next two weeks to go daily to the factory and to my brother-in-law's office. The first would provide me with the opportunity of shedding all responsibility, both for the disturbance of my writing and for the orphaned factory. The second would absolutely interrupt my writing—I cannot simply wipe from my eyes the sleep of fourteen nights—and would leave me, if I had enough strength of will and of hope, the prospect of possibly beginning again, in two weeks, where I left off today.

So I did not jump, and the temptations to make this a farewell letter (my ideas for it take another direction) are not very strong. I stood for a long time at the window and pressed against the pane, and there were many moments when it would have suited me to alarm the toll collector on the bridge by my fall. But all the while I really felt too firm to let the decision to smash myself to pieces on the pavement penetrate to the proper decisive depth. It also seemed to me that my staying alive interrupts my writing less than death—even if I can speak only, only of interruption—and that between the beginning of the novel and its continuation in two weeks somehow, in the factory especially and especially in relationship to my satisfied parents, I shall move and have my being within the innermost spaces of my novel.

Dearest Max, I am putting this whole thing before you not for your opinion, for of course you could have no opinion of it, but since I was firmly determined to jump without leaving a farewell letter—before the end one has a right to be just tired—I wanted, since I am about to step back into my room as its occupant, to write you instead a long letter of reunion, and here it is. And now just a kiss and goodnight, so that tomorrow I am a factory boss, as they demand.

Yours, Franz
[1912]

Questions

1. In what ways does Kafka's work situation resemble Gregor's?
2. What similarities do you find between Kafka's description of his family in this letter and those of Gregor's family in The Metamorphosis?
3. Explain whether you think Kafka presents his alternative identity as a writer as a transformation of his factory-worker self or as a conflict with it.

FRANZ KAFKA

To Kurt Wolff Verlag<sup>1</sup>

[Prague, October 25, 1915]

Dear Sir,

You recently mentioned that Ottomar Starke is going to do a drawing for the title page of Metamorphosis. . . . This prospect has given me a minor and perhaps unnecessary fright. It struck me that Starke, as an illustrator, might want to draw the insect itself. Not that, please not that! I do not want to restrict him, but only to make this plea out of my deeper knowledge of the story. The insect itself cannot be depicted. It cannot even be shown from a distance. Perhaps there is no such intention and my plea can be dismissed with a smile—so much the better. But I would be very grateful if you would pass along my request and make it more emphatic. If I were to offer suggestions for an illustration, I would choose such scenes as the following:

the parents and the head clerk in front of the locked door, or even better, the parents and the sister in the lighted room, with the door open upon the adjoining room that lies in darkness.

I imagine you have already received the proofs and the reviews.

With best regards, sincerely yours, Franz Kafka

[1915]

Questions

1. Why do you think Kafka did not want the insect drawn or even shown at a distance? How would such a title page affect your experience of reading The Metamorphosis?
2. Consider Kafka's two suggestions for illustrations. Why are they fitting? What does each one communicate? Which one would be better?

From Kafka

DAVID ZANE MAIROWITZ AND ROBERT CRUMB

David Zane Mairowitz (b. 1943) is a well-known Kafka scholar and freelance writer, who founded the International Times. Robert Crumb (b. 1943) is an artist and illustrator celebrated for his counterculture views of America and his founding of the "American comix movement." Creator of such characters as Devil Girl and Fritz the Cat, he was the subject of Terry Zwigoff's 1994 documentary Crumb. The following excerpt is taken from Kafka, also known as Kafka for Beginners, an illustrated biography with comic adaptations of some of Kafka's most famous works, including The Metamorphosis. The first part of this selection discusses the dominating influence of Kafka's father, a strong authority figure in the writer's life; the second part includes panels from their retelling of The Metamorphosis.

Those who knew Kafka well felt he lived behind a “glass wall.” He was there, smiling, kindly, a good listener, a faithful friend and yet, somehow, inaccessible. A jumble of complexes and neuroses, he managed to give the impression of distance, grace, serenity and, at times, even saintliness.

His capacity for swallowing his fear of others and turning this against himself, rather than against its source is the stuff of all his work. Nowhere is the more apparent than in his relation to this man...

Hermann Kafka (1852-1931)

Kafka lived with his parents nearly all his life (even when he was financially independent and could have moved out), in very close quarters where his hyper-sensitivity to noise was put to the test on a daily basis. For Kafka Senior, a giant of a man, his son was a failure and a Schlemiel (good-for-nothing), a grave disappointment. He never hesitated to let him know.

And at the dinner table...

Kafka's lifelong awe in the face of superior power, made famous in the novels The Trial and The Castle, begins with Hermann Kafka. He feared and hated his teachers at school, but had to see them as "Respektspersonen," to be respected for no other reason than that they were in positions of authority.

But he never rebelled. Instead, he turned his fear into a self-abasement or psychosomatic illness. In every contretemps with authority, he made himself the guilty party. Moreover, as in the classical relationship between master and slave, between colonizer and colonized, he began to see himself through his father's eyes.

Samsa, a traveling salesman, was the family's provider. Because of him, his father had been able to retire, and his sister could expect to study the violin at the music conservatory.

For this reason, the first person to witness his change, along with his family, was the Chief Clerk of his firm, who had arrived because Gregor, for the first time in his life, was late for work.

Questions

1. What do the illustrations add to the details about Kafka's life? Which did you go to first—illustrations or written text? Why?
2. The graphic retelling of The Metamorphosis includes quotations from Kafka and illustrations but also summary (comments, which you will notice, Kuper does not include in his rendition, which follows). Are these helpful or distracting? Explain. Is it easy to determine which are directly from Kafka?
3. What do you think Mairowitz, who is accustomed to writing for scholarly audiences of his peers, hoped to accomplish with this collaboration with Crumb? Do you think it should add to or detract from his reputation in the academic world?

PETER KUPER

Peter Kuper (b. 1958) is an award-winning cartoonist and illustrator known for his social and political commentary. His illustrations appear regularly in numerous magazines, including Time, Newsweek, and Mad, for which he draws "Spy vs. Spy" every month. He graduated with a BA from Kent State University in Cleveland, Ohio, and studied at the Parsons School of Design and the Pratt Institute in New York City. His most recent books are graphic-novel adaptations of The Metamorphosis and Upton Sinclair's The Jungle. His wordless graphic novel Sticks and Stones was awarded the gold medal in the sequential arts category in the 2004 Society of Illustrators competition. In 2007, he published Stop Forgetting to Remember: The Autobiography of Walter Kurtz, a semiautobiographical work on the struggle to balance being a husband, father, friend, and artist in the contemporary world.

THE INTRODUCTION

In 1904, eight years before Franz Kafka wrote The Metamorphosis in Prague, across the ocean a cartoonist named Winsor McCay created "Dream of the Rarebit Fiend," a comic strip that appeared in New York's Evening Telegram. In each one-page installment a character was trapped in a world that grew more surreal with each panel—a gentleman's leg inflates and demolishes a mansion, a suitor's lover crumbles into confetti and blows away, a lady's alligator handbag morphs into a monster and devours her. Finally, in the last panel, the character awakens to reality, vowing never again to eat the nightmare-inducing rarebit cheese before bedtime.

Of course, Franz Kafka never allowed his characters to enjoy the relief of awakening to normalcy from their disturbing dreams. Still, the two artists had much in common, including a shared genius for rendering the anxious intersection of reality and dreamscape. Kafka may never have been a comic strip fan, but his angst-ridden characters in reality-bending scenarios are ideally suited to this medium. This adaptation of The Metamorphosis couldn't exist without Kafka's illuminating words, but owes a visual debt to McCay's trailblazing excursions into the absurd darkness of slumberland. I have drawn tremendous inspiration from both these pioneers, fascinated by their ability to address our human condition with unexpected twists, brilliant artistry, and deadpan humor.

Nearly a century later, the works of Kafka and McCay seem as fresh as if they were created to reflect our current zeitgeist. Kafka's tales of nightmare trials and monolithic bureaucracies feel no more surreal than headlines from our daily newspapers. It makes one wish that simply avoiding rarebit cheese were the remedy.

—Peter Kuper

ADAPTED BY PETER KUPER

When Gregor Samsa
awoke one morning from disturbing dreams,
he found himself
transformed . . .

It was no dream.

W-What's happened to me?

But that was out of the question. Gregor was used to sleeping on his right side and in his present condition it was impossible to get into that position.

Day after day, it's the same story...

All the pressures of travel, worrying about train connections ...

Eating miserable food on the run ...

A parade of new faces, with no lasting relationships or greater intimacy ...

Other traveling salesmen live like harem women. For instance, when I get back to the hotel to write up the orders I've taken that morning, these fellows are just sitting down to have breakfast.

The change in Gregor's voice must have been muffled by the wooden door because his mother was reassured and shuffled off. However, their little exchange made his father and sister aware that Gregor had not, as they assumed, left for work.

But Gregor had no intention of unlocking the door and felt thankful for the habit he had acquired as a traveling salesman of bolting it at night, even when he was at home.

Certain that the change in his voice was merely the first sign of a bad cold, Gregor decided to get up, get dressed, and most important, have a good breakfast.

First he tried to arise by moving the lower part of his body...

But this proved to be too sensitive.

Then he tried moving his upper body...

But then he feared if he fell, it would take a miracle not to injure his head.

Back where he started, he lay there expecting, perhaps, everything would simply return to normal.

Herr Samsa, this behavior is shocking,
SHOCKING!
I must demand an immediate explanation!

I am astonished,
ASTONISHED!
I thought you were
a reasonable person!

I had planned to say this in private,
but you've given me no choice.
On behalf of your employer I must tell you, your performance at work has been most unsatisfactory and your job is not at all secure.

Gregor knew if the manager left in this mood, it would seriously jeopardize his job.

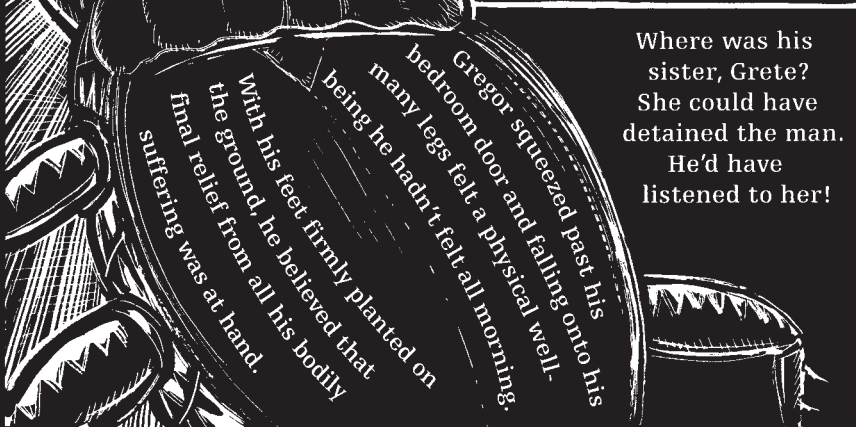

His parents didn't understand this, they were too preoccupied with their own immediate troubles.

Where was his sister, Grete? She could have detained the man. He'd have listened to her!

Gregor squeezed past his bedroom door and falling onto his many legs felt a physical well-being he hadn't felt all morning. With his feet firmly planted on the ground, he believed that final relief was at hand.

Questions

1. How would you describe the illustrations? Are they humorous? frightening? exaggerated? realistic? Do they confirm or conflict with your interpretation of The Metamorphosis? Why do you think Kuper chose to illustrate in black and white rather than in color? Explain whether you think his choice was effective.
2. Even though Kuper uses Kafka's language, he does not include every word. Follow along closely for a few pages and comment on his selections. Has he chosen well? Do the illustrations make up for what he has left out?
3. Explain why you would or would not find it difficult to follow the plot if you had not already read Kafka.
4. Do you see the characters other than Gregor as caricatures, or are they developed through both visual and written text as fully as they are in Kafka's original? Explain your response with specific reference to the two texts.
5. Kuper employs different fonts to indicate the sound of voices. Explain why this is or is not effective in conveying character.
6. How does Kuper visually translate symbols from Kafka's Metamorphosis, such as the alarm clock, or doors and locks? Does the visual representation make these symbols more powerful or too obvious?
7. A fiction writer has many tools and strategies available to develop plot, character, and setting. After reading Kuper's Metamorphosis, which of these three do you think is most challenging for the graphic novelist to develop?
8. A reviewer for the Chicago Tribune described Kuper's book as "a fully realized effort meant to be read as literature, albeit a kind of literature we haven't seen before." Do you think it is literature? Explain.

PETER KUPER ON THE METAMORPHOSIS

Renée Shea (RS): Why The Metamorphosis? Is it just a personal favorite of yours? Do you think it's especially powerful? The only other classic that you've done, as far as I can find, is The Jungle.

Peter Kuper (PK): The Metamorphosis seemed like a natural for comics. Kafka's imagery immediately gave me ideas for unusual ways of storytelling. His words acted as an anchor that allowed me to go wild visually while being grounded enough to not lose the reader. I had previously done a collection of nine of Kafka's short stories in a book called Give It Up! I found that his work translated so perfectly into comics that they seemed to draw themselves. Metamorphosis was the opportunity to do this kind of translation in a longer form.

RS: Why do you think Kafka's novella has weathered nearly a century so well? It's been a play, some film possibilities, now the novel—and it's remained required reading in high schools and colleges for decades. What's the lasting appeal?

PK: Feeling trapped by work, out of control, powerless, at odds with members of your family—who can't relate to that? It is about our human condition, and that isn't changing anytime soon. In fact, the world has only been getting more Kafkaesque.

RS: You've been very faithful to Kafka's text in your graphic retelling. Is changing the medium sufficiently creative for you? Did you have to resist changing details of the story?

PK: Yes, Kafka's inventions and the ground he covers gave me more than enough to work with. Transforming the text into a comic was already going pretty far; I wasn't looking to change anything—that would have been (even more) sacrilegious.

RS: That being said, the illustrations are themselves an interpretation of Kafka's Metamorphosis. What element(s) of your own interpretation—or, as you describe it, “adaptation”—do you think are most important in your graphic-novel version?

PK: I wanted to maintain the humor in the story. It probably depends on your sense of humor whether you find anything funny about Kafka's stories; I think they are often hilarious. The three roomers that appear later in the story are one good example—they would be comfortable in a Marx Brothers film.

RS: You've written that Kafka's “angst-ridden character in reality-bending scenarios are ideally suited to this medium.” Can you explain what you mean in more detail?

PK: In comics you can visually create a world, and the parameters can be stretched and bent and still feel like a reality. Although with CGI (computer-generated imagery), animated movies are blurring the line between what's real and what's drawn, this can be done seamlessly in a comic. You can create your own logic, and the surreal becomes reality. Kafka had already achieved this with his story. I used this as a springboard to demonstrate the possible ways a series of images can tell that story. Mine is only one interpretation. There are a million different ways his story could be told in comics.

10

RS: Your graphic novel captures the irony of Kafka and the dark humor, but it is not funny like your other adaptation of this story: “Metamorphosis Simpsons.” What was your intent with this Simpsons take on Kafka? Is this poking fun at Kafka's wide appeal (as if everyone knows the story), taking the satire in a more contemporary direction, devaluing it . . . ?

PK: This is one of the fundamental aspects of The Simpsons—taking sacred cows and serving them up as deliciously cooked humor. This is a lesson that Mad magazine taught so many of us and that led to shows like SNL and The Simpsons and the newspaper, the Onion. I'm just doing as I was taught by Alfred E. Neuman, and when the opportunity came up to do a Simpsons "Treehouse of Horror" story, Metamorphosis was a perfect sacred cow.

RS: In a letter to his publisher, Kafka expressed dismay about the original cover illustration and indicated that he did not want Gregor to be drawn. How do you respond to Kafka's concern?

PK: Kafka also told the executor of his will, Max Brod, to burn all of his unpublished manuscripts. I figured if his best friend could ignore him, I could do the same. Since I knew I was going to show Gregor on the inside of the book, I had already crossed Kafka's line. Actually, in my original cover design, I wanted to have the title printed on a translucent dust jacket (the paper cover that wraps around hardcover books), with the image of Gregor Samsa printed on the book itself. This way he would be out of focus; the only way you could see the bug was by lifting the dust jacket. This would have made the reader responsible for the unveiling. Unfortunately, like so many ideas, it was rejected because of cost.

RS: In a headnote to an interview, Michael Lorah described you as "undoubtedly the modern master whose work has refined the socially relevant comic to the highest point yet achieved." Why do you think Kafka's The Metamorphosis is "socially relevant" in the twenty-first century?

PK: Kafka's writing as a whole is incredibly relevant in our modern world. The term Kafkaesque is still regularly applied to acts by our politicians, our laws, and our daily experience with bureaucracies. The Metamorphosis is a great example of social critique.

RS: Do you think Gregor's is the quintessential adolescent consciousness? He hears people and he responds to them, but they don't understand. "Because no one could understand him, it didn't occur to anyone . . . that he could understand them. . . ." His body's out of control, alien to him. His family is embarrassed, then repulsed, by him, can't accept him as he is; sounds like a teenager to me!

PK: Sounds like the teenage hell we all went through—some more than others, of course, but I personally felt Kafka would have been a good choice to write about my adolescent experience.

RS: My students and I don't always agree about the purpose of retellings, particularly the visual ones. My assumption is that graphic retellings are a step toward the original, perhaps meant to whet the appetite for the original work; my students disagree, claiming that these works have their own life—and purpose. (One called your graphic retelling “a celebration of Kafka.”) But then what's the point? Is the audience for your Metamorphosis those who've read the original, those who will read the original after reading your graphic novel, or those whose understanding of Kafka will come exclusively from your adaptation?

PK: This can certainly be a problem, the same way that seeing a movie can replace people's desire to go out and read the book. Ideally everybody starts with the source material, and then they are in a position to judge how well the adaptation has done in capturing the original.

In the same way that music videos can get in the way of one's own images and associations with a song, I fear I may be guilty of this and hope the vengeful literary gods will pardon my intrusion. On the other hand, if someone who had never heard of Kafka came to his work through my adaptation, I may have helped someone discover Kafka's other writings. Having spent so many years working in an art form that has been considered “low art” only to be reevaluated as something higher, I find those distinctions to be faulty. Time has a way of adjusting these measures.

RS: Okay, I can't resist this one. David Foster Wallace writes about why students don't “get” Kafka's humor: “No wonder they cannot appreciate the really central Kafka joke: that the horrific struggle to establish a human self results in a self whose humanity is inseparable from that horrific struggle.” Do you agree with him?

PK: As I said earlier, whether you find Kafka's stories to be funny depends on your sense of humor. To me, the best humor has a dark edge. If people can laugh at the Onion's headlines about our modern horrors and what George Carlin had to say about the various ways we are doomed as a species, then Kafka isn't a stretch. It seems as if our times, for better and worse, are only going to produce more students who will find humor in the face of our waking nightmares. Sometimes that is the only way to survive.

Follow-Up

1. What elements or themes of Kafka's Metamorphosis are most important to Kuper?
2. Where does Kuper find humor in Kafka's Metamorphosis? How does he define that humor?

3. What do you think Kuper means when he describes comics as enabling artists to “create [their] own logic, and the surreal becomes reality” (para. 10)?
4. Does Kuper believe that his graphic novel will change how people read Kafka’s Metamorphosis?

Entering the Conversation

As you develop a response to one of the following questions, refer to the texts you have read in this section. You may also draw on your own experience or knowledge relating to comics, Kafka, and The Metamorphosis.

1. Compare and contrast the first part of the original story by Kafka with Kuper’s graphic retelling. Kuper uses actual text from the story, yet his illustrations are themselves an interpretation. Explain which of Kafka’s ideas or themes Kuper emphasizes, as well as instances where he departs from Kafka’s intent.
2. Choosing one theme from The Metamorphosis, explain why you think it remains compelling for readers today. Then compare how Kafka’s treatment of this theme is similar to or different from the way another artist in this Conversation treats the same theme.
3. Who is the audience for these retellings? Explain why you think the audience consists of those who’ve already read Kafka, those who will be motivated to read Kafka, or those who will read only the retelling. Pay special attention to young readers of today. Consider Kuper’s graphic novel along with at least one of the other retellings.
4. Who is more sympathetic toward Gregor—Kafka, Mairowitz and Crumb, or Kuper? Consider the role of humor in the depictions. Be very specific in using references to the texts to support your interpretation.
5. In an essay entitled “Kafka and The Metamorphosis,” John Updike commented on why he felt that any visual representation of Gregor was doomed:

Any theatrical or cinematic version of the story must founder on this point of external representation: A concrete image of the insect would be too distracting and shut off sympathy; such a version would lack the very heart of comedy and pathos which beats in the unsteady area between objective and subjective, where Gregor’s insect and human selves swayingly struggle. Still half-asleep, he notes his extraordinary condition yet persists in remembering and trying to fulfill his duties as a travelling salesman and the mainstay of this household. Later, relegated by the family to the shadows of a room turned storage closet, he responds to violin music and creeps forward, covered with dust and trailing remnants of food, to claim his sister’s love. Such scenes could not be done except with words. In this age that lives and dies by the visual, The Metamorphosis stands as a narrative absolutely literary, able to exist only where language and the mind's hazy wealth of imagery intersect.

Write an essay explaining what Updike's position is and why you agree or disagree with it. Use several sources from the Conversation in your analysis.

6. Write an essay supporting, challenging, or modifying the claim made in the following quotation by Iris Bruce in her essay "Kafka and Popular Culture." Refer to Kafka's novella and at least two other texts in your analysis:

Kafka's writings are a good example of how iconic texts that used to belong to "high culture" can be "reborn" in popular culture in generically different formats. . . . Kafka's phenomenal rebirth is in itself a stunning metamorphosis. Here we have a writer who has successfully bridged the gap between high and popular culture, whose name is recognized by people who have never read one of his novels: the word "Kafkaesque" has entered into everyday speech and taken on iconic value. However, this success has come at a cost . . . ; perhaps this is simply an example of capitalism's endless ability to transform important ideas and images into "catchy" popular icons for the thrill-hungry public. The unsettling and threatening possibilities inherent in the insect metaphor, for example, derive from deeply rooted anxieties, primal and contemporary at the same time; not incidentally, they also offer up new images for consumption in the insatiable cultural marketplace.

7. Write a dialogue between Franz Kafka and Peter Kuper. Imagine how Kafka would respond to Kuper's graphic versions of The Metamorphosis. You may invent and create dialogue as well as quote from Kafka's letter and the interview with Kuper.
8. Develop your own interpretation of The Metamorphosis using multimedia tools—audio, visual, or both. Explain why you made the choices you did.

Student Writing

Close Reading Drama

The student essay below was written as a timed response to the following prompt.

Using Hamlet's soliloquy from act IV, scene iv, lines 32–66, as your text, explain how it encompasses the larger themes in Hamlet and the universal truths that the play explores.

Hamlet's Internal Struggle

Kevin Carrig

In Hamlet, the title character is often used by Shakespeare to bring key themes to the fore and explore them. In this soliloquy, we find that Hamlet is having two common human experiences—he feels compassion toward other human beings as well as the desire for revenge against Claudius for killing his father. Unfortunately, these emotions, while equally universal, nevertheless pull in opposite directions. This soliloquy explores this conflict in depth, so that an analysis of the soliloquy will illuminate this internal struggle, which in turn is essential to understanding Hamlet as a play.

The soliloquy is marked by Hamlet's self-criticism, which focuses on his inability to act on his desires to plot for revenge. These decisions — not to take action against his uncle Claudius — are, he tells us, "one part wisdom / And ever three parts coward." Hamlet is experiencing the inability to reconcile his natural feelings of human sympathy with his beliefs that he is justified in seeking revenge on Claudius, so that even though he hates Claudius for killing his father and believes that he ought to be punished, he cannot escape human compassion. Thus, through this self-criticism, Shakespeare demonstrates that humans are by their nature good. Violence is contradictory to the plan of the god "that made us with such large discourse."

Hamlet's internal struggle is parallel to the physical struggle of the soldiers in the soliloquy, described as fighting over a small piece of land. In his appeal to those witnessing his downfall, Hamlet characterizes the war over the land as a "fight for a plot / Whereon the numbers cannot try the cause." By portraying the battle as ultimately pointless, Hamlet is communicating another universal truth: that the ends do not justify the means. While he may seem to have every reason in the world to kill Claudius, he realizes that the guilt that is felt in the course of seeking revenge is telling — it suggests that there are certain actions we cannot find it in ourselves to condone, no matter how merited the end products of those actions seem to be. Hamlet, here, is conveying that it is in our nature to look beyond the immediate repercussions of an act, thus pointing to the frailty of human decision making in this context.

In a final appeal to his constituents, Hamlet grapples with fundamental questions about the meaning of life. In the first section of the soliloquy, he compares himself with an animal and reflects on the paradoxical inability of humans to act on their desires. He questions the very purpose of rational beings, asking, "What is a man, / If his chief good and market of his time / Be but to sleep and feed?" For a creature overwhelmed with certain desires, that he cannot act on those desires because of another part of his nature reduces him to the status of an animal. Thus, Hamlet's winding road is one marked by a question of human nature and the degree to which emotion constitutes life as a whole.

Torn between compassion and revenge, Hamlet demonstrates a constant struggle between different human inclinations. In the fight over whether or not to take revenge, Hamlet is his own biggest foe. He is forced to choose between the lesser of two evils: murder and self-loathing. In this, Hamlet is as much a victim as Claudius. Seeing these two themes drawn out this way can give readers a greater appreciation for the themes in the play as a whole.

Questions

1. How might the student revise the first paragraph to address the prompt more clearly and directly?
2. Identify areas where more precise diction and clear expression would improve the essay. How would you advise the student to revise those areas?
3. Identify areas in the essay that require greater specificity. How would you advise the student to revise those areas?
4. The student uses “thus” twice, suggesting conclusions based on logical reasoning and supporting evidence. Is this word used appropriately? Is there enough support to warrant its use? What additional supporting evidence would bring greater cogency to the conclusions this word introduces?
5. Consider the verbs the student uses, noting several instances of passive voice and state-of-being verbs. Change these verbs to action verbs. What do these changes bring to the revised essay?
6. Is the student’s interpretation of the soliloquy sound? How effectively do you think this essay discusses the “larger themes” and “universal truths” that the prompt directs the student to address? How successfully does the essay deliver its intended meaning?

The Writer’s Craft—Close Reading

Tone

When we read sophisticated, challenging literature, perhaps the most elusive feature of the work is tone—defined as the attitude of the speaker toward his or her subject. In conversation, we communicate tone by varying our inflections, raising or lowering our volume and pitch, emphasizing certain words and phrases, and using gestures and facial expressions. Think of a phrase as simple as “Well, thanks,” and imagine how the tone could vary from enthusiastic to sincere to surprised to sarcastic. Or consider this response to a marriage proposal: “You’re asking me to marry you?” The speaker might be replying in a tone of outraged disbelief or one of unalloyed joy. The tone in these examples would be made clear by the sound of the person’s voice and his or her physical cues. Writers, however, must create and convey tone solely through words appearing on a printed page—or a computer screen—where readers need to “hear” the speaker’s voice. When we read to ourselves, we need to internalize the sound of the text, listening with our “inner ear,” as it were. We may ask, is the voice serious, ironic, facetious, or somber? Does it encourage, complain, admonish, or exhort? When we hear the text correctly—that is, when we pick up on the implied attitude—we are recognizing the tone.

Tone, then, is produced by details and descriptions; diction, especially the connotations of the words chosen; the arrangement of the words, including syntax or sounds resulting through juxtaposition or meter; imagery and figurative language; overall structure, whether in sentences or stanzas; and especially context. In other words, to determine the tone of a poem or prose passage, readers have to pay attention to all the choices a writer makes.

Author versus Speaker

When thinking about tone, it's important to remember that in literature, the speaker, whether a narrator or specific character, is not necessarily the author. Often an author will speak through a persona, or "mask," which is the voice and viewpoint an author adopts to deliver a story or poem. In other instances, the author might speak through a character. If you have read Jonathan Swift's essay "A Modest Proposal," for example, or watched The Colbert Report, you know that there is a difference between author and speaker, person and persona.

In drama, where there is little or no third-person narration and exposition, it is through tone that an author gives us insight into the characters' thoughts and feelings. Listen to Hamlet as he reflects on the quickness with which his mother remarried after his father's death:

O, most wicked speed, to post / With such dexterity to incestuous sheets!
(I.ii.156–57)

Listen closely to the sound of the language Shakespeare wrote for his character, Hamlet. The s sounds spit the venomous words out. The reader knows right away the poison and bitterness with which Hamlet, not Shakespeare, is filled; thus has Shakespeare prepared the reader for Hamlet's future language and behavior.

Style and Tone

Whether you are reading poetry or prose, the small choices in diction, imagery, figurative language, and syntax are the most important guides to understanding the work's tone and, ultimately, to interpreting the work's meaning. Let's look at an excerpt from "Her Kind" by Anne Sexton. The poem begins:

I have gone out, a possessed witch,
haunting the black air, braver at night;
dreaming evil, I have done my hitch
over the plain houses, light by light:
lonely thing, twelve-fingered, out of mind.
A woman like that is not a woman, quite.
I have been her kind.

The first thing that we might determine when thinking about tone is whether it is positive or negative; from there, we can fine-tune our reading. For instance, if we read through this poem quickly, we might think that the tone is positive: the speaker is reveling in being a witch. After all, what would make a witch happier than flying high above the plain (boring) houses on her broom at night, feeling brave, and “dreaming evil”? We could say that the tone is not only positive but also exultant and empowered. But why, then, is she called a “lonely thing” in line 5? This line simply doesn’t fit with a positive interpretation. Like a good juror, a good reader does not ignore evidence. Let’s look more carefully to arrive at a fuller understanding of the tone of this poem.

Do other choices in the poem reinforce the idea that it carries a lonesome tone? What do these choices add to it? In line 2, the witch admits that she’s “braver at night.” The use of the comparative “braver” makes us wonder why she isn’t as brave during the day, when the world is awake and people are out and about. Perhaps it’s because she is “twelve-fingered”? Whether we take this description literally or figuratively, it tells us that this witch is not a rebel but an outcast. Now the “plain houses” that she passes over become symbols of a normal life that is denied her. The tone has become not just one of loneliness but one of bitter longing for what’s below: the life of a woman, not that of a witch. As you can see, an investigation into the tone of a poem can very quickly lead to an interpretation of the entire piece.

Shifts in Tone

Tone is rarely consistent throughout a work of literature. Authors may use shifts in tone to add another layer of meaning to a literary text. In Chapter 2, we discussed “turns,” or places in a poem or passage that shift or change. These pivot points are frequently the heart of the interpretive matter, and very often what is shifting is the tone. Let’s look at an example from “Song: To the Men of England” by Percy Bysshe Shelley. The poem begins:

Men of England, wherefore plough
For the lords who lay ye low?
Wherefore weave with toil and care
The rich robes your tyrants wear?

In these lines, the pleading, urging tone of the speaker’s rhetorical questions is designed to enjoin his readers to action. The first six quatrains of the poem continue to speak in the encouraging, hortatory tone established in the first stanza, as the speaker pleads with his readers to change their lives; then the tone shifts for the final two stanzas, becoming admonitory and ironic, as if scolding any reader who is resigned, frustrated, and dismissive of his call to action. Note the shift from stanza 6 to stanzas 7 and 8:

Sow seed—but let no tyrant reap;
Find wealth—let no impostor heap;
Weave robes—let not the idle wear;
Forge arms—in your defence to bear.

Shrink to your cellars, holes, and cells—
In halls ye deck another dwells.
Why shake the chains ye wrought? Ye see
The steel ye tempered glance on ye.

With plough and spade and hoe and loom
Trace your grave and build your tomb
And weave your winding-sheet — till fair
England be your Sepulchre.

Tone in Fiction

In addition to using tone to convey their meaning, authors of fiction and other narratives use tone to subtly develop settings, characters, and even themes. Let's take a look at a passage from the contemporary short story "Admiral":

Nothing had changed in the paneled room that gave onto the garden, not as far as Nisha could see. There were the immense old high-backed leather armchairs and the antique Stickley sofa rescued from the law offices of Striker and Striker, the mahogany bar with the wine rack and the backlit shrine Mr. Striker had created in homage to the spirits of single-malt whisky, and overseeing it all, the oil portrait of Admiral with its dark heroic hues and golden patina of varnish. (para. 6)

The imagery here is key to understanding the tone. The passage begins with a posh, stately description of the room and the furniture, and then juxtaposes it with "the backlit shrine" in "homage" to the "spirits" of the whisky. By putting an ironic spin on shrine, homage, and especially spirits, evoking its double meaning, Boyle mocks the solemnity of the scene. In the course of describing the room—the setting—the author is also creating characters. He shows us Nisha's impressions as she takes in the setting. It clearly differs from her own home, suggesting a radical difference between her life and that of her employers. If the reader is still unsure of whether this scene is regal or ridiculous, the final phrase clears it up, for "overseeing it all," "heroic" and "golden," is the portrait of a dog! The reader also begins to understand the relationship between Mr. Striker and Nisha as Boyle presents the irony of characters who "worship" their possessions and even their dog but aren't much interested in the lives of people other than themselves. The passage suggests the awkward and static position of Nisha, confronted with the unchanging scene before her and the solipsistic nature of the Strikers. Through all of this, the story's themes are also being developed: themes concerning the selfishness of the characters, the foolishness of trying to stop time, and the perversity of worshipping a dead dog.

Words That Describe Tone

There are nearly endless ways to describe tone. You'll often need more than one word—perhaps an adverb and adjective combination (bitterly angry, humorously proud) or a contrasting pair (admiring yet envious, distant but loving). Following is a list of words that provides a good place to start. Each of these adjectives is useful for describing tones that you will encounter in literature. After looking up any that you don't know, separate them into two categories, one positive and one negative. Choose one of the stories from this chapter, and apply two of the words from the list to each of the main characters and three of the words to the narrator. Add to this list as you continue to read literature and respond to tone.

solemn	sad	generous	somber	grave didactic	audacious	mocking	dispassionate	resigned
acidulous	bitter	dreamy	pedantic	reflective earnest	caustic	pitiful	elevated	lofty candid	nostalgic	wistful	questioning	colloquial
detached	sentimental	apologetic	objective	lugubrious
restrained	enthusiastic	urbane	facetious	ambivalent
melancholy	sarcastic	playful	apprehensive	elegiac
acerbic	bitter	aloof	irreverent	sardonic
indignant	argumentative	scornful	pensive	incredulous
insistent	self-deprecating	familiar	maudlin	diffident
disinterested	condescending	sanguine	bemused	ecstatic
speculative	laudatory	strident	grim	mournful
contentious	cynical	self-assured	forthright	admonitory
contemptuous	urgent	poignant	zealous	giddy
querulous	polemical	insipid	stolid	callow

The following exercises will help you discern tone and understand how it contributes to meaning.

• EXERCISE 1 •

The tone of “Homage to My Hips” by Lucille Clifton can be characterized as confident—and then some. That confidence might be interpreted variously as humorous, rebellious, mocking, sexy, teasing, angry, aggressive, and so forth. Perform the poem in a way that conveys your interpretation of the poem’s tone.

• EXERCISE 2 •

For each of the following passages, identify the tone or tones, explain how the text delivers the tone(s), and explain how tone contributes to meaning.

1. CLAUDIUS:

’Tis sweet and commendable in your nature, Hamlet,
To give these mourning duties to your father:

But, you must know, your father lost a father;
 That father lost, lost his, and the survivor bound
 In filial obligation for some term
 To do obsequious sorrow: but to persever
 In obstinate condolement is a course
 Of impious stubbornness; 'tis unmanly grief;
 It shows a will most incorrect to heaven,
 A heart unfortified, a mind impatient,
 An understanding simple and unschool'd:
 For what we know must be and is as common
 As any the most vulgar thing to sense,
 Why should we in our peevish opposition
 Take it to heart? Fie! 'tis a fault to heaven,
 A fault against the dead, a fault to nature,
 To reason most absurd; whose common theme
 Is death of fathers, and who still hath cried,
 From the first corse till he that died to-day,
 "This must be so." We pray you, throw to earth
 This unprevailing woe, and think of us
 As of a father. (Hamlet, I.ii.87–108)

2. OPHELIA:

O, what a noble mind is here o'er-thrown!
 The courtier's, soldier's, scholar's, eye, tongue, sword;
 Th' expectancy and rose of the fair state,
 The glass of fashion and the mould of form,
 Th' observ'd of all observers, quite, quite, down!
 And I, of ladies most deject and wretched,
 That suck'd the honey of his music vows,
 Now see that noble and most sovereign reason
 Like sweet bells jangled, out of time and harsh;
 That unmatch'd form and feature of blown youth
 Blasted with ecstasy: O, woe is me,
 T' have seen what I have seen, see what I see! (Hamlet, III.i. 141–52)

3. I had always thought that my father's only ordeal was that he'd left his country and moved to a place where everything from the climate to the language was so unlike his own, a place where he never quite seemed to fit in, never appeared to belong. The only thing I can grasp now, as I drive way beyond the speed limit down yet another highway, is why the unfamiliar might have been so comforting, rather than distressing, to my father. And why he has never wanted the person he was, is, permanently documented in any way. He taught himself to appreciate the enormous weight of permanent markers by learning about the Ancient Egyptians. He had gotten to know them, through their crypts and monuments, in a way that he wanted no one to know him, no one except my mother and me, we, who are now his kas, his good angels, his masks against his own face. ("The Book of the Dead," para. 214)

4. As for the dog, she tried to be conscientious about the whole business of imprinting it with the past—or a past—though she felt ridiculous. Four years of college for this? Wars were being fought, people were starving, there were diseases to conquer, children to educate, good to do in the world, and here she was reliving her adolescence in the company of an inbred semi-retarded clown of a cloned Afghan hound because two childless rich people decreed it should be so. All right. She knew she'd have to move on. Knew it was temporary. Swore that she'd work up a new résumé and start sending it out—but then the face of her mother, sick from vomiting and with her scalp as smooth and slick as an eggplant, would rise up to shame her. She threw the ball to the dog. Took him to the park. Let the days fall round her like leaves from a dying tree. ("Admiral," para. 63)
5. Nwamgba was the first one to ask a question: Had they brought their guns, by any chance, the ones used to destroy the people of Agueke, and could she see one? The man said unhappily that it was the soldiers of the British government and the merchants of the Royal Niger Company who destroyed villages; they, instead, brought good news. He spoke about their god, who had come to the world to die, and who had a son but no wife, and who was three but also one. Many of the people around Nwamgba laughed loudly. Some walked away, because they had imagined that the white man was full of wisdom. Others stayed and offered cool bowls of water. ("The Headstrong Historian," para. 12)
6. But what should he do now? The next train left at seven o'clock. In order to catch that one, he'd have to rush like a madman, and his samples weren't packed up yet. He hardly felt alert or energetic enough. And even if he caught the train, he wouldn't avoid the Director's wrath, because the office porter had been waiting at the five-o'clock train and would long since have reported his failure to appear. The porter was completely under the Director's thumb—he had neither a backbone nor brains. What if Gregor were to report himself sick? But that would be highly awkward and suspicious, because he had not been sick once in five years of service. The Director would certainly come with the insurance doctor. He would reproach his parents for their lazy son and dismiss all rejoinders by referring them to the doctor, who considered all people completely healthy, but work-averse. And would he be so wrong in this case? Gregor actually felt completely fine, despite a fatigue completely unwarranted after such a long sleep. He even had a powerful appetite. (The Metamorphosis, para. 6)
7. "I don't agree," said W.E.B.,
 "If I should have the drive to seek
 Knowledge of chemistry or Greek,
 I'll do it. Charles and Miss can look

Another place for hand or cook.
 Some men rejoice in skill of hand,
 And some in cultivating land,
 But there are others who maintain
 The right to cultivate the brain.” (“Booker T. and W.E.B.,” ll. 8–16)

8. Who cares what it’s all about?
 I do! Edgar Allan Poe cares! Shelley cares! Beethoven & Dylan care.
 Do you care? What are you about or are you a human being with 10 fingers and two eyes? (“Is About,” ll. 21–24)

• EXERCISE 3 •

In the following soliloquy (I.v.98–108), Hamlet’s tone shifts dramatically, whether because he is mad or feigning madness. Identify the tone, where it shifts, and how the shift in tone affects the meaning of the soliloquy.

Yea, from the table of my memory
 I’ll wipe away all trivial fond records,
 All saws of books, all forms, all pressures past,
 That youth and observation copied there;
 And thy commandment all alone shall live
 Within the book and volume of my brain,
 Unmix’d with baser matter; yes, by heaven!
 O most pernicious woman!
 O villain, villain, smiling, damned villain!
 My tables,—meet it is I set it down,
 That one may smile, and smile, and be a villain.

• EXERCISE 4 •

Look back at the opening page of Kuper’s Metamorphosis on page 992 and the corresponding passage by Kafka on page 945. Describe the tone of Kafka’s passage and how he creates that tone. Then analyze the tone of Kuper’s graphic interpretation. How does Kuper convey Kafka’s tone? Where does he deviate from it?

• EXERCISE 5 •

Write a poem or passage expressing your viewpoint on conformity and rebellion that either expresses a specific tone or shifts between or among tones. Discuss the resources of language you used to develop that tone or tonal shifts.

• EXERCISE 6 •

Choose a poem or a passage from a story in this chapter and through the use of diction, syntax, and other features of writing that we have discussed, change the tone of the poem or passage you select, rewriting it as a parody of the original. You might take a serious poem or passage and make it facetious, change an ironic one so that its attitude is earnest, make a critical piece laudatory or an impassioned one objective—whichever is appropriate for your text.

Suggestions for Writing

Conformity and Rebellion

1. Thinking about the overall theme of this chapter, we may ask: Why do we conform? Certainly, we sometimes conform because of timidity, reluctance, ambition, or simply ease; but then there are times when we conform out of a sense of duty or responsibility, in the spirit of cooperation, or with a sense of sacrifice. Consider these ideas as they run through the selections in the chapter, and develop a thesis regarding the nature of conformity. Refer specifically to the texts of several of the chapter's selections to support your essay.
2. "What is a rebel? A man who says 'no,'" says Albert Camus. Among those who say no in this chapter are Melville's Bartleby; Adichie's Grace (or Afamefuna); Vonnegut's Harrison Bergeron; W.E.B. in Dudley Randall's poem; the speakers in the poems by George Herbert, Percy Bysshe Shelley, and Dylan Thomas; and, of course, Hamlet. What is the significance of Camus's question and answer? Consider how at least two of the characters or speakers in the chapter say "no," and write an essay in which you compare and contrast their rebellious actions or words, and draw conclusions about the consequences of their rebellion.
3. African American poet James Branch Cabell has said, "Poetry is man's rebellion against what he is." In their poems, Herbert, Thomas, Hikmet, Clifton, Sexton, and Duffy use first-person speakers. Consider what Cabell's statement means and how it illustrates a theme that runs through the selections in this chapter. Then write an essay that compares and contrasts two speakers as they illustrate Cabell's meaning.
4. Identify three selections in the chapter that express a similar theme in terms of conformity and rebellion, or three selections that offer different perspectives. Write an essay that explains how each of the three writers uses different means to express the themes or perspectives that you identify. Consider such features as structure, diction, imagery, figurative language, and tone. Refer to specific passages in each text to support your essay.

5. When confronted with a great challenge, the easier path to take is often the one that conformity proffers. Hamlet expresses the difficulty of accepting such a challenge. At the end of act I, he says, “The time is out of joint: O cursed spite, / That ever I was born to set it right!” Write an essay that compares and contrasts the way three characters in the chapter confront the challenge of “setting things right.” Use specific examples from the texts to support your essay.
6. Enjoining his listeners, singer Bob Marley proclaims, “Emancipate yourself from mental slavery / None but ourselves can free our minds.” Similarly, the speakers of the poems by Shelley, Dickinson, Thomas, Hikmet, and Ginsberg address the reader directly, stating an imperative. Compare the ways that two of these poems enjoin the reader to action. Refer to the texts of the poems to support your answer. Consider both style and content as you write your essay.
7. In imitation of Peter Kuper, create a graphic retelling of one of the shorter selections in the chapter. Among those that might be appropriate are “Disillusionment of Ten O’clock,” “anyone lived in a pretty how town,” “Booker T. and W.E.B.,” “On Living,” “Her Kind,” “Penelope,” and “An Epitaph.” Either draw the pictures yourself—by hand or with a computer—or cut and paste appropriate images to accompany your text.
8. Which of the contemporary stories—“The Book of the Dead,” “Admiral,” or “The Headstrong Historian”—did you enjoy most? Read two more stories or a novel by Danticat, Boyle, or Adichie. Write an essay that discusses the nature of conformity as addressed in the works of your selected author.
9. Write a poem in imitation of Ginsberg’s “Is About,” using a similar structure but changing each of the names and places that begin the lines. Then answer the question, What is your poem about?

Art and the Artist

Art for art's sake? I should think so, and more so than ever at the present time. It is the one orderly product which our middling race has produced. It is the cry of a thousand sentinels, the echo from a thousand labyrinths, it is the lighthouse which cannot be hidden . . . it is the best evidence we can have of our dignity.

—E. M. FORSTER

“Art” is the term used to refer to a wide range of human activities, creations, and expressions that appeal to the senses or emotions. It includes the visual arts, such as painting and sculpture, but also music, literature, and dance. In his essay “What Is Art?” novelist Leo Tolstoy asserts that art must create an emotional link between the artist and the audience, one that “infects” the viewer. The artists whose works fill this chapter are novelists, short-story writers, poets, and painters who not only create art, but also contemplate what it means to be an artist. They ask, like Nobel Prize-winning poet Seamus Heaney, whose pieces make up this chapter’s Conversation: what is the artist’s role in society?

Other artists represented in this chapter tackle the eternal question, what is art? Some do so by writing poems about poetry, a form called ars poetica (the art of poetry). Others write poetry that comments on a work in another genre—called ekphrastic poetry, from the Greek word ekphrasis (speak out). Homer’s description of Achilles’ shield in the Iliad is the oldest recorded ekphrastic work, and it has sparked an ongoing conversation in which writers continue to comment on the act of creating art in all its forms, reminding us that an emotional link exists not just between art and the viewer, but also among works of art. Look for that link in the works in this chapter.

Henry James considered the art of the writer and the art of the painter to be analogous. In his essay “The Art of Fiction,” he wrote, “Their inspiration is the same, their process (allowing for the different quality of the vehicle) is the same, their success is the same. They may learn from each other, they may explain and sustain each other. Their cause is the same and the honour of one is the honour of another.” Certainly “Sonny’s Blues” explains what it means to be a musician, to “impos[e] order” on the “roar rising from the void.” And Claude McKay truly honors the beauty and grace of the nightclub dancer in Harlem, as Frank O’Hara honors the memory of jazz singer Billie Holiday. Short-story writer Raymond Carver creates a narrator who, against the odds, is sustained and even sanctified by his experience of re-creating a work of art so that a blind man can “see” it. Alexander Pope takes up the cause of beauty in his plea that sound and sense work together. And T. S. Eliot creates the moody and isolated J. Alfred Prufrock to remind us that art might just be the saving grace of the modern world.

The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock

T. S. ELIOT

Poet, dramatist, and critic Thomas Stearns Eliot (1888–1965) was born and raised in St. Louis, Missouri. He moved to England when he was twenty-five, after studying at Harvard University, and eventually became a British subject. He once said that his poetry was a combination of American and British influences but that “in its sources, in its emotional springs, it comes from America.” Eliot studied philosophy at Harvard and Oxford, even learning Sanskrit to study Buddhism and other Indic religions. As a young man, he worked as a teacher and wrote book reviews to earn extra money. He later worked at Lloyds Bank in London and eventually became a director of Faber & Faber, an English publishing house. His most famous works include “The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock,” “The Wasteland” (1922), “Ash Wednesday” (1930), “Burnt Norton” (1941), “Little Gidding” (1942), “Four Quartets” (1943), and the play Murder in the Cathedral (1935). The musical Cats was based on Eliot’s Old Possum’s Book of Practical Cats (1939), which earned him Tony Awards in 1983 for best book and best score. He was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1948. Eliot is considered one of the great poetic innovators of the twentieth century and is closely associated with the modernist movement—especially in his use of stream of consciousness, a technique he uses in “The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock.” Eliot did not compromise when it came to the language of poetry, believing that poetry should represent the complexities of modern civilization. Later in his life, Eliot advocated traditionalism in religion, society, and literature. This seems at odds with the innovations of his early poetry, but he considered tradition to be an ongoing process, uniting past and present. “The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock,” a poem begun when Eliot was a college student and published when he was twenty-eight, is considered one of those works that epitomize the significance of poetry.

*S'io credesse che mia risposta fosse

<sup>1</sup>From Dante’s Inferno, canto XXVII, 61–66. The words are spoken by Guido da Montefeltro, who was condemned to hell for providing false counsel to Pope Boniface VIII. When asked to identify himself, Guido responded, “If I thought my answers were given to anyone who could ever return to the world, this flame would shake no more; but since none ever did return above from this depth, if what I hear is true, without fear of infamy I answer thee.” He does not know that Dante will return to earth to report on what he has seen and heard.—Eds.

Let us go then, you and I,
When the evening is spread out against the sky
Like a patient etherized upon a table;
Let us go, through certain half-deserted streets,
The muttering retreats 5
Of restless nights in one-night cheap hotels
And sawdust restaurants with oyster-shells:
Streets that follow like a tedious argument
Of insidious intent
To lead you to an overwhelming question . . . 10
Oh, do not ask, "What is it?"
Let us go and make our visit.

In the room the women come and go
Talking of Michelangelo.

The yellow fog that rubs its back upon the window-panes, 15
The yellow smoke that rubs its muzzle on the window-panes
Licked its tongue into the corners of the evening,
Lingered upon the pools that stand in drains,
Let fall upon its back the soot that falls from chimneys,
Slipped by the terrace, made a sudden leap, 20
And seeing that it was a soft October night,
Curled once about the house, and fell asleep.

And indeed there will be time
For the yellow smoke that slides along the street,
Rubbing its back upon the window-panes; 25
There will be time, there will be time
To prepare a face to meet the faces that you meet;
There will be time to murder and create,
And time for all the works and days of hands<sup>2</sup>
That lift and drop a question on your plate: 30
Time for you and time for me,
And time yet for a hundred indecisions,
And for a hundred visions and revisions,
Before the taking of a toast and tea.

In the room the women come and go 35
Talking of Michelangelo.

And indeed there will be time
To wonder, "Do I dare?" and, "Do I dare?"

<sup>2</sup>Reference to the title of a poem about agricultural life by the early Greek poet Hesiod.—Eds.

Time to turn back and descend the stair,
 With a bald spot in the middle of my hair — 40
 [They will say: "How his hair is growing thin!"]
 My morning coat, my collar mounting firmly to the chin,
 My necktie rich and modest, but asserted by a simple pin —

[They will say: "But how his arms and legs are thin!"]
 Do I dare 45
 Disturb the universe?
 In a minute there is time
 For decisions and revisions which a minute will reverse.

For I have known them all already, known them all:
 Have known the evenings, mornings, afternoons, 50
 I have measured out my life with coffee spoons;
 I know the voices dying with a dying fall
 Beneath the music from a farther room.
 So how should I presume?

And I have known the eyes already, known them all — 55
 The eyes that fix you in a formulated phrase.
 And when I am formulated, sprawling on a pin,
 When I am pinned and wriggling on the wall,
 Then how should I begin
 To spit out all the butt-ends of my days and ways? 60
 And how should I presume?

And I have known the arms already, known them all —
 Arms that are braceleted and white and bare
 [But in the lamplight, downed with light brown hair!] 65
 Is it perfume from a dress
 That makes me so digress?
 Arms that lie along a table, or wrap about a shawl.
 And should I then presume?
 And how should I begin?

Shall I say, I have gone at dusk through narrow streets, 70
 And watched the smoke that rises from the pipes
 Of lonely men in shirt-sleeves, leaning out of windows? . . .

I should have been a pair of ragged claws
 Scuttling across the floors of silent seas.

. . . . .

And the afternoon, the evening, sleeps so peacefully! 75
 Smoothed by long fingers,

Asleep . . . tired . . . or it malingers,
Stretched on the floor, here beside you and me.
Should I, after tea and cakes and ices,
Have the strength to force the moment to its crisis? 80
But though I have wept and fasted, wept and prayed, Though I have seen my head (grown slightly bald) brought in upon a platter,<sup>3</sup>
I am no prophet—and here's no great matter;
I have seen the moment of my greatness flicker,
And I have seen the eternal Footman hold my coat, and snicker, 85
And in short, I was afraid.

And would it have been worth it, after all,
After the cups, the marmalade, the tea,
Among the porcelain, among some talk of you and me,
Would it have been worth while 90
To have bitten off the matter with a smile,
To have squeezed the universe into a ball
To roll it toward some overwhelming question,
To say: "I am Lazarus,<sup>4</sup> come from the dead,
Come back to tell you all, I shall tell you all"— 95
If one, settling a pillow by her head,
Should say: "That is not what I meant at all.
That is not it, at all."

And would it have been worth it, after all,
Would it have been worth while, 100
After the sunsets and the dooryards and the sprinkled streets,
After the novels, after the teacups, after the skirts that trail along the floor—
And this, and so much more?—
It is impossible to say just what I mean!
But as if a magic lantern threw the nerves in patterns on a screen: 105
Would it have been worth while
If one, settling a pillow or throwing off a shawl,
And turning toward the window, should say:
"That is not it at all,
That is not what I meant, at all." 110

No! I am not Prince Hamlet, nor was meant to be;
 Am an attendant lord, one that will do
 To swell a progress, start a scene or two,
 Advise the prince: no doubt, an easy tool,
 Deferential, glad to be of use, 115
 Politic, cautious, and meticulous;
 Full of high sentence, but a bit obtuse;
 At times, indeed, almost ridiculous—
 Almost, at times, the Fool.
 I grow old . . . I grow old . . . 120
 I shall wear the bottoms of my trousers rolled.
 Shall I part my hair behind? Do I dare to eat a peach?
 I shall wear white flannel trousers, and walk upon the beach.
 I have heard the mermaids singing, each to each.
 I do not think that they will sing to me. 125
 I have seen them riding seaward on the waves
 Combing the white hair of the waves blown back
 When the wind blows the water white and black.
 We have lingered in the chambers of the sea
 By sea-girls wreathed with seaweed red and brown 130
 Till human voices wake us, and we drown.

Questions for Discussion

1. How does the epigraph from Dante's Inferno help Eliot comment on the modern world in "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock"? What does it tell us about the setting of this poem? How is Montefeltro's miscalculation related to the poem?
2. We can assume that the speaker of the poem is Prufrock, a character Eliot creates through the use of dramatic monologue—a technique in which a speaker addresses a silent listener, often revealing qualities he or she might wish to keep hidden. What kind of person is Prufrock? What does he unknowingly reveal?
3. Whom is the speaker addressing? This question is more complicated than it seems and likely has several answers. Consider all of the possibilities. What does each possible listener suggest about the development of Prufrock as a character? How does each possibility develop another level of meaning for the poem?

4. One of the most demanding aspects of this poem is its allusions, as Eliot expected his readers to be as well educated as he was. Some allusions are fairly accessible. The allusions to Michelangelo—an artist most people are familiar with—in line 14 and again in line 36 help us imagine the woman Prufrock is talking about. The function of the less accessible allusions—such as “works and days of hands” (l. 29)—may serve a different purpose. Why might Eliot have included such esoteric allusions? How do they affect your reading of the poem?
5. Consider the title of the poem. How is it ironic? In what ways is the poem a love song?
6. Eliot began writing this poem in 1909, when he was in college at Harvard. He continued to revise it until it was published in 1917. Some critics have commented that it is the poem of a young man, even though its narrator is middle aged. What qualities reveal the poem as a young man’s work?
7. An early review of the poem in the Times Literary Supplement (London) stated, “The fact that these things occurred to the mind of Mr. Eliot is surely of the very smallest importance to anyone, even to himself. They certainly have no relation to poetry” (June 21, 1917). Do you agree?
8. Eliot was in the avant-garde as a young poet, but he considered himself a traditionalist as he got older. What are the innovative aspects of this poem? Look for evidence of the traditionalism that would get stronger as Eliot aged.
9. In what ways is “The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock” a poem about time? Read through the poem and look for references to time, including aging, the meaning of time, and the word time itself. What conclusions can you draw about the way Eliot thinks about time?
10. In what ways is this poem a poem about art?

Questions on Style and Structure

1. How does Eliot set the tone in the poem’s first stanza? Look carefully at both the figurative language and the concrete details.
2. Eliot depends on the emotional associations of his images, what he called the “objective correlative,” to reveal aspects of Prufrock’s personality. In the first stanza, what emotions do you associate with images such as “patient etherized upon a table” (l. 3) or “one-night cheap hotels” (l. 6)?
3. The “yellow fog” that is the subject of the poem’s third stanza has the qualities of a cat. Is this association threatening, comforting, or both? How does your interpretation of the fog affect your reading of the poem as a whole?
4. You may notice that the images are arranged from top to bottom—the sky to the streets in the first stanza, and the windowpanes to the drains in the third. What is the effect of the way Eliot has Prufrock guide the reader’s eye and imagination?
5. Eliot uses the technique of enjambment, or run-on lines. An example is in lines 5–9: “The muttering retreats / Of restless nights in one-night cheap hotels /

And sawdust restaurants with oyster-shells: / Streets that follow like a tedious argument / Of insidious intent.” How does this technique help create the alienating quality of the city scene that’s set in the first 22 lines?

6. “The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock” is like a collage, a work of visual art created by materials and objects glued to a flat surface. In poetry this technique is called fragmentation, a favorite technique of the modernists. The fragments come together—or don’t—in a way that mirrors the fragmented, chaotic modern world. In the fourth stanza, for example, what is the effect of fragments such as “yellow smoke,” “murder and create,” “visions and revisions,” and “toast and tea” appearing together? Do they form a new picture, or are their effects fragmentary? How do the fragments communicate Eliot’s vision of a modern man in a modern city?
7. What do you make of the occasional rhyming in the midst of unrhymed free verse? Note especially the two repeated stanzas: “In the room the women come and go / Talking of Michelangelo.” How does this irregular rhyme scheme reflect and reveal the character of the speaker and the setting of the poem?
8. The middle section (ll. 37–86) of this poem moves from the chaotic city setting into the fragmented, anxiety-ridden mind of the speaker. How is Prufrock’s physical description developed in lines 37–44? How do Prufrock’s physical characteristics connect to emotional states?
9. Prufrock is a deeply self-conscious character. Explain the various ways that characteristic is developed in lines 37–72. Consider especially lines 55–58, in which Prufrock imagines himself pinned like a specimen to a wall.
10. From line 37 to line 87, twelve lines begin with “And.” What does the repetition of that conjunction suggest about Prufrock’s mental state?
11. “The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock” makes several allusions to metaphysical poet Andrew Marvell’s “To His Coy Mistress” (p. 693). “And indeed there will be time” (ll. 23, 37) alludes to that poem’s first lines, in which the speaker urges his lady friend to consummate their relationship by reminding her how fast time flies: “Had we but world enough, and time / This coyness, lady, were no crime.” Later, “To have squeezed the universe into a ball” (l. 92) alludes to the end of Marvell’s poem, in which the speaker makes one last pitch: “Let us roll all our strength and all / Our sweetness up into one ball.” How do we know that Prufrock’s purpose is different? What is the effect of alluding to Marvell’s flirtatious, self-confident poem?
12. Prufrock claims to have seen “Arms that are braceleted and white and bare” (l. 63), an allusion to metaphysical poet John Donne’s “The Relic,” in which the speaker imagines that when his grave and the grave of his beloved are dug up, the gravedigger will see the bracelet of his beloved’s hair encircling the bones of his arm, and will leave them alone. Critics have said that Donne invented the idea of modern love as private, as opposed to the feudal idea of love being social. How does this allusion, and the concrete image itself, help develop the character of Prufrock? What do you think is Eliot’s take on the idea of modern, private love?

13. In line 111, Prufrock readily admits he is no Hamlet. What might have led the reader to believe that Prufrock and Hamlet share characteristics? What characteristics of Hamlet does Prufrock claim not to have?
14. What is the effect of the semicolons and ellipses in lines 111–121? What do they tell you about Prufrock's state of mind?
15. Details such as Prufrock's assertion that he will "wear the bottom of [his] trousers rolled" (l. 121) or his question about whether he should "dare to eat a peach" (l. 122) have been interpreted in many ways. One is that they reveal his anxieties about aging—he may be too old for the bohemian style of rolled trousers or he may break a tooth on a peach pit. Another interpretation is that they are related to his nervousness around women. Consider several possibilities. How does each add to the portrait of Prufrock and the multiple meanings of Eliot's poem?
16. The last six lines of this poem form a sestet (6 lines), the form that both ends the traditional Petrarchan sonnet and offers a solution for the problem or conflict set out in the first eight lines (the octave). The poet Petrarch wrote about his unrequited love for Laura, but Prufrock doesn't even have an unrequited love. Do these last six lines offer any solutions? How does the image of mermaids continue some of the poem's motifs? What does it mean that Prufrock invites the reader to drown with him at the end of the poem?

Suggestions for Writing

1. Critic Roland Barthes has said, "Literature is the question minus the answer." "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock" is filled with questions. Write an essay in which you analyze one or more of the poem's questions and the extent to which the poem does or does not offer answers.
2. Write an essay in which you argue that Prufrock is a particular age. Use evidence from the poem to support your argument.
3. Humorist Garrison Keillor accused Eliot's character Prufrock of "killing off the pleasure of poetry." Others argue that the poem is actually funny if it is read carefully. Write an essay in which you defend, challenge, or qualify Keillor's statement.
4. Imagine that you are one of the women who say, "That is not what I meant at all. / That is not it, at all" (ll. 97–98, and similarly in ll. 109–110). In a poem, essay, or short story, explain what you mean by those words.
5. Write an essay in which you compare and contrast Prufrock either to Hamlet or to one of Shakespeare's fools, such as the one in King Lear or Puck in A Midsummer Night's Dream.

Sonny's Blues

JAMES BALDWIN

James Baldwin (1924–1987)—poet, novelist, playwright, essayist, activist—was one of the most influential figures of American literature during the latter half of the twentieth century. Born in Harlem to a single mother, he was later adopted by his stepfather, who was a preacher. Baldwin himself became a Pentecostal preacher when he was fourteen, but by the time he was seventeen, he had moved away from his family in Harlem to live among more open-minded artists and writers in Greenwich Village. In the late 1940s, Baldwin went to Europe, where he lived as an expatriate in France—and periodically in Turkey—for most of his life, returning to the United States to lecture and write. He felt that the United States of the midcentury was inimical to artists, especially black artists. In addition to the novels Go Tell It on the Mountain (1953), Giovanni's Room (1956), If Beale Street Could Talk (1974), and Just Above My Head (1979), Baldwin wrote Notes of a Native Son (1955) and The Fire Next Time (1963)—two explosive books that gave passionate voice to the civil rights movement. Baldwin also wrote poetry, plays, and essays. In “Sonny’s Blues,” Baldwin examines the connection between suffering and art. As he once said about his friend Beauford Delaney, a painter whose work was not appreciated during his lifetime: “I do not know, nor will any of us really know, what kind of strength it was that enabled him to make so dogged and splendid a journey.” “Sonny’s Blues,” which was first published in 1957 in the Partisan Review, examines that journey in the context of a pair of brothers, one a musician, the other a math teacher.

I read about it in the paper, in the subway, on my way to work. I read it, and I couldn’t believe it, and I read it again. Then perhaps I just stared at it, at the newsprint spelling out his name, spelling out the story. I stared at it in the swinging lights of the subway car, and in the faces and bodies of the people, and in my own face, trapped in the darkness which roared outside.

It was not to be believed and I kept telling myself that, as I walked from the subway station to the high school. And at the same time I couldn’t doubt it. I was scared, scared for Sonny. He became real to me again. A great block of ice got settled in my belly and kept melting there slowly all day long, while I taught my classes algebra. It was a special kind of ice. It kept melting, sending trickles of ice water all up and down my veins, but it never got less. Sometimes it hardened and seemed to expand until I felt my guts were going to come spilling out or that I was going to choke or scream. This would always be at a moment when I was remembering some specific thing Sonny had once said or done.

When he was about as old as the boys in my classes his face had been bright and open, there was a lot of copper in it; and he’d had wonderfully direct brown eyes, and great gentleness and privacy. I wondered what he looked like now. He had been picked up, the evening before, in a raid on an apartment downtown, for peddling and using heroin.

I couldn't believe it: but what I mean by that is that I couldn't find any room for it anywhere inside me. I had kept it outside me for a long time. I hadn't wanted to know. I had had suspicions, but I didn't name them, I kept putting them away. I told myself that Sonny was wild, but he wasn't crazy. And he'd always been a good boy, he hadn't ever turned hard or evil or disrespectful, the way kids can, so quick, so quick, especially in Harlem. I didn't want to believe that I'd ever see my brother going down, coming to nothing, all that light in his face gone out, in the condition I'd already seen so many others. Yet it had happened and here I was, talking about algebra to a lot of boys who might, every one of them for all I knew, be popping off needles every time they went to the head. Maybe it did more for them than algebra could.

I was sure that the first time Sonny had ever had horse, he couldn't have been much older than these boys were now. These boys, now, were living as we'd been living then, they were growing up with a rush and their heads bumped abruptly against the low ceiling of their actual possibilities. They were filled with rage. All they really knew were two darknesses, the darkness of their lives, which was now closing in on them, and the darkness of the movies, which had blinded them to that other darkness, and in which they now, vindictively, dreamed, at once more together than they were at any other time, and more alone.

When the last bell rang, the last class ended, I let out my breath. It seemed I'd been holding it for all that time. My clothes were wet—I may have looked as though I'd been sitting in a steam bath, all dressed up, all afternoon. I sat alone in the classroom a long time. I listened to the boys outside, downstairs, shouting and cursing and laughing. Their laughter struck me for perhaps the first time. It was not the joyous laughter which—God knows why—one associates with children. It was mocking and insular, its intent to denigrate. It was disenchanted, and in this, also, lay the authority of their curses. Perhaps I was listening to them because I was thinking about my brother and in them I heard my brother. And myself.

One boy was whistling a tune, at once very complicated and very simple, it seemed to be pouring out of him as though he were a bird, and it sounded very cool and moving through all that harsh, bright air, only just holding its own through all those other sounds.

I stood up and walked over to the window and looked down into the courtyard. It was the beginning of the spring and the sap was rising in the boys. A teacher passed through them every now and again, quickly, as though he or she couldn't wait to get out of that courtyard, to get those boys out of their sight and off their minds. I started collecting my stuff. I thought I'd better get home and talk to Isabel.

The courtyard was almost deserted by the time I got downstairs. I saw this boy standing in the shadow of a doorway, looking just like Sonny. I almost called his name. Then I saw that it wasn't Sonny, but somebody we used to know, a boy from around our block. He'd been Sonny's friend. He'd never been mine, having been too young for me, and, anyway, I'd never liked him. And now, even though he was a grown-up man, he still hung around that block, still spent hours on the street corners, was always high and raggy. I used to run into him from time to time and he'd often work around to asking me for a quarter or fifty cents. He always had some real good excuse, too, and I always gave it to him, I don't know why.

But now, abruptly, I hated him. I couldn't stand the way he looked at me, partly like a dog, partly like a cunning child. I wanted to ask him what the hell he was doing in the school courtyard. 10

He sort of shuffled over to me, and he said, "I see you got the papers. So you already know about it."

"You mean about Sonny? Yes, I already know about it. How come they didn't get you?"

He grinned. It made him repulsive and it also brought to mind what he'd looked like as a kid. "I wasn't there. I stay away from them people."

"Good for you." I offered him a cigarette and I watched him through the smoke. "You come all the way down here just to tell me about Sonny?"

"That's right." He was sort of shaking his head and his eyes looked strange, as though they were about to cross. The bright sun deadened his damp dark brown skin and it made his eyes look yellow and showed up the dirt in his kinked hair. He smelled funky. I moved a little away from him and I said, "Well, thanks. But I already know about it and I got to get home." 15

"I'll walk you a little ways," he said. We started walking. There were a couple of kids still loitering in the courtyard and one of them said goodnight to me and looked strangely at the boy beside me.

"What're you going to do?" he asked me. "I mean, about Sonny?"

"Look. I haven't seen Sonny for over a year. I'm not sure I'm going to do anything. Anyway, what the hell can I do?"

"That's right," he said quickly, "ain't nothing you can do. Can't much help old Sonny no more, I guess."

It was what I was thinking and so it seemed to me he had no right to say it. 20

"I'm surprised at Sonny, though," he went on—he had a funny way of talking, he looked straight ahead as though he were talking to himself—"I thought Sonny was a smart boy, I thought he was too smart to get hung."

"I guess he thought so too," I said sharply, "and that's how he got hung. And how about you? You're pretty goddamn smart, I bet."

Then he looked directly at me, just for a minute. "I ain't smart," he said. "If I was smart, I'd have reached for a pistol a long time ago."

"Look. Don't tell me your sad story, if it was up to me, I'd give you one." Then I felt guilty—guilty, probably, for never having supposed that the poor bastard had a story of his own, much less a sad one, and I asked, quickly, "What's going to happen to him now?"

He didn't answer this. He was off by himself some place. "Funny thing," he said, and from his tone we might have been discussing the quickest way to get to Brooklyn, "when I saw the papers this morning, the first thing I asked myself was if I had anything to do with it. I felt sort of responsible." 25

I began to listen more carefully. The subway station was on the corner, just before us, and I stopped. He stopped, too. We were in front of a bar and he ducked slightly, peering in, but whoever he was looking for didn't seem to be there. The juke box was blasting away with something black and bouncy and I half watched the barmaid as she danced her way from the juke box to her place behind the bar. And I watched her face as she laughingly responded to something someone said to her, still keeping time to the music. When she smiled one saw the little girl, one sensed the doomed, still-struggling woman beneath the battered face of the semi-whore.

"I never give Sonny nothing," the boy said finally, "but a long time ago I come to school high and Sonny asked me how it felt." He paused, I couldn't bear to watch him, I watched the barmaid, and I listened to the music which seemed to be causing the pavement to shake. "I told him it felt great." The music stopped, the barmaid paused and watched the juke box until the music began again. "It did."

All this was carrying me some place I didn't want to go. I certainly didn't want to know how it felt. It filled everything, the people, the houses, the music, the dark, quicksilver barmaid, with menace; and this menace was their reality.

"What's going to happen to him now?" I asked again.

"They'll send him away some place and they'll try to cure him." He shook his head. "Maybe he'll even think he's kicked the habit. Then they'll let him loose"—he gestured, throwing his cigarette into the gutter. "That's all."

"What do you mean, that's all?"

But I knew what he meant.

"I mean, that's all." He turned his head and looked at me, pulling down the corners of his mouth. "Don't you know what I mean?" he asked, softly.

"How the hell would I know what you mean?" I almost whispered it, I don't know why.

"That's right," he said to the air, "how would he know what I mean?" He turned toward me again, patient and calm, and yet I somehow felt him shaking, shaking as though he were going to fall apart. I felt that ice in my guts again, the dread I'd felt all afternoon; and again I watched the barmaid, moving about the bar, washing glasses, and singing. "Listen. They'll let him out and then it'll just start all over again. That's what I mean."

"You mean—they'll let him out. And then he'll just start working his way back in again. You mean he'll never kick the habit. Is that what you mean?"

"That's right," he said, cheerfully. "You see what I mean."

"Tell me," I said at last, "why does he want to die? He must want to die, he's killing himself, why does he want to die?"

He looked at me in surprise. He licked his lips. "He don't want to die. He wants to live. Don't nobody want to die, ever."

Then I wanted to ask him—too many things. He could not have answered, or if he had, I could not have borne the answers. I started walking. "Well, I guess it's none of my business."

"It's going to be rough on old Sonny," he said. We reached the subway station. "This is your station?" he asked. I nodded. I took one step down. "Damn!"

he said, suddenly. I looked up at him. He grinned again. "Damn it if I didn't leave all my money home. You ain't got a dollar on you, have you? Just for a couple of days, is all."

All at once something inside gave and threatened to come pouring out of me. I didn't hate him any more. I felt that in another moment I'd start crying like a child.

"Sure," I said. "Don't sweat." I looked in my wallet and didn't have a dollar, I only had a five. "Here," I said. "That hold you?"

He didn't look at it—he didn't want to look at it. A terrible closed look came over his face, as though he were keeping the number on the bill a secret from him and me. "Thanks," he said, and now he was dying to see me go. "Don't worry about Sonny. Maybe I'll write him or something."

"Sure," I said. "You do that. So long."

"Be seeing you," he said. I went on down the steps.

45

And I didn't write Sonny or send him anything for a long time. When I finally did, it was just after my little girl died, he wrote me back a letter which made me feel like a bastard.

Here's what he said:

DEAR BROTHER,

You don't know how much I needed to hear from you. I wanted to write you many a time but I dug how much I must have hurt you and so I didn't write. But now I feel like a man who's been trying to climb up out of some deep, real deep and funky hole and just saw the sun up there, outside. I got to get outside.

I can't tell you much about how I got here. I mean I don't know how to tell you. I guess I was afraid of something or I was trying to escape from something and you know I have never been very strong in the head (smile). I'm glad Mama and Daddy are dead and can't see what's happened to their son and I swear if I'd known what I was doing I would never have hurt you so, you and a lot of other fine people who were nice to me and who believed in me.

I don't want you to think it had anything to do with me being a musician. It's more than that. Or maybe less than that. I can't get anything straight in my head down here and I try not to think about what's going to happen to me when I get outside again. Sometime I think I'm going to flip and never get outside and sometime I think I'll come straight back. I tell you one thing, though, I'd rather blow my brains out than go through this again. But that's what they all say, so they tell me. If I tell you when I'm coming to New York and if you could meet me, I sure would appreciate it. Give my love to Isabel and the kids and I was sure sorry to hear about little Gracie. I wish I could be like Mama and say the Lord's will be done, but I don't know it seems to me that trouble is the one thing that never does get stopped and I don't know what good it does to blame it on the Lord. But maybe it does some good if you believe it.

Your brother,
SONNY

Then I kept in constant touch with him and I sent him whatever I could and I went to meet him when he came back to New York. When I saw him many things I thought I had forgotten came flooding back to me. This was because I had begun, finally, to wonder about Sonny, about the life that Sonny lived inside. This life, whatever it was, had made him older and thinner and it had deepened the distant stillness in which he had always moved. He looked very unlike my baby brother. Yet, when he smiled, when we shook hands, the baby brother I'd never known looked out from the depths of his private life, like an animal waiting to be coaxed into the light.

"How you been keeping?" he asked me.

50

"All right. And you?"

"Just fine." He was smiling all over his face. "It's good to see you again."

"It's good to see you."

The seven years' difference in our ages lay between us like a chasm: I wondered if these years would ever operate between us as a bridge. I was remembering, and it made it hard to catch my breath, that I had been there when he was born; and I had heard the first words he had ever spoken. When he started to walk, he walked from our mother straight to me. I caught him just before he fell when he took the first steps he ever took in this world.

"How's Isabel?"

55

"Just fine. She's dying to see you."

"And the boys?"

"They're fine, too. They're anxious to see their uncle."

"Oh, come on. You know they don't remember me."

"Are you kidding? Of course they remember you."

60

He grinned again. We got into a taxi. We had a lot to say to each other, far too much to know how to begin.

As the taxi began to move, I asked, "You still want to go to India?"

He laughed. "You still remember that. Hell, no. This place is Indian enough for me."

"It used to belong to them," I said.

And he laughed again. "They damn sure knew what they were doing when they got rid of it."

65

Years ago, when he was around fourteen, he'd been all hipped on the idea of going to India. He read books about people sitting on rocks, naked, in all kinds of weather, but mostly bad, naturally, and walking barefoot through hot coals and arriving at wisdom. I used to say that it sounded to me as though they were getting away from wisdom as fast as they could. I think he sort of looked down on me for that.

"Do you mind," he asked, "if we have the driver drive alongside the park? On the west side—I haven't seen the city in so long."

"Of course not," I said. I was afraid that I might sound as though I were humoring him, but I hoped he wouldn't take it that way.

So we drove along, between the green of the park and the stony, lifeless elegance of hotels and apartment buildings, toward the vivid, killing streets of our childhood.

These streets hadn't changed, though housing projects jutted up out of them now like rocks in the middle of a boiling sea. Most of the houses in which we had grown up had vanished, as had the stores from which we had stolen, the basements in which we had first tried sex, the rooftops from which we had hurled tin cans and bricks. But houses exactly like the houses of our past yet dominated the landscape, boys exactly like the boys we once had been found themselves smothering in these houses, came down into the streets for light and air and found themselves encircled by disaster. Some escaped the trap, most didn't. Those who got out always left something of themselves behind, as some animals amputate a leg and leave it in the trap. It might be said, perhaps, that I had escaped, after all, I was a school teacher; or that Sonny had, he hadn't lived in Harlem for years. Yet, as the cab moved uptown through streets which seemed, with a rush, to darken with dark people, and as I covertly studied Sonny's face, it came to me that what we both were seeking through our separate cab windows was that part of ourselves which had been left behind. It's always at the hour of trouble and confrontation that the missing member aches.

We hit 110th Street and started rolling up Lenox Avenue. And I'd known this avenue all my life, but it seemed to me again, as it had seemed on the day I'd first heard about Sonny's trouble, filled with a hidden menace which was its very breath of life.

"We almost there," said Sonny.

"Almost." We were both too nervous to say anything more.

We live in a housing project. It hasn't been up long. A few days after it was up it seemed uninhabitably new, now, of course, it's already rundown. It looks like a parody of the good, clean, faceless life—God knows the people who live in it do their best to make it a parody. The beat-looking grass lying around isn't enough to make their lives green, the hedges will never hold out the streets, and they know it. The big windows fool no one, they aren't big enough to make space out of no space. They don't bother with the windows, they watch the TV screen instead. The playground is most popular with the children who don't play at jacks, or skip rope, or roller skate, or swing, and they can be found in it after dark. We moved in partly because it's not too far from where I teach, and partly for the kids; but it's really just like the houses in which Sonny and I grew up. The same things happen, they'll have the same things to remember. The moment Sonny and I started into the house I had the feeling that I was simply bringing him back into the danger he had almost died trying to escape.

Sonny has never been talkative. So I don't know why I was sure he'd be dying to talk to me when supper was over the first night. Everything went fine, the oldest boy remembered him, and the youngest boy liked him, and Sonny had remembered to bring something for each of them; and Isabel, who is really much nicer than I am, more open and giving, had gone to a lot of trouble about dinner and was genuinely glad to see him. And she's always been able to tease Sonny in a way that I haven't. It was nice to see her face so vivid again and to hear her laugh and watch her make Sonny laugh. She wasn't, or, anyway, she didn't seem to be, at all uneasy or embarrassed. She chatted as though there were no subject which had to be avoided and she got Sonny past his first, faint stiffness. And thank God she was there, for I was filled with that icy dread again. Everything I did seemed awkward to me, and everything I said sounded freighted with hidden meaning. I was trying to remember everything I'd heard about dope addiction and I couldn't help watching Sonny for signs. I wasn't doing it out of malice. I was trying to find out something about my brother. I was dying to hear him tell me he was safe.

"Safe!" my father grunted, whenever Mama suggested trying to move to a neighborhood which might be safer for children. "Safe, hell! Ain't no place safe for kids, nor nobody."

He always went on like this, but he wasn't, ever, really as bad as he sounded, not even on weekends, when he got drunk. As a matter of fact, he was always on the lookout for "something a little better," but he died before he found it. He died suddenly, during a drunken weekend in the middle of the war, when Sonny was fifteen. He and Sonny hadn't ever got on too well. And this was partly because Sonny was the apple of his father's eye. It was because he loved Sonny so much and was frightened for him, that he was always fighting with him. It doesn't do any good to fight with Sonny. Sonny just moves back, inside himself, where he can't be reached. But the principal reason that they never hit it off is that they were so much alike. Daddy was big and rough and loud-talking, just the opposite of Sonny, but they both had—that same privacy.

Mama tried to tell me something about this, just after Daddy died. I was home on leave from the army.

This was the last time I ever saw my mother alive. Just the same, this picture gets all mixed up in my mind with pictures I had of her when she was younger. The way I always see her is the way she used to be on a Sunday afternoon, say, when the old folks were talking after the big Sunday dinner. I always see her wearing pale blue. She'd be sitting on the sofa. And my father would be sitting in the easy chair, not far from her. And the living room would be full of church folks and relatives. There they sit, in chairs all around the living room, and the night is creeping up outside, but nobody knows it yet. You can see the darkness growing against the windowpanes and you hear the street noises every now and again, or maybe the jangling beat of a tambourine from one of the churches close by, but it's real quiet in the room. For a moment nobody's talking, but every face looks darkening, like the sky outside. And my mother rocks a little from the waist, and my father's eyes are closed. Everyone is looking at something a child can't see. For a minute they've forgotten the children. Maybe a kid is lying on the rug, half asleep. Maybe somebody's got a kid in his lap and is absent-mindedly stroking the kid's head. Maybe there's a kid, quiet and big-eyed, curled up in a big chair in the corner. The silence, the darkness coming, and the darkness in the faces frightens the child obscurely. He hopes that the hand which strokes his forehead will never stop—will never die. He hopes that there will never come a time when the old folks won't be sitting around the living room, talking about where they've come from, and what they've seen, and what's happened to them and their kinfolk.

But something deep and watchful in the child knows that this is bound to end, is already ending. In a moment someone will get up and turn on the light. Then the old folks will remember the children and they won't talk any more that day. And when light fills the room, the child is filled with darkness. He knows that every time this happens he's moved just a little closer to that darkness outside. The darkness outside is what the old folks have been talking about. It's what they've come from. It's what they endure. The child knows that they won't talk any more because if he knows too much about what's happened to them, he'll know too much too soon, about what's going to happen to him.

The last time I talked to my mother, I remember I was restless. I wanted to get out and see Isabel. We weren't married then and we had a lot to straighten out between us. 80

There Mama sat, in black, by the window. She was humming an old church song, Lord, you brought me from a long ways off. Sonny was out somewhere. Mama kept watching the streets.

"I don't know," she said, "if I'll ever see you again, after you go off from here. But I hope you'll remember the things I tried to teach you."

"Don't talk like that," I said, and smiled. "You'll be here a long time yet."

She smiled, too, but she said nothing. She was quiet for a long time. And I said, "Mama, don't you worry about nothing. I'll be writing all the time, and you be getting the checks. . . ."

"I want to talk to you about your brother," she said, suddenly. "If anything happens to me he ain't going to have nobody to look out for him." 85

"Mama," I said, "ain't nothing going to happen to you or Sonny. Sonny's all right. He's a good boy and he's got good sense."

"It ain't a question of his being a good boy," Mama said, "nor of his having good sense. It ain't only the bad ones, nor yet the dumb ones that gets sucked under." She stopped, looking at me. "Your Daddy once had a brother," she said, and she smiled in a way that made me feel she was in pain. "You didn't never know that, did you?"

"No," I said, "I never knew that," and I watched her face.

"Oh, yes," she said, "your Daddy had a brother." She looked out of the window again. "I know you never saw your Daddy cry. But I did—many a time, through all these years."

I asked her, "What happened to his brother? How come nobody's ever talked about him?" 90

This was the first time I ever saw my mother look old.

"His brother got killed," she said, "when he was just a little younger than you are now. I knew him. He was a fine boy. He was maybe a little full of the devil, but he didn't mean nobody no harm."

Then she stopped and the room was silent, exactly as it had sometimes been on those Sunday afternoons. Mama kept looking out into the streets.

"He used to have a job in the mill," she said, "and, like all young folks, he just liked to perform on Saturday nights. Saturday nights, him and your father would drift around to different places, go to dances and things like that, or just sit around with people they knew, and your father's brother would sing, he had a fine voice, and play along with himself on his guitar. Well, this particular Saturday night, him and your father was coming home from some place, and they were both a little drunk and there was a moon that night, it was bright like day. Your father's brother was feeling kind of good, and he was whistling to himself, and he had his guitar slung over his shoulder. They was coming down a hill and beneath them was a road that turned off from the highway. Well, your father's brother, being always kind of frisky, decided to run down this hill, and he did, with that guitar banging and clanging behind him, and he ran across the road, and he was making water behind a tree. And your father was sort of amused at him and he was still coming down the hill, kind of slow. Then he heard a car motor and that same minute his brother stepped from behind the tree, into the road, in the moonlight. And he started to cross the road. And your father started to run down the hill, he says he don't know why. This car was full of white men. They was all drunk, and when they seen your father's brother they let out a great whoop and holler and they aimed the car straight at him. They was having fun, they just wanted to scare him, the way they do sometimes, you know. But they was drunk. And I guess the boy, being drunk, too, and scared, kind of lost his head. By the time he jumped it was too late. Your father says he heard his brother scream when the car rolled over him, and he heard the wood of that guitar when it give, and he heard them strings go flying, and he heard them white men shouting, and the car kept on a-going and it ain't stopped till this day. And, time your father got down the hill, his brother weren't nothing but blood and pulp."

Tears were gleaming on my mother's face. There wasn't anything I could say.

"He never mentioned it," she said, "because I never let him mention it before you children. Your Daddy was like a crazy man that night and for many a night thereafter. He says he never in his life seen anything as dark as that road after the lights of that car had gone away. Weren't nothing, weren't nobody on that road, just your Daddy and his brother and that busted guitar. Oh, yes. Your Daddy never did really get right again. Till the day he died he weren't sure but that every white man he saw was the man that killed his brother."

She stopped and took out her handkerchief and dried her eyes and looked at me.

"I ain't telling you all this," she said, "to make you scared or bitter or to make you hate nobody. I'm telling you this because you got a brother. And the world ain't changed."

I guess I didn't want to believe this. I guess she saw this in my face. She turned away from me, toward the window again, searching those streets.

"But I praise my Redeemer," she said at last, "that He called your Daddy home before me. I ain't saying it to throw no flowers at myself, but, I declare, it keeps me from feeling too cast down to know I helped your father get safely through this world. Your father always acted like he was the roughest, strongest man on earth. And everybody took him to be like that. But if he hadn't had me there—to see his tears!"

100

She was crying again. Still, I couldn't move. I said, "Lord, Lord, Mama, I didn't know it was like that."

"Oh, honey," she said, "there's a lot that you don't know. But you are going to find it out." She stood up from the window and came over to me. "You got to hold on to your brother," she said, "and don't let him fall, no matter what it looks like is happening to him and no matter how evil you gets with him. You going to be evil with him many a time. But don't you forget what I told you, you hear?"

"I won't forget," I said. "Don't you worry, I won't forget. I won't let nothing happen to Sonny."

My mother smiled as though she were amused at something she saw in my face. Then, "You may not be able to stop nothing from happening. But you got to let him know you's there."

Two days later I was married, and then I was gone. And I had a lot of things on my mind and I pretty well forgot my promise to Mama until I got shipped home on a special furlough for her funeral. 105

And, after the funeral, with just Sonny and me alone in the empty kitchen, I tried to find out something about him.

"What do you want to do?" I asked him.

"I'm going to be a musician," he said.

For he had graduated, in the time I had been away, from dancing to the juke box to finding out who was playing what, and what they were doing with it, and he had bought himself a set of drums.

"You mean, you want to be a drummer?" I somehow had the feeling that being a drummer might be all right for other people but not for my brother Sonny. 110

"I don't think," he said, looking at me very gravely, "that I'll ever be a good drummer. But I think I can play a piano."

I frowned. I'd never played the role of the older brother quite so seriously before, had scarcely ever, in fact, asked Sonny a damn thing. I sensed myself in the presence of something I didn't really know how to handle, didn't understand. So I made my frown a little deeper as I asked: "What kind of musician do you want to be?"

He grinned. "How many kinds do you think there are?"

"Be serious," I said.

He laughed, throwing his head back, and then looked at me. "I am serious." 115

"Well, then, for Christ's sake, stop kidding around and answer a serious question. I mean, do you want to be a concert pianist, you want to play classical music and all that, or—or what?" Long before I finished he was laughing again. "For Christ's sake, Sonny!"

He sobered, but with difficulty. "I'm sorry. But you sound so—scared!" and he was off again.

"Well, you may think it's funny now, baby, but it's not going to be so funny when you have to make your living at it, let me tell you that." I was furious because I knew he was laughing at me and I didn't know why.

"No," he said, very sober now, and afraid, perhaps, that he'd hurt me, "I don't want to be a classical pianist. That isn't what interests me. I mean"—he paused, looking hard at me, as though his eyes would help me to understand, and then gestured helplessly, as though perhaps his hand would help—"I mean, I'll have a lot of studying to do, and I'll have to study everything, but, I mean, I want to play with—jazz musicians." He stopped. "I want to play jazz," he said.

Well, the word had never before sounded as heavy, as real, as it sounded that afternoon in Sonny's mouth. I just looked at him and I was probably frowning a real frown by this time. I simply couldn't see why on earth he'd want to spend his time hanging around nightclubs, clowning around on bandstands, while people pushed each other around a dance floor. It seemed—beneath him, somehow. I had never thought about it before, had never been forced to, but I suppose I had always put jazz musicians in a class with what Daddy called "good-time people."

"Are you serious?"

"Hell, yes, I'm serious."

He looked more helpless than ever, and annoyed, and deeply hurt.

I suggested, helpfully: "You mean—like Louis Armstrong?"

His face closed as though I'd struck him. "No. I'm not talking about none of that old-time, down home crap."

"Well, look, Sonny, I'm sorry, don't get mad. I just don't altogether get it, that's all. Name somebody—you know, a jazz musician you admire."

"Bird."

"Who?"

"Bird! Charlie Parker! Don't they teach you nothing in the goddamn army?"

I lit a cigarette. I was surprised and then a little amused to discover that I was trembling. "I've been out of touch," I said. "You'll have to be patient with me. Now. Who's this Parker character?"

"He's just one of the greatest jazz musicians alive," said Sonny, sullenly, his hands in his pockets, his back to me. "Maybe the greatest," he added, bitterly, "that's probably why you never heard of him."

"All right," I said, "I'm ignorant. I'm sorry. I'll go out and buy all the cat's records right away, all right?"

"It don't," said Sonny, with dignity, "make any difference to me. I don't care what you listen to. Don't do me no favors."

I was beginning to realize that I'd never seen him so upset before. With another part of my mind I was thinking that this would probably turn out to be one of those things kids go through and that I shouldn't make it seem important by pushing it too hard. Still, I didn't think it would do any harm to ask: "Doesn't all this take a lot of time? Can you make a living at it?"

He turned back to me and half leaned, half sat, on the kitchen table. "Everything takes time," he said, "and—well, yes, sure, I can make a living at it. But what I don't seem to be able to make you understand is that it's the only thing I want to do."

"Well, Sonny," I said, gently, "you know people can't always do exactly what they want to do—"

"No, I don't know that," said Sonny, surprising me. "I think people ought to do what they want to do, what else are they alive for?"

"You getting to be a big boy," I said desperately, "it's time you started thinking about your future."

"I'm thinking about my future," said Sonny, grimly. "I think about it all the time."

I gave up. I decided, if he didn't change his mind, that we could always talk about it later. "In the meantime," I said, "you got to finish school." We had already decided that he'd have to move in with Isabel and her folks. I knew this wasn't the ideal arrangement because Isabel's folks are inclined to be dicty and they hadn't especially wanted Isabel to marry me. But I didn't know what else to do. "And we have to get you fixed up at Isabel's." 140

There was a long silence. He moved from the kitchen table to the window. "That's a terrible idea. You know it yourself."

"Do you have a better idea?"

He just walked up and down the kitchen for a minute. He was as tall as I was. He had started to shave. I suddenly had the feeling that I didn't know him at all.

He stopped at the kitchen table and picked up my cigarettes. Looking at me with a kind of mocking, amused defiance, he put one between his lips. "You mind?"

"You smoking already?" 145

He lit the cigarette and nodded, watching me through the smoke. "I just wanted to see if I'd have the courage to smoke in front of you." He grinned and blew a great cloud of smoke to the ceiling. "It was easy." He looked at my face. "Come on, now. I bet you was smoking at my age, tell the truth."

I didn't say anything but the truth was on my face, and he laughed. But now there was something very strained in his laugh. "Sure. And I bet that ain't all you was doing."

He was frightening me a little. "Cut the crap," I said. "We already decided that you was going to go and live at Isabel's. Now what's got into you all of a sudden?"

"You decided it," he pointed out. "I didn't decide nothing." He stopped in front of me, leaning against the stove, arms loosely folded. "Look, brother. I don't want to stay in Harlem no more, I really don't." He was very earnest. He looked at me, then over toward the kitchen window. There was something in his eyes I'd never seen before, some thoughtfulness, some worry all his own. He rubbed the muscle of one arm. "It's time I was getting out of here."

"Where do you want to go, Sonny?" 150

"I want to join the army. Or the navy, I don't care. If I say I'm old enough, they'll believe me."

Then I got mad. It was because I was so scared. "You must be crazy. You god-damn fool, what the hell do you want to go and join the army for?"

"I just told you. To get out of Harlem."

"Sonny, you haven't even finished school. And if you really want to be a musician, how do you expect to study if you're in the army?"

He looked at me, trapped, and in anguish. "There's ways. I might be able to work out some kind of deal. Anyway, I'll have the G.I. Bill when I come out." 155

"If you come out." We stared at each other. "Sonny, please. Be reasonable. I know the setup is far from perfect. But we got to do the best we can."

"I ain't learning nothing in school," he said. "Even when I go." He turned away from me and opened the window and threw his cigarette out into the narrow alley. I watched his back. "At least, I ain't learning nothing you'd want me to learn." He slammed the window so hard I thought the glass would fly out, and turned back to me. "And I'm sick of the stink of these garbage cans!"

"Sonny," I said, "I know how you feel. But if you don't finish school now, you're going to be sorry later that you didn't." I grabbed him by the shoulders. "And you only got another year. It ain't so bad. And I'll come back and I swear I'll help you do whatever you want to do. Just try to put up with it till I come back. Will you please do that? For me?"

He didn't answer and he wouldn't look at me.

"Sonny. You hear me?"

He pulled away. "I hear you. But you never hear anything I say."

I didn't know what to say to that. He looked out of the window and then back at me. "OK," he said, and sighed. "I'll try."

Then I said, trying to cheer him up a little, "They got a piano at Isabel's. You can practice on it."

And as a matter of fact, it did cheer him up for a minute. "That's right," he said to himself. "I forgot that." His face relaxed a little. But the worry, the thoughtfulness, played on it still, the way shadows play on a face which is staring into the fire.

But I thought I'd never hear the end of that piano. At first, Isabel would write me, saying how nice it was that Sonny was so serious about his music and how, as soon as he came in from school, or wherever he had been when he was supposed to be at school, he went straight to that piano and stayed there until suppertime. And, after supper, he went back to that piano and stayed there until everybody went to bed. He was at the piano all day Saturday and all day Sunday. Then he bought a record player and started playing records. He'd play one record over and over again, all day long sometimes, and he'd improvise along with it on the piano. Or he'd play one section of the record, one chord, one change, one progression, then he'd do it on the piano. Then back to the record. Then back to the piano.

Well, I really don't know how they stood it. Isabel finally confessed that it wasn't like living with a person at all, it was like living with sound. And the sound didn't make any sense to her, didn't make any sense to any of them—naturally. They began, in a way, to be afflicted by this presence that was living in their home. It was as though Sonny were some sort of god, or monster. He moved in an atmosphere which wasn't like theirs at all. They fed him and he ate, he washed himself, he walked in and out of their door; he certainly wasn't nasty or unpleasant or rude, Sonny isn't any of those things; but it was as though he were all wrapped up in some cloud, some fire, some vision all his own; and there wasn't any way to reach him.

At the same time, he wasn't really a man yet, he was still a child, and they had to watch out for him in all kinds of ways. They certainly couldn't throw him out. Neither did they dare to make a great scene about that piano because even they dimly sensed, as I sensed, from so many thousands of miles away, that Sonny was at that piano playing for his life.

But he hadn't been going to school. One day a letter came from the school board and Isabel's mother got it—there had, apparently, been other letters but Sonny had torn them up. This day, when Sonny came in, Isabel's mother showed him the letter and asked where he'd been spending his time. And she finally got it out of him that he'd been down in Greenwich Village, with musicians and other characters, in a white girl's apartment. And this scared her and she started to scream at him and what came up, once she began — though she denies it to this day — was what sacrifices they were making to give Sonny a decent home and how little he appreciated it.

Sonny didn't play the piano that day. By evening, Isabel's mother had calmed down but then there was the old man to deal with, and Isabel herself. Isabel says she did her best to be calm but she broke down and started crying. She says she just watched Sonny's face. She could tell, by watching him, what was happening with him. And what was happening was that they penetrated his cloud, they had reached him. Even if their fingers had been a thousand times more gentle than human fingers ever are, he could hardly help feeling that they had stripped him naked and were spitting on that nakedness. For he also had to see that his presence, that music, which was life or death to him, had been torture for them and that they had endured it, not at all for his sake, but only for mine. And Sonny couldn't take that. He can take it a little better today than he could then but he's still not very good at it and, frankly, I don't know anybody who is.

The silence of the next few days must have been louder than the sound of all the music ever played since time began. One morning, before she went to work, Isabel was in his room for something and she suddenly realized that all of his records were gone. And she knew for certain that he was gone. And he was. He went as far as the navy would carry him. He finally sent me a postcard from some place in Greece and that was the first I knew that Sonny was still alive. I didn't see him any more until we were both back in New York and the war had long been over.

He was a man by then, of course, but I wasn't willing to see it. He came by the house from time to time, but we fought almost every time we met. I didn't like the way he carried himself, loose and dreamlike all the time, and I didn't like his friends, and his music seemed to be merely an excuse for the life he led. It sounded just that weird and disordered.

Then we had a fight, a pretty awful fight, and I didn't see him for months. By and by I looked him up, where he was living, in a furnished room in the Village, and I tried to make it up. But there were lots of people in the room and Sonny just lay on his bed, and he wouldn't come downstairs with me, and he treated these other people as though they were his family and I weren't. So I got mad and then he got mad, and then I told him that he might just as well be dead as live the way he was living. Then he stood up and he told me not to worry about him any more in life, that he was dead as far as I was concerned. Then he pushed me to the door and the other people looked on as though nothing were happening, and he slammed the door behind me. I stood in the hallway, staring at the door. I heard somebody laugh in the room and then the tears came to my eyes. I started down the steps, whistling to keep from crying, I kept whistling to myself, You going to need me, baby, one of these cold, rainy days.

I read about Sonny's trouble in the spring. Little Grace died in the fall. She was a beautiful little girl. But she only lived a little over two years. She died of polio and she suffered. She had a slight fever for a couple of days, but it didn't seem like anything and we just kept her in bed. And we would certainly have called the doctor, but the fever dropped, she seemed to be all right. So we thought it had just been a cold. Then, one day, she was up, playing, Isabel was in the kitchen fixing lunch for the two boys when they'd come in from school, and she heard Grace fall down in the living room. When you have a lot of children you don't always start running when one of them falls, unless they start screaming or something. And, this time, Grace was quiet. Yet, Isabel says that when she heard that thump and then that silence, something happened in her to make her afraid. And she ran to the living room and there was little Grace on the floor, all twisted up, and the reason she hadn't screamed was that she couldn't get her breath. And when she did scream, it was the worst sound, Isabel says, that she'd ever heard in all her life, and she still hears it sometimes in her dreams. Isabel will sometimes wake me up with a low, moaning, strangled sound and I have to be quick to awaken her and hold her to me and where Isabel is weeping against me seems a mortal wound.

I think I may have written Sonny the very day that little Grace was buried. I was sitting in the living room in the dark, by myself, and I suddenly thought of Sonny. My trouble made his real.

One Saturday afternoon, when Sonny had been living with us, or, anyway, been in our house, for nearly two weeks, I found myself wandering aimlessly about the living room, drinking from a can of beer, and trying to work up the courage to search Sonny's room. He was out, he was usually out whenever I was home, and Isabel had taken the children to see their grandparents. Suddenly I was standing still in front of the living room window, watching Seventh Avenue. The idea of searching Sonny's room made me still. I scarcely dared to admit to myself what I'd be searching for. I didn't know what I'd do if I found it. Or if I didn't.

On the sidewalk across from me, near the entrance to a barbecue joint, some people were holding an old-fashioned revival meeting. The barbecue cook, wearing a dirty white apron, his conked hair reddish and metallic in the pale sun, and a cigarette between his lips, stood in the doorway, watching them. Kids and older people paused in their errands and stood there, along with some older men and a couple of very tough-looking women who watched everything that happened on the avenue, as though they owned it, or were maybe owned by it. Well, they were watching this, too. The revival was being carried on by three sisters in black, and a brother. All they had were their voices and their Bibles and a tambourine. The brother was testifying and while he testified two of the sisters stood together, seeming to say, amen, and the third sister walked around with the tambourine outstretched and a couple of people dropped coins into it. Then the brother's testimony ended and the sister who had been taking up the collection dumped the coins into her palm and transferred them to the pocket of her long black robe. Then she raised both hands, striking the tambourine against the air, and then against one hand, and she started to sing. And the two other sisters and the brother joined in.

It was strange, suddenly, to watch, though I had been seeing these street meetings all my life. So, of course, had everybody else down there. Yet, they paused and watched and listened and I stood still at the window. "Tis the old ship of Zion," they sang, and the sister with the tambourine kept a steady, jangling beat, "it has rescued many a thousand!" Not a soul under the sound of their voices was hearing this song for the first time, not one of them had been rescued. Nor had they seen much in the way of rescue work being done around them. Neither did they especially believe in the holiness of the three sisters and the brother, they knew too much about them, knew where they lived, and how. The woman with the tambourine, whose voice dominated the air, whose face was bright with joy, was divided by very little from the woman who stood watching her, a cigarette between her heavy, chapped lips, her hair a cuckoo's nest, her face scarred and swollen from many beatings, and her black eyes glittering like coal. Perhaps they both knew this, which was why, when, as rarely, they addressed each other, they addressed each other as Sister. As the singing filled the air the watching, listening faces underwent a change, the eyes focusing on something within; the music seemed to soothe a poison out of them; and time seemed, nearly, to fall away from the sullen, belligerent, battered faces, as though they were fleeing back to their first condition, while dreaming of their last. The barbecue cook half shook his head and smiled, and dropped his cigarette and disappeared into his joint. A man fumbled in his pockets for change and stood holding it in his hand impatiently, as though he had just remembered a pressing appointment further up the avenue. He looked furious. Then I saw Sonny, standing on the edge of the crowd. He was carrying a wide, flat notebook with a green cover, and it made him look, from where I was standing, almost like a schoolboy. The coppery sun brought out the copper in his skin, he was very faintly smiling, standing very still. Then the singing stopped, the tambourine turned into a collection plate again. The furious man dropped in his coins and vanished, so did a couple of the women, and Sonny dropped some change in the plate, looking directly at the woman with a little smile. He started across the avenue, toward the house. He has a slow, loping walk, something like the way Harlem hipsters walk, only he's imposed on this his own half-beat. I had never really noticed it before.

I stayed at the window, both relieved and apprehensive. As Sonny disappeared from my sight, they began singing again. And they were still singing when his key turned in the lock.

"Hey," he said.

"Hey, yourself. You want some beer?"

"No. Well, maybe." But he came up to the window and stood beside me, looking out. "What a warm voice," he said.

They were singing If I could only hear my mother pray again!

"Yes," I said, "and she can sure beat that tambourine."

"But what a terrible song," he said, and laughed. He dropped his notebook on the sofa and disappeared into the kitchen. "Where's Isabel and the kids?"

"I think they went to see their grandparents. You hungry?"

"No." He came back into the living room with his can of beer. "You want to come some place with me tonight?"

I sensed, I don't know how, that I couldn't possibly say no. "Sure. Where?"

180

185

He sat down on the sofa and picked up his notebook and started leafing through it. "I'm going to sit in with some fellows in a joint in the Village."

"You mean, you're going to play, tonight?"

"That's right." He took a swallow of his beer and moved back to the window. He gave me a sidelong look. "If you can stand it."

"I'll try," I said.

He smiled to himself and we both watched as the meeting across the way broke up. The three sisters and the brother, heads bowed, were singing God be with you till we meet again. The faces around them were very quiet. Then the song ended. The small crowd dispersed. We watched the three women and the lone man walk slowly up the avenue.

"When she was singing before," said Sonny, abruptly, "her voice reminded me for a minute of what heroin feels like sometimes—when it's in your veins. It makes you feel sort of warm and cool at the same time. And distant. And—and sure." He sipped his beer, very deliberately not looking at me. I watched his face. "It makes you feel—in control. Sometimes you've got to have that feeling."

"Do you?" I sat down slowly in the easy chair.

"Sometimes." He went to the sofa and picked up his notebook again. "Some people do."

"In order," I asked, "to play?" And my voice was very ugly, full of contempt and anger.

"Well"—he looked at me with great, troubled eyes, as though, in fact, he hoped his eyes would tell me things he could never otherwise say—"they think so. And if they think so—!"

"And what do you think?" I asked.

He sat on the sofa and put his can of beer on the floor. "I don't know," he said, and I couldn't be sure if he were answering my question or pursuing his thoughts. His face didn't tell me. "It's not so much to play. It's to stand it, to be able to make it at all. On any level." He frowned and smiled: "In order to keep from shaking to pieces."

"But these friends of yours," I said, "they seem to shake themselves to pieces pretty goddamn fast."

"Maybe." He played with the notebook. And something told me that I should curb my tongue, that Sonny was doing his best to talk, that I should listen. "But of course you only know the ones that've gone to pieces. Some don't—or at least they haven't yet and that's just about all any of us can say." He paused. "And then there are some who just live, really, in hell, and they know it and they see what's happening and they go right on. I don't know." He sighed, dropped the notebook, folded his arms. "Some guys, you can tell from the way they play, they on something all the time. And you can see that, well, it makes something real for them. But of course," he picked up his beer from the floor and sipped it and put the can down again, "they want to, too, you've got to see that. Even some of them that say they don't—some, not all."

"And what about you?" I asked—I couldn't help it. "What about you? Do you want to?"

He stood up and walked to the window and remained silent for a long time. Then he sighed. "Me," he said. Then: "While I was downstairs before, on my way here, listening to that woman sing, it struck me all of a sudden how much suffering she must have had to go through—to sing like that. It's repulsive to think you have to suffer that much."

I said: "But there's no way not to suffer—is there, Sonny?"

"I believe not," he said and smiled, "but that's never stopped anyone from trying." He looked at me. "Has it?" I realized, with this mocking look, that there stood between us, forever, beyond the power of time or forgiveness, the fact that I had held silence—so long!—when he had needed human speech to help him. He turned back to the window. "No, there's no way not to suffer. But you try all kinds of ways to keep from drowning in it, to keep on top of it, and to make it seem—well, like you. Like you did something, all right, and now you're suffering for it. You know?" I said nothing. "Well you know," he said, impatiently, "why do people suffer? Maybe it's better to do something to give it a reason, any reason."

205

"But we just agreed," I said, "that there's no way not to suffer. Isn't it better, then, just to—take it?"

"But nobody just takes it," Sonny cried, "that's what I'm telling you! Everybody tries not to. You're just hung up on the way some people try—it's not your way!"

The hair on my face began to itch, my face felt wet. "That's not true," I said, "that's not true. I don't give a damn what other people do, I don't even care how they suffer. I just care how you suffer." And he looked at me. "Please believe me," I said, "I don't want to see you—die—trying not to suffer."

"I won't," he said, flatly, "die trying not to suffer. At least, not any faster than anybody else."

"But there's no need," I said, trying to laugh, "is there? in killing yourself?"

210

I wanted to say more, but I couldn't. I wanted to talk about will power and how life could be—well, beautiful. I wanted to say that it was all within; but was it? or, rather, wasn't that exactly the trouble? And I wanted to promise that I would never fail him again. But it would all have sounded—empty words and lies.

So I made the promise to myself and prayed that I would keep it.

"It's terrible sometimes, inside," he said, "that's what's the trouble. You walk these streets, black and funky and cold, and there's not really a living ass to talk to, and there's nothing shaking, and there's no way of getting it out—that storm inside. You can't talk it and you can't make love with it, and when you finally try to get with it and play it, you realize nobody's listening. So you've got to listen. You got to find a way to listen."

And then he walked away from the window and sat on the sofa again, as though all the wind had suddenly been knocked out of him. "Sometimes you'll do anything to play, even cut your mother's throat." He laughed and looked at me. "Or your brother's." Then he sobered. "Or your own." Then: "Don't worry. I'm all right now and I think I'll be all right. But I can't forget—where I've been. I don't mean just the physical place I've been, I mean where I've been. And what I've been."

"What have you been, Sonny?" I asked.

215

He smiled—but sat sideways on the sofa, his elbow resting on the back, his fingers playing with his mouth and chin, not looking at me. “I’ve been something I didn’t recognize, didn’t know I could be. Didn’t know anybody could be.” He stopped, looking inward, looking helplessly young, looking old. “I’m not talking about it now because I feel guilty or anything like that—maybe it would be better if I did, I don’t know. Anyway, I can’t really talk about it. Not to you, not to anybody,” and now he turned and faced me. “Sometimes, you know, and it was actually when I was most out of the world, I felt that I was in it, that I was with it, really, and I could play or I didn’t really have to play, it just came out of me, it was there. And I don’t know how I played, thinking about it now, but I know I did awful things, those times, sometimes, to people. Or it wasn’t that I did anything to them—it was that they weren’t real.” He picked up the beer can; it was empty; he rolled it between his palms: “And other times—well, I needed a fix, I needed to find a place to lean, I needed to clear a space to listen—and I couldn’t find it, and I—went crazy, I did terrible things to me, I was terrible for me.” He began pressing the beer can between his hands, I watched the metal begin to give. It glittered, as he played with it, like a knife, and I was afraid he would cut himself, but I said nothing. “Oh well. I can never tell you. I was all by myself at the bottom of something, stinking and sweating and crying and shaking, and I smelled it, you know? my stink, and I thought I’d die if I couldn’t get away from it and yet, all the same, I knew that everything I was doing was just locking me in with it. And I didn’t know,” he paused, still flattening the beer can, “I didn’t know, I still don’t know, something kept telling me that maybe it was good to smell your own stink, but I didn’t think that that was what I’d been trying to do—and—who can stand it?” and he abruptly dropped the ruined beer can, looking at me with a small, still smile, and then rose, walking to the window as though it were the lodestone rock. I watched his face, he watched the avenue. “I couldn’t tell you when Mama died—but the reason I wanted to leave Harlem so bad was to get away from drugs. And then, when I ran away, that’s what I was running from—really. When I came back, nothing had changed, I hadn’t changed, I was just—older.” And he stopped, drumming with his fingers on the windowpane. The sun had vanished, soon darkness would fall. I watched his face. “It can come again,” he said, almost as though speaking to himself. Then he turned to me. “It can come again,” he repeated. “I just want you to know that.”

“All right,” I said, at last. “So it can come again. All right.”

He smiled, but the smile was sorrowful. “I had to try to tell you,” he said.

“Yes,” I said. “I understand that.”

“You’re my brother,” he said, looking straight at me, and not smiling at all.

“Yes,” I repeated, “yes. I understand that.”

He turned back to the window, looking out. “All that hatred down there,” he said, “all that hatred and misery and love. It’s a wonder it doesn’t blow the avenue apart.”

We went to the only nightclub on a short, dark street, downtown. We squeezed through the narrow, chattering, jam-packed bar to the entrance of the big room, where the bandstand was. And we stood there for a moment, for the lights were very dim in this room and we couldn’t see. Then, “Hello, boy,” said a voice and an enormous black man, much older than Sonny or myself, erupted out of all that atmospheric lighting and put an arm around Sonny's shoulder. "I been sitting right here," he said, "waiting for you."

He had a big voice, too, and heads in the darkness turned toward us.

Sonny grinned and pulled a little away, and said, "Creole, this is my brother. I told you about him." 225

Creole shook my hand. "I'm glad to meet you, son," he said, and it was clear that he was glad to meet me there, for Sonny's sake. And he smiled, "You got a real musician in your family," and he took his arm from Sonny's shoulder and slapped him, lightly, affectionately, with the back of his hand.

"Well. Now I've heard it all," said a voice behind us. This was another musician, and a friend of Sonny's, a coal-black, cheerful-looking man, built close to the ground. He immediately began confiding to me, at the top of his lungs, the most terrible things about Sonny, his teeth gleaming like a lighthouse and his laugh coming up out of him like the beginning of an earthquake. And it turned out that everyone at the bar knew Sonny, or almost everyone; some were musicians, working there, or nearby, or not working, some were simply hangers-on, and some were there to hear Sonny play. I was introduced to all of them and they were all very polite to me. Yet, it was clear that, for them, I was only Sonny's brother. Here, I was in Sonny's world. Or, rather: his kingdom. Here, it was not even a question that his veins bore royal blood.

They were going to play soon and Creole installed me, by myself, at a table in a dark corner. Then I watched them, Creole, and the little black man, and Sonny, and the others, while they horsed around, standing just below the bandstand. The light from the bandstand spilled just a little short of them and, watching them laughing and gesturing and moving about, I had the feeling that they, nevertheless, were being most careful not to step into that circle of light too suddenly: that if they moved into the light too suddenly, without thinking, they would perish in flame. Then, while I watched, one of them, the small, black man, moved into the light and crossed the bandstand and started fooling around with his drums. Then—being funny and being, also, extremely ceremonious—Creole took Sonny by the arm and led him to the piano. A woman's voice called Sonny's name and a few hands started clapping. And Sonny, also being funny and being ceremonious, and so touched, I think, that he could have cried, but neither hiding it nor showing it, riding it like a man, grinned, and put both hands to his heart and bowed from the waist.

Creole then went to the bass fiddle and a lean, very bright-skinned brown man jumped up on the bandstand and picked up his horn. So there they were, and the atmosphere on the bandstand and in the room began to change and tighten. Someone stepped up to the microphone and announced them. Then there were all kinds of murmurs. Some people at the bar shushed others. The waitress ran around, frantically getting in the last orders, guys and chicks got closer to each other, and the lights on the bandstand, on the quartet, turned to a kind of indigo. Then they all looked different there. Creole looked about him for the last time, as though he were making certain that all his chickens were in the coop, and then he—jumped and struck the fiddle. And there they were.

All I know about music is that not many people ever really hear it. And even then, on the rare occasions when something opens within, and the music enters, what we mainly hear, or hear corroborated, are personal, private, vanishing evocations. But the man who creates the music is hearing something else, is dealing with the roar rising from the void and imposing order on it as it hits the air. What is evoked in him, then, is of another order, more terrible because it has no words, and triumphant, too, for that same reason. And his triumph, when he triumphs, is ours. I just watched Sonny's face. His face was troubled, he was working hard, but he wasn't with it. And I had the feeling that, in a way, everyone on the bandstand was waiting for him, both waiting for him and pushing him along. But as I began to watch Creole, I realized that it was Creole who held them all back. He had them on a short rein. Up there, keeping the beat with his whole body, wailing on the fiddle, with his eyes half closed, he was listening to everything, but he was listening to Sonny. He was having a dialogue with Sonny. He wanted Sonny to leave the shoreline and strike out for the deep water. He was Sonny's witness that deep water and drowning were not the same thing—he had been there, and he knew. And he wanted Sonny to know. He was waiting for Sonny to do the things on the keys which would let Creole know that Sonny was in the water.

And, while Creole listened, Sonny moved, deep within, exactly like someone in torment. I had never before thought of how awful the relationship must be between the musician and his instrument. He has to fill it, this instrument, with the breath of life, his own. He has to make it do what he wants it to do. And a piano is just a piano. It's made out of so much wood and wires and little hammers and big ones, and ivory. While there's only so much you can do with it, the only way to find this out is to try; to try and make it do everything.

And Sonny hadn't been near a piano for over a year. And he wasn't on much better terms with his life, not the life that stretched before him now. He and the piano stammered, started one way, got scared, stopped; started another way, panicked, marked time, started again; then seemed to have found a direction, panicked again, got stuck. And the face I saw on Sonny I'd never seen before. Everything had been burned out of it, and, at the same time, things usually hidden were being burned in, by the fire and fury of the battle which was occurring in him up there.

Yet, watching Creole's face as they neared the end of the first set, I had the feeling that something had happened, something I hadn't heard. Then they finished, there was scattered applause, and then, without an instant's warning, Creole started into something else, it was almost sardonic, it was Am I Blue. And, as though he commanded, Sonny began to play. Something began to happen. And Creole let out the reins. The dry, low, black man said something awful on the drums, Creole answered, and the drums talked back. Then the horn insisted, sweet and high, slightly detached perhaps, and Creole listened, commenting now and then, dry, and driving, beautiful and calm and old. Then they all came together again, and Sonny was part of the family again. I could tell this from his face. He seemed to have found, right there beneath his fingers, a damn brand-new piano. It seemed that he couldn't get over it. Then, for awhile, just being happy with Sonny, they seemed to be agreeing with him that brand-new pianos certainly were a gas.

Then Creole stepped forward to remind them that what they were playing was the blues. He hit something in all of them, he hit something in me, myself, and the music tightened and deepened, apprehension began to beat the air. Creole began to tell us what the blues were all about. They were not about anything very new. He and his boys up there were keeping it new, at the risk of ruin, destruction, madness, and death, in order to find new ways to make us listen. For, while the tale of how we suffer, and how we are delighted, and how we may triumph is never new, it always must be heard. There isn't any other tale to tell, it's the only light we've got in all this darkness.

And this tale, according to that face, that body, those strong hands on those strings, has another aspect in every country, and a new depth in every generation. Listen, Creole seemed to be saying, listen. Now these are Sonny's blues. He made the little black man on the drums know it, and the bright, brown man on the horn. Creole wasn't trying any longer to get Sonny in the water. He was wishing him Godspeed. Then he stepped back, very slowly, filling the air with the immense suggestion that Sonny speak for himself.

Then they all gathered around Sonny and Sonny played. Every now and again one of them seemed to say, amen. Sonny's fingers filled the air with life, his life. But that life contained so many others. And Sonny went all the way back, he really began with the spare, flat statement of the opening phrase of the song. Then he began to make it his. It was very beautiful because it wasn't hurried and it was no longer a lament. I seemed to hear with what burning he had made it his, with what burning we had yet to make it ours, how we could cease lamenting. Freedom lurked around us and I understood, at last, that he could help us to be free if we would listen, that he would never be free until we did. Yet, there was no battle in his face now. I heard what he had gone through, and would continue to go through until he came to rest in earth. He had made it his: that long line, of which we knew only Mama and Daddy. And he was giving it back, as everything must be given back, so that, passing through death, it can live forever. I saw my mother's face again, and felt, for the first time, how the stones of the road she had walked on must have bruised her feet. I saw the moonlit road where my father's brother died. And it brought something else back to me, and carried me past it. I saw my little girl again and felt Isabel's tears again, and I felt my own tears begin to rise. And I was yet aware that this was only a moment, that the world waited outside, as hungry as a tiger, and that trouble stretched above us, longer than the sky.

Then it was over. Creole and Sonny let out their breath, both soaking wet, and grinning. There was a lot of applause and some of it was real. In the dark, the girl came by and I asked her to take drinks to the bandstand. There was a long pause, while they talked up there in the indigo light and after awhile I saw the girl put a Scotch and milk on top of the piano for Sonny. He didn't seem to notice it, but just before they started playing again, he sipped from it and looked toward me, and nodded. Then he put it back on top of the piano. For me, then, as they began to play again, it glowed and shook above my brother's head like the very cup of trembling.

Questions for Discussion

1. It is easy to see that the narrator of “Sonny’s Blues” and his brother, Sonny, represent two sides of the same coin: one brother is employed as a math teacher, married, clean living; the other is a jazz musician, single, struggling with heroin addiction. Discuss the ways in which Baldwin brings these two characters to life and makes them more than just opposites. Which brother do you think is the story’s main character? Explain your answer.
2. The backdrop of 1950s Harlem and the story of the narrator’s uncle’s death (para. 94) suggest that the characters have suffered from vicious and institutionalized racism. Where else do you see the impact of racism in the story? Do you think that Sonny’s addiction and the narrator’s repression and rigidity are caused by their natures or by the social forces of racism?
3. “Sonny’s Blues” is a story about listening, and not just the effort of the narrator to learn to listen to Sonny. Track the different descriptions of music in this story. How does each one add another dimension to the story’s meaning? How does each one say something about the needs and desires of the story’s characters?
4. Why do you think the narrator gets back in touch with Sonny when his daughter, Grace, dies?
5. Do you think this story has a happy ending? Why or why not?
6. This story depends somewhat on a view of Harlem in the 1950s. Research the ways in which Harlem has changed in the last fifty years. Do you think the change is superficial or profound? Could a tale such as the one told in “Sonny’s Blues” take place there today? If so, in what ways would it be different?
7. Sonny tells his brother that Louis Armstrong is “old-time, down home” music. He likes the music of Charlie “Bird” Parker. Listen to music by Louis Armstrong and Charlie Parker, and describe the differences between them. Parker’s version of “White Christmas” gives the listener a particularly vivid understanding of the bebop style he exemplified and that so intrigues Sonny. How does Baldwin illustrate bebop in the story’s last scene at the club?
8. Do you agree that suffering is necessary to create art? Consider such examples as painter Vincent van Gogh, musician Kurt Cobain, and poet Sylvia Plath, but also jazz trumpeter Miles Davis and Rolling Stones guitarist Keith Richards, who both overcame heroin addiction.

Questions on Style and Structure

1. What is the effect of the repetition of the word “it” in the first two paragraphs?
2. The first sentence of the story’s second paragraph begins, “It was not to be believed.” What does the use of the passive voice suggest about the narrator’s response to the news he has just gotten?
3. Why do you think the plot of this story is not in chronological order? Try rearranging the events of the story so that they are in chronological order. How does it change the story Baldwin is telling?

4. The narrator has a conversation with an old neighborhood friend of Sonny's (paras. 9–46). How does that conversation shape the characterization of the narrator? How does it shape our expectations for the outcome of the story?
5. What do you think is the purpose of the narrator's description of a typical Sunday afternoon at his parents' house (paras. 78–79)? What part does that setting have in the story's conflict?
6. What does the narrator's statement "My trouble made his real" (para. 174) reveal about his character? What does it reveal about the nature of empathy?
7. Why do you think Baldwin gave no name to the narrator?
8. According to the narrator—and his mother—how are Sonny and his father similar? What evidence does the story offer as support? What are the parallels between the narrator and his mother? What do you think the dash in the last sentence of paragraph 76 says about the narrator? about Sonny and his father?
9. The story ends in a club where the narrator goes to hear Sonny play. The language of the story changes, becoming more abstract and metaphorical. What does that change suggest about the part music plays in the lives of the musicians and what Baldwin wants us to feel about Sonny and his blues?
10. What do you think is the difference between deep water and drowning (para. 230)? Why do you think the narrator begins to understand his brother and himself through the way Creole leads Sonny into the music?
11. What effect does Sonny's music have on the narrator? Look closely at paragraph 236.
12. The very last line of the story is an allusion to a somewhat enigmatic passage in the Bible about rage and God's protection against it. What does the allusion suggest about the glowing "cup of trembling" the narrator sees in the cup "above [his] brother's head"?

Suggestions for Writing

1. Using "Sonny's Blues" and other stories, poems, or films about art and artists as evidence, write an essay in which you defend, challenge, or qualify the formula created by editor and critic Robert Gottlieb to mock the proliferation of movies about artists and their process: "Love + Suffering = Art."
2. Write an essay in which you compare the narrator to Sonny. Be sure to discuss the way in which Baldwin uses the contrast between them to develop one or more of the story's themes.
3. Write an essay in which you analyze the names of the characters—and the fact that the narrator has no name.
4. There's an old saying that "mathematics is music for the mind; music is mathematics for the soul." Write about how this connection is illustrated in "Sonny's Blues."
5. Research the jazz musicians of the first part of the twentieth century, and write an essay that illuminates some of the reasons the narrator of "Sonny's Blues" did not feel that playing jazz music was a viable career choice for his younger brother.
6. Write a version of "Sonny's Blues" as it might happen today. Experiment with imitating Baldwin's voice and using nonchronological plotting.

The Yellow Wallpaper

CHARLOTTE PERKINS GILMAN

Charlotte Perkins Gilman (1860–1935) came from a long line of feminists and suffragists, including her grandaunt, Harriet Beecher Stowe, the author of Uncle Tom's Cabin. Born in Hartford, Connecticut, she was brought up in an atmosphere of rigid coldness, forbidden to make close friendships or even to read fiction. Gilman was educated mostly at home and briefly at the Rhode Island School of Design. She married artist Charles Walter Stetson in 1884 and suffered a severe bout of postpartum depression after the birth of their daughter. She underwent Dr. Silas Weir Mitchell's "rest cure," a treatment in which she was instructed to "live as domestic a life as possible. Have your child with you all the time. Have but two hours' intellectual life a day. And never touch a pen, brush, or pencil as long as you live." Gilman and Stetson divorced, unusual for the time, and she later remarried. Gilman lived in California for much of her later life; lectured on social reform; and wrote short stories, poetry, and nonfiction. A believer in euthanasia, Gilman took an overdose of chloroform when she learned she had inoperable breast cancer. Gilman wrote The Yellow Wallpaper, published in 1892, as an indictment of the rest cure.

It is very seldom that mere ordinary people like John and myself secure ancestral halls for the summer.

A colonial mansion, a hereditary estate, I would say a haunted house and reach the height of romantic felicity—but that would be asking too much of fate!

Still I will proudly declare that there is something queer about it.

Else, why should it be let so cheaply? And why have stood so long untenanted?

John laughs at me, of course, but one expects that in marriage.

5

John is practical in the extreme. He has no patience with faith, an intense horror of superstition, and he scoffs openly at any talk of things not to be felt and seen and put down in figures.

John is a physician, and perhaps—(I would not say it to a living soul, of course, but this is dead paper and a great relief to my mind)—perhaps that is one reason I do not get well faster.

You see, he does not believe I am sick!

And what can one do?

If a physician of high standing, and one's own husband, assures friends and relatives that there is really nothing the matter with one but temporary nervous depression—a slight hysterical tendency—what is one to do?

10

My brother is also a physician, and also of high standing, and he says the same thing.

So I take phosphates or phosphites—whichever it is, and tonics, and journeys, and air, and exercise, and am absolutely forbidden to "work" until I am well again.

Personally, I disagree with their ideas.

Personally, I believe that congenial work, with excitement and change, would do me good.

But what is one to do?

I did write for a while in spite of them; but it does exhaust me a good deal—having to be so sly about it, or else meet with heavy opposition.

I sometimes fancy that in my condition if I had less opposition and more society and stimulus—but John says the very worst thing I can do is to think about my condition, and I confess it always makes me feel bad.

So I will let it alone and talk about the house.

The most beautiful place! It is quite alone, standing well back from the road, quite three miles from the village. It makes me think of English places that you read about, for there are hedges and walls and gates that lock, and lots of separate little houses for the gardeners and people.

There is a delicious garden! I never saw such a garden—large and shady, full of box-bordered paths, and lined with long grape-covered arbors with seats under them.

There were greenhouses, too, but they are all broken now.

There was some legal trouble, I believe, something about the heirs and co-heirs; anyhow, the place has been empty for years.

That spoils my ghostliness, I am afraid, but I don't care—there is something strange about the house—I can feel it.

I even said so to John one moonlight evening, but he said what I felt was a draught, and shut the window.

I get unreasonably angry with John sometimes. I'm sure I never used to be so sensitive. I think it is due to this nervous condition.

But John says if I feel so, I shall neglect proper self-control; so I take pains to control myself—before him, at least, and that makes me very tired.

I don't like our room a bit. I wanted one downstairs that opened on the piazza and had roses all over the window, and such pretty old-fashioned chintz hangings! but John would not hear of it.

He said there was only one window and not room for two beds, and no near room for him if he took another.

He is very careful and loving, and hardly lets me stir without special direction.

I have a schedule prescription for each hour in the day; he takes all care from me, and so I feel basely ungrateful not to value it more.

He said we came here solely on my account, that I was to have perfect rest and all the air I could get. "Your exercise depends on your strength, my dear," said he, "and your food somewhat on your appetite; but air you can absorb all the time." So we took the nursery at the top of the house.

It is a big, airy room, the whole floor nearly, with windows that look all ways, and air and sunshine galore. It was nursery first and then playroom and gymnasium, I should judge; for the windows are barred for little children, and there are rings and things in the walls.

The paint and paper look as if a boys' school had used it. It is stripped off—the paper—in great patches all around the head of my bed, about as far as I can reach, and in a great place on the other side of the room low down. I never saw a worse paper in my life.

One of those sprawling flamboyant patterns committing every artistic sin.

It is dull enough to confuse the eye in following, pronounced enough to constantly irritate and provoke study, and when you follow the lame uncertain curves for a little distance they suddenly commit suicide—plunge off at outrageous angles, destroy themselves in unheard of contradictions.

The color is repellant, almost revolting; a smouldering unclean yellow, strangely faded by the slow-turning sunlight.

It is a dull yet lurid orange in some places, a sickly sulphur tint in others.

No wonder the children hated it! I should hate it myself if I had to live in this room long.

There comes John, and I must put this away,—he hates to have me write a word.

We have been here two weeks, and I haven't felt like writing before, since that first day.

I am sitting by the window now, up in this atrocious nursery, and there is nothing to hinder my writing as much as I please, save lack of strength.

John is away all day, and even some nights when his cases are serious.

I am glad my case is not serious!

But these nervous troubles are dreadfully depressing.

John does not know how much I really suffer. He knows there is no reason to suffer, and that satisfies him.

Of course it is only nervousness. It does weigh on me so not to do my duty in any way!

I meant to be such a help to John, such a real rest and comfort, and here I am a comparative burden already!

Nobody would believe what an effort it is to do what little I am able,—to dress and entertain, and order things.

It is fortunate Mary is so good with the baby. Such a dear baby!

And yet I cannot be with him, it makes me so nervous.

I suppose John never was nervous in his life. He laughs at me so about this wall-paper!

At first he meant to repaper the room, but afterward he said that I was letting it get the better of me, and that nothing was worse for a nervous patient than to give way to such fancies.

He said that after the wall-paper was changed it would be the heavy bedstead, and then the barred windows, and then that gate at the head of the stairs, and so on.

"You know the place is doing you good," he said, "and really, dear, I don't care to renovate the house just for a three months' rental."

"Then do let us go downstairs," I said, "there are such pretty rooms there." 55

Then he took me in his arms and called me a blessed little goose, and said he would go down cellar, if I wished, and have it whitewashed into the bargain.

But he is right enough about the beds and windows and things.

It is an airy and comfortable room as anyone need wish, and, of course, I would not be so silly as to make him uncomfortable just for a whim.

I'm really getting quite fond of the big room, all but that horrid paper.

Out of one window I can see the garden, those mysterious deep-shaded arbors, 60 the riotous old-fashioned flowers, and bushes and gnarly trees.

Out of another I get a lovely view of the bay and a little private wharf belonging to the estate. There is a beautiful shaded lane that runs down there from the house. I always fancy I see people walking in these numerous paths and arbors, but John has cautioned me not to give way to fancy in the least. He says that with my imaginative power and habit of story-making, a nervous weakness like mine is sure to lead to all manner of excited fancies, and that I ought to use my will and good sense to check the tendency. So I try.

I think sometimes that if I were only well enough to write a little it would relieve the press of ideas and rest me.

But I find I get pretty tired when I try.

It is so discouraging not to have any advice and companionship about my work. When I get really well, John says we will ask Cousin Henry and Julia down for a long visit; but he says he would as soon put fireworks in my pillow-case as to let me have those stimulating people about now.

I wish I could get well faster. 65

But I must not think about that. This paper looks to me as if it knew what a vicious influence it had!

There is a recurrent spot where the pattern lolls like a broken neck and two bulbous eyes stare at you upside down.

I get positively angry with the impertinence of it and the everlastingness. Up and down and sideways they crawl, and those absurd, unblinking eyes are everywhere. There is one place where two breadths didn't match, and the eyes go all up and down the line, one a little higher than the other.

I never saw so much expression in an inanimate thing before, and we all know how much expression they have! I used to lie awake as a child and get more entertainment and terror out of blank walls and plain furniture than most children could find in a toy-store.

I remember what a kindly wink the knobs of our big, old bureau used to have, 70 and there was one chair that always seemed like a strong friend.

I used to feel that if any of the other things looked too fierce I could always hop into that chair and be safe.

The furniture in this room is no worse than inharmonious, however, for we had to bring it all from downstairs. I suppose when this was used as a playroom they had to take the nursery things out, and no wonder! I never saw such ravages as the children have made here.

The wall-paper, as I said before, is torn off in spots, and it sticketh closer than a brother—they must have had perseverance as well as hatred.

Then the floor is scratched and gouged and splintered, the plaster itself is dug out here and there, and this great heavy bed, which is all we found in the room, looks as if it had been through the wars.

But I don't mind it a bit—only the paper.

There comes John's sister. Such a dear girl as she is, and so careful of me! I must not let her find me writing.

She is a perfect and enthusiastic housekeeper, and hopes for no better profession. I verily believe she thinks it is the writing which made me sick!

But I can write when she is out, and see her a long way off from these windows.

There is one that commands the road, a lovely shaded winding road, and one that just looks off over the country. A lovely country, too, full of great elms and velvet meadows.

This wallpaper has a kind of sub-pattern in a different shade, a particularly irritating one, for you can only see it in certain lights, and not clearly then.

80

But in the places where it isn't faded and where the sun is just so—I can see a strange, provoking, formless sort of figure, that seems to skulk about behind that silly and conspicuous front design.

There's sister on the stairs!

Well, the Fourth of July is over! The people are all gone and I am tired out. John thought it might do me good to see a little company, so we just had mother and Nellie and the children down for a week.

Of course I didn't do a thing. Jennie sees to everything now.

But it tired me all the same.

85

John says if I don't pick up faster he shall send me to Weir Mitchell in the fall.

But I don't want to go there at all. I had a friend who was in his hands once, and she says he is just like John and my brother, only more so!

Besides, it is such an undertaking to go so far.

I don't feel as if it was worthwhile to turn my hand over for anything, and I'm getting dreadfully fretful and querulous.

I cry at nothing, and cry most of the time.

90

Of course I don't when John is here, or anybody else, but when I am alone.

And I am alone a good deal just now. John is kept in town very often by serious cases, and Jennie is good and lets me alone when I want her to.

So I walk a little in the garden or down that lovely lane, sit on the porch under the roses, and lie down up here a good deal.

I'm getting really fond of the room in spite of the wallpaper. Perhaps because of the wallpaper.

It dwells in my mind so!

95

I lie here on this great immovable bed—it is nailed down, I believe—and follow that pattern about by the hour. It is as good as gymnastics, I assure you. I start, we'll say, at the bottom, down in the corner over there where it has not been touched, and I determine for the thousandth time that I will follow that pointless pattern to some sort of a conclusion.

I know a little of the principle of design, and I know this thing was not arranged on any laws of radiation, or alternation, or repetition, or symmetry, or anything else that I ever heard of.

It is repeated, of course, by the breadths, but not otherwise.

Looked at in one way each breadth stands alone, the bloated curves and flourishes—a kind of “debased Romanesque” with delirium tremens—go waddling up and down in isolated columns of fatuity.

But, on the other hand, they connect diagonally, and the sprawling outlines run off in great slanting waves of optic horror, like a lot of wallowing sea-weeds in full chase. 100

The whole thing goes horizontally, too, at least it seems so, and I exhaust myself in trying to distinguish the order of its going in that direction.

They have used a horizontal breadth for a frieze, and that adds wonderfully to the confusion.

There is one end of the room where it is almost intact, and there, when the crosslights fade and the low sun shines directly upon it, I can almost fancy radiation after all,—the interminable grotesques seem to form around a common centre and rush off in headlong plunges of equal distraction.

It makes me tired to follow it. I will take a nap I guess.

I don’t know why I should write this. 105

I don’t want to.

I don’t feel able.

And I know John would think it absurd. But I must say what I feel and think in some way—it is such a relief!

But the effort is getting to be greater than the relief.

Half the time now I am awfully lazy, and lie down ever so much. 110

John says I mustn’t lose my strength, and has me take cod liver oil and lots of tonics and things, to say nothing of ale and wine and rare meat.

Dear John! He loves me very dearly, and hates to have me sick. I tried to have a real earnest reasonable talk with him the other day, and tell him how I wish he would let me go and make a visit to Cousin Henry and Julia.

But he said I wasn’t able to go, nor able to stand it after I got there; and I did not make out a very good case for myself, for I was crying before I had finished.

It is getting to be a great effort for me to think straight. Just this nervous weakness I suppose.

And dear John gathered me up in his arms, and just carried me upstairs and laid me on the bed, and sat by me and read to me till it tired my head. 115

He said I was his darling and his comfort and all he had, and that I must take care of myself for his sake, and keep well.

He says no one but myself can help me out of it, that I must use my will and self-control and not let any silly fancies run away with me.

There's one comfort, the baby is well and happy, and does not have to occupy this nursery with the horrid wallpaper.

If we had not used it, that blessed child would have! What a fortunate escape! Why, I wouldn't have a child of mine, an impressionable little thing, live in such a room for worlds.

I never thought of it before, but it is lucky that John kept me here after all, I can stand it so much easier than a baby, you see. 120

Of course I never mention it to them any more—I am too wise, but I keep watch of it all the same.

There are things in the wallpaper that nobody knows but me, or ever will.

Behind that outside pattern the dim shapes get clearer every day.

It is always the same shape, only very numerous.

And it is like a woman stooping down and creeping about behind that pattern. I don't like it a bit. I wonder—I begin to think—I wish John would take me away from here! 125

It is so hard to talk with John about my case, because he is so wise, and because he loves me so.

But I tried it last night.

It was moonlight. The moon shines in all around just as the sun does.

I hate to see it sometimes, it creeps so slowly, and always comes in by one window or another.

John was asleep and I hated to waken him, so I kept still and watched the moonlight on that undulating wallpaper till I felt creepy. 130

The faint figure behind seemed to shake the pattern, just as if she wanted to get out.

I got up softly and went to feel and see if the paper did move, and when I came back John was awake.

"What is it, little girl?" he said. "Don't go walking about like that—you'll get cold."

I thought it was a good time to talk, so I told him that I really was not gaining here, and that I wished he would take me away.

"Why, darling!" said he, "our lease will be up in three weeks, and I can't see how to leave before. 135

"The repairs are not done at home, and I cannot possibly leave town just now. Of course if you were in any danger, I could and would, but you really are better, dear, whether you can see it or not. I am a doctor, dear, and I know. You are gaining flesh and color, your appetite is better, I feel really much easier about you."

"I don't weigh a bit more," said I, "nor as much; and my appetite may be better in the evening when you are here but it is worse in the morning when you are away!"

"Bless her little heart!" said he with a big hug, "she shall be as sick as she pleases! But now let's improve the shining hours by going to sleep, and talk about it in the morning!"

"And you won't go away?" I asked gloomily.

"Why, how can I, dear? It is only three weeks more and then we will take a nice little trip of a few days while Jennie is getting the house ready. Really dear you are better!" 140

"Better in body perhaps—" I began, and stopped short, for he sat up straight and looked at me with such a stern, reproachful look that I could not say another word.

"My darling," said he, "I beg you, for my sake and for our child's sake, as well as for your own, that you will never for one instant let that idea enter your mind! There is nothing so dangerous, so fascinating, to a temperament like yours. It is a false and foolish fancy. Can you trust me as a physician when I tell you so?"

So of course I said no more on that score, and we went to sleep before long. He thought I was asleep first, but I wasn't, and lay there for hours trying to decide whether that front pattern and the back pattern really did move together or separately.

On a pattern like this, by daylight, there is a lack of sequence, a defiance of law, that is a constant irritant to a normal mind.

The color is hideous enough, and unreliable enough, and infuriating enough, but the pattern is torturing. 145

You think you have mastered it, but just as you get well underway in following, it turns a back-somersault and there you are. It slaps you in the face, knocks you down, and tramples upon you. It is like a bad dream.

The outside pattern is a florid arabesque, reminding one of a fungus. If you can imagine a toadstool in joints, an interminable string of toadstools, budding and sprouting in endless convolutions—why, that is something like it.

That is, sometimes!

There is one marked peculiarity about this paper, a thing nobody seems to notice but myself, and that is that it changes as the light changes.

When the sun shoots in through the east window—I always watch for that first long, straight ray—it changes so quickly that I never can quite believe it. 150

That is why I watch it always.

By moonlight—the moon shines in all night when there is a moon—I wouldn't know it was the same paper.

At night in any kind of light, in twilight, candlelight, lamplight, and worst of all by moonlight, it becomes bars! The outside pattern I mean, and the woman behind it is as plain as can be.

I didn't realize for a long time what the thing was that showed behind, that dim sub-pattern, but now I am quite sure it is a woman.

By daylight she is subdued, quiet. I fancy it is the pattern that keeps her so still. It is so puzzling. It keeps me quiet by the hour. 155

I lie down ever so much now. John says it is good for me, and to sleep all I can.

Indeed he started the habit by making me lie down for an hour after each meal.

It is a very bad habit I am convinced, for you see I don't sleep.

And that cultivates deceit, for I don't tell them I'm awake—O, no!

The fact is I am getting a little afraid of John.

160

He seems very queer sometimes, and even Jennie has an inexplicable look.

It strikes me occasionally, just as a scientific hypothesis,—that perhaps it is the paper!

I have watched John when he did not know I was looking, and come into the room suddenly on the most innocent excuses, and I've caught him several times looking at the paper! And Jennie too. I caught Jennie with her hand on it once.

She didn't know I was in the room, and when I asked her in a quiet, a very quiet voice, with the most restrained manner possible, what she was doing with the paper—she turned around as if she had been caught stealing, and looked quite angry—asked me why I should frighten her so!

Then she said that the paper stained everything it touched, that she had found yellow smooches on all my clothes and John's, and she wished we would be more careful!

Did not that sound innocent? But I know she was studying that pattern, and I am determined that nobody shall find it out but myself!

Life is very much more exciting now than it used to be. You see I have something more to expect, to look forward to, to watch. I really do eat better, and am more quiet than I was.

John is so pleased to see me improve! He laughed a little the other day, and said I seemed to be flourishing in spite of my wall-paper.

I turned it off with a laugh. I had no intention of telling him it was because of the wall-paper—he would make fun of me. He might even want to take me away.

I don't want to leave now until I have found it out. There is a week more, and I think that will be enough.

170

I'm feeling ever so much better! I don't sleep much at night, for it is so interesting to watch developments; but I sleep a good deal in the daytime.

In the daytime it is tiresome and perplexing.

There are always new shoots on the fungus, and new shades of yellow all over it. I cannot keep count of them, though I have tried conscientiously.

It is the strangest yellow, that wall-paper! It makes me think of all the yellow things I ever saw—not beautiful ones like buttercups, but old foul, bad yellow things.

But there is something else about that paper—the smell! I noticed it the moment we came into the room, but with so much air and sun it was not bad. Now we have had a week of fog and rain, and whether the windows are open or not, the smell is here.

175

It creeps all over the house.

I find it hovering in the dining-room, skulking in the parlor, hiding in the hall, lying in wait for me on the stairs.

It gets into my hair.

Even when I go to ride, if I turn my head suddenly and surprise it—there is that smell!

Such a peculiar odor, too! I have spent hours in trying to analyze it, to find what it smelled like. 180

It is not bad—at first, and very gentle, but quite the subtlest, most enduring odor I ever met.

In this damp weather it is awful, I wake up in the night and find it hanging over me.

It used to disturb me at first. I thought seriously of burning the house—to reach the smell.

But now I am used to it. The only thing I can think of that it is like is the color of the paper! A yellow smell.

There is a very funny mark on this wall, low down, near the mopboard. A streak that runs round the room. It goes behind every piece of furniture, except the bed, a long, straight, even smooch, as if it had been rubbed over and over. 185

I wonder how it was done and who did it, and what they did it for. Round and round and round—round and round and round—it makes me dizzy!

I really have discovered something at last.

Through watching so much at night, when it changes so, I have finally found out.

The front pattern does move—and no wonder! The woman behind shakes it!

Sometimes I think there are a great many women behind, and sometimes only one, and she crawls around fast, and her crawling shakes it all over. 190

Then in the very bright spots she keeps still, and in the very shady spots she just takes hold of the bars and shakes them hard.

And she is all the time trying to climb through. But nobody could climb through that pattern—it strangles so; I think that is why it has so many heads.

They get through, and then the pattern strangles them off and turns them upside down, and makes their eyes white!

If those heads were covered or taken off it would not be half so bad.

I think that woman gets out in the daytime! 195

And I'll tell you why—privately—I've seen her!

I can see her out of every one of my windows!

It is the same woman, I know, for she is always creeping, and most women do not creep by daylight.

I see her in that long shaded lane, creeping up and down. I see her in those dark grape arbors, creeping all around the garden.

I see her on that long road under the trees, creeping along, and when a carriage comes she hides under the blackberry vines. 200

I don't blame her a bit. It must be very humiliating to be caught creeping by daylight!

I always lock the door when I creep by daylight. I can't do it at night, for I know John would suspect something at once.

And John is so queer now, that I don't want to irritate him. I wish he would take another room! Besides, I don't want anybody to get that woman out at night but myself.

I often wonder if I could see her out of all the windows at once.

But, turn as fast as I can, I can only see out of one at one time.

205

And though I always see her, she may be able to creep faster than I can turn!

I have watched her sometimes away off in the open country, creeping as fast as a cloud shadow in a high wind.

If only that top pattern could be gotten off from the under one! I mean to try it, little by little.

I have found out another funny thing, but I shan't tell it this time! It does not do to trust people too much.

There are only two more days to get this paper off, and I believe John is beginning to notice. I don't like the look in his eyes.

210

And I heard him ask Jennie a lot of professional questions, about me. She had a very good report to give.

She said I slept a good deal in the daytime.

John knows I don't sleep very well at night, for all I'm so quiet!

He asked me all sorts of questions, too, and pretended to be very loving and kind.

As if I couldn't see through him!

215

Still, I don't wonder he acts so, sleeping under this paper for three months.

It only interests me, but I feel sure John and Jennie are secretly affected by it.

Hurrah! This is the last day, but it is enough. John to stay in town over night, and won't be out until this evening.

Jennie wanted to sleep with me—the sly thing! But I told her I should undoubtedly rest better for a night all alone.

That was clever, for really I wasn't alone a bit! As soon as it was moonlight and that poor thing began to crawl and shake the pattern, I got up and ran to help her.

220

I pulled and she shook, I shook and she pulled, and before morning we had peeled off yards of that paper.

A strip about as high as my head and half around the room.

And then when the sun came and that awful pattern began to laugh at me, I declared I would finish it to-day!

We go away to-morrow, and they are moving all my furniture down again to leave things as they were before.

Jennie looked at the wall in amazement, but I told her merrily that I did it out of pure spite at the vicious thing.

225

She laughed and said she wouldn't mind doing it herself, but I must not get tired.

How she betrayed herself that time!

But I am here, and no person touches this paper but me,—not alive!

She tried to get me out of the room—it was too patent! But I said it was so quiet and empty and clean now that I believed I would lie down again and sleep all I could, and not to wake me even for dinner—I would call when I woke.

So now she is gone, and the servants are gone, and the things are gone, and there is nothing left but that great bedstead nailed down, with the canvas mattress we found on it. 230

We shall sleep downstairs to-night, and take the boat home to-morrow.

I quite enjoy the room, now it is bare again.

How those children did tear about here!

This bedstead is fairly gnawed!

But I must get to work. 235

I have locked the door and thrown the key down into the front path.

I don't want to go out, and I don't want to have anybody come in, till John comes.

I want to astonish him.

I've got a rope up here that even Jennie did not find. If that woman does get out, and tries to get away, I can tie her!

But I forgot I could not reach far without anything to stand on! 240

This bed will not move!

I tried to lift and push it until I was lame, and then I got so angry I bit off a little piece at one corner—but it hurt my teeth.

Then I peeled off all the paper I could reach standing on the floor. It sticks horribly and the pattern just enjoys it! All those strangled heads and bulbous eyes and waddling fungus growths just shriek with derision!

I am getting angry enough to do something desperate. To jump out of the window would be admirable exercise, but the bars are too strong even to try.

Besides I wouldn't do it. Of course not. I know well enough that a step like that is improper and might be misconstrued. 245

I don't like to look out of the windows even—there are so many of those creeping women, and they creep so fast.

I wonder if they all come out of that wall-paper as I did?

But I am securely fastened now by my well-hidden rope—you don't get me out in the road there!

I suppose I shall have to get back behind the pattern when it comes night, and that is hard!

It is so pleasant to be out in this great room and creep around as I please! 250

I don't want to go outside. I won't, even if Jennie asks me to.

For outside you have to creep on the ground, and everything is green instead of yellow.

But here I can creep smoothly on the floor, and my shoulder just fits in that long smooch around the wall, so I cannot lose my way.

Why, there's John at the door!

It is no use, young man, you can't open it! 255

How he does call and pound!

Now he's crying for an axe.

It would be a shame to break down that beautiful door!

"John dear!" said I in the gentlest voice, "the key is down by the front steps, under a plantain leaf!"

That silenced him for a few moments.

260

Then he said—very quietly indeed, "Open the door, my darling!"

"I can't," said I. "The key is down by the front door under a plantain leaf!"

And then I said it again, several times, very gently and slowly, and said it so often that he had to go and see, and he got it of course, and came in. He stopped short by the door.

"What is the matter?" he cried. "For God's sake, what are you doing!"

I kept on creeping just the same, but I looked at him over my shoulder.

265

"I've got out at last," said I, "in spite of you and Jane. And I've pulled off most of the paper, so you can't put me back!"

Now why should that man have fainted? But he did, and right across my path by the wall, so that I had to creep over him every time!

Exploring the Text

1. The narrator of "The Yellow Wallpaper" undergoes a profound change from the beginning of the story to the end. How is her change revealed in relation to her response to the wallpaper? How does she feel about the change? How do your feelings differ from the narrator's?
2. The narrator describes the room with the yellow wallpaper as a former nursery—that is, a room in a large house where children played, ate their meals, and may have been educated. What evidence is there that it may have had a different function? How does that discrepancy help develop the character of the narrator and communicate the themes of the story?
3. Much of the language used to describe the narrator's experience has both a denotative (descriptive) function and a connotative (symbolic or figurative) function. How do the meanings of such words and phrases as "yellow," "creeping," "immovable bed," and "outside pattern" change as they appear in different parts of the story?
4. Look at the description of the wallpaper in paragraphs 96–104. How does the syntax of the sentences both mirror the pattern on the wallpaper and suggest the narrator's agitation?
5. The narrator's husband, John, maintains his composure—and single-mindedness—for nearly the whole story. Characterize his change at the end. How does his fainting add another level of subversion to this early feminist story?
6. "The Yellow Wallpaper" raises the question of what happens when a person is deprived of the chance for creative expression. What are the similarities and differences between the suffering of Sonny in "Sonny's Blues" and the suffering of the narrator in this story?

RAYMOND CARVER

Raymond Carver (1938–1988) was born in Clatskanie, Oregon—a mill town on the Columbia River—and grew up in Yakima, Washington. His early life was haunted by poverty, his father’s alcoholism, and domestic violence. After graduating from high school, Carver worked with his father at a sawmill in California. At nineteen, he married sixteen-year-old Maryann Burk, and by the time he was twenty, he was the father of two children. Carver supported his wife and children by working as a janitor, sawmill laborer, deliveryman, and library assistant. The family moved to California, where Carver took a creative-writing course taught by novelist John Gardner. Carver began to publish his writing, but developed such a serious drinking problem that he was hospitalized several times. With the help of Alcoholics Anonymous, Carver finally stopped drinking in 1977. Two years later he met poet Tess Gallagher, shortly after which he and Maryann separated and eventually divorced. Carver married Gallagher in 1988, only six weeks before he died of lung cancer. Carver’s works include the poetry collections Near Klamath (1968), At Night the Salmon Move (1976), and Path to the Waterfall (1989), and the short-story collections Put Yourself in My Shoes (1974), What We Talk about When We Talk about Love (1981), and Cathedral (1982). Carver’s writing style is minimalist; some attribute this to teachers and editors, such as John Gardner and Gordon Lish, who urged him to use fewer and fewer words. Carver said of this story selection, “There is definitely a change going on in my writing. It happened when I wrote the story ‘Cathedral.’”

This blind man, an old friend of my wife’s, he was on his way to spend the night. His wife had died. So he was visiting the dead wife’s relatives in Connecticut. He called my wife from his in-laws’. Arrangements were made. He would come by train, a five-hour trip, and my wife would meet him at the station. She hadn’t seen him since she worked for him one summer in Seattle ten years ago. But she and the blind man had kept in touch. They made tapes and mailed them back and forth. I wasn’t enthusiastic about his visit. He was no one I knew. And his being blind bothered me. My idea of blindness came from the movies. In the movies, the blind moved slowly and never laughed. Sometimes they were led by seeing-eye dogs. A blind man in my house was not something I looked forward to.

That summer in Seattle she had needed a job. She didn’t have any money. The man she was going to marry at the end of the summer was in officers’ training school. He didn’t have any money, either. But she was in love with the guy, and he was in love with her, etc. She’d seen something in the paper: HELP WANTED—Reading to Blind Man, and a telephone number. She phoned and went over, was hired on the spot. She’d worked with this blind man all summer. She read stuff to him, case studies, reports, that sort of thing. She helped him organize his little office in the county social-service department. They'd become good friends, my wife and the blind man. How do I know these things? She told me. And she told me something else. On her last day in the office, the blind man asked if he could touch her face. She agreed to this. She told me he touched his fingers to every part of her face, her nose—even her neck! She never forgot it. She even tried to write a poem about it. She was always trying to write a poem. She wrote a poem or two every year, usually after something really important had happened to her.

When we first started going out together, she showed me the poem. In the poem, she recalled his fingers and the way they had moved around over her face. In the poem, she talked about what she had felt at the time, about what went through her mind when the blind man touched her nose and lips. I can remember I didn't think much of the poem. Of course, I didn't tell her that. Maybe I just don't understand poetry. I admit it's not the first thing I reach for when I pick up something to read.

Anyway, this man who'd first enjoyed her favors, the officer-to-be, he'd been her childhood sweetheart. So okay. I'm saying that at the end of the summer she let the blind man run his hands over her face, said goodbye to him, married her childhood etc., who was now a commissioned officer, and she moved away from Seattle. But they'd kept in touch, she and the blind man. She made the first contact after a year or so. She called him up one night from an Air Force base in Alabama. She wanted to talk. They talked. He asked her to send him a tape and tell him about her life. She did this. She sent the tape. On the tape, she told the blind man about her husband and about their life together in the military. She told the blind man she loved her husband but she didn't like it where they lived and she didn't like it that he was a part of the military-industrial thing. She told the blind man she'd written a poem and he was in it. She told him that she was writing a poem about what it was like to be an Air Force officer's wife. The poem wasn't finished yet. She was still writing it. The blind man made a tape. He sent her the tape. She made a tape. This went on for years. My wife's officer was posted to one base and then another. She sent tapes from Moody AFB, McGuire, McConnell, and finally Travis, near Sacramento, where one night she got to feeling lonely and cut off from people she kept losing in that moving-around life. She got to feeling she couldn't go it another step. She went in and swallowed all the pills and capsules in the medicine chest and washed them down with a bottle of gin. Then she got into a hot bath and passed out.

But instead of dying, she got sick. She threw up. Her officer—why should he have a name? he was the childhood sweetheart, and what more does he want?—came home from somewhere, found her, and called the ambulance. In time, she put it all on a tape and sent the tape to the blind man. Over the years, she put all kinds of stuff on tapes and sent the tapes off lickety-split. Next to writing a poem every year, I think it was her chief means of recreation. On one tape, she told the blind man she'd decided to live away from her officer for a time. On another tape, she told him about her divorce. She and I began going out, and of course she told her blind man about it. She told him everything, or so it seemed to me. Once she asked me if I'd like to hear the latest tape from the blind man. This was a year ago. I was on the tape, she said. So I said okay, I'd listen to it. I got us drinks and we settled down in the living room. We made ready to listen. First she inserted the tape into the player and adjusted a couple of dials. Then she pushed a lever. The tape squeaked and someone began to talk in this loud voice. She lowered the volume. After a few minutes of harmless chitchat, I heard my own name in the mouth of this stranger, this blind man I didn't even know! And then this: "From all you've said about him, I can only conclude—" But we were interrupted, a knock at the door, something, and we didn't ever get back to the tape. Maybe it was just as well. I'd heard all I wanted to.

Now this same blind man was coming to sleep in my house.

"Maybe I could take him bowling," I said to my wife. She was at the draining board doing scalloped potatoes. She put down the knife she was using and turned around.

"If you love me," she said, "you can do this for me. If you don't love me, okay. But if you had a friend, any friend, and the friend came to visit, I'd make him feel comfortable." She wiped her hands with the dish towel.

"I don't have any blind friends," I said.

"You don't have any friends," she said. "Period. Besides," she said, "goddamn it, 10 his wife's just died! Don't you understand that? The man's lost his wife!"

I didn't answer. She'd told me a little about the blind man's wife. Her name was Beulah. Beulah! That's a name for a colored woman.

"Was his wife Negro?" I asked.

"Are you crazy?" my wife said. "Have you just flipped or something?" She picked up a potato. I saw it hit the floor, then roll under the stove. "What's wrong with you?" she said. "Are you drunk?"

"I'm just asking," I said.

Right then my wife filled me in with more detail than I cared to know. I made a 15 drink and sat at the kitchen table to listen. Pieces of the story began to fall into place.

Beulah had gone to work for the blind man the summer after my wife had stopped working for him. Pretty soon Beulah and the blind man had themselves a church wedding. It was a little wedding—who'd want to go to such a wedding in the first place?—just the two of them, plus the minister and the minister's wife. But it was a church wedding just the same. It was what Beulah had wanted, he'd said. But even then Beulah must have been carrying the cancer in her glands. After they had been inseparable for eight years—my wife's word, inseparable—Beulah's health went into a rapid decline. She died in a Seattle hospital room, the blind man sitting beside the bed and holding on to her hand. They'd married, lived and worked together, slept together—had sex, sure—and then the blind man had to bury her. All this without his having ever seen what the goddamned woman looked like. It was beyond my understanding. Hearing this, I felt sorry for the blind man for a little bit. And then I found myself thinking what a pitiful life this woman must have led. Imagine a woman who could never see herself as she was seen in the eyes of her loved one. A woman who could go on day after day and never receive the smallest compliment from her beloved. A woman whose husband could never read the expression on her face, be it misery or something better. Someone who could wear makeup or not—what difference to him? She could, if she wanted, wear green eye-shadow around one eye, a straight pin in her nostril, yellow slacks and purple shoes, no matter. And then to slip off into death, the blind man's hand on her hand, his blind eyes streaming tears—I'm imagining now—her last thought maybe this: that he never even knew what she looked like, and she on an express to the grave. Robert was left with a small insurance policy and half of a twenty-peso Mexican coin. The other half of the coin went into the box with her. Pathetic.

So when the time rolled around, my wife went to the depot to pick him up. With nothing to do but wait—sure, I blamed him for that—I was having a drink and watching the TV when I heard the car pull into the drive. I got up from the sofa with my drink and went to the window to have a look.

I saw my wife laughing as she parked the car. I saw her get out of the car and shut the door. She was still wearing a smile. Just amazing. She went around to the other side of the car to where the blind man was already starting to get out. This blind man, feature this, he was wearing a full beard! A beard on a blind man! Too much, I say. The blind man reached into the back seat and dragged out a suitcase. My wife took his arm, shut the car door, and, talking all the way, moved him down the drive and then up the steps to the front porch. I turned off the TV. I finished my drink, rinsed the glass, dried my hands. Then I went to the door.

My wife said, "I want you to meet Robert. Robert, this is my husband. I've told you all about him." She was beaming. She had this blind man by his coat sleeve.

The blind man let go of his suitcase and up came his hand.

20

I took it. He squeezed hard, held my hand, and then he let it go.

"I feel like we've already met," he boomed.

"Likewise," I said. I didn't know what else to say. Then I said, "Welcome. I've heard a lot about you." We began to move then, a little group, from the porch into the living room, my wife guiding him by the arm. The blind man was carrying his suitcase in his other hand. My wife said things like, "To your left here, Robert. That's right. Now watch it, there's a chair. That's it. Sit down right here. This is the sofa. We just bought this sofa two weeks ago."

I started to say something about the old sofa. I'd liked that old sofa. But I didn't say anything. Then I wanted to say something else, small-talk, about the scenic ride along the Hudson. How going to New York, you should sit on the right-hand side of the train, and coming from New York, the left-hand side.

"Did you have a good train ride?" I said. "Which side of the train did you sit on, by the way?"

25

"What a question, which side!" my wife said. "What's it matter which side?" she said.

"I just asked," I said.

"Right side," the blind man said. "I hadn't been on a train in nearly forty years. Not since I was a kid. With my folks. That's been a long time. I'd nearly forgotten the sensation. I have winter in my beard now," he said. "So I've been told, anyway. Do I look distinguished, my dear?" the blind man said to my wife.

"You look distinguished, Robert," she said. "Robert," she said. "Robert, it's just so good to see you."

My wife finally took her eyes off the blind man and looked at me. I had the feeling she didn't like what she saw. I shrugged. 30

I've never met, or personally known, anyone who was blind. This blind man was late forties, a heavy-set, balding man with stooped shoulders, as if he carried a great weight there. He wore brown slacks, brown shoes, a light-brown shirt, a tie, a sports coat. Spiffy. He also had this full beard. But he didn't use a cane and he didn't wear dark glasses. I'd always thought dark glasses were a must for the blind. Fact was, I wished he had a pair. At first glance, his eyes looked like anyone else's eyes. But if you look close, there was something different about them. Too much white in the iris, for one thing, and the pupils seemed to move around in the sockets without his knowing it or being able to stop it. Creepy. As I stared at his face, I saw the left pupil turn in toward his nose while the other made an effort to keep in one place. But it was only an effort, for that eye was on the roam without his knowing it or wanting it to be.

I said, "Let me get you a drink. What's your pleasure? We have a little of everything. It's one of our pastimes."

"Bub, I'm a Scotch man myself," he said fast enough in this big voice.

"Right," I said. Bub! "Sure you are, I knew it."

He let his fingers touch his suitcase, which was sitting alongside the sofa. He was taking his bearings. I didn't blame him for that. 35

"I'll move that up to your room," my wife said.

"No, that's fine," the blind man said loudly. "It can go up when I go up."

"A little water with the Scotch?" I said.

"Very little," he said.

"I knew it," I said. 40

He said, "Just a tad. The Irish actor, Barry Fitzgerald? I'm like that fellow. When I drink water, Fitzgerald said, I drink water. When I drink whiskey, I drink whiskey." My wife laughed. The blind man brought his hand up under his beard. He lifted his beard slowly and let it drop.

I did the drinks, three big glasses of Scotch with a splash of water in each. Then we made ourselves comfortable and talked about Robert's travels. First the long flight from the West Coast to Connecticut, we covered that. Then from Connecticut up here by train. We had another drink concerning that leg of the trip.

I remembered having read somewhere that the blind didn't smoke because, as speculation had it, they couldn't see the smoke they exhaled. I thought I knew that much and that much only about blind people. But this blind man smoked his cigarette down to the nubbin and then lit another one. This blind man filled his ashtray and my wife emptied it.

When we sat down at the table for dinner, we had another drink. My wife heaped Robert's plate with cube steak, scalloped potatoes, green beans. I buttered him up two slices of bread. I said, "Here's bread and butter for you." I swallowed some of my drink. "Now let us pray," I said, and the blind man lowered his head. My wife looked at me, her mouth agape. "Pray the phone won't ring and the food doesn't get cold," I said.

We dug in. We ate everything there was to eat on the table. We ate like there was no tomorrow. We didn't talk. We ate. We scarfed. We grazed that table. We were into serious eating. The blind man had right away located his foods, he knew just where everything was on his plate. I watched with admiration as he used his knife and fork on the meat. He'd cut two pieces of meat, fork the meat into his mouth, and then go all out for the scalloped potatoes, the beans next, and then he'd tear off a hunk of buttered bread and eat that. He'd follow this up with a big drink of milk. It didn't seem to bother him to use his fingers once in a while, either.

We finished everything, including half a strawberry pie. For a few moments, we sat as if stunned. Sweat beaded on our faces. Finally, we got up from the table and left the dirty plates. We didn't look back. We took ourselves into the living room and sank into our places again. Robert and my wife sat on the sofa. I took the big chair. We had us two or three more drinks while they talked about the major things that had come to pass for them in the past ten years. For the most part, I just listened. Now and then I joined in. I didn't want him to think I'd left the room, and I didn't want her to think I was feeling left out. They talked of things that had happened to them—to them!—these past ten years. I waited in vain to hear my name on my wife's sweet lips: "And then my dear husband came into my life"—something like that. But I heard nothing of the sort. More talk of Robert. Robert had done a little of everything, it seemed, a regular blind jack-of-all-trades. But most recently he and his wife had had an Amway distributorship, from which, I gathered, they'd earned their living, such as it was. The blind man was also a ham radio operator. He talked in his loud voice about conversations he'd had with fellow operators in Guam, in the Philippines, in Alaska, and even in Tahiti. He said he'd have a lot of friends there if he ever wanted to go visit those places. From time to time, he'd turn his blind face toward me, put his hand under his beard, ask me something. How long had I been in my present position? (Three years.) Did I like my work? (I didn't.) Was I going to stay with it? (What were the options?) Finally, when I thought he was beginning to run down, I got up and turned on the TV.

My wife looked at me with irritation. She was heading toward a boil. Then she looked at the blind man and said, "Robert, do you have a TV?"

The blind man said, "My dear, I have two TVs. I have a color set and a black-and-white thing, an old relic. It's funny, but if I turn the TV on, and I'm always turning it on, I turn on the color set. It's funny, don't you think?"

I didn't know what to say to that. I had absolutely nothing to say to that. No opinions. So I watched the news program and tried to listen to what the announcer was saying.

"This is a color TV," the blind man said. "Don't ask me how, but I can tell."

"We traded up a while ago," I said.

The blind man had another taste of his drink. He lifted his beard, sniffed it, and let it fall. He leaned forward on the sofa. He positioned his ashtray on the coffee table, then put the lighter to his cigarette. He leaned back on the sofa and crossed his legs at the ankles.

My wife covered her mouth, and then she yawned. She stretched. She said, "I think I'll go upstairs and put on my robe. I think I'll change into something else. Robert, you make yourself comfortable," she said.

"I'm comfortable," the blind man said.

"I want you to feel comfortable in this house," she said.

55

"I am comfortable," the blind man said.

After she'd left the room, he and I listened to the weather report and then to the sports roundup. By that time, she'd been gone so long I didn't know if she was going to come back. I thought she might have gone to bed. I wished she'd come back downstairs. I didn't want to be left alone with a blind man. I asked him if he wanted another drink, and he said sure. Then I asked if he wanted to smoke some dope with me. I said I'd just rolled a number. I hadn't, but I planned to do so in about two shakes.

"I'll try some with you," he said.

"Damn right," I said. "That's the stuff."

I got our drinks and sat down on the sofa with him. Then I rolled us two fat numbers. I lit one and passed it. I brought it to his fingers. He took it and inhaled.

60

"Hold it as long as you can," I said. I could tell he didn't know the first thing.

My wife came back downstairs wearing her pink robe and her pink slippers.

"What do I smell?" she said.

"We thought we'd have us some cannabis," I said.

My wife gave me a savage look. Then she looked at the blind man and said, "Robert, I didn't know you smoked."

65

He said, "I do now, my dear. There's a first time for everything. But I don't feel anything yet."

"This stuff is pretty mellow," I said. "This stuff is mild. It's dope you can reason with," I said. "It doesn't mess you up."

"Not much it doesn't, bub," he said, and laughed.

My wife sat on the sofa between the blind man and me. I passed her the number. She took it and toked and then passed it back to me. "Which way is this going?" she said. Then she said, "I shouldn't be smoking this. I can hardly keep my eyes open as it is. That dinner did me in. I shouldn't have eaten so much."

"It was the strawberry pie," the blind man said. "That's what did it," he said, and he laughed his big laugh. Then he shook his head.

70

"There's more strawberry pie," I said.

"Do you want some more, Robert?" my wife said.

"Maybe in a little while," he said.

We gave our attention to the TV. My wife yawned again. She said, "Your bed is made up when you feel like going to bed, Robert. I know you must have had a long day. When you're ready to go to bed, say so." She pulled his arm. "Robert?"

He came to and said, "I've had a real nice time. This beats tapes, doesn't it?"

75

I said, "Coming at you," and I put the number between his fingers. He inhaled, held the smoke, and then let it go. It was like he'd been doing it since he was nine years old.

"Thanks, bub," he said. "But I think this is all for me. I think I'm beginning to feel it," he said. He held the burning roach out for my wife.

"Same here," she said. "Ditto. Me, too." She took the roach and passed it to me. "I may just sit here for a while between you two guys with my eyes closed. But don't let me bother you, okay? Either one of you. If it bothers you, say so. Otherwise, I may just sit here with my eyes closed until you're ready to go to bed," she said. "Your bed's made up, Robert, when you're ready. It's right next to our room at the top of the stairs. We'll show you up when you're ready. You wake me up now, you guys, if I fall asleep." She said that and then she closed her eyes and went to sleep.

The news program ended. I got up and changed the channel. I sat back down on the sofa. I wished my wife hadn't pooped out. Her head lay across the back of the sofa, her mouth open. She'd turned so that her robe had slipped away from her legs, exposing a juicy thigh. I reached to draw her robe back over her, and it was then that I glanced at the blind man. What the hell! I flipped the robe open again.

"You say when you want some strawberry pie," I said.

80

"I will," he said.

I said, "Are you tired? Do you want me to take you up to your bed? Are you ready to hit the hay?"

"Not yet," he said. "No, I'll stay up with you, bub. If that's all right. I'll stay up until you're ready to turn in. We haven't had a chance to talk. Know what I mean? I feel like me and her monopolized the evening." He lifted his beard and he let it fall. He picked up his cigarettes and his lighter.

"That's all right," I said. Then I said, "I'm glad for the company."

And I guess I was. Every night I smoked dope and stayed up as long as I could before I fell asleep. My wife and I hardly ever went to bed at the same time. When I did go to sleep, I had these dreams. Sometimes I'd wake up from one of them, my heart going crazy.

85

Something about the church and the Middle Ages was on the TV. Not your run-of-the-mill TV fare. I wanted to watch something else. I turned to the other channels. But there was nothing on them, either. So I turned back to the first channel and apologized.

"Bub, it's all right," the blind man said. "It's fine with me. Whatever you want to watch is okay. I'm always learning something. Learning never ends. It won't hurt me to learn something tonight. I got ears," he said.

We didn't say anything for a time. He was leaning forward with his head turned at me, his right ear aimed in the direction of the set. Very disconcerting. Now and then his eyelids drooped and then they snapped open again. Now and then he put his fingers into his beard and tugged, like he was thinking about something he was hearing on the television.

On the screen, a group of men wearing cowls was being set upon and tormented by men dressed in skeleton costumes and men dressed as devils. The men dressed as devils wore devil masks, horns, and long tails. This pageant was part of a procession. The Englishman who was narrating the thing said it took place in Spain once a year. I tried to explain to the blind man what was happening.

"Skeletons," he said. "I know about skeletons," he said, and he nodded.

The TV showed this one cathedral. Then there was a long, slow look at another one. Finally, the picture switched to the famous one in Paris, with its flying buttresses and its spires reaching up to the clouds. The camera pulled away to show the whole of the cathedral rising above the skyline.

There were times when the Englishman who was telling the thing would shut up, would simply let the camera move around over the cathedrals. Or else the camera would tour the countryside, men in fields walking behind oxen. I waited as long as I could. Then I felt I had to say something. I said, "They're showing the outside of this cathedral now. Gargoyles. Little statues carved to look like monsters. Now I guess they're in Italy. Yeah, they're in Italy. There's paintings on the walls of this one church."

"Are those fresco paintings, bub?" he asked, and he sipped from his drink.

I reached for my glass. But it was empty. I tried to remember what I could remember. "You're asking me are those frescoes?" I said. "That's a good question. I don't know."

The camera moved to a cathedral outside Lisbon. The differences in the Portuguese cathedral compared with the French and Italian were not that great. But they were there. Mostly the interior stuff. Then something occurred to me, and I said, "Something has occurred to me. Do you have any idea what a cathedral is? What they look like, that is? Do you follow me? If somebody says cathedral to you, do you have any notion what they're talking about? Do you know the difference between that and a Baptist church, say?"

He let the smoke dribble from his mouth. "I know they took hundreds of workers fifty or a hundred years to build," he said. "I just heard the man say that, of course. I know generations of the same families worked on a cathedral. I heard him say that, too. The men who began their life's work on them, they never lived to see the completion of their work. In that wise, bub, they're no different from the rest of us, right?" He laughed. Then his eyelids drooped again. His head nodded. He seemed to be snoozing. Maybe he was imagining himself in Portugal. The TV was showing another cathedral now. This one was in Germany. The Englishman's voice droned on. "Cathedrals," the blind man said. He sat up and rolled his head back and forth. "If you want the truth, bub, that's about all I know. What I just said. What I heard him say. But maybe you could describe one to me? I wish you'd do it. I'd like that. If you want to know, I really don't have a good idea."

I stared hard at the shot of the cathedral on the TV. How could I even begin to describe it? But say my life depended on it. Say my life was being threatened by an insane guy who said I had to do it or else.

I stared some more at the cathedral before the picture flipped off into the countryside. There was no use. I turned to the blind man and said, "To begin with, they're very tall." I was looking around the room for clues. "They reach way up. Up and up. Toward the sky. They're so big, some of them, they have to have these supports. To help hold them up, so to speak. These supports are called buttresses. They remind me of viaducts, for some reason. But maybe you don't know viaducts, either? Sometimes the cathedrals have devils and such carved into the front. Sometimes lords and ladies. Don't ask me why this is," I said.

He was nodding. The whole upper part of his body seemed to be moving back and forth.

"I'm not doing so good, am I?" I said.

100

He stopped nodding and leaned forward on the edge of the sofa. As he listened to me, he was running his fingers through his beard. I wasn't getting through to him, I could see that. But he waited for me to go on just the same. He nodded, like he was trying to encourage me. I tried to think what else to say. "They're really big," I said. "They're massive. They're built of stone. Marble, too, sometimes. In those olden days, when they built cathedrals, men wanted to be close to God. In those olden days, God was an important part of everyone's life. You could tell this from their cathedral-building. I'm sorry," I said, "but it looks like that's the best I can do for you. I'm just no good at it."

"That's all right, bub," the blind man said. "Hey, listen. I hope you don't mind my asking you. Can I ask you something? Let me ask you a simple question, yes or no. I'm just curious and there's no offense. You're my host. But let me ask if you are in any way religious? You don't mind my asking?"

I shook my head. He couldn't see that, though. A wink is the same as a nod to a blind man. "I guess I don't believe in it. In anything. Sometimes it's hard. You know what I'm saying?"

"Sure I do," he said.

"Right," I said.

105

The Englishman was still holding forth. My wife sighed in her sleep. She drew a long breath and went on with her sleeping.

"You'll have to forgive me," I said. "But I can't tell you what a cathedral looks like. It just isn't in me to do it. I can't do any more than I've done."

The blind man sat very still, his head down, as he listened to me.

I said, "The truth is, cathedrals don't mean anything special to me. Nothing. Cathedrals. They're something to look at on late-night TV. That's all they are."

It was then that the blind man cleared his throat. He brought something up. He took a handkerchief from his back pocket. Then he said, "I get it, bub. It's okay. It happens. Don't worry about it," he said. "Hey, listen to me. Will you do me a favor? I got an idea. Why don't you find us some heavy paper? And a pen. We'll do something. We'll draw one together. Get us a pen and some heavy paper. Go on, bub, get the stuff," he said.

110

So I went upstairs. My legs felt like they didn't have any strength in them. They felt like they did after I'd done some running. In my wife's room, I looked around. I found some ballpoints in a little basket on her table. And then I tried to think where to look for the kind of paper he was talking about.

Downstairs, in the kitchen, I found a shopping bag with onion skins in the bottom of the bag. I emptied the bag and shook it. I brought it into the living room and sat down with it near his legs. I moved some things, smoothed the wrinkles from the bag, spread it out on the coffee table.

The blind man got down from the sofa and sat next to me on the carpet.

He ran his fingers over the paper. He went up and down the sides of the paper. The edges, even the edges. He fingered the corners.

"All right," he said. "All right, let's do her."

115

He found my hand, the hand with the pen. He closed his hand over my hand. "Go ahead, bub, draw," he said. "Draw. You'll see. I'll follow along with you. It'll be okay. Just begin now like I'm telling you. You'll see. Draw," the blind man said.

So I began. First I drew a box that looked like a house. It could have been the house I lived in. Then I put a roof on it. At either end of the roof, I drew spires. Crazy.

"Swell," he said. "Terrific. You're doing fine," he said.

"Never thought anything like this could happen in your lifetime, did you, bub? Well, it's a strange life, we all know that. Go on now. Keep it up."

I put in windows with arches. I drew flying buttresses. I hung great doors. I couldn't stop. The TV station went off the air. I put down the pen and closed and opened my fingers. The blind man felt round over the paper. He moved the tips of his fingers over the paper, all over what I had drawn, and he nodded.

"Doing fine," the blind man said.

I took up the pen again, and he found my hand. I kept at it. I'm no artist. But I kept drawing just the same.

My wife opened up her eyes and gazed at us. She sat up on the sofa, her robe hanging open. She said, "What are you doing? Tell me, I want to know."

I didn't answer her.

The blind man said, "We're drawing a cathedral. Me and him are working on it. Press hard," he said to me. "That's right. That's good," he said. "Sure. You got it, bub. I can tell. You didn't think you could. But you can, can't you? You're cooking with gas now. You know what I'm saying? We're going to really have us something here in a minute. How's the old arm?" he said. "Put some people in there now. What's a cathedral without people?"

My wife said, "What's going on? Robert, what are you doing? What's going on?"

"It's all right," he said to her. "Close your eyes now," the blind man said to me.

I did it. I closed them just like he said.

"Are they closed?" he said. "Don't fudge."

"They're closed," I said.

"Keep them that way," he said. He said, "Don't stop now. Draw."

So we kept on with it. His fingers rode my fingers as my hand went over the paper. It was like nothing else in my life up to now.

Then he said, "I think that's it. I think you got it," he said. "Take a look. What do you think?"

But I had my eyes closed. I thought I'd keep them that way for a little longer. I thought it was something I ought to do.

"Well?" he said. "Are you looking?"

My eyes were still closed. I was in my house. I knew that. But I didn't feel like I was inside anything.

"It's really something," I said.

Exploring the Text

1. How does the first-person narrator of “Cathedral” reveal himself to the reader? Note his tone. Notice also the details he chooses to reveal about himself and his wife, as well as the ones he doesn’t reveal. What character traits are you able to ascertain even in the first few paragraphs?
2. How does Carver’s narrator set the reader up for meeting the blind man? Is your first response to Robert the same as the narrator’s? Look at paragraphs 18–44. How does Carver use both the conversation and the narrator’s private thoughts to create the blind man’s character while also continuing to develop the character of the narrator?
3. Blindness is both a subject of “Cathedral” and a recurring motif. Consider the many different ways blindness is addressed in the story. How does each add complexity and meaning to the story?
4. What is it about a cathedral that makes this architectural structure so perfect for the story? Consider some of the information the narrator and Robert learn from the television show they have on, as well as what you already know about cathedrals. What does this story say about both the art of building a cathedral and the art of drawing a picture for a blind man?
5. The narrator experiences an epiphany—a moment of sudden insight and clarity—at the end of the story, but the author never explains what that insight is. Why do you think Carver withholds that specific information from the reader? What other information is withheld from the reader? Why?
6. Characterize the habits of the narrator and his wife. They do not seem close; they watch television rather than talk to each other; they drink to excess, overeat, and use drugs. Does Carver judge them? Do you?
7. Carver’s stories often focus on sadness and loss in the everyday lives of ordinary people. How is that both true and not true of “Cathedral”?
8. Who do you think is the hero of the story? Why?

Videotape

DON DELILLO

Novelist Don DeLillo was born in the Bronx, in New York City, in 1936. Educated at Fordham University, DeLillo worked in advertising for five years before he became a full-time writer. He is the author of the novels White Noise (1985), Running Dog (1978), The Names (1982), Libra (1988), Underworld (1997), The Body Artist (2001), and Falling Man (2007), among others. DeLillo is considered one of the central figures of twentieth- and twenty-first-century postmodernism, a term used to describe various movements in the arts that question modern assumptions about culture, identity, history, or language. When DeLillo was asked how he felt about that classification, he responded, “I don’t react. But I’d prefer not to be labeled. I’m a novelist, period. An American novelist.” A recurring theme in DeLillo's work is the saturation of mass media and the ways it removes or changes the meaning of events—a theme apparent in "Videotape."

It shows a man driving a car. It is the simplest sort of family video. You see a man at the wheel of a medium Dodge.

It is just a kid aiming her camera through the rear window of the family car at the windshield of the car behind her.

You know about families and their video cameras. You know how kids get involved, how the camera shows them that every subject is potentially charged, a million things they never see with the unaided eye. They investigate the meaning of inert objects and dumb pets and they poke at family privacy. They learn to see things twice.

It is the kid's own privacy that is being protected here. She is twelve years old and her name is being withheld even though she is neither the victim nor the perpetrator of the crime but only the means of recording it.

It shows a man in a sport shirt at the wheel of his car. There is nothing else to see. The car approaches briefly, then falls back. 5

You know how children with cameras learn to work the exposed moments that define the family cluster. They break every trust, spy out the undefended space, catching mom coming out of the bathroom in her cumbrous robe and turbaned towel, looking bloodless and plucked. It is not a joke. They will shoot you sitting on the pot if they can manage a suitable vantage.

The tape has the jostled sort of noneventness that marks the family product. Of course the man in this case is not a member of the family but a stranger in a car, a random figure, someone who has happened along in the slow lane.

It shows a man in his forties wearing a pale shirt open at the throat, the image washed by reflections and sunglint, with many jostled moments.

It is not just another video homicide. It is a homicide recorded by a child who thought she was doing something simple and maybe halfway clever, shooting some tape of a man in a car.

He sees the girl and waves briefly, wagging a hand without taking it off the wheel—an underplayed reaction that makes you like him. 10

It is unrelenting footage that rolls on and on. It has an aimless determination, a persistence that lives outside the subject matter. You are looking into the mind of home video. It is innocent, it is aimless, it is determined, it is real.

He is bald up the middle of his head, a nice guy in his forties whose whole life seems open to the hand-held camera.

But there is also an element of suspense. You keep on looking not because you know something is going to happen—of course you do know something is going to happen and you do look for that reason but you might also keep on looking if you came across this footage for the first time without knowing the outcome. There is a crude power operating here. You keep on looking because things combine to hold you fast—a sense of the random, the amateurish, the accidental, the impending. You don't think of the tape as boring or interesting. It is crude, it is blunt, it is relentless.

It is the jostled part of your mind, the film that runs through your hotel brain under all the thoughts you know you're thinking.

The world is lurking in the camera, already framed, waiting for the boy or girl who will come along and take up the device, learn the instrument, shooting old granddad at break-fast, all stroked out so his nostrils gape, the cereal spoon baby-gripped in his pale fist.

It shows a man alone in a medium Dodge. It seems to go on forever.

15

There's something about the nature of the tape, the grain of the image, the sputtering black-and-white tones, the starkness—you think this is more real, truer-to-life than anything around you. The things around you have a rehearsed and layered and cosmetic look. The tape is superreal, or maybe underreal is the way you want to put it. It is what lies at the scraped bottom of all the layers you have added. And this is another reason why you keep on looking. The tape has a searing realness.

It shows him giving an abbreviated wave, stiff-palmed, like a signal flag at a siding.

You know how families make up games. This is just another game in which the child invents the rules as she goes along. She likes the idea of videotaping a man in his car. She has probably never done it before and she sees no reason to vary the format or terminate early or pan to another car. This is her game and she is learning it and playing it at the same time. She feels halfway clever and inventive and maybe slightly intrusive as well, a little bit of brazenness that spices any game.

And you keep on looking. You look because this is the nature of the footage, to make a channeled path through time, to give things a shape and a destiny.

Of course if she had panned to another car, the right car at the precise time, she would have caught the gunman as he fired.

The chance quality of the encounter. The victim, the killer and the child with a camera. Random energies that approach a common point. There's something here that speaks to you directly, saying terrible things about forces beyond your control, lines of intersection that cut through history and logic and every reasonable layer of human expectation.

She wandered into it. The girl got lost and wandered clear-eyed into horror. This is a children's story about straying too far from home. But it isn't the family car that serves as the instrument of the child's curiosity, her inclination to explore. It is the camera that puts her in the tale.

You know about holidays and family celebrations and how somebody shows up with a camcorder and the relatives stand around and barely react because they're numbingly accustomed to the process of being taped and decked and shown on the VCR with the coffee and cake.

He is hit soon after. If you've seen the tape many times you know from the hand wave exactly when he will be hit. It is something, naturally, that you wait for. You say to your wife, if you're at home and she is there, Now here is where he gets it. You say, Janet, hurry up, this is where it happens.

Now here is where he gets it. You see him jolted, sort of wire-shocked—then he seizes up and falls toward the door or maybe leans or slides into the door is the proper way to put it. It is awful and unremarkable at the same time. The car stays in the slow lane. It approaches briefly, then falls back.

You don't usually call your wife over to the TV set. She has her programs, you have yours. But there's a certain urgency here. You want her to see how it looks. The tape has been running forever and now the thing is finally going to happen and you want her to be here when he's shot.

Here it comes all right. He is shot, head-shot, and the camera reacts, the child reacts—there is a jolting movement but she keeps on taping, there is a sympathetic response, a nerve response, her heart is beating faster but she keeps the camera trained on the subject as he slides into the door and even as you see him die you're thinking of the girl. At some level the girl has to be present here, watching what you're watching, unprepared—the girl is seeing this cold and you have to marvel at the fact that she keeps the tape rolling.

It shows something awful and unaccompanied. You want your wife to see it because it is real this time, not fancy movie violence—the realness beneath the layers of cosmetic perception. Hurry up, Janet, here it comes. He dies so fast. There is no accompaniment of any kind. It is very stripped. You want to tell her it is realer than real but then she will ask what that means.

The way the camera reacts to the gunshot—a startle reaction that brings pity and terror into the frame, the girl's own shock, the girl's identification with the victim.

You don't see the blood, which is probably trickling behind his ear and down the back of his neck. The way his head is twisted away from the door, the twist of the head gives you only a partial profile and it's the wrong side, it's not the side where he was hit.

And maybe you're being a little aggressive here, practically forcing your wife to watch. Why? What are you telling her? Are you making a little statement? Like I'm going to ruin your day out of ordinary spite. Or a big statement? Like this is the risk of existing. Either way you're rubbing her face in this tape and you don't know why.

It shows the car drifting toward the guardrail and then there's a jostling sense of two other lanes and part of another car, a split-second blur, and the tape ends here, either because the girl stopped shooting or because some central authority, the police or the district attorney or the TV station, decided there was nothing else you had to see.

This is either the tenth or eleventh homicide committed by the Texas Highway Killer. The number is uncertain because the police believe that one of the shootings may have been a copycat crime.

And there is something about videotape, isn't there, and this particular kind of serial crime? This is a crime designed for random taping and immediate playing. You sit there and wonder if this kind of crime became more possible when the means of taping an event and playing it immediately, without a neutral interval, a balancing space and time, became widely available. Taping-and-playing intensifies and compresses the event. It dangles a need to do it again. You sit there thinking that the serial murder has found its medium, or vice versa—an act of shadow technology, of compressed time and repeated images, stark and glary and unremarkable.

It shows very little in the end. It is a famous murder because it is on tape and because the murderer has done it many times and because the crime was recorded by a child. So the child is involved, the Video Kid as she is sometimes called because they have to call her something. The tape is famous and so is she. She is famous in the modern manner of people whose names are strategically withheld. They are famous without names or faces, spirits living apart from their bodies, the victims and witnesses, the underage criminals, out there somewhere at the edges of perception.

Seeing someone at the moment he dies, dying unexpectedly. This is reason alone to stay fixed to the screen. It is instructional, watching a man shot dead as he drives along on a sunny day. It demonstrates an elemental truth, that every breath you take has two possible endings. And that's another thing. There's a joke locked away here, a note of cruel slapstick that you are willing to appreciate even if it makes you feel a little guilty. Maybe the victim's a chump, a sort of silent-movie dupe, classically unlucky. He had it coming in a sense, for letting himself be caught on camera. Because once the tape starts rolling it can only end one way. This is what the context requires.

You don't want Janet to give you any crap about it's on all the time, they show it a thousand times a day. They show it because it exists, because they have to show it, because this is why they're out there, to provide our entertainment.

The more you watch the tape, the deader and colder and more relentless it becomes. The tape sucks the air right out of your chest but you watch it every time.

Exploring the Text

1. Who is the main character of "Videotape"? If you think of several answers, consider how each answer would affect the focus of the story and thus its theme and message.
2. What evidence of the traditional elements of plot, such as conflict, rising action, and climax, do you find in "Videotape"? How does DeLillo subvert and change some of these?
3. How does DeLillo create the story's pace? How is it similar to the way an amateur video unwinds?
4. Can you consider the point of view of this story to be second person? The speaker addresses the reader: "If you've seen the tape many times you know from the hand wave exactly when he will be hit. . . . You say to your wife, if you're at home and she is there, Now here is where he gets it. You say, Janet, hurry up, this is where it happens" (para. 24). And yet the reader doesn't have a wife named Janet or any wife at all most likely. How does the "you" of the story become another character but also represent the reader? How does this technique help DeLillo achieve the purpose of his story?
5. "Videotape" is considered a masterpiece of sudden fiction, a genre or subset of fiction characterized by immediacy. Somewhat like in medias res (in the middle of things)—the technique Homer uses in the Iliad to drop us right into the action at the end of the Trojan War—the reader is thrown into an event that began before he or she got there; the setting is underexplained, or not explained at all; and yet by the time the story is finished, a strong sense of plot and setting remains. Why is this genre particularly apt for the story DeLillo tells in "Videotape"?

While, at each change, the son of Libyan Jove,<sup>5</sup> 15
 Now burns with glory, and then melts with love;
 Now his fierce eyes with sparkling fury glow,
 Now sighs steal out, and tears begin to flow;
 Persians and Greeks like turns of nature found,
 And the world's victor stood subdued by sound! 20
 The pow'r of music all our hearts allow,
 And what Timotheus was, is DRYDEN now.

1. Using allusions to classical mythology that he would have expected his readers to know, Pope makes his point in “Sound and Sense” by exemplifying the effects or defects he wants to direct attention to in bad or good poetry. For example, he uses alliteration—the gentle sound of s—when he describes Zephyr, the gentle west wind. Find other examples in the excerpt of alliteration and onomatopoeia. How do the sounds of the words illustrate the examples and provide lessons on “true ease in writing”?
2. Examine the rhyme scheme. Pope was famous for writing couplets (two rhyming lines). How do the series of couplets in this poem help Pope convey his message about the relationship between sound and sense?
3. Pope manipulates the sound of this poem by controlling the poem’s rhythm. Find examples of the way he varies stress (or accent), mixes mono- and polysyllabic words, ends words in consonants that do not easily blend, or slows a line down with commas. Be sure to read the poem aloud to hear the effects of the poem’s “sound.”
4. “Sound and Sense” is a didactic poem, meaning it was written for the purpose of instructing its readers. However, it does contain lyrical language that expresses emotion. How does Pope use that lyrical language to achieve his didactic purpose in this poem?
5. What conclusions can you draw about Pope’s view of the artist and his or her art? What expectations do you think he had about the artist’s place in society?

SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE

Born in rural Devonshire, England, Samuel Taylor Coleridge (1772–1834) was a founder of the Romantic movement in literature and one of the so-called Lake poets, who lived and worked in the Lake District in rural northwest England.

He is best known for “The Rime of the Ancient Mariner,” “Christabel,” and “Kubla Khan”—poems of mystery and magic—and for his meditative verse and literary criticism. His philosophical works influenced the nineteenth-century American transcendental movement, particularly the discussion of the imagination in his Biographia Literaria (1817). Coleridge was close to fellow Lake Poet William Wordsworth and his sister, Dorothy. Coleridge and Wordsworth anonymously published Lyrical Ballads, a collection of poems that rejected traditional poetic language in favor of direct speech. It is considered the seminal Romantic work. Coleridge was plagued with physical ailments, for which he took large quantities of laudanum—a mixture of opium and alcohol, which some believe prevented him from living up to his early promise. Later in his life, however, he managed to control his addiction. Coleridge claimed that he wrote “Kubla Khan” in 1797 during a stay at a farmhouse. He had taken laudanum and fallen asleep in his chair as he was reading in Purchas his Pilgrimage a description by Marco Polo of a palace the Chinese emperor Kubla Khan had commissioned. When he awoke, he tried to transcribe his dream but was interrupted by a “person on business from Porlock.” The fragment that remains was first published in 1816.

In Xanadu<sup>1</sup> did Kubla Khan

A stately pleasure-dome decree:

Where Alph, the sacred river, ran

Through caverns measureless to man

Down to a sunless sea.

5

So twice five miles of fertile ground

With walls and towers were girdled round:

And here were gardens bright with sinuous rills

Where blossomed many an incense-bearing tree;

And there were forests ancient as the hills,

10

Enfolding sunny spots of greenery.

But oh! that deep romantic chasm which slanted

Down the green hill athwart a cedarn cover!

A savage place! as holy and enchanted

As e'er beneath a waning moon was haunted

15

By woman wailing for her demon-lover!

And from this chasm, with ceaseless turmoil seething,

As if this earth in fast thick pants were breathing,

A mighty fountain momentarily was forced,

Amid whose swift half-intermitted burst

20

1. “Kubla Khan” is filled with contrasts. Track these oppositions as you read the poem. What is the effect of the contrasts between, for example, chasms and hills (ll. 12–13)?
2. How does Coleridge achieve the chantlike quality in “Kubla Khan”?
3. How does the first part of “Kubla Khan” (ll. 1–30) differ from the second part (ll. 31–54)? What causes the change? What does the shift offer in the way of an explanation for the poem’s meaning?
4. According to Coleridge, his transcription of the dream was interrupted by a “person on business from Porlock,” after which he was unable to recall the vision or the poem he composed in his dream. No one knows who interrupted him, but the person from Porlock has become a metaphor for interrupted inspiration. What does this anecdote add to the meaning of the poem as a meditation on creativity?
5. Characterize the speaker in “Kubla Khan.”
6. “Kubla Khan” has been interpreted many ways. Some consider it a straightforward portrayal of Coleridge’s opium-induced hallucination; others believe it to be about the beauty of creation. Consider several possibilities. What is your interpretation?

WILLIAM WORDSWORTH

William Wordsworth (1770–1850) is one of the most famous and influential poets of the Western world and one of the premier Romantics. Widely known for his reverence of nature and the power of his lyrical verse, he lived in the Lake District of northern England, where he was inspired by the natural beauty of the landscape. With Samuel Taylor Coleridge, he published Lyrical Ballads in 1798; the collection, which changed the direction of English poetry, begins with Coleridge’s “Rime of the Ancient Mariner” and includes Wordsworth’s “Lines Composed a Few Miles above Tintern Abbey.” Among Wordsworth’s other most famous works are “The World Is Too Much with Us” (p. 498), a sonnet; “Ode: Intimations of Immortality”; and “The Prelude, or Growth of a Poet’s Mind,” an autobiographical poem. In the sonnet “London, 1802,” the speaker addresses and eulogizes the poet John Milton.

Milton! thou should’st be living at this hour:
 England hath need of thee: she is a fen
 Of stagnant waters: altar, sword, and pen,
 Fireside, the heroic wealth of hall and bower,
 Have forfeited their ancient English dower

Of inward happiness. We are selfish men;
Oh! raise us up, return to us again;
And give us manners, virtue, freedom, power.
Thy soul was like a star, and dwelt apart:
Thou hadst a voice whose sound was like the sea:      10
Pure as the naked heavens, majestic, free,
So didst thou travel on life's common way,
In cheerful godliness; and yet thy heart
The lowliest duties on herself did lay.

1. “London, 1802” is an example of a classic Petrarchan sonnet: it has fourteen lines written in iambic pentameter; its rhyme scheme is abba, abba, cdde, ce. The traditional sonnet poses a situation or question in the octet (first eight lines) that is resolved or answered in the sestet (the last six lines). What situation does Wordsworth present in “London, 1802”? What resolution does he suggest?
2. Wordsworth often uses single words to represent bigger ideas, a literary device called metonymy. What institutions do “altar,” “sword,” “pen,” and “fireside” represent?
3. Wordsworth uses similes to present the qualities in Milton that he believes would help England out of its stagnant selfishness. What is the effect of this figurative language? What is the extra level of meaning it creates?
4. According to this poem, what potential does the artist have for improving society? How must the artist behave to make that potential become real and useful?
5. This poem is unusually nationalistic for a Romantic writer. What might explain Wordsworth’s focus on England’s heritage and one of its great poets?

JOHN KEATS

John Keats was born in London in 1795. His early education introduced him to literature, music, and theater, but after his father and mother died, young John’s guardian took him out of school and apprenticed him to a surgeon and apothecary. He went on to study medicine, but almost immediately abandoned medicine for poetry. Keats is considered one of the major poets of the Romantic movement, even though his background of relative poverty stood in stark contrast to the classically educated Romantic poets, such as Percy Bysshe Shelley (p. 917) and William Wordsworth. Keats did not have an easy life: he was poor and in ill health, and his work was not well received while he was alive. Though Keats died at twenty-five, his work—both his poetry and the letters in which he explained his aesthetic theories—has withstood the test of time. Some of his best-known poems are “On First Looking into Chapman’s Homer” (1816), “Ode to a Nightingale” (1819), “La Belle Dame Sans Merci” (1819), “Lamia” (1819), and “To Autumn” (1819). In the poems that follow, Keats addresses the limitations of two art forms—the sonnet and an ancient artifact—at the same time that he honors them.

On the Sonnet

If by dull rhymes our English must be chained,
 And like Andromeda,<sup>1</sup> the sonnet sweet
 Fettered, in spite of pained loveliness,
 Let us find, if we must be constrained,
 Sandals more interwoven and complete 5
 To fit the naked foot of Poesy:<sup>2</sup>
 Let us inspect the lyre, and weigh the stress
 Of every chord, and see what may be gained
 By ear industrious, and attention meet;
 Misers of sound and syllable, no less 10
 Than Midas of his coinage, let us be Jealous of dead leaves in the bay-wreath crown,
 So, if we may not let the Muse be free,
 She will be bound with garlands of her own.

Exploring the Text

1. In a letter including “On the Sonnet,” Keats wrote, “I have been endeavoring to discover a better sonnet stanza than we have.” He objected to the “pouncing rhythms” of the Petrarchan form and the inevitable “tick” of the closing couplet in the Shakespearean stanza. You will notice that the rhyme scheme of this sonnet is unconventional, but look carefully at the beginning rhymes, such as “Fettered,” “Let us,” and “Jealous.” In what other ways does Keats vary the conventions of a sonnet?
2. According to Keats, what is the connection between beautiful Andromeda, who was chained to a rock in the sea until Perseus rescued her, and the sonnet form?

4. This poem has several image patterns, including chains, mythology, music, and clothing. Trace one or more of them and consider their effects. How do these patterns help connect sound and sense? How do they comment on the sonnet form and its relationship to art?
5. What do you think of Keats's inclination to restructure the sonnet form? What does that inclination tell you about the nature of the artist?

Ode on a Grecian Urn

1

Thou still unravished bride of quietness,
 Thou foster child of silence and slow time,
 Sylvan historian, who canst thus express
 A flowery tale more sweetly than our rhyme:
 What leaf-fringed legend haunts about thy shape 5
 Of deities or mortals, or of both,
 In Tempe or the dales of Arcady?<sup>1</sup>
 What men or gods are these? What maidens loath?
 What mad pursuit? What struggle to escape?
 What pipes and timbrels? What wild ecstasy? 10

2

Heard melodies are sweet, but those unheard
 Are sweeter; therefore, ye soft pipes, play on;
 Not to the sensual ear, but, more endeared,
 Pipe to the spirit ditties of no tone:
 Fair youth, beneath the trees, thou canst not leave 15
 Thy song, nor ever can those trees be bare;
 Bold Lover, never, never canst thou kiss,
 Though winning near the goal—yet, do not grieve;
 She cannot fade, though thou hast not thy bliss,
 Forever wilt thou love, and she be fair! 20

3

Ah, happy, happy boughs! that cannot shed
 Your leaves, nor ever bid the Spring adieu;
 And, happy melodist, unwearied,

<sup>1</sup>Pastoral regions of Greece. —Eds.

Forever piping songs forever new;
 More happy love! more happy, happy love! 25
 Forever warm and still to be enjoyed,
 Forever panting, and forever young;
 All breathing human passion far above,
 That leaves a heart high-sorrowful and cloyed,
 A burning forehead, and a parching tongue. 30

4

Who are these coming to the sacrifice?
 To what green altar, O mysterious priest,
 Lead'st thou that heifer lowing at the skies,
 And all her silken flanks with garlands dressed?
 What little town by river or sea shore, 35
 Or mountain-built with peaceful citadel,
 Is emptied of this folk, this pious morn?
 And, little town, thy streets forevermore
 Will silent be; and not a soul to tell
 Why thou art desolate, can e'er return. 40

5

O Attic shape! Fair attitude! with brede<sup>2</sup>
 Of marble men and maidens overwrought,
 With forest branches and the trodden weed;
 Thou, silent form, dost tease us out of thought
 As doth eternity: Cold Pastoral! 45
 When old age shall this generation waste,
 Thou shalt remain, in midst of other woe
 Than ours, a friend to man, to whom thou say'st,
 "Beauty is truth, truth beauty,"—that is all
 Ye know on earth, and all ye need to know. 50

1. Who is the poem's speaker? What does he observe as he studies the urn? What questions does he ask as he examines this artifact of another time? Who is he addressing?
2. An ode is an ancient form that originally followed strict rules of rhythm, meter, and rhyme. By the time of the Romantics, the ode was more flexible, used to meditate on or address a single object or condition. What aspects of this form make it well suited to a meditation on a piece of art?

3. The last two lines of the ode: “‘Beauty is truth, truth beauty,’ — that is all / Ye know on earth, and all ye need to know” are among the most enigmatic in all of poetry, both for their content and for the many possibilities of who is addressing whom. Consider four possibilities: speaker to reader, urn to reader, speaker to urn, and speaker to figures on the urn. How does each perspective change the meaning of those two lines and the poem as a whole?
4. Noticing that the first and fourth stanzas of the poem are filled with question marks and the last stanza has none, what paradoxical comments does “Ode on a Grecian Urn” make about art?
5. While the urn described in the poem is imaginary, “Ode on a Grecian Urn” was supposedly inspired by Keats’s visit to the Elgin Marbles on exhibit at the British Museum. What does this context add to your understanding of the poem?

My Last Duchess

ROBERT BROWNING

Born the son of a bank clerk, Robert Browning (1812–1889) was, for the most part, educated at home, and is said to have learned Latin, Greek, Italian, and French by the age of fourteen. He came under the influence of Percy Bysshe Shelley in his teens, and adopted radical views concerning society and religion. He began to publish poetry in 1833, but his work was not highly regarded or widely read. In 1845, he read Poems by Elizabeth Barrett. The two corresponded, met, and eloped to Italy the following year. Until her death in 1861, his identity as her husband brought him more attention than did his work. The publication of Collected Poems in 1852 and The Ring and the Book in 1868 finally brought him acclaim. Among his most well-known poems are “The Pied Piper of Hamelin” (1842), “Fra Lippo Lippi” (1855), and “My Last Duchess,” included here. Written in 1842, it is an excellent example of the dramatic monologue—a form in which the speaker is clearly distinct from the poet, and the speaker’s innermost thoughts are revealed by the situation.

Ferrara<sup>1</sup>

That’s my last Duchess painted on the wall,
Looking as if she were alive. I call
That piece a wonder, now: Frà Pandolf’s<sup>2</sup> hands

Worked busily a day, and there she stands.
 Will't please you sit and look at her? I said 5
 "Frà Pandolf" by design, for never read
 Strangers like you that pictured countenance,
 The depth and passion of its earnest glance,
 But to myself they turned (since none puts by
 The curtain I have drawn for you, but I) 10
 And seemed as they would ask me, if they durst,
 How such a glance came there; so, not the first
 Are you to turn and ask thus. Sir, 'twas not
 Her husband's presence only, called that spot
 Of joy into the Duchess' cheek: perhaps 15
 Frà Pandolf chanced to say "Her mantle laps
 Over my lady's wrist too much," or "Paint
 Must never hope to reproduce the faint
 Half-flush that dies along her throat": such stuff
 Was courtesy, she thought, and cause enough 20
 For calling up that spot of joy. She had
 A heart—how shall I say?—too soon made glad,
 Too easily impressed; she liked whate'er
 She looked on, and her looks went everywhere.
 Sir, 'twas all one! My favor at her breast, 25
 The dropping of the daylight in the West,
 The bough of cherries some officious fool
 Broke in the orchard for her, the white mule
 She rode with round the terrace—all and each
 Would draw from her alike the approving speech, 30
 Or blush, at least. She thanked men,—good! but thanked Somehow—I know not how—as if she ranked
 My gift of a nine-hundred-years-old name
 With anybody's gift. Who'd stoop to blame
 This sort of trifling? Even had you skill 35
 In speech—which I have not—to make your will Quite clear to such an one, and say, "Just this
 Or that in you disgusts me; here you miss,
 Or there exceed the mark"—and if she let
 Herself be lessoned so, nor plainly set 40
 Her wits to yours, forsooth, and made excuse,
 —E'en then would be some stooping; and I choose
 Never to stoop. Oh sir, she smiled, no doubt,
 Whene'er I passed her; but who passed without Much the same smile? This grew; I gave commands; 45
 Then all smiles stopped together. There she stands
 As if alive. Will't please you rise? We'll meet

The company below, then. I repeat,
 The Count your master's known munificence
 Is ample warrant that no just pretense
 Of mine for dowry will be disallowed;
 Though his fair daughter's self, as I avowed
 At starting, is my object. Nay, we'll go
 Together down, sir. Notice Neptune, though,
 Taming a sea-horse, thought a rarity,
 Which Claus of Innsbruck<sup>3</sup> cast in bronze for me!

CLAUDE MCKAY

Poet, novelist, and journalist Claude McKay was born in 1890 in Jamaica. The youngest of eleven children, he was sent to live with an older brother—a school-teacher—who took charge of his education, introducing him to the classics of British literature, such as Milton, Pope, and the Romantics. McKay began writing poetry at the age of ten, and by the time he immigrated to the United States at age twenty-two, he had published two volumes of verse. In America, McKay faced the harsh realities of racism and, despite his education, took on menial jobs to make a living. McKay became known for his protest poetry, which spoke directly about racial issues and the trials of the working class. Inspired by a wave of lynchings, his sonnet “If We Must Die" (1919) encourages resistance, even if a fight seems doomed; Winston Churchill quoted it during World War II. Langston Hughes and Countee Cullen considered McKay an inspirational voice during the Harlem Renaissance. McKay's novels include Home to Harlem (1922), Banjo: A Story without a Plot (1929), and Banana Bottom (1933). He lived abroad, in England and France, on and off for years, but returned to the United States in 1934, where he worked in Chicago as a journalist, writing mostly for left-leaning publications. McKay died in 1948, having never returned to Jamaica. "Harlem Dancer" was first published under the pseudonym Eli Edwards in the avant-garde publication Seven Arts (Oct. 1917).

Applauding youths laughed with young prostitutes
 And watched her perfect, half-clothed body sway;
 Her voice was like the sound of blended flutes
 Blown by black players upon a picnic day.
 She sang and danced on gracefully and calm, 5
 The light gauze hanging loose about her form;
 To me she seemed a proudly-swaying palm
 Grown lovelier for passing through a storm.
 Upon her swarthy neck black shiny curls
 Luxuriant fell; and tossing coins in praise, 10
 The wine-flushed, bold-eyed boys, and even the girls,
 Devoured her shape with eager, passionate gaze;
 But looking at her falsely-smiling face,
 I knew her self was not in that strange place.

1. Who is the speaker in "The Harlem Dancer"? How is the speaker connected to the events described? How is what he or she sees different from what those watching the dancer see?
2. The poem is a sonnet, a form often used by McKay. How do the restrictions of the sonnet—rhyme scheme and number of lines—work to create a scene imbued with passion, sadness, and anger?
3. Examine the imagery in the poem. What techniques does McKay use to create a vivid picture of the dancer? Look especially at the descriptions of her voice ("like the sound of blended flutes / Blown by black players upon a picnic day," ll. 3–4) and her form ("a proudly-swaying palm / Grown lovelier for passing through a storm," ll. 7–8). What surprising associations does McKay make?
4. Look closely at the poem's last line. What might McKay mean by the word "self"?
5. This poem describes a nightclub dancer. What do you think McKay thinks about the woman and the way she earns her living? Do you think he sees her work as art? Explain your answer.

Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird

WALLACE STEVENS

Wallace Stevens (1879–1955) is considered one of the most important American modernist poets. Born in Reading, Pennsylvania, Stevens studied at Harvard University and graduated from New York Law School. He worked as a lawyer in New York and became vice president of one of the largest insurance businesses in Hartford, Connecticut. In addition to being a successful businessman, Stevens is considered one of the great poets of the twentieth century. His poetry collections include Harmonium (1923), The Man with the Blue Guitar and Other Poems (1937), A Primitive like an Orb (1948), and Transport to Summer (1947). Collected Poems (1954) brought Stevens both a Pulitzer Prize and the National Book Award. Stevens's work is often described as meditative and philosophical. He was a poet of ideas, with a strong belief in the poet as someone with heightened powers. Stevens favored precision of imagery and clear, sharp language, rejecting the sentiment favored by the Romantic and Victorian poets. With its haiku-like austerity and abstract form, "Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird" has been associated with the cubist painters, such as Pablo Picasso and Georges Braque, who depicted their subjects from many viewpoints by breaking them up and reassembling them in an abstract form.

I

Among twenty snowy mountains
The only moving thing
Was the eye of the blackbird.

II

I was of three minds,
Like a tree
In which there are three blackbirds.

5

III

The blackbird whistled in the autumn winds.
It was a small part of the pantomime.

IV

A man and a woman
Are one.
A man and a woman and a blackbird
Are one.

10

I do not know which to prefer,
 The beauty of inflections
 Or the beauty of innuendoes, 15
 The blackbird whistling
 Or just after.

VI

Icicles filled the long window
 With barbaric glass.
 The shadow of the blackbird 20
 Crossed it, to and fro.
 The mood
 Traced in the shadow
 An indecipherable cause.

VII

O thin men of Haddam, 25
 Why do you imagine golden birds?
 Do you not see how the blackbird
 Walks around the feet
 Of the women about you?

VIII

I know noble accents 30
 And lucid, inescapable rhythms;
 But I know, too,
 That the blackbird is involved
 In what I know.

IX

When the blackbird flew out of sight, 35
 It marked the edge
 Of one of many circles.

X

At the sight of blackbirds
 Flying in a green light,
 Even the bawds of euphony 40
 Would cry out sharply.

XI

He rode over Connecticut
In a glass coach.
Once, a fear pierced him,
In that he mistook
The shadow of his equipage
For blackbirds.

45

XII

The river is moving.
The blackbird must be flying.

XIII

It was evening all afternoon.
It was snowing
And it was going to snow.
The blackbird sat
In the cedar-limbs.

Exploring the Text

1. Each of the thirteen stanzas of “Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird” might be a poem. What, besides the blackbird, connects them?
2. What conclusions can you draw about the speaker of the poem? about what it means to look at an object?
3. This poem has a cinematic quality that is introduced in the first stanza, when the eye of the speaker moves from a long establishing shot of snowy mountains to a close-up of the eye of a blackbird. What other film techniques do you find as you work through the poem? Consider framing, close-ups—even sound.
4. Stanza VII uses apostrophe (words spoken to a person who is absent or imaginary, or to an idea or thing) to address the “thin men of Haddam” (l. 25). Those thin men—and their home in Haddam—have been interpreted many ways. Haddam is a town in Connecticut, which is mentioned again in stanza XI. What are some of the possible explanations for the Connecticut references? What comment might Stevens be making by contrasting Connecticut life to blackbirds?
5. Is there logic to the order of the stanzas? Try reshuffling them to see if the poem’s meaning changes.
6. Black is an accepted symbol of death. Why is this interpretation too limited for this complex and enigmatic poem?
7. Using this poem as a model, write your own version of looking at a familiar object thirteen different ways.

D. H. LAWRENCE

David Herbert Lawrence was born in 1885 in a mining village in England. His father was a miner, and his mother was a schoolteacher. With his mother's encouragement, Lawrence was educated and became a schoolteacher himself, escaping life in the mines. His works include the novels Sons and Lovers (1912), The Rainbow (1915), and Women in Love (1920), and the poetry collections Birds, Beasts and Flowers (1923), Pansies (1929), and Last Poems (1933). Lawrence often felt as though the forces of modern civilization were against him: some of his books were banned because of their graphic love scenes, and he had trouble with English authorities because of his German wife and his objections to what would later become World War I. As a result, the Lawrences sought refuge in Italy, Australia, Mexico, and finally the south of France, where Lawrence died of tuberculosis in 1930 at the age of forty-four. In "Piano," Lawrence moves past nostalgia for his own childhood to a meditation on the nature of memory.

Softly, in the dusk, a woman is singing to me;
Taking me back down the vista of years, till I see
A child sitting under the piano, in the boom of the tingling strings
And pressing the small, poised feet of a mother who smiles as she sings.

In spite of myself, the insidious mastery of song
 Betrays me back, till the heart of me weeps to belong
 To the old Sunday evenings at home, with winter outside
 And hymns in the cosy parlour, the tinkling piano our guide.

So now it is vain for the singer to burst into clamour
With the great black piano appassionato. The glamour
Of childish days is upon me, my manhood is cast Down in the flood of remembrance, I weep like a child for the past.

[1923]

Exploring the Text

1. Who is the speaker in "Piano"? Who is the woman in the first line of the poem? Who is the child the speaker sees sitting under the piano (l. 3)?
2. Consider the poem's diction. What effects do words and phrases such as "smiles," "weeps," "winter outside," "hymns," "cosy parlour," and "black piano appassionato" have on your mental picture of the speaker?

3. What techniques does Lawrence use to ensure that the reader shares the experience of being under the piano with the speaker?
4. What do you think Lawrence means by the words “vain” (l. 9) and “glamour” (l. 10)? How does your interpretation of the words add another level of meaning to the poem?
5. How does Lawrence achieve a balance between empathy for the younger self he imagines and self-pity? between mere sentimentality and stark human emotion?
6. What does “Piano” say about the connection between art and memory? about the difference between public art and the art of the private individual?

The Day Lady Died

FRANK O'HARA

Frank O'Hara (1926–1966) grew up in Grafton, Massachusetts. After high school, he enlisted in the navy and served on a destroyer for most of World War II. While attending Harvard University on the GI Bill, his teacher, poet John Ciardi, recommended him for a graduate fellowship in comparative literature at the University of Michigan. After he received his master's degree, O'Hara moved to New York City, where he was at the center of New York's art and poetry worlds, writing for Art News magazine and working both at the front desk and as an assistant curator at the Museum of Modern Art. O'Hara was inspired by city life as other poets have been inspired by nature. He once wrote, “I can't even enjoy a blade of grass unless I know there's a subway handy, or a record store or some other sign that people do not totally regret life.” O'Hara's poetry collections include City Winter and Other Poems (1952); Meditations in an Emergency (1957); Second Avenue (1960); Odes (1960); and Lunch Poems (1964), from which the following poem about the death of jazz singer Billie Holiday is taken.

It is 12:20 in New York a Friday three days after Bastille day, yes it is 1959 and I go get a shoeshine because I will get off the 4:19 in Easthampton at 7:15 and then go straight to dinner and I don't know the people who will feed me

5

I walk up the muggy street beginning to sun and have a hamburger and a malted and buy an ugly NEW WORLD WRITING to see what the poets in Ghana are doing these days

I go on to the bank and Miss Stillwagon (first name Linda I once heard) doesn't even look up my balance for once in her life and in the GOLDEN GRIFFIN I get a little Verlaine

10 for Patsy with drawings by Bonnard although I do think of Hesiod, trans. Richmond Lattimore or 15 Brendan Behan's new play or Le Balcon or Les Nègres of Genet, but I don't, I stick with Verlaine after practically going to sleep with quandariness and for Mike I just stroll into the PARK LANE Liquor Store and ask for a bottle of Strega and 20 then I go back where I came from to 6th Avenue and the tobacconist in the Ziegfeld Theatre and casually ask for a carton of Gauloises and a carton of Picayunes, and a NEW YORK POST with her face on it and I am sweating a lot by now and thinking of 25 leaning on the john door in the 5 SPOT while she whispered a song along the keyboard to Mal Waldron and everyone and I stopped breathing

[1964]

Exploring the Text

1. It's probably safe to say that O'Hara is the poem's speaker. Characterize him. From what you have read, how would you describe the rest of his day? the rest of his life?
2. The poem takes place on a summer day in New York City and provides plenty of details about the time and place. How does the vivid setting help create the poem's tone?
3. Except for the last two lines, the poem is in the present tense. How does the abrupt switch add another level of meaning to the poem?
4. O'Hara once described his work as "I do this I do that" poetry because his poems sometimes sound like diary entries. "The Day Lady Died" is from a collection called Lunch Poems. How is it more than a report of what someone did on his lunch hour?
5. "Lady" refers to jazz singer Billie Holiday, who died as a result of heroin addiction. O'Hara heard her sing at a club called the Five Spot, where she broke the law by singing a song with piano player Mal Waldron. Holiday had lost her cabaret license and wasn't supposed to sing anywhere alcohol was being served; thus, she really did whisper the song. Does this information change the meaning of the poem? Explain.

MARY OLIVER

Mary Oliver (b. 1935) was born in Maple Heights, an affluent suburb of Cleveland. She attended the Ohio State University and Vassar College, but did not complete her degree. Nonetheless, she has held several teaching positions at universities, including Bennington College. Oliver published her first volume, No Voyage, and Other Poems, at the age of twenty-eight, and in 1984 won the Pulitzer Prize with American Primitive (1983). Following a period of silence, she published a considerable body of prose and verse between 1990 and 2006, winning the Christopher Award and the L. L. Winship/PEN New England Award for House of Light (1990), and the National Book Award for New and Selected Poems (1992). These were followed by White Pine (1994), West Wind (1997), Winter Hours: Prose, Prose Poems, and Poems (1999), Owls and Other Fantasies: Poems and Essays (2003), Why I Wake Early (2004), and Thirst (2006). "Singapore" comes from her award-winning 1990 collection, House of Light.

In Singapore, in the airport,
a darkness was ripped from my eyes.
In the women's restroom, one compartment stood open.
A woman knelt there, washing something in the white bowl.

Disgust argued in my stomach 5 and I felt, in my pocket, for my ticket.

A poem should always have birds in it.
Kingfishers, say, with their bold eyes and gaudy wings.
Rivers are pleasant, and of course trees.
A waterfall, or if that's not possible, a fountain rising and falling. 10

A person wants to stand in a happy place, in a poem.

When the woman turned I could not answer her face.
Her beauty and her embarrassment struggled together, and neither could win.

She smiled and I smiled. What kind of nonsense is this?
Everybody needs a job. 15

Yes, a person wants to stand in a happy place, in a poem.
But first we must watch her as she stares down at her labor, which is dull enough.

She is washing the tops of the airport ashtrays, as big as hubcaps, with a blue rag.
Her small hands turn the metal, scrubbing and rinsing.
She does not work slowly, nor quickly, but like a river. 20
Her dark hair is like the wing of a bird.

I don't doubt for a moment that she loves her life.
And I want her to rise up from the crust and the slop and fly down to the river.
This probably won't happen.
But maybe it will. 25
If the world were only pain and logic, who would want it?

Of course, it isn't.

Neither do I mean anything miraculous, but only the light that can shine out of a life. I mean the way she unfolded and refolded the blue cloth, the way her smile was only for my sake; I mean the way this poem is filled with trees, and birds.

Exploring the Text

1. Who is the speaker of the poem? How do we know what kind of person she is? Pay particular attention to the array of responses she has to the woman she sees in the restroom stall.
2. What does the repetition of "I mean" in the last stanza of the poem suggest about the connection between the speaker and the woman she sees in the restroom?
3. Mary Oliver is known for her poetry and prose about nature. How does she weave the natural world into "Singapore," which takes place in the women's restroom in an airport?
4. "Singapore" is an example of ars poetica, a poem that is also a treatise on the art of poetry. What comment does this poem make about the art of poetry? How does Oliver connect ars poetica to real life?
5. "[A] darkness was ripped from my eyes" (l. 2) is an allusion to the conversion of Saul, in Acts 9 of the New Testament: "there fell from his eyes something like scales and he regained his sight and he arose and was baptized; and he took food and was strengthened." What effect does the allusion have on the meaning of "Singapore"?

The Blues

BILLY COLLINS

Billy Collins (b. 1941) served two terms as poet laureate of the United States, beginning in 2001. He has written more than ten books of poetry, including The Art of Drowning (1995), Picnic, Lightning (1998), and Nine Horses (2002). A distinguished professor of English at Lehman College in New York City, Collins has received fellowships from the National Endowment for the Arts and the Guggenheim Foundation and was chosen in 1992 as a "literary lion" of the New York Public Library. Collins, who actively promotes poetry in the schools, edited Poetry 180: A Turning Back to Poetry (2003)—an anthology of contemporary poems that aims to increase high school students' appreciation and enjoyment of poetry. "The Blues" was first published in Sailing around the Room (2001).

Much of what is said here must be said twice,
a reminder that no one takes an immediate interest in the pain of others.

Nobody will listen, it would seem, 5
if you simply admit your baby left you early this morning she didn't even stop to say good-bye.

But if you sing it again with the help of the band 10 which will now lift you to a higher, more ardent and beseeching key,

people will not only listen;
they will shift to the sympathetic edges of their chairs, 15 moved to such acute anticipation by that chord and the delay that follows, they will not be able to sleep unless you release with one finger a scream from the throat of your guitar 20 and turn your head back to the microphone to let them know you're a hard-hearted man but that woman's sure going to make you cry.

Exploring the Text

1. On first read, it seems that the speaker and the poet are the same. Are they? Who is the audience—the “you” in the poem? Is it possible that the “you” is, in fact, the speaker?
2. Collins uses punctuation cleverly in this poem. Track the punctuation, and explain how he uses it to change the rhythm. How does that change relate to the subject of the poem?
3. What is the effect of the enjambment that Collins uses throughout the poem?
4. Traditional blues lyrics consist of one line repeated twice, followed by a third line that responds to or explains the first two lines. How does Billy Collins both exemplify and explain that form?
5. In a way, “The Blues” is an example of ars poetica. How does the poem comment on the art of poetry as well as the art of singing the blues?

Nighthawks

EDWARD HOPPER

American painter Edward Hopper (1882–1967) was born in Nyack, New York. He first studied illustration in New York City, before switching to painting and traveling to Europe. His work was influenced by the European realists, such as Velázquez, Goya, Daumier, and Manet. Although one of his paintings was in the famous New York Armory show of 1913, his work generated little interest until his 1925 painting House by the Railroad. Its blunt geometrical shapes, architectural details, and flat masses of color were in keeping with his earlier work, but the painting's mood of melancholy and loneliness marked the advent of his mature style, a style still present in Nighthawks, reproduced here.

Nighthawks (1942, oil on canvas, 33 $\frac{1}{8}$  x 60 in.)

Exploring the Text

1. It is almost impossible to look at Nighthawks without making up a story. What is your story?
2. Although the painting is realistic, if you look carefully you will notice that what Hopper left out is almost as interesting as what he included. What are some of the things missing from the painting, and how do they add nuance to the painting's story?
3. How does Hopper use elements of visual art, such as light and line, to create the mood of melancholy and mystery?

4. Nighthawks is the subject of several poems, including the ones that follow. What do you think makes it such a popular subject?

IRA SADOFF

Ira Sadoff (b. 1945) was born in Brooklyn and educated at Cornell University and the University of Oregon. He has taught at Hobart and William Smith Colleges, the University of Virginia, and the Iowa Writers’ Workshop, and is now the Arthur Jeremiah Roberts Professor of Literature at Colby College. He has written many books of poetry, including Emotional Traffic (1990), Grazing (1998), and Barter (2003), and his work has appeared in the New Yorker, the New Republic, Esquire, and the American Poetry Review. He has described himself as “one poet among a decreasing minority who is trying to resist the return to formalism, the sterile, conservative, aesthete academism of the nineteen-fifties.” This poem first appeared in his 1975 collection, Settling Down.

Imagine a town where no one walks the streets. Where the sidewalks are swept clean as ceilings and the barber pole stands still as a corpse.
There is no wind. The windows on the brick buildings are boarded up with doors, and a single light shines in the all-night diner while the rest of the town sits in its shadow.

5

In an hour it will be daylight. The busboy in the diner counts the empty stools and looks at his reflection in the coffee urns. On the radio the announcer says the allies have won another victory. There have been few casualties. A man with a wide-brimmed hat and the woman sitting next to him are drinking coffee or tea; on the other side of the counter a stranger watches them as though he had nowhere else to focus his eyes. He wonders if perhaps they are waiting for the morning buses to arrive, if they are expecting some member of their family to bring them important news. Or perhaps they will get on the bus themselves, ask the driver where he is going, and whatever his answer they will tell him it could not be far enough.

10

When the buses arrive at sunrise they are empty as hospital beds—
the hum of the motor is distant as a voice coming from within the body.
The man and woman have walked off to some dark street, while the stranger remains fixed in his chair. When he picks up the morning paper he is not surprised to read there would be no exchange of prisoners, the war would go on forever, the Cardinals would win the pennant, there would be no change in the weather.

Exploring the Text

1. What story does Sadoff's poem tell about Nighthawks?
2. The poem mentions objects and describes settings that do not appear in this particular painting but are in other Hopper works. What do these elements contribute to the meaning of the poem? to our understanding of how the speaker feels about Hopper?
3. Sadoff uses several similes. What connects them? How do they connect to the painting?
4. The poem begins with the word "Imagine" and moves from a description of the scene in Hopper's painting to what was in the newspaper—real events from 1942—which the man in the painting might read the next morning. How does Sadoff honor the painting's universal themes while also mooring it to a specific time in history?
5. What do you think the poem says about Nighthawks? about the relationship between a painting and its viewer?

Inventing My Parents

After Edward Hopper's Nighthawks, 1942

SUSAN LUDVIGSON

Susan Ludvigson (b. 1942) is a professor of English at Winthrop University. Her books of poetry include Sweet Confluence: New and Selected Poems (2000) and Escaping the House of Certainty (2006). She is considered a southern poet, yet she seldom writes about the South specifically. "Inventing My Parents" is part of Ludvigson's 1993 collection Everything Winged Must Be Dreaming.

They sit in the bright café, discussing Hemingway and how this war will change them.
 Sinclair Lewis's name comes up, and Kay Boyle's, and then Fitzgerald's. 5
 They disagree about the American Dream.
 My mother, her bare arms
 silver under fluorescent lights, says she imagines it a hawk flying over, its shadow sweeping 10 every town. Their coffee's getting cold but they hardly notice. My mother's face is lit by ideas. My father's gestures are a Frenchman's. When he concedes a point, he shrugs, an elaborate lift 15 of the shoulders, his hands and smile declaring an open mind.
 I am five months old, at home with a sitter this August night when the air outside is warm as a bath. They decide, 20 though the car is parked nearby, to walk the few blocks home, savoring

 the fragrant night, their being alone together.
 As they go out the door, he's reciting Donne's "Canonization": "For God's sake                      25 hold your tongue, and let me love," and she's laughing, light as summer rain when it begins.

[1993]

Exploring the Text

1. What story does Ludvigson's poem tell about Nighthawks?
2. Who is the speaker in the poem? What do we learn about her by the way she imagines her parents as characters in Hopper's painting?
3. The antecedent of "it" in line 9 appears to be "American Dream" in line 6. What else might "it" refer to? What is the connection between the American Dream and the title of Hopper's painting?
4. The parents presented by Ludvigson's speaker seem happier and more cultured than the couple pictured in Nighthawks. What is the effect of this juxtaposition?
5. In the poem "Canonization" by John Donne, the speaker begs to be left alone to love. Its title can be considered two ways: that the speaker's deep love makes him a saint, and that the poem itself canonizes the lovers. Why do you think Ludvigson chose to have the speaker's father quote this particular poem? How might it connect to Hopper's painting?

Focus on Comparison and Contrast

1. Ira Sadoff and Susan Ludvigson both tell stories based on Nighthawks. How are their stories different? How are they similar? What do both stories tell us about the place Nighthawks occupies in the American psyche?
2. Sadoff uses events from 1942 to bring his interpretation of Nighthawks into the world beyond the painting, while Ludvigson cites American novelists. How do these imagined contexts affect the poets' interpretations of Hopper's painting?
3. How is the mood and tone different in the two poems? Are there similarities?
4. In Sister Wendy's American Masterpieces, the art critic writes:

From Jo's [Hopper's wife] diaries we learn that Hopper described this work as a painting of "three characters." The man behind the counter, though imprisoned in the triangle, is in fact free. He has a job, a home, he can come and go; he can look at the customers with a half-smile. It is the customers who are the nighthawks. Nighthawks are predators—but are the men there to prey on the woman, or has she come in to prey on the men? To my mind, the man and woman are a couple, as the position of their hands suggests, but they are a couple so lost in misery that they cannot communicate; they have nothing to give each other. I see the nighthawks of the picture not so much as birds of prey, but simply as birds: great winged creatures that should be free in the sky, but instead are shut in, dazed and miserable, with their heads constantly banging against the glass of the world's callousness.

Compare Sister Wendy's interpretation to the interpretations of Sadoff and Ludvigson. What is your own interpretation?

Writing Assignment

"Hopper's 'Nighthawks' (1942)" by Ira Sadoff and "Inventing My Parents: After Edward Hopper's Nighthawks, 1942" by Susan Ludvigson are inspired by the same painting, a painting that captures a moment that is both realistic and enigmatic. Compare and contrast the techniques each poet uses to capture that moment in words. Consider also how they explain—or don't explain—Hopper's painting.

The Laundresses

EDGAR DEGAS

Hilaire-Germain-Edgar Degas was born in Paris in 1834 and lived for eighty-three years—long enough to be celebrated in his lifetime—but he never stopped developing and experimenting. Degas changed subjects often and experimented with style and media; in his later years, for example, when his eyesight began to fail, he started to work in pastel and sculpture. Usually classed with the impressionists, Degas differed from them in several ways, mainly in his dislike of painting directly from nature. Among Degas's favorite subjects were ballerinas, horse racing, and working-class people, such as the laundresses in the work reproduced here.

EAVAN BOLAND

Eavan Boland (b. 1944) spent the first six years of her life in Dublin, moving to London when her father was appointed Irish ambassador, and then to New York when he was appointed president of the UN General Assembly. She recalls that she felt deprived of her Irish roots—particularly in London, where anti-Irish sentiment was rife. She writes of this experience in “An Irish Child in England: 1951,” exemplified by “the teacher in the London convent who, / when I pronounced ‘I amn’t’ in the classroom / turned and said—‘you’re not in Ireland now.’” Boland returned to Dublin for college, earning a BA in English and Latin from Trinity College Dublin. She has taught at Stanford University since 1996. Boland’s first collection, 23 Poems (1966), met with mixed reviews, but she established her reputation with In Her Own Image (1980). She has published regularly since, her most comprehensive volumes being An Origin Like Water: Collected Poems, 1967–1987 (1996) and New Collected Poems (2008), and has won several awards, in addition to being awarded honorary degrees both in the United States and in Ireland. She is a feminist and a poet but, she maintains, not a feminist poet. She sees a fundamental difference between the “ethic” of feminism and the “aesthetic” of poetry, arguing that feminism is a definite moral position, whereas poetry, like all art, begins where certainty ends. Through her work, Boland strives to give meaning to everyday events in women’s lives, as witnessed in “Degas’s Laundresses.”

You rise, you dawn
 roll-sleeved Aphrodites,
 out of a camisole brine,
 a linen pit of stitches,
 silking the fitted sheets 5
 away from you like waves.
 You seam dreams in the folds of wash from which freshes
 the whiff and reach of fields where it bleached and stiffened. 10
 Your chat’s sabbatical:
 brides, wedding outfits,
 a pleasure of leisured women are sweated into the folds, the neat heaps of linen. 15
 Now the drag of the clasp.
 Your wrists basket your waist.
 You round to the square weight.

Wait. There behind you.
 A man. There behind you. 20
 Whatever you do don't turn.
 Why is he watching you?
 Whatever you do don't turn.
 Whatever you do don't turn.

 See he takes his ease 25
 staking his easel so,
 slowly sharpening charcoal,
 closing his eyes just so,
 slowly smiling as if so slowly he is 30

 unbandaging his mind.
 Surely a good laundress would understand its twists, its white turns,
 its blind designs — 35

 it's your winding sheet.

[1982]

Exploring the Texts

1. Eavan Boland's poem is an interpretation of Degas's The Laundresses. What is the speaker's attitude toward the subject of the poem? To whom is the poem addressed?
2. What do you think Degas's attitude toward his subject is? In addition to the way he portrays the two women, what other elements of style depict Degas's attitude? Look closely at line, shape, and composition—the way the figures are placed on the canvas. If possible, find the picture online so that you can look at it in color.
3. Who is the man in "Degas's Laundresses"? What is the speaker's attitude toward him?
4. In her poem, Boland names many of the items the laundresses wash and iron. What is the effect of naming these items even though they are not recognizable in the painting?
5. Degas once said, "It's one thing to copy what one sees, but it's much better to draw what can only be seen in one's memory. It's a transformation during which the imagination collaborates with the memory . . . there your recollections and fantasies are freed from the tyranny exerted by nature." How do both the painting and the poem combine memory and imagination? Do you think Degas and Boland feel the same way about the laundresses? Explain the differences and similarities and what might cause them.

EAVAN BOLAND ON WRITING

Renée Shea (RS): Why this painting—why Degas? Do you have a special connection with this painter?

Eavan Boland (EB): My mother was an artist, so I heard about paintings and painters from when I was young. Degas wasn't her favorite, but she admired certain things he did, especially his ballet dancers. That's how I first saw him—as a painter of glamour and art. In the 1970s, the Armand Hammer exhibition—a big collection of French paintings—came to Dublin. I saw it there. There were charcoal drawings of laundresses by Degas in the exhibition. Suddenly, this painter I had only ever associated with the color and festivity of dances and horse racing appeared to me as a harsh, mysterious interpreter of women and work. That really made an impression.

RS: Why do you see the painter—Degas—as an interloper, a menacing presence in the life of his subject, someone “staking his easel . . . slowly sharpening charcoal”?

EB: It wasn't so much Degas. It was an argument I was having with myself. My first child had been born, and I was in the house more than I had ever been. I was writing new poems, and I was getting to be fascinated with the idea of the domestic life and its silent, almost undocumented aspects. I was beginning to ask whether art really broke that silence or whether it just recorded it. That was a time when I wanted to ask ethical questions, not just aesthetic ones.

RS: I read the poem as a rebuke or at least a reminder that the working-women being depicted are objectified, not treated as fully human. Yet in your description of them the language suggests a kind of idealization: “roll-sleeved Aphrodites” who “seam dreams in the fold / of wash.” Isn't what you're doing a different kind of objectification?

EB: The opening of the poem is ironic. I wanted to bring out contrasts between the actual state of the laundresses—the steam, the heat, the hard work—and the myth of a leisured Aphrodite, rising out of the waves. They're the down-to-earth exception that proves the rule. I saw them as already mythologized in the history of myth, merely by being women and painted objects. But I wasn't doing the objectifying; it had already been done. I was trying to reveal it.

RS: You've written “Degas's Laundresses” in first person, a direct address to the laundress herself. Why? Why was this preferable to having the woman speak for herself?

EB: In fact it's a plural. The image I first saw—and then revisited in the catalog—was of two laundresses. They're talking together, at least as I imagine them (“your chat’s sabbatical”). They’re working together, so it was an address to both.

RS: I know this poem is often given a feminist reading, interpreted as an outcry against the work that these unnamed and uncelebrated women carry out by necessity rather than by choice. But isn’t the issue one of class (during a specific time period) as much as gender?

EB: I’m not sure it’s either. Or at least, gender and class are a lesser aspect. This is a poem about the way art disrupts life, and life comes back as art. It’s about one artist—myself—warning the subjects of another artist’s work to be wary because they are about to become images in his work. And yet, of course, through that very warning, they become images in mine. This is a poem about both accusation and self-accusation, with also, I think, more play and irony than maybe has been seen.

RS: You have poems about other paintings—“On Renoir’s The Grape Pickers,” for example—with a similar re-vision to call our attention, perhaps, to a different way of seeing the work. Would you comment on your interest in shifting the lens, as it were? Or are these poems further exploration of your concern for the domestic sphere of women’s lives?

EB: Both poems were written at a time when I was beginning to be especially interested in the domestic, in work, and in the lives of women in connection with both. The paintings deal with these. It’s the Degas, however, that most interested me.

RS: Is it a coincidence that you have chosen two impressionist painters (Renoir and Degas), or are you commenting—skeptically!—on the glorification of what is really hard and dull work?

EB: They’re both painters I admire. But I’m also aware that there’s a conversation going on in their work about what should—and should not—be beautified or glamorized. It’s not just that I’m troubled about it; they seem troubled, too. The images of female beauty in their work often contrast with the realistic and darker representations of hard labor and the anonymity of the subjects. It’s a conflicted vision. I was drawn to that conflict.

RS: In the poems I’ve asked about as well as many of your others, you are referencing artists from previous eras. How is this ongoing dialogue between present and past—as Eliot writes, “the presence of the past”—an essential part of being an artist, whether poet or painter?

EB: I’m sure it’s different for everyone. It’s always seemed to me, though, that the first requirement is a conversation with yourself. As a writer, a poet, that’s the easier one. Eventually, you know where you want to go, and why. The conversation with the past follows on that. Often that’s a more thorny and unsettled dialogue. It certainly has been for me. The limits of authority and the freedom to transgress are all there. It's the way those conversations weave together—the first with yourself, the second with the past—that ends up being important. At least it has been that way for me.

RS: My students often question “originality” and “authenticity” when they encounter a work that is a retelling (such as a graphic novel depiction of a famous work or a writing-back such as Wide Sargasso Sea). Does responding to the work of other artists require or embolden the same kind of imagination as creating a wholly original work, or are these terms as slippery as they seem?

EB: They are slippery terms. Talking about the work of other artists in your own work can be helpful, though—as both text and pretext. The drawing by Degas allowed me to go further with arguments I was already exploring. I wanted to turn a harsh light on some of the flatteries of creativity. It was a personal quest. His drawing opened the door and allowed me to think it through. Perhaps responding to other artists makes it more likely that the poem will be an argumentative piece than otherwise, or maybe not. But in the case of this poem, and at that time, it certainly was helpful.

Follow-Up

1. Do you agree with Eavan Boland that Degas is a “harsh, mysterious interpreter of women and work,” or did you see something different in the painting? What is your interpretation?
2. Boland says that talking about other artists’ work can work as “both text and pretext.” What do you think she means by that? Consider other retellings you have read; do you think the writer used the artwork as text, pretext, or both?
3. Boland says she wanted to ask ethical questions instead of just aesthetic questions in her interpretation of Degas’s work. What ethical questions does she ask? Which questions do you think could be considered aesthetic?

Seamus Heaney: The Responsibility of the Artist

Seamus Heaney was born in 1939 at Mossbawn, his family’s farm, in Northern Ireland, about thirty miles northwest of Belfast. Heaney was the eldest of nine children. His father’s family was involved in farming and cattle dealing, and his mother's family had been employed in a local linen mill. Heaney lived on the farm until he was twelve and won a scholarship to St. Columb's College, a Catholic boarding school about forty miles away. He later lived in Belfast and then the Republic of Ireland, and he said that his departure from the farm at Mossbawn was a removal from "the earth of farm labour to the heaven of education." At St. Columb's, Heaney learned Latin and Irish, and as a student at Queen's University in Belfast, he learned Anglo-Saxon; these languages resonate throughout his work. Heaney became known in the mid-1960s, when he was part of a group of Northern Irish poets that included Michael Longley, Derek Mahon, Paul Muldoon, and Ciaran Carson. Though stylistically diverse, these poets shared the background of a society that was deeply divided both politically and religiously.

Heaney's works include the collections Death of a Naturalist (1966), Door into the Dark (1969), North (1975), Station Island (1984), Opened Ground (1998), and Electric Light (2001). He is also known for his translations—such as Sweeney Astray (1983), Sweeney's Fight (1992), and Beowulf (1999)—and the plays The Cure at Troy (1990) and Burial at Thebes (2004). He was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1995.

In the foreword to Preoccupations: Selected Prose, 1968–1978—his first collection of prose—Heaney asks, "How should a poet properly live and write? What is his relationship to be to his own voice, his own place, his literary heritage and his contemporary world?" This preoccupation with the question of the responsibility of the poet still occupies Heaney's poetry and prose, as the works in this Conversation show.

INTERVIEWS WITH SEAMUS HEANEY

DENNIS O'DRISCOLL

Editor and poet Dennis O'Driscoll was born in County Tipperary, Ireland, in 1954. The excerpt that appears here was part of Stepping Stones (2008), a series of Heaney's reminiscences, guided by questions from O'Driscoll.

'Tollund', another post-IRA-ceasefire poem, is dated the previous month, September 1994. Were you actually in Jutland at that time?

The coincidence was extraordinary. The IRA announced the ceasefire on a Wednesday, the last Wednesday in August, if I'm not mistaken, and I was asked to write about it for the next weekend's Sunday Tribune. That same weekend I was also bound for Denmark, to do a reading in Copenhagen University, and inevitably I was remembering the visit I'd made to Jutland twenty-one years earlier, to see the Tollund Man. What happened, at any rate, was an unexpected trip to the actual bog in Tollund where the body had been found in the 1950s. My host in the English Department, Nick Rosenmeir, took this sudden notion on the Saturday afternoon, bundled his wife and Marie and myself into his car, crossed to Jutland that evening on a ferry, put us up that night at their holiday house near Silkeborg and on the Sunday morning brought us to the actual spot where the turf cutters had dug him out.

'Hallucinatory and familiar', you called it.

That's exactly how it felt — as familiar as Toner's Bog in the townlands of Mulhollandstown and Scribe, all named in the poem. It was like a world restored, the world of the second chance, and that's why there's an echo of that Shakespearean line, 'Richard's himself again', in the last stanza. I also wanted to get in something of the dawn promise you find in that beautiful little speech at the end of the first scene of Hamlet: Marcellus talks about a hallowed moment in the dark of the year when 'the bird of dawning singeth all night long'. On our Sunday morning in Tollund, I felt a similar lightening of mood and opening of possibility. We were like 'ghosts who'd walked abroad / Unfazed by light, to make a new beginning / . . . Ourselves again, free-willed again, not bad'. What we were experiencing, you could say, was hope rather than optimism, and that's why I liked the complicating echo of the words 'Sinn Féin' in the phrase 'ourselves again'.

You were still sceptical?

5

Cautious, certainly. I knew it would be crazy to expect a great change of heart on either side.

You weren't all that surprised presumably when the IRA bombed Canary Wharf in 1996?

I was disappointed if not entirely dismayed, but I still didn't believe it was the beginning of the end. More the end of the beginning. I couldn't see things being rolled back to their pre-ceasefire state. Too many adjustments, small but significant, had been made, not just in the public arena but at the core of most people's consciousness. The collective resolution had firmed up—again, not optimistically, just more or less obstinately.

You believed, therefore, in the 'peace process'? From the start?

I was chary, from the start, of the use of the term 'process'. Peace in Northern Ireland—to begin with, at any rate—was always going to be a rigged-up, slightly rickety affair: something ad hoc and precariously in the balance, depending at once on great stealth and great boldness by individuals on both sides. There's something too foreclosed about calling it a 'process', as if all you had to do was to initiate certain movements or exchanges and the whole thing would work itself out in theory and in practice.

The fact that the Good Friday Agreement of 1998 resulted in a power-sharing executive that included both Unionists and Republicans—David Trimble and Gerry Adams—as well as constitutional nationalists must have been beyond anything foreseeable in your childhood.

Definitely. And the fact that the first executive bickered and faltered and fell was less important than the change it effected in the overall mindset. Loyalists were enraged to see Republicans holding ministries at Stormont; but, because of the long, slow, painful turn of events that had led to that eventuality, they lived with it and were very slightly changed by the experience—just as Republicans and nationalists were changed by being included, however reluctantly, in the affairs of the Northern Irish state. They became participants and created an Irish dimension in a political culture that was officially British. In the end, we arrived at a point where Sinn Féin and the DUP could, as they say, do business in the devolved assembly, which meant that Ian Paisley had to actually speak to Gerry Adams and Martin McGuinness, with unexpectedly good initial results. The population as a whole has allowed itself more hope and trust in the future, but the sectarian underlife is still there, of course.

At times of great hope or tragedy—the Ulster ceasefires, the Good Friday Agreement, the Nobel Peace Prizes for Hume and Trimble, the Omagh bombing—you have written newspaper commentaries. These were always prominently published (sometimes on the front page), so I presume they were commissioned by the editors. Did you welcome such commissions?

Short notice is the crucial factor on those occasions. You're giving an immediate response, at a moment when the adrenalin is running. I couldn't say I welcomed the commissions, but I do feel some obligation at moments like that. It's hard to find the right language, of course. You want a note of seriousness, but at the same time you don't just want orotundity. I think, however, that a poet does have a role and a responsibility. You're allowed, for example, to quote poetry—probably expected to quote it; in the wake of the Omagh bombing, I remember how grateful I was to invoke Wilfred Owen's line about 'the eternal reciprocity of tears'. At times like that, you realize Philip Larkin got it right when he said that 'someone will forever be surprising / A hunger in himself to be more serious'.

Questions

1. In this excerpt, Heaney talks about Irish politics in the late 1990s, a time of hopefulness that has since been realized. How does Heaney connect the great changes in relations between the Republic of Ireland and Northern Ireland to poetry—both his and others?
2. How does Heaney describe his response to being asked to write newspaper commentaries in times of "great hope or tragedy"?
3. Why do you think Heaney makes a distinction between hope and optimism (para. 4)? Explain your answer.

From Feeling into Words

SEAMUS HEANEY

Originally a lecture given at a meeting of the Royal Society of Literature in 1974, "Feeling into Words" was published in Preoccupations: Selected Prose, 1968–1978 (1980).

In practice, you proceed by your own experience of what it is to write what you consider a successful poem. You survive in your own esteem not by the corroboration of theory but by the trust in certain moments of satisfaction which you know intuitively to be moments of extension. You are confirmed by the visitation of the last poem and threatened by the elusiveness of the next one, and the best moments are those when your mind seems to implode and words and images rush of their own accord into the vortex. Which happened to me once when the line 'We have no prairies' drifted into my head at bedtime and loosened a fall of images that constitute the poem 'Bogland', the last one in Door into the Dark.

I had been vaguely wishing to write a poem about bogland, chiefly because it is a landscape that has a strange assuaging effect on me, one with associations reaching back into early childhood. We used to hear about bog-butter, butter kept fresh for a great number of years under the peat. Then when I was at school the skeleton of an elk had been taken out of a bog nearby and a few of our neighbours had got their photographs in the paper, peering out across its antlers. So I began to get an idea of bog as the memory of the landscape, or as a landscape that remembered everything that happened in and to it. In fact, if you go round the National Museum in Dublin, you will realize that a great proportion of the most cherished material heritage of Ireland was ‘found in a bog.’ Moreover, since memory was the faculty that supplied me with the first quickening of my own poetry, I had a tentative unrealized need to make a congruence between memory and bogland and, for the want of a better word, our national consciousness. And it all released itself after ‘We have no prairies . . .’—but we have bogs.

At that time I was teaching modern literature in Queen’s University, Belfast, and had been reading about the frontier and the West as an important myth in the American consciousness, so I set up—or rather, laid down—the bog as an answering Irish myth. I wrote it quickly the next morning, having slept on my excitement, and revised it on the hoof, from line to line, as it came:

We have no prairies
To slice a big sun at evening—
Everywhere the eye concedes to Encroaching horizon,

Is wooed into the cyclops’ eye
Of a tarn. Our unfenced country
Is bog that keeps crusting
Between the sights of the sun.

They’ve taken the skeleton
Of the Great Irish Elk
Out of the peat, set it up
An astounding crate full of air.

Butter sunk under
More than a hundred years
Was recovered salty and white.
The ground itself is kind, black butter

Melting and opening underfoot,
Missing its last definition
By millions of years.
They’ll never dig coal here,

Only the waterlogged trunks
Of great firs, soft as pulp.
Our pioneers keep striking
Inwards and downwards,

Every layer they strip
Seems camped on before.
The bogholes might be Atlantic seepage.
The wet centre is bottomless.

Again, as in the case of ‘Digging’, the seminal impulse had been unconscious. What generated the poem about memory was something lying beneath the very floor of memory, something I only connected with the poem months after it was written, namely a warning that older people would give us about going into the bog. They were afraid we might drown in pools in the old workings, so they put it about (and we believed them) that there was no bottom in the bog-holes. Little did they—or I—know that I would filch it for the last line of a book.

There was also in that book a poem called ‘Requiem for the Croppies’, written in 1966, when most poets in Ireland were straining to celebrate the anniversary of the 1916 Rising. That insurrection at Easter was the harvest of seeds sown in 1798, when revolutionary republican ideals and national feeling coalesced in the doctrines of Irish republicanism and in the rebellion of 1798 itself—unsuccessful and savagely put down. The poem was born of and ended with an image of resurrection based on the fact that sometime after the rebels were buried in common graves, the graves began to sprout with young barley, growing up from barley corn which the ‘croppies’ had carried in their pockets to eat while on the march. The oblique implication was that the seeds of violent resistance sown in the Year of Liberty had flowered in what Yeats called ‘the right rose tree’ of 1916. I did not realize at the time that the original heraldic murderous encounter between Protestant yeoman and Catholic rebel was to be initiated again in the summer of 1969, in Belfast, two months after the book was published.

From that moment the problems of poetry moved from being simply a matter of achieving the satisfactory verbal icon to being a search for images and symbols adequate to our predicament. I do not mean liberal lamentation that citizens should feel compelled to murder one another or deploy their different military arms over the matter of nomenclatures such as ‘British’ or ‘Irish’. I do not mean public celebrations of resistance or execrations of atrocity—although there is nothing necessarily unpoetic about such celebration, if one thinks of Yeats’s ‘Easter 1916’. I mean that I felt it imperative to discover a field of force in which, without abandoning fidelity to the processes and experience of poetry as I have outlined them, it would be possible to encompass the perspectives of a humane reason and at the same time to grant the religious intensity of the violence its deplorable authenticity and complexity. And when I say religious, I am not thinking simply of the sectarian division. To some extent, the enmity can be viewed as a struggle between the cults and devotees of a god and a goddess. There is an indigenous territorial numen, a tutelary of the whole island, call her Mother Ireland, Kathleen Ni Houlihan, the poor old woman, the Shan Van Vocht, whatever; and her sovereignty has been temporarily usurped or infringed by a new male cult whose founding fathers were Cromwell, William of Orange and Edward Carson, and whose godhead is incarnate in a rex or caesar resident in a palace in London. What we have is the tail-end of a struggle in a province between territorial piety and imperial power.

Now, I realize that this idiom is remote from the agnostic world of economic interest, whose iron hand operates in the velvet glove of ‘talks between elected representatives’, and remote from the political manoeuvres of power-sharing; but it is not remote from the psychology of the Irishmen and Ulstermen who do the killing, and not remote from the bankrupt psychology and mythologies implicit in the terms ‘Irish Catholic’ and ‘Ulster Protestant’. The question, as ever, is, ‘How with this rage shall beauty hold a plea?’ And my answer is, by offering ‘befitting emblems of adversity’.

Some of these emblems I found in a book that was published in English translation, appositely, the year the killing started, in 1969. And again appositely, it was entitled The Bog People. It was chiefly concerned with preserved bodies of men and women found in the bogs of Jutland, naked, strangled or with their throats cut, disposed under the peat since early Iron Age times. The author, P. V. Glob, argues convincingly that a number of these, and in particular the Tollund Man, whose head is now preserved near Aarhus in the museum at Silkeborg, were ritual sacrifices to the Mother Goddess, the goddess of the ground who needed new bridegrooms each winter to bed with her in her sacred place, in the bog, to ensure the renewal and fertility of the territory in the spring. Taken in relation to the tradition of Irish political martyrdom for that cause whose icon is Kathleen Ni Houlihan, this is more than an archaic barbarous rite: it is an archetypal pattern. And the unforgettable photographs of these victims blended in my mind with photographs of atrocities, past and present, in the long rites of Irish political and religious struggles. When I wrote this poem, I had a completely new sensation, one of fear. It was a vow to go on pilgrimage and I felt as it came to me—and again it came quickly—that unless I was deeply in earnest about what I was saying, I was simply invoking dangers for myself.

Questions

1. What is the formula Heaney uses for knowing he’s written a successful poem? How does he illustrate it?
2. What does Heaney say changed what he saw as poetry’s purpose? How does he illustrate that change? What are some of the things Heaney says do not serve the purpose of finding “images and symbols adequate to our predicament” (para. 5)?
3. How does Heaney extend the meaning of religious?

Crediting Poetry

SEAMUS HEANEY

“Crediting Poetry” is the lecture Heaney gave when he was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1995.

When I first encountered the name of the city of Stockholm, I little thought that I would ever visit it, never mind end up being welcomed to it as a guest of the Swedish Academy and the Nobel Foundation. At that particular time, such an outcome was not just beyond expectation: it was simply beyond conception. In the nineteen-forties, when I was the eldest child of an ever-growing family in rural county Derry, we crowded together in the three rooms of a traditional thatched farmstead and lived a kind of den-life which was more or less emotionally and intellectually proofed against the outside world. It was an intimate, physical, creaturely existence in which the night sounds of the horse in the stable beyond one bedroom wall mingled with the sounds of adult conversation from the kitchen beyond the other. We took in everything that was going on, of course—rain in the trees, mice on the ceiling, a steam train rumbling along the railway line one field back from the house—but we took it in as if we were in the doze of hibernation. Ahistorical, pre-sexual, in suspension between the archaic and the modern, we were as susceptible and impressionable as the drinking water that stood in a bucket in our scullery: every time a passing train made the earth shake, the surface of that water used to ripple delicately, concentrically, and in utter silence.

But it was not only the earth that shook for us: the air around and above us was alive and signalling also. When a wind stirred in the beeches, it also stirred an aerial wire attached to the topmost branch of the chestnut tree. Down it swept, in through a hole bored in the corner of the kitchen window, right on into the innards of our wireless set where a little pandemonium of burbles and squeaks would suddenly give way to the voice of a BBC newsreader speaking out of the unexpected like a deus ex machina. And that voice too we could hear in our bedroom, transmitting from beyond and behind the voices of the adults in the kitchen; just as we could often hear, behind and beyond every voice, the frantic, piercing signalling of Morse code.

We could pick up the names of neighbours being spoken in the local accents of our parents, and in the resonant English tones of the newsreader the names of bombers and of cities bombed, of war fronts and army divisions, the numbers of planes lost and of prisoners taken, of casualties suffered and advances made; and always, of course, we would pick up too those other, solemn and oddly bracing words, ‘the enemy’ and ‘the allies’. But even so, none of the news of these world-spasms entered me as terror. If there was something ominous in the newscaster’s tones, there was something torpid about our understanding of what was at stake; and if there was something culpable about such political ignorance in that time and place, there was something positive about the security I inhabited as a result of it.

The wartime, in other words, was pre-reflective time for me. Pre-literate too. Pre-historical in its way. Then as the years went on and my listening became more deliberate, I would climb up on an arm of our big sofa to get my ear closer to the wireless speaker. But it was still not the news that interested me; what I was after was the thrill of story, such as a detective serial about a British special agent called Dick Barton or perhaps a radio adaptation of one of Capt. W. E. Johns’s adventure tales about an RAF flying ace called Biggles. Now that the other children were older and there was so much going on in the kitchen, I had to get close to the actual radio set in order to concentrate my hearing, and in that intent proximity to the dial I grew familiar with the names of foreign stations, with Leipzig and Oslo and Stuttgart and Warsaw and, of course, with Stockholm.

I also got used to hearing short bursts of foreign languages as the dial hand swept round from BBC to Radio Eireann, from the intonations of London to those of Dublin, and even though I did not understand what was being said in those first encounters with the gutturals and sibilants of European speech, I had already begun a journey into the wideness of the world. This in turn became a journey into the wideness of language, a journey where each point of arrival—whether in one's poetry or one's life—turned out to be a stepping stone rather than a destination, and it is that journey which has brought me now to this honoured spot. And yet the platform here feels more like a space station than a stepping stone, so that is why, for once in my life, I am permitting myself the luxury of walking on air. 5

I credit poetry for making this space-walk possible. I credit it immediately because of a line I wrote fairly recently encouraging myself (and whoever else might be listening) to 'walk on air against your better judgement'. But I credit it ultimately because poetry can make an order as true to the impact of external reality and as sensitive to the inner laws of the poet's being as the ripples that rippled in and rippled out across the water in that scullery bucket fifty years ago. An order where we can at last grow up to that which we stored up as we grew. An order which satisfies all that is appetitive in the intelligence and prehensile in the affections. I credit poetry, in other words, both for being itself and for being a help, for making possible a fluid and restorative relationship between the mind's centre and its circumference, between the child gazing at the word 'Stockholm' on the face of the radio dial and the man facing the faces that he meets in Stockholm at this most privileged moment. I credit it because credit is due to it, in our time and in all time, for its truth to life, in every sense of that phrase.

To begin with, I wanted that truth to life to possess a concrete reality, and rejoiced most when the poem seemed most direct, an upfront representation of the world it stood in for or stood up for or stood its ground against. Even as a schoolboy, I loved John Keats's ode 'To Autumn' for being an ark of the covenant between language and sensation; as an adolescent, I loved Gerard Manley Hopkins for the intensity of his exclamations, which were also equations for a rapture and an ache I didn't fully know I knew until I read him; I loved Robert Frost for his farmer's accuracy and his wily down-to-earthness; and Chaucer too for much the same reasons. Later on I would find a different kind of accuracy, a moral down-to-earthness to which I responded deeply and always will, in the war poetry of Wilfred Owen, a poetry where a New Testament sensibility suffers and absorbs the shock of the new century's barbarism. Then later again, in the pure consequence of Elizabeth Bishop's style, in the sheer obduracy of Robert Lowell's and in the barefaced confrontation of Patrick Kavanagh's, I encountered further reasons for believing in poetry's ability—and responsibility—to say what happens, to 'pity the planet', to be 'not concerned with Poetry'.

This temperamental disposition towards an art that was earnest and devoted to things as they are was corroborated by the experience of having been born and brought up in Northern Ireland and of having lived with that place even though I have lived out of it for the past quarter of a century. No place in the world prides itself more on its vigilance and realism, no place considers itself more qualified to censure any flourish of rhetoric or extravagance of aspiration. So, partly as a result of having internalized these attitudes through growing up with them, I went for years half-avoiding and half-resisting the opulence and extensiveness of poets as different as Wallace Stevens and Rainer Maria Rilke; crediting insufficiently the crystalline inwardness of Emily Dickinson, all those forked lightnings and fissures of association; and missing the visionary strangeness of Eliot. And these more or less costive attitudes were fortified by a refusal to grant the poet any more licence than any other citizen; and they were further induced by having to conduct oneself as a poet in a situation of ongoing political violence and public expectation. A public expectation, it has to be said, not of poetry as such but of political positions variously approvable by mutually disapproving groups.

In such circumstances, the mind still longs to repose in what Samuel Johnson once called with superb confidence ‘the stability of truth’, even as it recognizes the destabilizing nature of its own operations and enquiries. Without needing to be theoretically instructed, consciousness quickly realizes that it is the site of variously contending discourses. The child in the bedroom listening simultaneously to the domestic idiom of his Irish home and the official idioms of the British broadcaster while picking up from behind both the signals of some other distress, that child was already being schooled for the complexities of his adult predicament, a future where he would have to adjudicate among promptings variously ethical, aesthetical, moral, political, metrical, sceptical, cultural, topical, typical, post-colonial and, taken all together, simply impossible. So it was that I found myself in the mid-nineteen-seventies in another small house, this time in County Wicklow south of Dublin, with a young family of my own and a slightly less imposing radio set, listening to the rain in the trees and to the news of bombings closer to home—not only those by the Provisional IRA in Belfast but equally atrocious assaults in Dublin by loyalist paramilitaries from the north. Feeling puny in my predicaments as I read about the tragic logic of Osip Mandelstam’s fate in the nineteen-thirties, feeling challenged yet steadfast in my non-combatant status when I heard, for example, that one particularly sweet-natured school friend had been interned without trial because he was suspected of having been involved in a political killing. What I was longing for was not quite stability but an active escape from the quicksand of relativism, a way of crediting poetry without anxiety or apology. In a poem called ‘Exposure’ I wrote then:

If I could come on meteorite!
Instead I walk through damp leaves,
Husks, the spent flukes of autumn,

Imagining a hero
On some muddy compound,

His gift like a slingstone
Whirled for the desperate.

How did I end up like this?
I often think of my friends'
Beautiful prismatic counselling
And the anvil brains of some who hate me

As I sit weighing and weighing
My responsible tristia.
For what? For the ear? For the people?
For what is said behind-backs?

Rain comes down through the alders,
Its low conducive voices
Mutter about let-downs and erosions
And yet each drop recalls

The diamond absolutes.
I am neither internee nor informer;
An inner émigré, grown long-haired
And thoughtful; a wood-kerne

Escaped from the massacre,
Taking protective colouring
From bole and bark, feeling
Every wind that blows;

Who, blowing up these sparks
For their meagre heat, have missed
The once-in-a-lifetime portent,
The comet's pulsing rose.

In one of the poems best known to students in my generation, a poem which could be said to have taken the nutrients of the symbolist movement and made them available in capsule form, the American poet Archibald MacLeish affirmed that 'A poem should be equal to / not true'. As a defiant statement of poetry's gift for telling truth but telling it slant, this is both cogent and corrective. Yet there are times when a deeper need enters, when we want the poem to be not only pleasurably right but compellingly wise, not only a surprising variation played upon the world, but a retuning of the world itself. We want the surprise to be transitive, like the impatient thump which unexpectedly restores the picture to the television set, or the electric shock which sets the fibrillating heart back to its proper rhythm. We want what the woman wanted in the prison queue in Leningrad, standing there blue with cold and whispering for fear, enduring the terror of Stalin's regime and asking the poet Anna Akhmatova if she could describe it all, if her art could be equal to it. And this is the want I too was experiencing in those far more protected circumstances in County

Wicklow when I wrote the lines I have just quoted, a need for poetry that would merit the definition of it I gave a few moments ago, as an order 'true to the impact of external reality and . . . sensitive to the inner laws of the poet's being'.

The external reality and inner dynamic of happenings in Northern Ireland between 1968 and 1974 were symptomatic of change, violent change admittedly, but change nevertheless, and for the minority living there, change had been long overdue. It should have come early, as the result of the ferment of protest on the streets in the late sixties, but that was not to be and the eggs of danger which were always incubating got hatched out very quickly. While the Christian moralist in oneself was impelled to deplore the atrocious nature of the IRA's campaign of bombings and killings, and the 'mere Irish' in oneself was appalled by the ruthlessness of the British Army on occasions like Bloody Sunday in Derry in 1972, the minority citizen in oneself, the one who had grown up conscious that his group was distrusted and discriminated against in all kinds of official and unofficial ways, this citizen's perception was at one with the poetic truth of the situation in recognizing that if life in Northern Ireland were ever really to flourish, change had to take place. But that citizen's perception was also at one with the truth in recognizing that the very brutality of the means by which the IRA were pursuing change was destructive of the trust upon which new possibilities would have to be based.

Nevertheless, until the British government caved in to the strong-arm tactics of the Ulster loyalist workers after the Sunningdale Conference in 1974, a well-disposed mind could still hope to make sense of the circumstances, to balance what was promising with what was destructive and do what W. B. Yeats had tried to do half a century before, namely, 'to hold in a single thought reality and justice'. After 1974, however, for the twenty long years between then and the ceasefires of August 1994, such a hope proved impossible. The violence from below was productive of nothing but a retaliatory violence from above, the dream of justice became subsumed into the callousness of reality, and people settled in to a quarter century of life-waste and spirit-waste, of hardening attitudes and narrowing possibilities that were the natural result of political solidarity, traumatic suffering and sheer emotional self-protectiveness.

One of the most harrowing moments in the whole history of the harrowing of the heart in Northern Ireland came when a minibus full of workers being driven home one January evening in 1976 was held up by armed and masked men and the occupants of the van ordered at gunpoint to line up at the side of the road. Then one of the masked executioners said to them, 'Any Catholics among you, step out here'. As it happened, this particular group, with one exception, were all Protestants, so the presumption must have been that the masked men were Protestant paramilitaries about to carry out a tit-for-tat sectarian killing of the Catholic as the odd man out, the one who would have been presumed to be in sympathy with the IRA and all its actions. It was a terrible moment for him, caught between dread and witness, but he did make a motion to step forward. Then, the story goes, in that split second of decision, and in the relative cover of the winter evening darkness, he felt the hand of the Protestant worker next to him take his hand and squeeze it in a signal that said no, don't move, we'll not betray you, nobody need know what faith or party you belong to. All in vain, however, for the man stepped out of the line; but instead of finding a gun at his temple, he was thrown backward and away as the gunmen opened fire on those remaining in the line, for these were not Protestant terrorists, but members, presumably, of the Provisional IRA.

It is difficult at times to repress the thought that history is about as instructive as an abattoir; that Tacitus was right and that peace is merely the desolation left behind after the decisive operations of merciless power. I remember, for example, shocking myself with a thought I had about that friend who was imprisoned in the seventies upon suspicion of having been involved with a political murder: I shocked myself by thinking that even if he were guilty, he might still perhaps be helping the future to be born, breaking the repressive forms and liberating new potential in the only way that worked, that is to say the violent way—which therefore became, by extension, the right way. It was like a moment of exposure to interstellar cold, a reminder of the scary element, both inner and outer, in which human beings must envisage and conduct their lives. But it was only a moment. The birth of the future we desire is surely in the contraction which that terrified Catholic felt on the roadside when another hand gripped his hand, not in the gunfire that followed, so absolute and so desolate, if also so much a part of the music of what happens.

As writers and readers, as sinners and citizens, our realism and our aesthetic sense make us wary of crediting the positive note. The very gunfire braces us and the atrocious confers a worth upon the effort which it calls forth to confront it. We are rightly in awe of the torsions in the poetry of Paul Celan and rightly enamoured of the suspiring voice in Samuel Beckett because these are evidence that art can rise to the occasion and somehow be the corollary of Celan's stricken destiny as Holocaust survivor and Beckett's demure heroism as a member of the French Resistance. Likewise, we are rightly suspicious of that which gives too much consolation in these circumstances; the very extremity of our late-twentieth-century knowledge puts much of our cultural heritage to an extreme test. Only the very stupid or the very deprived can any longer help knowing that the documents of civilization have been written in blood and tears, blood and tears no less real for being very remote. And when this intellectual predisposition coexists with the actualities of Ulster and Israel and Bosnia and Rwanda and a host of other wounded spots on the face of the earth, the inclination is not only not to credit human nature with much constructive potential but not to credit anything too positive in the work of art.

Which is why for years I was bowed to the desk like some monk bowed over his prie-dieu, some dutiful contemplative pivoting his understanding in an attempt to bear his portion of the weight of the world, knowing himself incapable of heroic virtue or redemptive effect, but constrained by his obedience to his rule to repeat the effort and the posture. Blowing up sparks for a meagre heat. Forgetting faith, straining towards good works. Attending insufficiently to the diamond absolutes, among which must be counted the sufficiency of that which is absolutely imagined. Then finally and happily, and not in obedience to the dolorous circumstances of my native place but in spite of them, I straightened up. I began a few years ago to try to make space in my reckoning and imagining for the marvellous as well as for the murderous. And once again I shall try to represent the import of that changed orientation with a story out of Ireland.

This is a story about another monk holding himself up valiantly in the posture of endurance. It is said that once upon a time St Kevin was kneeling with his arms stretched out in the form of a cross in Glendalough, a monastic site not too far from where we lived in County Wicklow, a place which to this day is one of the most wooded and watery retreats in the whole of the country. Anyhow, as Kevin knelt and prayed, a blackbird mistook his outstretched hand for some kind of roost and swooped down upon it, laid a clutch of eggs in it and proceeded to nest in it as if it were the branch of a tree. Then, overcome with pity and constrained by his faith to love the life in all creatures great and small, Kevin stayed immobile for hours and days and nights and weeks, holding out his hand until the eggs hatched and the fledglings grew wings, true to life if subversive of common sense, at the intersection of natural process and the glimpsed ideal, at one and the same time a signpost and a reminder. Manifesting that order of poetry which is true to all that is appetitive in the intelligence and prehensile in the affections. An order where we can at last grow up to that which we stored up as we grew.

St Kevin's story is, as I say, a story out of Ireland. But it strikes me that it could equally well come out of India or Africa or the Arctic or the Americas. By which I do not mean merely to consign it to a typology of folktales, or to dispute its value by questioning its culture-bound status within a multi-cultural context. On the contrary, its trustworthiness and its travel-worthiness have to do with its local setting. Indeed, the whole conception strikes me rather as being another example of the kind of work I saw a few weeks ago in the small museum in Sparta, on the morning before the news of this year's Nobel Prize in Literature was announced.

This was art which sprang from a cult very different from the faith espoused by St Kevin. Yet in it there was a representation of a roasted bird and an entranced beast and a self-enrapturing man, except that this time the man was Orpheus and the rapture came from music rather than prayer. The work itself was a small carved relief and I could not help making a sketch of it; but neither could I help copying out the information typed on the card which accompanied and identified the exhibit. The image moved me because of its antiquity and durability, but the description on the card moved me also because it gave a name and credence to that which I see myself as having been engaged upon for the past three decades: 'Votive panel,' the identification card said, 'possibly set up to Orpheus by local poet. Local work of the Hellenistic period.'

Once again, I hope I am not being sentimental or simply fetishizing—as we have learnt to say—the local. I wish instead to suggest that images and stories of the kind I am invoking here do function as bearers of value. The century has witnessed the defeat of Nazism by force of arms; but the erosion of the Soviet regimes was caused, among other things, by the sheer persistence, beneath the imposed ideological conformity, of cultural values and psychic resistances of a kind that these stories and images enshrine. Even if we have learned to be rightly and deeply fearful of elevating the cultural forms and conservatisms of any nation into normative and exclusivist systems, even if we have terrible proof that pride in an ethnic and religious heritage can quickly degrade into the fascistic, our vigilance on that score should not displace our love and trust in the good of the indigenous per se. On the contrary, a trust in the staying power and travel-worthiness of such good should encourage us to credit the possibility of a world where respect for the validity of every tradition will issue in the creation and maintenance of a salubrious political space. In spite of devastating and repeated acts of massacre, assassination and extirpation, the huge acts of faith which have marked the new relations between Palestinians and Israelis, Africans and Afrikaners, and the way in which walls have come down in Europe and iron curtains have opened, all this inspires a hope that new possibility can still open up in Ireland as well. The crux of that problem involves an ongoing partition of the island between British and Irish jurisdictions, and an equally persistent partition of the affections in Northern Ireland between the British and Irish heritages; but surely every dweller in the country must hope that the governments involved in its governance can devise institutions which will allow that partition to become a bit more like the net on a tennis court, a demarcation allowing for agile give-and-take, for encounter and contending, prefiguring a future where the vitality that flowed in the beginning from those bracing words ‘enemy’ and ‘allies’ might finally derive from a less binary and altogether less binding vocabulary.

When the poet W. B. Yeats stood on this platform more than seventy years ago, 20 Ireland was emerging from the throes of a traumatic civil war that had followed fast on the heels of a war of independence fought against the British. The struggle that ensued had been brief enough; it was over by May 1923, some seven months before Yeats sailed to Stockholm, but it was bloody, savage and intimate, and for generations to come it would dictate the terms of politics within the twenty-six independent counties of Ireland, that part of the island known first of all as the Irish Free State and then subsequently as the Republic of Ireland.

Yeats barely alluded to the civil war or the war of independence in his Nobel speech. Nobody understood better than he the connection between the construction or destruction of a political order and the founding or foundering of cultural life, but on this occasion he chose to talk instead about the Irish Dramatic Movement. His story was about the creative purpose of that movement and its historic good fortune in having not only his own genius to sponsor it, but also the genius of his friends John Millington Synge and Lady Augusta Gregory. He came to Sweden to tell the world that the local work of poets and dramatists had been as important to the transformation of his native place and times as the ambushes of guerrilla armies; and his boast in that elevated prose was essentially the same as the one he would make in verse more than a decade later in his poem ‘The Municipal Gallery Revisited’. There Yeats presents himself amongst the portraits and heroic narrative paintings which celebrate the events and personalities of recent history and all of a sudden realizes that something truly epochmaking has occurred:

“‘This is not’, I say, / ‘The dead Ireland of my youth, but an Ireland / The poets have imagined, terrible and gay’”. And the poem concludes with two of the most quoted lines of his entire oeuvre:

Think where man’s glory most begins and ends,
And say my glory was I had such friends.

And yet, expansive and thrilling as these lines are, they are an instance of poetry flourishing itself rather than proving itself, they are the poet’s lap of honour, and in this respect if in no other they resemble what I am doing in this lecture. In fact, I should quote here on my own behalf some other words from the poem: ‘You that would judge me, do not judge alone / This book or that’. Instead, I ask you to do what Yeats asked his audience to do and think of the achievement of Irish poets and dramatists and novelists over the past forty years, among whom I am proud to count great friends. In literary matters, Ezra Pound advised against accepting the opinion of those ‘who haven’t themselves produced notable work’, and it is advice I have been privileged to follow, since it is the good opinion of notable workers—and not just those in my own country—that has fortified my endeavour since I began to write in Belfast more than thirty years ago.

Yeats, however, was by no means all flourish. To the credit of poetry in our century there must surely be entered in any reckoning his two great sequences of poems entitled ‘Nineteen Hundred and Nineteen’ and ‘Meditations in Time of Civil War’, the latter of which contains the famous lyric about the bird’s nest at his window, where a starling or stare had built in a crevice of the old wall. The poet was living then in a Norman tower which had been very much a part of the military history of the country in earlier troubled times, and as his thoughts turned upon the irony of civilizations being consolidated by violent and powerful conquerors who end up commissioning the artists and the architects, he began to associate the sight of a mother bird feeding its young with the image of the honey-bee, an image deeply lodged in poetic tradition and always suggestive of the ideal of an industrious, harmonious, nurturing commonwealth:

The bees build in the crevices
Of loosening masonry, and there
The mother birds bring grubs and flies.
My wall is loosening; honey-bees,
Come build in the empty house of the stare.

We are closed in, and the key is turned
On our uncertainty; somewhere
A man is killed, or a house burned,
Yet no clear fact to be discerned:
Come build in the empty house of the stare.

A barricade of stone or of wood;
Some fourteen days of civil war;
Last night they trundled down the road

That dead young soldier in his blood:
Come build in the empty house of the stare.

We had fed the heart on fantasies,
The heart's grown brutal from the fare;
More substance in our enmities
Than in our love; O honey-bees,
Come build in the empty house of the stare.

I have heard this poem repeated often, in whole and in part, by people in Ireland over the past twenty-five years, and no wonder, for it is as tender-minded towards life itself as St Kevin was and as tough-minded about what happens in and to life as Homer. It knows that the massacre will happen again on the roadside, that the workers in the minibus are going to be lined up and shot down just after quitting time; but it also credits as a reality the squeeze of the hand, the actuality of sympathy and protectiveness between living creatures. It satisfies the contradictory needs which consciousness experiences at times of extreme crisis, the need on the one hand for a truth-telling that will be hard and retributive, and on the other hand the need not to harden the mind to a point where it denies its own yearnings for sweetness and trust. It is a proof that poetry can be equal to and true at the same time, an example of that completely adequate poetry which the Russian woman sought from Anna Akhmatova and which William Wordsworth produced at a corresponding moment of historical crisis and personal dismay almost exactly two hundred years ago.

When the bard Demodocus sings of the fall of Troy and of the slaughter that accompanied it, Odysseus weeps and Homer says that his tears were like the tears of a wife on a battlefield weeping for the death of a fallen husband. His epic simile continues:

At the sight of the man panting and dying there,
she slips down to enfold him, crying out;
then feels the spears, prodding her back and shoulders,
and goes bound into slavery and grief.
Piteous weeping wears away her cheeks:
but no more piteous than Odysseus' tears,
cloaked as they were, now, from the company.

Even today, three thousand years later, as we channel-surf over so much live coverage of contemporary savagery, highly informed but nevertheless in danger of growing immune, familiar to the point of overfamiliarity with old newsreels of the concentration camp and the gulag, Homer's image can still bring us to our senses. The callousness of those spear-shafts on the woman's back and shoulders survives time and translation. The image has that documentary adequacy which answers all that we know about the intolerable.

But there is another kind of adequacy which is specific to lyric poetry. This has to do with the 'temple inside our hearing' which the passage of the poem calls into being. It is an adequacy deriving from what Mandelstam called 'the steadfastness of speech articulation, from the resolution and independence which the entirely realized poem sponsors. It has as much to do with the energy released by linguistic fission and fusion, with the buoyancy generated by cadence and tone and rhyme and stanza, as it has to do with the poem's concerns or the poet's truthfulness. In fact, in lyric poetry, truthfulness becomes recognizable as a ring of truth within the medium itself. And it is the unappeasable pursuit of this note, a note tuned to its most extreme in Emily Dickinson and Paul Celan and orchestrated to its most opulent in John Keats, it is this which keeps the poet's ear straining to hear the totally persuasive voice behind all the other informing voices.

Which is a way of saying that I have never quite climbed down from the arm of that sofa. I may have grown more attentive to the news and more alive to the world history and world-sorrow behind it. But the thing uttered by the speaker I strain towards is still not quite the story of what is going on; it is more reflexive than that, because as a poet I am in fact straining towards a strain, in the sense that the effort is to repose in the stability conferred by a musically satisfying order of sounds. As if the ripple at its widest desired to be verified by a reformation of itself, to be drawn in and drawn out through its point of origin.

I also strain towards this in the poetry I read. And I find it, for example, in the repetition of that refrain of Yeats's, 'Come build in the empty house of the stare', with its tone of supplication, its pivots of strength in the words 'build' and 'house' and its acknowledgement of dissolution in the word 'empty'. I find it also in the triangle of forces held in equilibrium by the triple rhyme of 'fantasies' and 'enmities' and 'honeybees', and in the sheer in-placeness of the whole poem as a given form within the language. Poetic form is both the ship and the anchor. It is at once a buoyancy and a holding, allowing for the simultaneous gratification of whatever is centrifugal and centripetal in mind and body. And it is by such means that Yeats's work does what the necessary poetry always does, which is to touch the base of our sympathetic nature while taking in at the same time the unsympathetic reality of the world to which that nature is constantly exposed. The form of the poem, in other words, is crucial to poetry's power to do the thing which always is and always will be to poetry's credit: the power to persuade that vulnerable part of our consciousness of its rightness in spite of the evidence of wrongness all around it, the power to remind us that we are hunters and gatherers of values, that our very solitudes and distresses are creditable, in so far as they, too, are an earnest of our veritable human being.

Questions

1. How does Heaney credit the radio that his family listened to as an influence on his work? What point does he make at the end of the speech when he comes back to the radio?
2. In paragraph 7, Heaney talks about his favorite poets, including poets whose work he came to like better as he grew older. How does Heaney connect the work of his favorite poets to the development of his political views and his own work?

3. What examples does Heaney give to illustrate his realization that “consciousness quickly realizes that it is the site of variously contending discourses” (para. 9)?
4. Heaney provides examples in the form of anecdotes, a folktale, his own poetry, and the poetry of others. How do each of these examples contribute to his argument that poetry should be “true to the impact of external reality and . . . sensitive to the inner laws of the poet’s being” (para. 6)?
5. Why do you think this lecture is titled “Crediting Poetry”? What does Heaney claim poetry can do for individuals? for nations? for humanity?

Digging

SEAMUS HEANEY

Between my finger and my thumb
The squat pen rests; snug as a gun.

Under my window, a clean rasping sound
When the spade sinks into gravelly ground:
My father, digging. I look down

5

Till his straining rump among the flowerbeds
Bends low, comes up twenty years away
Stooping in rhythm through potato drills<sup>1</sup>
Where he was digging.

The coarse boot nestled on the lug, the shaft
Against the inside knee was levered firmly.
He rooted out tall tops, buried the bright edge deep
To scatter new potatoes that we picked
Loving their cool hardness in our hands.

10

By god, the old man could handle a spade.
Just like his old man.

15

My grandfather cut more turf in a day
Than any other man on Toner’s bog.
Once I carried him milk in a bottle
Corked sloppily with paper. He straightened up
To drink it, then fell to right away
Nicking and slicing neatly, heaving sods
Over his shoulder, going down and down
For the good turf. Digging.

<sup>1</sup>Furrows in the soil for sowing seeds. — EDS.

The cold smell of potato mould, the squelch and slap      25
Of soggy peat, the curt cuts of an edge
Through living roots awaken in my head.
But I've no spade to follow men like them.

Between my finger and my thumb
The squat pen rests.      30
I'll dig with it.

Questions

1. It is likely that Heaney is the poem's speaker. How is he both different from and similar to his father and grandfather?
2. "Digging" is one of Heaney's first published poems. What themes does he address in it?
3. In an interview with Dennis O'Driscoll in Stepping Stones, Heaney said of "Digging": "I wasn't discommoded by English critics gabbling on about the out-of-dateness of bulls and bogs, but I was caught on the hop when I found those images being read as some kind of endorsement of the Northern status quo." How could "Digging" be read (or misread) as an "endorsement of the Northern status quo"? Why might Heaney dislike this interpretation?

Requiem for the Croppies

SEAMUS HEANEY

The pockets of our great coats full of barley—
No kitchens on the run, no striking camp—
We moved quick and sudden in our own country.
The priest lay behind ditches with the tramp.
A people, hardly marching—on the hike—      5
We found new tactics happening each day:
We'd cut through reins and rider with the pike
And stampede cattle into infantry,
Then retreat through hedges where cavalry must be thrown.
Until, on Vinegar Hill, the fatal conclave.      10
Terraced thousands died, shaking scythes at cannon.
The hillside blushed, soaked in our broken wave.
They buried us without shroud or coffin
And in August the barley grew up out of the grave.

Questions

1. This is one of several poems Heaney wrote about the bog people, nearly intact bodies of men and women from as early as 260 B.C.E. found in Northern Ireland and Denmark by peat cutters. Heaney was inspired by P. V. Glob's book The Bog People: Iron-Age Man Preserved, a study of the exhumed bog people. How does

- Heaney honor the body of the Tollund Man and at the same time use it to represent and symbolize northern Europe's bloody history?
2. What is the effect of Heaney's turn from a description of the Tollund Man to what are likely examples of violence from his own time in Northern Ireland?
  3. Why do you think Heaney ends the poem by saying he "will feel lost, / Unhappy and at home"?

Tollund

SEAMUS HEANEY

That Sunday morning we had travelled far.
We stood a long time out in Tollund Moss:
The low ground, the swart water, the thick grass
Hallucinatory and familiar.

A path through Jutland fields. Light traffic sound. 5
Willow bushes; rushes; bog-fir grags
In a swept and gated farmyard; dormant quags.
And silage under wraps in its silent mound.

It could have been a still out of the bright
'Townland of Peace', that poem of dream farms 10
Outside all contention. The scarecrow's arms
Stood open opposite the satellite

Dish in the paddock, where a standing stone
Had been resituated and landscaped,
With tourist signs in futhark runic script 15
In Danish and in English. Things had moved on.

It could have been Mullhollandstown or Scribe.
The by-roads had their names on them in black
And white; it was user-friendly outback
Where we stood footloose, at home beyond the tribe, 20

More scouts than strangers, ghosts who'd walked abroad
Unfazed by light, to make a new beginning
And make a go of it, alive and sinning,
Ourselves again, free-willed again, not bad.

Questions

1. The third and fourth stanzas contain disparate images: a scarecrow's arms and a satellite dish, tourist signs and runic script. What is the effect of these juxtapositions?

2. “Townland of Peace” (l. 10) is a reference to a poem by Northern Irish poet John Hewitt, which contains these lines: “not to lose again / the line and compass so my head and heart / no longer plunge and tug to drag apart.” How does that line connect to the concerns Heaney has in the poems collected here—especially “Tollund”?
3. “Tollund” is a “post-IRA-ceasefire poem,” which Heaney describes in the interview from Stepping Stones (p. 1128) as expressing “hope rather than optimism.” What do you find hopeful in the poem?
4. How do the themes of “Digging” find their way into the bog poems (“Bogland,” “Tollund Man,” and “Tollund”)?
5. How do the ideas in the bog poems connect to the last line of “Requiem for the Croppies”?

A Call

SEAMUS HEANEY

‘Hold on,’ she said, ‘I’ll just run out and get him.
The weather here’s so good, he took the chance
To do a bit of weeding.’

So I saw him
Down on his hands and knees beside the leek rig,
Touching, inspecting, separating one 5
Stalk from the other, gently pulling up
Everything not tapered, frail and leafless,
Pleased to feel each little weed-root break,
But rueful also . . .

Then found myself listening to
The amplified grave ticking of hall clocks 10
Where the phone lay unattended in a calm
Of mirror glass and sunstruck pendulums . . .

And found myself then thinking: if it were nowadays,
This is how Death would summon Everyman.

Next thing he spoke and I nearly said I loved him. 15

[1996]

Questions

1. Who is the speaker? Who do you think he or she is calling?
2. What do you think Heaney means by the phrase “if it were nowadays” (l. 13)?
3. In this poem, perhaps more than the others collected here, there is evidence of what the Irish writer John Banville called Heaney’s “unapologetic stance” in which he “insists on affirming the enduring decencies, what Wordsworth calls ‘the little nameless unremembered acts / Of kindness and of love.” While its subject is intimate, what bigger issues does “A Call” also address?

Postscript

SEAMUS HEANEY

And some time make the time to drive out west
Into County Clare, along the Flaggy Shore,
In September or October, when the wind
And the light are working off each other
So that the ocean on one side is wild 5
With foam and glitter, and inland among stones
The surface of a slate-grey lake is lit
By the earthed lightning of a flock of swans,
Their feathers roughed and ruffling, white on white,
Their fully grown headstrong-looking heads 10
Tucked or cresting or busy underwater.
Useless to think you'll park and capture it
More thoroughly. You are neither here nor there,
A hurry through which known and strange things pass
As big soft buffetings come at the car sideways 15
And catch the heart off guard and blow it open.

Questions

1. In “This Is Not a Spade: The Poetry of Seamus Heaney,” Ola Larsmo writes:

Heaney creates a way in which you learn to see the actual world around you, in a new light. But “seeing” in the Heaney sense can mean two things, two concepts which we find in the centre of modernist poetry; ‘epiphany’ and ‘correspondence’.

It is quite simple: ‘epiphany’ is here . . . the moment where you experience a sudden insight into the meaning of things seemingly trivial. . . .

‘Correspondence’, on the other hand, is when you realise previously invisible connections between things, connections perhaps only made possible through the special kind of language we call poetry.

How does “Postscript” contain both “epiphany” and “correspondence”?

2. What do you think Heaney means by the “known and strange things” (l. 14)?
3. How do you see “Postscript” as part of a progression in the works you have studied in this Conversation? How does “Postscript” accomplish what Heaney called in his Nobel Prize speech his goal to “make space in [his] reckoning and imagining for the marvellous as well as for the murderous” (para. 15)?

1. Write an essay in which you compare and contrast the poems in the Conversation in terms of how they reflect Heaney's view of the responsibility of the artist.
2. Heaney often refers to this question from Shakespeare's Sonnet 65: "How with this rage shall beauty hold a plea" (l. 3). Read the entire sonnet.

Does Shakespeare answer the question? Do you think Heaney answers it in the works in this Conversation? Discuss your answers to both questions.

3. Do you believe Heaney comes to a conclusion about how artists can balance their sense of beauty with their responsibility for social action? If so, write an essay in which you agree or disagree with his conclusion. If not, write an essay in which you come to your own conclusion.
4. Using the close reading techniques you have studied, analyze three or more of the poems in this Conversation. Choose the poems thematically, or just pick the ones you like best. Write an essay in which you compare and contrast the techniques Heaney uses.
5. Research the bog people, and prepare a presentation in which you use visuals—along with Heaney’s poetry—to show what New York Times critic Michiko Kakutani called Heaney’s “literary power to unearth from the Irish their gloriously gruesome relics of innocent death and sudden violence and the transcendent nurturing of present upon past that is revealed in the ancient murk of the boglands of Ireland and Jutland.”

Close Reading Poetry

The first draft of this student essay was written as a timed response to the following prompt. The final draft was revised outside of class.

Read the following poem carefully. Then write a well-organized essay in which you analyze how the use of language reveals the speaker's attitude toward his subject.

"My Last Duchess,"

Ferrara

That's my last Duchess painted on the wall,
Creepy! Looking as if she were alive. I call
That piece a wonder, now: Frà Pandolf's hands
Worked busily a day, and there she stands.
Will't please you sit and look at her? I said
"Frà Pandolf" by design, for never read
Strangers like you that pictured countenance, sentimental picture—no negativity The depth and passion of its earnest glance,
But to myself they turned (since none puts by
The curtain I have drawn for you, but I)
And seemed as they would ask me, if they durst,
How such a glance came there; so, not the first
Are you to turn and ask thus. Sir, 'twas not
Her husband's presence only, called that spot
Of joy into the Duchess' cheek: perhaps
Frà Pandolf chanced to say "Her mantle laps
Over my lady's wrist too much," or "Paint
Must never hope to reproduce the faint
Half-flush that dies along her throat": such stuff
Was courtesy, she thought, and cause enough
For calling up that spot of joy. She had
A heart—how shall I say?—too soon made glad,
Too easily impressed; she liked whate'er
list She looked on, and her looks went everywhere.

He ♥ed her but
w/resentment
she's dead but he sort of misses her.

Sir, 'twas all one! My favor at her breast, 25
 The dropping of the daylight in the West,
 The bough of cherries some officious fool
 Broke in the orchard for her, the white mule
 She rode with round the terrace—All and each
 Would draw from her alike the approving speech, 30
 Or blush, at least. She thanked men,—good! but thanked Somehow—I know not how—As if she ranked
 My gift of a nine-hundred-years-old name
 With anybody's gift. Who'd stoop to blame
 This sort of trifling? Even had you skill 35
 In speech—which I have not—to make your will Quite clear to such an one, and say, "Just this
 Or that in you disgusts me; here you miss,
 Or there exceed the mark"—And if she let
 Herself be lessoned so, nor plainly set 40
 Her wits to yours, forsooth, and made excuse,
 —E'en then would be some stooping; and I choose
 Never to stoop. Oh sir, she smiled, no doubt,
 Whene'er I passed her; but who passed without Much the same smile? This grew; I gave commands; 45
 Then all smiles stopped together. There she stands
 As if alive. Will't please you rise? We'll meet
 The company below, then. I repeat,
 The Count your master's known munificence
 Is ample warrant that no just pretense
 Of mine for dowry will be disallowed;
 Though his fair daughter's self, as I avowed
 At starting, is my object. Nay, we'll go
 Together down, sir. Notice Neptune, though, 50
 Taming a sea-horse, thought a rarity,
 Which Claus of Innsbruck cast in bronze for me! 55

First Draft

Robert Browning is a well renowned and intriguing famous poet; he often wrote about love, and in his poem "My Last Dutch Duchess," though he does the same, there is some added resentment felt throughout this piece. As he the speaker discusses a painting of a woman in his house, the memories of her come back to him. Although most of these memories are happy joyous and happy, we as readers see the love and resentment of the speaker's late Duchess as expressed through his language.

That the speaker loved this woman in the painting is undeniable, as seen in his language. To describe her, he uses words like "wonder," "passion," and "joy." As he looks at the painting of her, he says it looks "as if she were alive." By saying this, the speaker is reminiscing about the time they spent together that makes his memory of her even more real and alive. He also asks the question whether or not his audience will look at her. In doing this, he wants them to share her beauty with him, another sign of his love for her. Finally, before she dies, the speaker talks of her smile, something indicative of love and of his recognition of her beauty.

Although this poem is filled with the speaker's loving memory of the woman in the painting, there are definite hues of resentment and dissatisfaction with the woman as well. The first hint of this is in line 22, when he begins to say that although this woman has heart, she has negative qualities, such as being too easily amused and too easily impressed, that make him unhappy with her. The specific employment of the word "too" infers the quality in her is overwhelming and ultimately negative. Later, he mentions that other men liked her, and this clearly made him jealous and angry as seen by his use of the words "fool" and "mule," both words of negative connotation. He also uses the word "anybody" to illustrate that he felt was bitter when she ~~didn't~~ acted as if his expensive 900 year old gift meant nothing. Finally, the verb "stoop," which is used three times in the last section of the poem, is used, and this word is rather negative in its meaning.

Because it is apparent that the speaker has an exaggerated sense of himself, it is questionable that he is the one who made sure her "smiles stopped together." Although this is debatable, it is definite that through Browning's choice of words and diction, it is clear that the speaker loved the woman in the painting while resenting her at the same time. Often in love, this mixture occurs so this poem is easy to relate to. Browning is a classic contributor to literature and poetry, and his poem "My Last Dutchess Duchess" is no exception.

Browning poem essay

Robert Browning is a very famous poet who often wrote about love. However, in this poem, "My Last Duchess," although love is definitely expressed, Browning illustrates other feelings, such as anger and resentment. The speaker in this poem is giving a tour of his house to someone with whom he is arranging his daughter's marriage. In this dramatic monologue, he is showing this man a picture of his last duchess, and the memories of her are flooding back into his mind. As he begins to talk about this woman and her impact on his life, he shows the mixed feelings of love and anger that he had toward her, as expressed through his intricate language.

That the speaker loved this woman in the painting is undeniable. First, he hides the painting behind a curtain so that she solely belongs to him. To describe her, he uses words such as “wonder” (l. 3), “passion” (l. 8), and “joy” (l. 15). This word choice on Browning’s part shows specific selection of words that convey the speaker’s love. The speaker also says he sees her “as if she were alive” (l. 2). In doing so, he is remembering her life and almost celebrating the time they shared together. In line 5, the speaker asks the other man a rhetorical question that invites him to glance at the painting, inviting him to share the beauty of it, another sign of the speaker’s love. In the first section of the poem, the speaker’s tone is rather sentimental and nostalgic, which shows his reverence for his last duchess and the love they once shared. Finally, before she dies (l. 43), the speaker talks about her smile, something definitely indicative of love and of his recognition of her beauty.

Although this poem is filled with the speaker’s memory of the woman in the painting, there are definite hues of resentment and dissatisfaction bleeding across it. The first hint of this is in lines 22 and 23, when Browning carefully employs the repetition of the word “too” to describe her personality. The speaker says that although this woman had heart, she had negative qualities that bothered him, such as being “too” easily amused and “too” easily impressed. This sentence also hints at the first we see of the speaker’s obsession with keeping his duchess in line. A few lines later, around 28, the speaker starts talking about how other men liked her, which made him very jealous and angry, as seen by the negative connotation of the words “fool” and “mule” (ll. 27, 28). As the speaker continues to talk about these bad memories he has of her, he gets flustered and angry, which is seen not only in his words but also in the syntax. Compared to the flowing and accessible syntax in the first part of the poem, as the speaker gets angry, the sentences become extremely choppy, full of dashes, and almost incoherent. Toward the end of the poem, Browning uses euphemistic short sentences to show the speaker’s final actions toward his last duchess (ll. 45–46). Then, with alliteration and passive voice, it is revealed that he, in fact, did kill her: “then all smiles stopped together” (line 46).

Because it is apparent that the speaker has an exaggerated sense of himself, it is not surprising that he kills his last duchess in order to ease his paranoia that she is out of line by “thanking” other men and being “too soon made glad.” Although he does kill her, it is made clear by his specific language that he did, at least at one point, love her and care about her, too. This poem is made even more profound by the fact that it speaks universally about love: although it can be heartwarming and exciting, it can also be vindictive and jealousy ridden.

Questions

1. What are the main differences you find between the first and final drafts? Consider the overall organization as well as her analysis.
2. Paragraph 2 begins with the same topic sentence in both the first and the final draft, suggesting a very similar intent in both. But how has Stephanie used evidence differently to make the paragraph in the final draft more persuasive?
3. What in the final draft suggests to you that Stephanie either reread or discussed the poem before she revised the actual essay?
4. In what ways has Stephanie's writing style become more polished in the final draft? Consider word choice, sentence structure, and variety as well as accuracy of grammar and mechanics.
5. Although we have labeled the second example a "final" draft, we know that our writing can always be improved. What would you suggest Stephanie do to make this essay even better?

The Writer's Craft—Close Reading

Figurative Language

As you learned in Chapter 2, figurative language refers to any language that goes beyond the literal, such as metaphors, similes, and personification. These techniques don't exist for the sake of a treasure hunt; they exist because they help writers say what they want to say in a way that is vivid and forceful. They provide meaning beyond the denotation of the words, they elicit emotional responses, they add another level of meaning or nuance, and they bring descriptions to life. Figurative language should not simply be added as decoration or ornamentation to create a more elaborate style. In the best writing, figurative language works subtly to express an idea while opening the work up to interpretation.

Many writers and critics use the term metaphor to refer to figurative language in general, as Robert Frost does in his essay "Education by Poetry." He says, "unless you are at home in the metaphor . . . you are not safe anywhere. Because you are not at ease with figurative values: you don't know the metaphor in its strength and its weakness." Frost is pointing out that figurative language deeply influences the way we think and view the world by highlighting relationships among different objects, actions, and ideas.

Sometimes we use figurative language in everyday speech or in our own persuasive writing to appeal to a shared understanding between audience and author. For instance, sports metaphors call on common values; therefore, most of us know what someone means when proclaiming, "We're in a marathon, not a sprint." A writer signals that he believes his life is more than half over when he entitles his memoir The Fifth Inning, as did poet E. Ethelbert Miller; and we all know that things are going well when someone declares, "We've got them on the ropes!" These metaphors make sense to us even if we don't know very much about track, baseball, or boxing.

Figurative language is playful, but like a good joke, it takes finesse, and in the hands of a careless writer, it can be pretty dreadful. Web sites abound with metaphors that have gone awry. One site featuring bad lines from mystery novels includes, “Her parting words lingered heavily inside me like last night’s Taco Bell” and “The killer was a misplaced comma in the jaunty, happy sentence that made up the party crowd.” Another site devoted to metaphors from romance novels offers us, “Claire felt swept away by this dark stranger, a helpless dust bunny in the roaring cacophony of his gas-powered leaf blower.” Sometimes people just get carried away and mix their metaphors, as did one media figure, who declared, “I knew enough to realize that the alligators were in the swamp and that it was time to circle the wagons.”

But who’s to say that these are “bad” or “ineffective,” while others are original, elegant, and insightful? Sometime it is a matter of taste, time period, or occasion. The more you read and analyze literature, the more astute you will become about what works and what does not, though different interpretations are one of the pleasures of literature. In her book Illness as Metaphor, Susan Sontag points out the military metaphors we use to describe cancer: cancer cells are “invasive,” and the body’s “defenses” must be summoned to “defeat” the “enemy.” While she argues that such language “contributes to the excommunicating and stigmatizing of the ill,” others might find the metaphors effective because they suggest a battle leading toward victory—and health.

Remember that identifying and naming examples of figurative language is only a small part of analysis; it is their effect on meaning that is important. In “Hopper’s ‘Nighthawks’ (1942)” by Ira Sadoff, the similes add to the development of the sad and reflective tone of the poem:

When the buses arrive at sunrise they are empty as hospital beds—
the hum of the motor is distant as a voice coming from within the body.

These images evoke feelings similar to those of the painting’s lonely scene and Sadoff’s interpretation of it.

In T. S. Eliot’s “The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock,” the speaker invites the reader:

Let us go then, you and I,
When the evening is spread out against the sky
Like a patient etherized upon a table;

The simile suggests that the night is quiet, nearly dead; however, the reader can’t help but associate the narrator with the numbed state of a patient who has been anesthetized and is about to undergo surgery.

James Baldwin uses an extended metaphor in “Sonny’s Blues” to give his character depth and nuance:

I was scared, scared for Sonny. . . . A great block of ice got settled in my belly and kept melting there slowly all day long, while I taught my classes algebra. It was a special kind of ice. It kept melting, sending trickles of ice water all up and down my veins, but it never got less. Sometimes it hardened and seemed to expand until I felt my guts were going to come spilling out or that I was going to choke or scream. This would always be at a moment when I was remembering some specific thing Sonny had once said or done.

The block of ice is a metaphor for the fear and anxiety the narrator has for his brother, Sonny, but it also hints that, at least at the story's beginning, the narrator is emotionally cold, and has hardened his heart toward his brother. How that block of ice eventually melts and evaporates is very much a theme of the story.

The following exercises will help you begin to analyze figurative language and understand its effects on meaning and clarity. Remember, it is not enough to simply recognize a technique; the effective close reader should understand how that technique creates layers of meaning and provokes an emotional reaction.

• EXERCISE 1 •

In each of the following sentences or excerpts, choose the simile or metaphor that you think is the most meaningful and explain why. Then explain why you think the author used the simile or metaphor he or she did.

1. This was another musician, and a friend of Sonny's, a coal-black, cheerful-looking man, built close to the ground. He immediately began confiding to me, at the top of his lungs, the most terrible things about Sonny, his teeth gleaming like (the morning sun on a snowbank, a lighthouse, a brand-new Cadillac) and his laugh coming up out of him like (a roll of thunder, the beginning of an earthquake, an awkward topic). ("Sonny's Blues")
2. Yet, it was clear that, for them, I was only Sonny's brother. Here, I was in Sonny's world. Or, rather: his (world, kingdom, empire). ("Sonny's Blues")
3. You rise, you dawn
roll-sleeved Aphrodites,
out of a camisole brine,
a linen pit of stitches,
silking the fitted sheets
away from you like (fluttering leaves, waves, butterflies in flight). ("Degas's Laundresses")
4. I remember what a kindly wink the knobs of our big old bureau used to have, and there was one chair that always seemed like (a safe haven, a port in a storm, a strong friend). ("The Yellow Wallpaper")
5. The glamour / Of childish days is upon me, my manhood is cast / Down in the (torrent, flood, storm) of remembrance, I weep like a (babe, child, waif) for the past. ("Piano")

• EXERCISE 2 •

Identify the figurative language in the following selections, and then label each as metaphor, simile, personification, apostrophe, metonymy, and so on. Work in pairs or groups to discuss their effects on the meaning of the passage and the ways in which they evoke a response from the reader.

1. These boys, now, were living as we'd been living then, they were growing up with a rush and their heads bumped abruptly against the low ceiling of their actual possibilities. ("Sonny's Blues")
2. We dug in. We ate everything there was to eat on the table. We ate like there was no tomorrow. We didn't talk. We ate. We scarfed. We grazed that table. We were into serious eating. ("Cathedral")
3. Heard melodies are sweet, but those unheard / Are sweeter; therefore, ye soft pipes, play on. ("Ode on a Grecian Urn")
4. Her voice was like the sound of blended flutes / Blown by black players upon a picnic day. ("The Harlem Dancer")
5. England hath need of thee: she is a fen / Of stagnant waters: altar, sword, and pen, / Fireside, the heroic wealth of hall and bower. ("London, 1802")
6. It is dull enough to confuse the eye in following, pronounced enough constantly to irritate and provoke study, and when you follow the lame uncertain curves for a little distance they suddenly commit suicide—plunge off at outrageous angles, destroy themselves in unheard of contradictions. ("The Yellow Wallpaper")

• EXERCISE 3 •

Following is a passage from "The Yellow Wallpaper" (p. 1066). Identify the figurative language and discuss its effect. Focus on why it adds nuance and complexity to the passage rather than simply ornamentation.

The color is hideous enough, and unreliable enough, and infuriating enough, but the pattern is torturing.

You think you have mastered it, but just as you get well underway in following, it turns a back-somersault and there you are. It slaps you in the face, knocks you down, and tramples upon you. It is like a bad dream.

The outside pattern is a florid arabesque, reminding one of a fungus. If you can imagine a toadstool in joints, an interminable string of toadstools, budding and sprouting in endless convolutions—why, that is something like it.

• EXERCISE 4 •

Rewrite the following passage from “Sonny’s Blues” (p. 1041) by eliminating the figurative language and making the description as literal as you can. Discuss the effect of your revision.

But as I began to watch Creole, I realized that it was Creole who held them all back. He had them on a short rein. Up there, keeping the beat with his whole body, wailing on the fiddle, with his eyes half closed, he was listening to everything, but he was listening to Sonny. He was having a dialogue with Sonny. He wanted Sonny to leave the shoreline and strike out for the deep water. He was Sonny’s witness that deep water and drowning were not the same thing—he had been there, and he knew. And he wanted Sonny to know. He was waiting for Sonny to do the things on the keys which would let Creole know that Sonny was in the water.

• EXERCISE 5 •

Don DeLillo’s “Videotape” (p. 1090) is notable for its spare tone and minimal figurative language. Rewrite the following passage by adding carefully selected figurative language, and explain the choices you have made. How do your additions change the meaning of the passage? the story? Why do you think DeLillo chose to avoid figurative language?

He is hit soon after. If you’ve seen the tape many times you know from the hand wave exactly when he will be hit. It is something, naturally, that you wait for. You say to your wife, if you’re at home and she is there, Now here is where he gets it. You say, Janet, hurry up, this is where it happens.

Now here is where he gets it. You see him jolted, sort of wire-shocked—then he seizes up and falls toward the door or maybe leans or slides into the door is the proper way to put it. It is awful and unremarkable at the same time. The car stays in the slow lane. It approaches briefly, then falls back.

• EXERCISE 6 •

Both Claude McKay’s “The Harlem Dancer” (p. 1106) and Eavan Boland’s “Degas’s Laundresses” (p. 1122) describe women doing work that could be considered demeaning. Working in a group or with a partner, reread the poems. Discuss how each uses figurative language to show both sides of the story—the difficulty of the work and the dignity of the people doing it.

• EXERCISE 7 •

William Wordsworth's "London, 1802" (p. 1099) describes the decline of England by comparing it to a "fen / Of stagnant waters." Create a metaphor for your hometown, your state, or even the country that communicates your feelings about its present condition.

Suggestions for Writing

Art and the Artist

1. This chapter begins with a quote from novelist E. M. Forster. Using the pieces in this chapter to support your position, write an essay in which you agree or disagree with Forster's assertion that art provides the most important evidence of human dignity.
2. Write an essay on whether or not you believe artists—painters, musicians, poets, novelists—have a responsibility to society. If so, what is their responsibility?
3. Choose one of the following statements, and write an essay in which you explain why it expresses a belief about art that is similar to yours. Use works you read in this chapter as support.

"Art is the desire of a man to express himself, to record the reactions of his personality to the world he lives in."—Amy Lowell

"In everything that can be called art there is a quality of redemption."—Raymond Chandler

"The artist speaks to our capacity for delight and wonder, to the sense of mystery surrounding our lives, to our sense of pity and beauty, and pain."—Joseph Conrad

"It doesn't make much difference how the paint is put on as long as something has been said. Technique is just a means of arriving at a statement."—Jackson Pollock

4. H. L. Mencken said:

In those fields of art, at all events, which concern themselves with ideas as well as with sensations it is almost impossible to find any trace of an artist who was not actively hostile to his environment.

Use the texts in this chapter to explain whether you agree with Mencken's statement that artists are nonconformists. Extend your argument to include your definition of the role of the artist in society.

5. Research some of the female and minority artists in this chapter. Write an essay describing how their pieces reflect the historical difficulties their social groups have had in becoming artists.
6. Find a pair of poems about one painting (W. H. Auden and Randall Jarrell have both written about Brueghel's "Landscape with the Fall of Icarus," for example). Write an essay in which you compare and contrast the poems' interpretations of the work.
7. In "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock," the shy Prufrock alludes to Andrew Marvell's "To His Coy Mistress." Imagine and write a conversation between Prufrock and the speaker in Marvell's poem. How might the Marvell speaker advise Prufrock? What do you think Prufrock's response would be?

Tradition and Progress

The world owes all its onward impulses to men ill at ease. The happy man inevitably confines himself within ancient limits.

—NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE

There are few arenas in which the war between tradition and progress is as clearly fought as literature, where both the message and the medium—subject and style—take sides. The conflict between respect for traditional values and the human impulse to grow and change has been the subject of fiction and poetry for centuries. And even a beginning student of literature can tell the difference between a novel written in the nineteenth century and one written in the twentieth or twenty-first century; between a Shakespearean sonnet and a free-verse poem. In his essay “Tradition and the Individual Talent,” T. S. Eliot says, “If the only form of tradition, of handing down, consisted in following the ways of the immediate generation before us in a blind or timid adherence to its successes, ‘tradition’ should positively be discouraged.” The works in this chapter ask how we determine which traditions are worth keeping and which must be jettisoned for the sake of progress, and how the old and the new overlap in the meantime.

The works in this chapter honor both the new and the old. In Daisy Miller, Henry James explores what happens when a “pretty American flirt” finds herself in the most traditional and judgmental of societies. And Flannery O’Connor’s portrayal of the grandmother in “A Good Man Is Hard to Find” leaves us wondering if traditional values would have helped against the force of evil embodied in The Misfit. Charles Baxter’s “Fenstad’s Mother” and Gish Jen’s “Who’s Irish?” challenge our expectations about which generation is more traditional and which is more progressive. Poems such as “Dover Beach” remind us that changes wrought by the Industrial Revolution had human costs and consequences, in the same way that “Goodbye, Goldeneye” points a finger at progress in the twentieth century. “A Bedtime Story” and “When All of My Cousins Are Married” consider the conflict between the traditions of the country of one’s birth and the more progressive ways of American life. “Mending Wall” reflects on rural traditions, while “Forty Acres”—a poem commissioned on the occasion of the election of Barack Obama, the United States’ first African American president—uses traditional rural images and references to celebrate one of the most progressive steps this country has ever taken.

In his 1985 essay “Where Is Our Dover Beach?” critic Roger Rosenblatt asks, “Who in Dover today would describe the world as various and beautiful and new? Yet how is the world less so than it was 134 years ago or a thousand, or the way it will be a thousand years hence, since its variety, beauty and novelty are always in the hands of people?” Everything, he says, “depends on how one wishes to live one’s life, which still requires . . . constancy . . . and a good deal of courage besides.”

HENRY JAMES

Henry James (1843–1916) was born into a wealthy family of intellectuals in New York City. His father, Henry James Sr., was a theologian who counted Thoreau, Emerson, and Hawthorne among his friends. James's brother William was a famous psychologist and philosopher; his sister, Alice, led a quiet life, but has become a controversial feminist icon through her posthumously published diary. Educated mostly by tutors during the family's travels in Europe, James briefly attended Harvard Law School when he was nineteen, but decided that he would rather study literature. James then moved to Europe—first to Paris, then to London, and finally to Rye in Sussex, England, where he lived for most of the rest of his life. He published his first short story, "A Tragedy of Errors," in 1864 and soon became a regular contributor to the Nation and Atlantic Monthly. Daisy Miller, published in 1870, made James famous. His best-known novels include The Portrait of a Lady (1881), The Turn of the Screw (1898), The Wings of the Dove (1902), and The Ambassadors (1903). James also wrote literary and art criticism, travel books, and a two-volume autobiography. Critic Edmund Wilson placed James among the literary giants:

One would be in a position to appreciate James better if one compared him with the dramatists of the seventeenth century—Racine and Molière, whom he resembles in form as well as in point of view, and even Shakespeare, when allowances are made for the most extreme differences in subject and form. These poets are not, like Dickens and Hardy, writers of melodrama—either humorous or pessimistic, nor secretaries of society like Balzac nor prophets like Tolstoy; they are occupied simply with the presentation of conflicts of moral character, which they do not concern themselves with softening or averting. They do not indict society for these situations: they regard them as universal and inevitable. They do not even blame God for allowing them: they accept them as conditions of life.

In James's work, the most compelling conflicts of moral character are the ones that feature Americans in Europe. James was fascinated by the obvious distinctions in social class among Europeans as well as their self-confidence about culture. Many of his novels and novellas—including Daisy Miller—involve American protagonists who are, according to James scholar Alfred Habegger, "noble, intrepid, and full of dangerous illusions about the complex European order."

Part I

At the little town of Vevey, in Switzerland, there is a particularly comfortable hotel. There are, indeed, many hotels; for the entertainment of tourists is the business of the place, which, as many travellers will remember, is seated upon the edge of a remarkably blue lake<sup>1</sup>—a lake that it behooves every tourist to visit. The shore of the lake presents an unbroken array of establishments of this order, of every category, from the “grand hotel” of the newest fashion, with a chalk-white front, a hundred balconies, and a dozen flags flying from its roof, to the little Swiss pension<sup>2</sup> of an elder day, with its name inscribed in German-looking lettering upon a pink or yellow wall, and an awkward summer-house in the angle of the garden. One of the hotels at Vevey, however, is famous, even classical, being distinguished from many of its upstart neighbours by an air both of luxury and of maturity. In this region, in the month of June, American travellers are extremely numerous; it may be said, indeed, that Vevey assumes at this period some of the characteristics of an American watering-place. There are sights and sounds which evoke a vision, an echo, of Newport and Saratoga.<sup>3</sup> There is a flitting hither and thither of “stylish” young girls, a rustling of muslin flounces, a rattle of dance-music in the morning hours, a sound of high-pitched voices at all times. You receive an impression of these things at the excellent inn of the “Trois Couronnes,”<sup>4</sup> and are transported in fancy to the Ocean House or to Congress Hall.<sup>5</sup> But at the “Trois Couronnes,” it must be added, there are other features that are much at variance with these suggestions: neat German waiters, who look like secretaries of legation; Russian princesses sitting in the garden; little Polish boys walking about, held by the hand, with their governors; a view of the sunny crest of the Dent du Midi<sup>6</sup> and the picturesque towers of the Castle of Chillon.

I hardly know whether it was the analogies or the differences that were uppermost in the mind of a young American, who, two or three years ago, sat in the garden of the “Trois Couronnes,” looking about him, rather idly, at some of the graceful objects I have mentioned. It was a beautiful summer morning, and in whatever fashion the young American looked at things, they must have seemed to him charming. He had come from Geneva the day before, by the little steamer, to see his aunt, who was staying at the hotel—Geneva having been for a long time his place of residence. But his aunt had a headache—his aunt had almost always a headache—and now she was shut up in her room, smelling camphor, so that he was at liberty to wander about. He was some seven-and-twenty years of age; when his friends spoke of him, they usually said that he was at Geneva, “studying.” When his enemies spoke of him they said—but, after all, he had no enemies; he was an extremely amiable fellow, and universally liked. What I should say is, simply, that when certain persons spoke of him they affirmed that the reason of his spending so much time at Geneva was that he was extremely devoted to a lady who lived there—a foreign lady—a person older than himself. Very few Americans—indeed I think none—had ever seen this lady, about whom there were some singular stories. But Winterbourne had an old attachment for the little metropolis of Calvinism;<sup>7</sup> he had been put to school there as a boy, and he had afterwards gone to college there—circumstances which had led to his forming a great many youthful friendships. Many of these he had kept, and they were a source of great satisfaction to him.

After knocking at his aunt's door and learning that she was indisposed, he had taken a walk about the town, and then he had come in to his breakfast. He had now finished his breakfast; but he was drinking a small cup of coffee, which had been served to him on a little table in the garden by one of the waiters who looked like an attaché.<sup>8</sup> At last he finished his coffee and lit a cigarette. Presently a small boy came walking along the path—an urchin of nine or ten. The child, who was diminutive for his years, had an aged expression of countenance, a pale complexion, and sharp little features. He was dressed in knickerbockers, with red stockings, which displayed his poor little spindle-shanks; he also wore a brilliant red cravat. He carried in his hand a long alpenstock, the sharp point of which he thrust into everything that he approached—the flower-beds, the garden-benches, the trains of the ladies' dresses. In front of Winterbourne he paused, looking at him with a pair of bright, penetrating little eyes.

"Will you give me a lump of sugar?" he asked, in a sharp, hard little voice—a voice immature, and yet, somehow, not young.

Winterbourne glanced at the small table near him, on which his coffee-service rested, and saw that several morsels of sugar remained. "Yes, you may take one," he answered; "but I don't think sugar is good for little boys." 5

This little boy stepped forward and carefully selected three of the coveted fragments, two of which he buried in the pocket of his knickerbockers, depositing the other as promptly in another place. He poked his alpenstock, lance-fashion, into Winterbourne's bench, and tried to crack the lump of sugar with his teeth.

"Oh, blazes; it's har-r-d!" he exclaimed, pronouncing the adjective in a peculiar manner.

Winterbourne had immediately perceived that he might have the honour of claiming him as a fellow-countryman. "Take care you don't hurt your teeth," he said, paternally.

"I haven't got any teeth to hurt. They have all come out. I have only got seven teeth. My mother counted them last night, and one came out right afterwards. She said she'd slap me if any more came out. I can't help it. It's this old Europe. It's the climate that makes them come out. In America they didn't come out. It's these hotels."

Winterbourne was much amused. "If you eat three lumps of sugar, your mother will certainly slap you," he said. 10

"She's got to give me some candy, then," rejoined his young interlocutor. "I can't get any candy here—any American candy. American candy's the best candy."

"And are American little boys the best little boys?" asked Winterbourne.

"I don't know. I'm an American boy," said the child.

"I see you are one of the best!" laughed Winterbourne.

"Are you an American man?" pursued this vivacious infant. And then, on 15
Winterbourne's affirmative reply—"American men are the best," he declared.

His companion thanked him for the compliment; and the child, who had now got astride of his alpenstock, stood looking about him, while he attacked a second lump of sugar. Winterbourne wondered if he himself had been like this in his infancy, for he had been brought to Europe about this age.

"Here comes my sister!" cried the child, in a moment. "She's an American girl."

Winterbourne looked along the path and saw a beautiful young lady advancing. "American girls are the best girls," he said, cheerfully, to his young companion.

"My sister ain't the best!" the child declared. "She's always blowing at me."

"I imagine that is your fault, not hers," said Winterbourne. The young lady meanwhile had drawn near. She was dressed in white muslin, with a hundred frills and flounces, and knots of pale-coloured ribbon. She was bare-headed; but she balanced in her hand a large parasol, with a deep border of embroidery; and she was strikingly, admirably pretty. "How pretty they are!" thought Winterbourne, straightening himself in his seat, as if he were prepared to rise. 20

The young lady paused in front of his bench, near the parapet of the garden, which overlooked the lake. The little boy had now converted his alpenstock into a vaulting-pole, by the aid of which he was springing about in the gravel, and kicking it up not a little.

"Randolph," said the young lady, "what are you doing?"

"I'm going up the Alps," replied Randolph. "This is the way!" And he gave another little jump, scattering the pebbles about Winterbourne's ears.

"That's the way they come down," said Winterbourne.

"He's an American man!" cried Randolph, in his little hard voice. 25

The young lady gave no heed to this announcement, but looked straight at her brother. "Well, I guess you had better be quiet," she simply observed.

It seemed to Winterbourne that he had been in a manner presented. He got up and stepped slowly towards the young girl, throwing away his cigarette. "This little boy and I have made acquaintance," he said, with great civility. In Geneva, as he had been perfectly aware, a young man was not at liberty to speak to a young unmarried lady except under certain rarely-occurring conditions; but here at Vevey, what conditions could be better than these?—a pretty American girl coming and standing in front of you in a garden. This pretty American girl, however, on hearing Winterbourne's observation, simply glanced at him; she then turned her head and looked over the parapet, at the lake and the opposite mountains. He wondered whether he had gone too far; but he decided that he must advance farther, rather than retreat. While he was thinking of something else to say, the young lady turned to the little boy again.

"I should like to know where you got that pole," she said.

"I bought it!" responded Randolph.

"You don't mean to say you're going to take it to Italy?" 30

"Yes, I am going to take it to Italy!" the child declared.

The young girl glanced over the front of her dress, and smoothed out a knot or two of ribbon. Then she rested her eyes upon the prospect again. "Well, I guess you had better leave it somewhere," she said, after a moment.

"Are you going to Italy?" Winterbourne inquired, in a tone of great respect. The young lady glanced at him again. "Yes, sir," she replied. And he said nothing more.

"Are you—a—going over the Simplon?"<sup>9</sup> Winterbourne pursued, a little embarrassed. 35

"I don't know," she said. "I suppose it's some mountain. Randolph, what mountain are we going over?"

"Going where?" the child demanded.

"To Italy," Winterbourne explained.

"I don't know," said Randolph. "I don't want to go to Italy. I want to go to America."

"Oh, Italy is a beautiful place!" rejoined the young man. 40

"Can you get candy there?" Randolph loudly inquired.

"I hope not," said his sister. "I guess you have had enough candy, and mother thinks so too."

"I haven't had any for ever so long—for a hundred weeks!" cried the boy, still jumping about.

The young lady inspected her flounces and smoothed her ribbons again; and Winterbourne presently risked an observation upon the beauty of the view. He was ceasing to be embarrassed, for he had begun to perceive that she was not in the least embarrassed herself. There had not been the slightest alteration in her charming complexion; she was evidently neither offended nor flattered. If she looked another way when he spoke to her, and seemed not particularly to hear him, this was simply her habit, her manner. Yet, as he talked a little more, and pointed out some of the objects of interest in the view, with which she appeared quite unacquainted, she gradually gave him more of the benefit of her glance; and then he saw that this glance was perfectly direct and unshrinking. It was not, however, what would have been called an immodest glance, for the young girl's eyes were singularly honest and fresh. They were wonderfully pretty eyes; and, indeed, Winterbourne had not seen for a long time anything prettier than this fair countrywoman's various features—her complexion, her nose, her ears, her teeth. He had a great relish for feminine beauty; he was addicted to observing and analysing it; and as regards this young lady's face he made several observations. It was not at all insipid, but it was not exactly expressive; and though it was eminently delicate, Winterbourne mentally accused it—very forgivingly—of a want of finish. He thought it very possible that Master Randolph's sister was a coquette; he was sure she had a spirit of her own; but in her bright, sweet, superficial little visage there was no mockery, no irony. Before long it became obvious that she was much disposed towards conversation. She told him that they were going to Rome for the winter—she and her mother and Randolph. She asked him if he was a "real American"; she shouldn't have taken him for one; he seemed more like a German—this was said after a little hesitation, especially when he spoke. Winterbourne, laughing, answered that he had met Germans who spoke like Americans; but that he had not, so far as he remembered, met an American who spoke like a German. Then he asked her if she should not be more comfortable in sitting upon the bench which he had just quitted. She answered that she liked standing up and walking about; but she presently sat down. She told him she was from New York State—"if you know where that is." Winterbourne learned more about her by catching hold of her small, slippery brother and making him stand a few minutes by his side.

"Tell me your name, my boy," he said.

45

"Randolph C. Miller," said the boy, sharply. "And I'll tell you her name"; and he levelled his alpenstock at his sister.

"You had better wait till you are asked!" said this young lady, calmly.

"I should like very much to know your name," said Winterbourne.

"Her name is Daisy Miller!" cried the child. "But that isn't her real name; that isn't her name on her cards."

"It's a pity you haven't got one of my cards!" said Miss Miller.

50

"Her real name is Annie P. Miller," the boy went on.

"Ask him his name," said his sister, indicating Winterbourne.

But on this point Randolph seemed perfectly indifferent; he continued to supply information with regard to his own family. "My father's name is Ezra B. Miller," he announced. "My father ain't in Europe; my father's in a better place than Europe."

Winterbourne imagined for a moment that this was the manner in which the child had been taught to intimate that Mr. Miller had been removed to the sphere of celestial rewards. But Randolph immediately added, "My father's in Schenectady. He's got a big business. My father's rich, you bet."

"Well!" ejaculated Miss Miller, lowering her parasol and looking at the embroidered border. Winterbourne presently released the child, who departed, dragging his alpenstock along the path. "He doesn't like Europe," said the young girl. "He wants to go back."

55

"To Schenectady, you mean?"

"Yes; he wants to go right home. He hasn't got any boys here. There is one boy here, but he always goes round with a teacher; they won't let him play."

"And your brother hasn't any teacher?" Winterbourne inquired.

"Mother thought of getting him one, to travel round with us. There was a lady told her of a very good teacher; an American lady—perhaps you know her—Mrs. Sanders. I think she came from Boston. She told her of this teacher, and we thought of getting him to travel round with us. But Randolph said he didn't want a teacher travelling round with us. He said he wouldn't have lessons when he was in the cars.<sup>10</sup> And we are in the cars about half the time. There was an English lady we met in the cars—I think her name was Miss Featherstone; perhaps you know her. She wanted to know why I didn't give Randolph lessons—give him 'instruction,' she called it. I guess he could give me more instruction than I could give him. He's very smart."

"Yes," said Winterbourne; "he seems very smart."

"Mother's going to get a teacher for him as soon as we get to Italy. Can you get good teachers in Italy?"

"Very good, I should think," said Winterbourne.

"Or else she's going to find some school. He ought to learn some more. He's only nine. He's going to college." And in this way Miss Miller continued to converse upon the affairs of her family, and upon other topics. She sat there with her extremely pretty hands, ornamented with very brilliant rings, folded in her lap, and with her pretty eyes now resting upon those of Winterbourne, now wandering over the garden, the people who passed by, and the beautiful view. She talked to Winterbourne as if she had known him a long time. He found it very pleasant. It was many years since he had heard a young girl talk so much. It might have been said of this unknown young lady, who had come and sat down beside him upon a bench, that she chattered. She was very quiet; she sat in a charming tranquil attitude, but her lips and her eyes were constantly moving. She had a soft, slender, agreeable voice, and her tone was decidedly sociable. She gave Winterbourne a history of her movements and intentions, and those of her mother and brother, in Europe and enumerated, in particular, the various hotels at which they had stopped. "That English lady, in the cars," she said—"Miss Featherstone—asked me if we didn't all live in hotels in America. I told her I had never been in so many hotels in my life as since I came to Europe. I have never seen so many—it's nothing but hotels." But Miss Miller did not make this remark with a querulous accent; she appeared to be in the best humour with everything. She declared that the hotels were very good, when once you got used to their ways, and that Europe was perfectly sweet. She was not disappointed—not a bit. Perhaps it was because she had heard so much about it before. She had ever so many intimate friends that had been there ever so many times. And then she had had ever so many dresses and things from Paris. Whenever she put on a Paris dress she felt as if she were in Europe.

"It was a kind of a wishing-cap," said Winterbourne.

"Yes," said Miss Miller, without examining this analogy; "it always made me wish I was here. But I needn't have done that for dresses. I am sure they send all the pretty ones to America; you see the most frightful things here. The only thing I don't like," she proceeded, "is the society. There isn't any society; or, if there is, I don't know where it keeps itself. Do you? I suppose there is some society somewhere, but I haven't seen anything of it. I'm very fond of society, and I have always had a great deal of it. I don't mean only in Schenectady, but in New York. I used to go to New York every winter. In New York I had lots of society. Last winter I had seventeen dinners given me; and three of them were by gentlemen," added Daisy Miller. "I have more friends in New York than in Schenectady—more gentleman friends; and more young lady friends too," she resumed in a moment. She paused again for an instant; she was looking at Winterbourne with all her prettiness in her lively eyes and in her light, slightly monotonous smile. "I have always had," she said, "a great deal of gentlemen's society."

Poor Winterbourne was amused, perplexed, and decidedly charmed. He had never yet heard a young girl express herself in just this fashion, never, at least, save in cases where to say such things seemed a kind of demonstrative evidence of a certain laxity of deportment. And yet was he to accuse Miss Daisy Miller of actual or potential inconduite,<sup>11</sup> as they said at Geneva? He felt that he had lived at Geneva so long that he had lost a good deal; he had become dishabituated to the American tone. Never, indeed, since he had grown old enough to appreciate things, had he encountered a young American girl of so pronounced a type as this. Certainly she was very charming, but how deucedly sociable! Was she simply a pretty girl from New York State—were they all like that, the pretty girls who had a good deal of gentlemen's society? Or was she also a designing, an audacious, an unscrupulous young person? Winterbourne had lost his instinct in this matter, and his reason could not help him. Miss Daisy Miller looked extremely innocent. Some people had told him that, after all, American girls were exceedingly innocent; and others had told him that, after all, they were not. He was inclined to think Miss Daisy Miller was a flirt—a pretty American flirt. He had never, as yet, had any relations with young ladies of this category. He had known, here in Europe, two or three women—persons older than Miss Daisy Miller, and provided, for respectability's sake, with husbands—who were great coquettes—dangerous, terrible women, with whom one's relations were liable to take a serious turn. But this young girl was not a coquette in that sense; she was very unsophisticated; she was only a pretty American flirt. Winterbourne was almost grateful for having found the formula that applied to Miss Daisy Miller. He leaned back in his seat; he remarked to himself that she had the most charming nose he had ever seen; he wondered what were the regular conditions and limitations of one's intercourse with a pretty American flirt. It presently became apparent that he was on the way to learn.

"Have you been to that old castle?" asked the young girl, pointing with her parasol to the far-gleaming walls of the Château de Chillon.

"Yes, formerly, more than once," said Winterbourne. "You too, I suppose, have seen it?"

"No; we haven't been there. I want to go there dreadfully. Of course I mean to go there. I wouldn't go away from here without having seen that old castle."

"It's a very pretty excursion," said Winterbourne, "and very easy to make. You can drive, you know, or you can go by the little steamer." 70

"You can go in the cars," said Miss Miller.

"Yes; you can go in the cars," Winterbourne assented.

"Our courier<sup>12</sup> says they take you right up to the castle," the young girl continued. "We were going last week; but my mother gave out. She suffers dreadfully from dyspepsia. She said she couldn't go. Randolph wouldn't go either; he says he doesn't think much of old castles. But I guess we'll go this week, if we can get Randolph."

"Your brother is not interested in ancient monuments?" Winterbourne inquired, smiling.

“He says he don’t care much about old castles. He’s only nine. He wants to stay at the hotel. Mother’s afraid to leave him alone, and the courier won’t stay with him; so we haven’t been to many places. But it will be too bad if we don’t go up there.” And Miss Miller pointed again at the Château de Chillon. 75

“I should think it might be arranged,” said Winterbourne. “Couldn’t you get some one to stay—for the afternoon—with Randolph?”

Miss Miller looked at him a moment; and then, very placidly—“I wish you would stay with him!” she said.

Winterbourne hesitated a moment. “I should much rather go to Chillon with you.”

“With me?” asked the young girl, with the same placidity.

She didn’t rise, blushing, as a young girl at Geneva would have done; and yet Winterbourne, conscious that he had been very bold, thought it possible she was offended. “With your mother,” he answered very respectfully. 80

But it seemed that both his audacity and his respect were lost upon Miss Daisy Miller. “I guess my mother won’t go after all,” she said. “She don’t like to ride round in the afternoon. But did you really mean what you said just now; that you would like to go up there?”

“Most earnestly,” Winterbourne declared.

“Then we may arrange it. If mother will stay with Randolph, I guess Eugenio will.”

“Eugenio?” the young man inquired.

“Eugenio’s our courier. He doesn’t like to stay with Randolph; he’s the most fastidious man I ever saw. But he’s a splendid courier. I guess he’ll stay at home with Randolph if mother does, and then we can go to the castle.” 85

Winterbourne reflected for an instant as lucidly as possible—“we” could only mean Miss Daisy Miller and himself. This programme seemed almost too agreeable for credence; he felt as if he ought to kiss the young lady’s hand. Possibly he would have done so—and quite spoiled the project; but at this moment another person—presumably Eugenio—appeared. A tall, handsome man, with superb whiskers, wearing a velvet morning-coat and a brilliant watch-chain, approached Miss Miller, looking sharply at her companion. “Oh, Eugenio!” said Miss Miller, with the friendliest accent.

Eugenio had looked at Winterbourne from head to foot; he now bowed gravely to the young lady. “I have the honour to inform mademoiselle that luncheon is upon the table.”

Miss Miller slowly rose. “See here, Eugenio,” she said. “I’m going to that old castle, any way.”

“To the Château de Chillon, mademoiselle?” the courier inquired. “Mademoiselle has made arrangements?” he added, in a tone which struck Winterbourne as very impertinent.

Eugenio’s tone apparently threw, even to Miss Miller’s own apprehension, a slightly ironical light upon the young girl’s situation. She turned to Winterbourne, blushing a little—a very little. “You won’t back out?” she said. 90

"I shall not be happy till we go!" he protested.

"And you are staying in this hotel?" she went on. "And you are really an American?"

The courier stood looking at Winterbourne, offensively. The young man, at least, thought his manner of looking an offence to Miss Miller; it conveyed an imputation that she "picked up" acquaintances. "I shall have the honour of presenting to you a person who will tell you all about me," he said smiling, and referring to his aunt.

"Oh, well, we'll go some day," said Miss Miller. And she gave him a smile and turned away. She put up her parasol and walked back to the inn beside Eugenio. Winterbourne stood looking after her; and as she moved away, drawing her muslin furbelows over the gravel, said to himself that she had the tournure<sup>13</sup> of a princess.

He had, however, engaged to do more than proved feasible, in promising to present his aunt, Mrs. Costello, to Miss Daisy Miller. As soon as the former lady had got better of her headache he waited upon her in her apartment; and, after the proper inquiries in regard to her health, he asked her if she had observed, in the hotel, an American family—a mamma, a daughter, and a little boy.

"And a courier?" said Mrs. Costello. "Oh, yes, I have observed them. Seen them—heard them—and kept out of their way." Mrs. Costello was a widow with a fortune; a person of much distinction, who frequently intimated that, if she were not so dreadfully liable to sick-headaches, she would probably have left a deeper impress upon her time. She had a long pale face, a high nose, and a great deal of very striking white hair, which she wore in large puffs and rouleaux<sup>14</sup> over the top of her head. She had two sons married in New York, and another who was now in Europe. This young man was amusing himself at Hombourg,<sup>15</sup> and, though he was on his travels, was rarely perceived to visit any particular city at the moment selected by his mother for her own appearance there. Her nephew, who had come up to Vevey expressly to see her, was therefore more attentive than those who, as she said, were nearer to her. He had imbibed at Geneva the idea that one must always be attentive to one's aunt. Mrs. Costello had not seen him for many years, and she was greatly pleased with him, manifesting her approbation by initiating him into many of the secrets of that social sway which, as she gave him to understand, she exerted in the American capital. She admitted that she was very exclusive; but, if he were acquainted with New York, he would see that one had to be. And her picture of the minutely hierarchical constitution of the society of that city, which she presented to him in many different lights, was, to Winterbourne's imagination, almost oppressively striking.

He immediately perceived, from her tone, that Miss Daisy Miller's place in the social scale was low. "I am afraid you don't approve of them," he said.

"They are very common," Mrs. Costello declared. "They are the sort of Americans that one does one's duty by not—not accepting."

"Ah, you don't accept them?" said the young man.

"I can't, my dear Frederick. I would if I could, but I can't." 100

"The young girl is very pretty," said Winterbourne, in a moment.

"Of course she's pretty. But she is very common."

"I see what you mean of course," said Winterbourne, after another pause.

"She has that charming look that they all have," his aunt resumed. "I can't think where they pick it up; and she dresses in perfection — no, you don't know how well she dresses. I can't think where they get their taste."

"But, my dear aunt, she is not, after all, a Comanche savage." 105

"She is a young lady," said Mrs. Costello, "who has an intimacy with her mamma's courier."

"An intimacy with the courier?" the young man demanded.

"Oh, the mother is just as bad! They treat the courier like a familiar friend — like a gentleman. I shouldn't wonder if he dines with them. Very likely they have never seen a man with such good manners, such fine clothes, so like a gentleman. He probably corresponds to the young lady's idea of a Count. He sits with them in the garden, in the evening. I think he smokes."

Winterbourne listened with interest to these disclosures; they helped him to make up his mind about Miss Daisy. Evidently she was rather wild. "Well," he said, "I am not a courier, and yet she was very charming to me."

"You had better have said at first," said Mrs. Costello with dignity, "that you had made her acquaintance." 110

"We simply met in the garden, and we talked a bit."

"Tout bonnement!<sup>16</sup> And pray what did you say?"

"I said I should take the liberty of introducing her to my admirable aunt."

"I am much obliged to you."

"It was to guarantee my respectability," said Winterbourne. 115

"And pray who is to guarantee hers?"

"Ah, you are cruel!" said the young man. "She's a very nice young girl."

"You don't say that as if you believed it," Mrs. Costello observed.

"She is completely uncultivated," Winterbourne went on. "But she is wonderfully pretty, and, in short, she is very nice. To prove that I believe it, I am going to take her to the Château de Chillon."

"You two are going off there together? I should say it proved just the contrary. How long had you known her, may I ask, when this interesting project was formed? You haven't been twenty-four hours in the house." 120

"I had known her half an hour!" said Winterbourne, smiling.

"Dear me!" cried Mrs. Costello. "What a dreadful girl!"

Her nephew was silent for some moments. "You really think, then," he began, earnestly, and with a desire for trustworthy information — "you really think that —" But he paused again.

"Think what, sir?" said his aunt.

"That she is the sort of young lady who expects a man—sooner or later—to carry her off?" 125

"I haven't the least idea what such young ladies expect a man to do. But I really think that you had better not meddle with little American girls that are uncultivated, as you call them. You have lived too long out of the country. You will be sure to make some great mistake. You are too innocent."

"My dear aunt, I am not so innocent," said Winterbourne, smiling and curling his moustache.

"You are too guilty, then!"

Winterbourne continued to curl his moustache, meditatively. "You won't let the poor girl know you then?" he asked at last.

"Is it literally true that she is going to the Château de Chillon with you?" 130

"I think that she fully intends it."

"Then, my dear Frederick," said Mrs. Costello, "I must decline the honour of her acquaintance. I am an old woman, but I am not too old—thank Heaven—to be shocked!"

"But don't they all do these things—the young girls in America?" Winterbourne inquired.

Mrs. Costello stared a moment. "I should like to see my granddaughters do them!" she declared, grimly.

This seemed to throw some light upon the matter, for Winterbourne remembered to have heard that his pretty cousins in New York were "tremendous flirts." If, therefore, Miss Daisy Miller exceeded the liberal margin allowed to these young ladies, it was probable that anything might be expected of her. Winterbourne was impatient to see her again, and he was vexed with himself that, by instinct, he should not appreciate her justly. 135

Though he was impatient to see her, he hardly knew what he should say to her about his aunt's refusal to become acquainted with her; but he discovered, promptly enough, that with Miss Daisy Miller there was no great need of walking on tiptoe. He found her that evening in the garden, wandering about in the warm starlight, like an indolent sylph, and swinging to and fro the largest fan he had ever beheld. It was ten o'clock. He had dined with his aunt, had been sitting with her since dinner, and had just taken leave of her till the morrow. Miss Daisy Miller seemed very glad to see him; she declared it was the longest evening she had ever passed.

"Have you been all alone?" he asked.

"I have been walking round with mother. But mother gets tired walking round," she answered.

"Has she gone to bed?"

"No; she doesn't like to go to bed," said the young girl. "She doesn't sleep—not three hours. She says she doesn't know how she lives. She's dreadfully nervous. I guess she sleeps more than she thinks. She's gone somewhere after Randolph; she wants to try to get him to go to bed. He doesn't like to go to bed." 140

"Let us hope she will persuade him," observed Winterbourne.

"She will talk to him all she can; but he doesn't like her to talk to him," said Miss Daisy, opening her fan. "She's going to try to get Eugenio to talk to him. But he isn't afraid of Eugenio. Eugenio's a splendid courier, but he can't make much impression on Randolph! I don't believe he'll go to bed before eleven." It appeared that Randolph's vigil was in fact triumphantly prolonged, for Winterbourne strolled about with the young girl for some time without meeting her mother. "I have been looking round for that lady you want to introduce me to," his companion resumed. "She's your aunt." Then, on Winterbourne's admitting the fact, and expressing some curiosity as to how she had learned it, she said she had heard all about Mrs. Costello from the chamber-maid. She was very quiet and very comme il faut;<sup>17</sup> she wore white puffs; she spoke to no one, and she never dined at the table d'hôte.<sup>18</sup> Every two days she had a headache. "I think that's a lovely description, headache and all!" said Miss Daisy, chattering along in her thin, gay voice. "I want to know her ever so much. I know just what your aunt would be; I know I should like her. She would be very exclusive. I like a lady to be exclusive; I'm dying to be exclusive myself. Well, we are exclusive, mother and I. We don't speak to every one—or they don't speak to us. I suppose it's about the same thing. Any way, I shall be ever so glad to know your aunt."

Winterbourne was embarrassed. "She would be most happy," he said; "but I am afraid those headaches will interfere."

The young girl looked at him through the dusk. "But I suppose she doesn't have a headache every day," she said, sympathetically.

Winterbourne was silent a moment. "She tells me she does," he answered at last—not knowing what to say.

Miss Daisy Miller stopped and stood looking at him. Her prettiness was still visible in the darkness; she was opening and closing her enormous fan. "She doesn't want to know me!" she said, suddenly. "Why don't you say so? You needn't be afraid. I'm not afraid!" And she gave a little laugh.

Winterbourne fancied there was a tremor in her voice; he was touched, shocked, mortified by it. "My dear young lady," he protested, "she knows no one. It's her wretched health."

The young girl walked on a few steps, laughing still. "You needn't be afraid," she repeated. "Why should she want to know me?" Then she paused again; she was close to the parapet of the garden, and in front of her was the starlit lake. There was a vague sheen upon its surface, and in the distance were dimly-seen mountain forms. Daisy Miller looked out upon the mysterious prospect, and then she gave another little laugh. "Gracious! she is exclusive!" she said. Winterbourne wondered whether she was seriously wounded, and for a moment almost wished that her sense of injury might be such as to make it becoming in him to attempt to reassure and comfort her. He had a pleasant sense that she would be very approachable for consolatory purposes. He felt then, for the instant, quite ready to sacrifice his aunt, conversationally; to admit that she was a proud, rude woman, and to declare that they needn't mind her. But before he had time to commit himself to this perilous mixture of gallantry and impiety, the young lady, resuming her walk, gave an exclamation in quite another tone. "Well; here's mother! I guess she hasn't got Randolph to go to bed." The figure of a lady appeared, at a distance, very indistinct in the darkness, and advancing with a slow and wavering movement. Suddenly it seemed to pause.

"Are you sure it is your mother? Can you distinguish her in this thick dusk?" Winterbourne asked.

"Well!" cried Miss Daisy Miller, with a laugh, "I guess I know my own mother. And when she has got on my shawl, too! She is always wearing my things." 150

The lady in question, ceasing to advance, hovered vaguely about the spot at which she had checked her steps.

"I am afraid your mother doesn't see you," said Winterbourne. "Or perhaps," he added—thinking, with Miss Miller, the joke permissible—"perhaps she feels guilty about your shawl."

"Oh, it's a fearful old thing!" the young girl replied, serenely. "I told her she could wear it. She won't come here, because she sees you."

"Ah, then," said Winterbourne, "I had better leave you."

"Oh, no; come on!" urged Miss Daisy Miller. 155

"I'm afraid your mother doesn't approve of my walking with you."

Miss Miller gave him a serious glance. "It isn't for me; it's for you—that is, it's for her. Well; I don't know who it's for! But mother doesn't like any of my gentlemen friends. She's right down timid. She always makes a fuss if I introduce a gentleman. But I do introduce them—almost always. If I didn't introduce my gentlemen friends to mother," the young girl added, in her little soft, flat monotone, "I shouldn't think I was natural."

"To introduce me," said Winterbourne, "you must know my name." And he proceeded to pronounce it.

"Oh, dear; I can't say all that!" said his companion, with a laugh. But by this time they had come up to Mrs. Miller, who, as they drew near, walked to the parapet of the garden and leaned upon it, looking intently at the lake, and turning her back to them. "Mother!" said the young girl, in a tone of decision. Upon this the elder lady turned round. "Mr. Winterbourne," said Miss Daisy Miller, introducing the young man very frankly and prettily. "Common" she was, as Mrs. Costello had pronounced her; yet it was a wonder to Winterbourne that, with her commonness, she had a singularly delicate grace.

Her mother was a small, spare, light person, with a wandering eye, a very exiguous nose, and a large forehead, decorated with a certain amount of thin, much-frizzled hair. Like her daughter, Mrs. Miller was dressed with extreme elegance; she had enormous diamonds in her ears. So far as Winterbourne could observe, she gave him no greeting—she certainly was not looking at him. Daisy was near her, pulling her shawl straight. "What are you doing, poking round here?" this young lady inquired; but by no means with that harshness of accent which her choice of words may imply. 160

"I don't know," said her mother, turning towards the lake again.

"I shouldn't think you'd want that shawl!" Daisy exclaimed.

"Well—I do!" her mother answered, with a little laugh.

"Did you get Randolph to go to bed?" asked the young girl.

"No; I couldn't induce him," said Mrs. Miller, very gently. "He wants to talk to the waiter. He likes to talk to that waiter." 165

"I was telling Mr. Winterbourne," the young girl went on; and to the young man's ear her tone might have indicated that she had been uttering his name all her life.

"Oh, yes!" said Winterbourne; "I have the pleasure of knowing your son."

Randolph's mamma was silent; she turned her attention to the lake. But at last she spoke. "Well, I don't see how he lives!"

"Anyhow, it isn't so bad as it was at Dover," said Daisy Miller.

"And what occurred at Dover?" Winterbourne asked. 170

"He wouldn't go to bed at all. I guess he sat up all night—in the public parlour. He wasn't in bed at twelve o'clock: I know that."

"It was half-past twelve," declared Mrs. Miller, with mild emphasis.

"Does he sleep much during the day?" Winterbourne demanded.

"I guess he doesn't sleep much," Daisy rejoined.

"I wish he would!" said her mother. "It seems as if he couldn't." 175

"I think he's real tiresome," Daisy pursued.

Then, for some moments, there was silence. "Well, Daisy Miller," said the elder lady, presently, "I shouldn't think you'd want to talk against your own brother!"

"Well, he is tiresome, mother," said Daisy, quite without the asperity of a retort.

"He's only nine," urged Mrs. Miller.

"Well, he wouldn't go to that castle," said the young girl. "I'm going there with Mr. Winterbourne." 180

To this announcement, very placidly made, Daisy's mamma offered no response. Winterbourne took for granted that she deeply disapproved of the projected excursion; but he said to himself that she was a simple, easily-managed person, and that a few deferential protestations would take the edge from her displeasure. "Yes," he began; "your daughter has kindly allowed me the honour of being her guide."

Mrs. Miller's wandering eyes attached themselves, with a sort of appealing air, to Daisy, who, however, strolled a few steps farther, gently humming to herself. "I presume you will go in the cars," said her mother.

"Yes; or in the boat," said Winterbourne.

"Well, of course, I don't know," Mrs. Miller rejoined. "I have never been to that castle."

"It is a pity you shouldn't go," said Winterbourne, beginning to feel reassured as to her opposition. And yet he was quite prepared to find that, as a matter of course, she meant to accompany her daughter. 185

"We've been thinking ever so much about going," she pursued; "but it seems as if we couldn't. Of course Daisy—she wants to go round. But there's a lady here—I don't know her name—she says she shouldn't think we'd want to go to see castles here; she should think we'd want to wait till we got to Italy. It seems as if there would be so many there," continued Mrs. Miller, with an air of increasing confidence. "Of course we only want to see the principal ones. We visited several in England," she presently added.

"Ah, yes! in England there are beautiful castles," said Winterbourne. "But Chillon, here, is very well worth seeing."

"Well, if Daisy feels up to it—," said Mrs. Miller, in a tone impregnated with a sense of the magnitude of the enterprise. "It seems as if there was nothing she wouldn't undertake."

"Oh, I think she'll enjoy it!" Winterbourne declared. And he desired more and more to make it a certainty that he was to have the privilege of a tête-à-tête<sup>19</sup> with the young lady, who was still strolling along in front of them, softly vocalising. "You are not disposed, madam," he inquired, "to undertake it yourself?"

Daisy's mother looked at him, an instant, askance, and then walked forward in silence. Then—"I guess she had better go alone," she said, simply. 190

Winterbourne observed to himself that this was a very different type of maternity from that of the vigilant matrons who massed themselves in the forefront of social intercourse in the dark old city at the other end of the lake. But his meditations were interrupted by hearing his name very distinctly pronounced by Mrs. Miller's unprotected daughter.

"Mr. Winterbourne!" murmured Daisy.

"Mademoiselle!" said the young man.

"Don't you want to take me out in a boat?"

"At present?" he asked. 195

"Of course!" said Daisy.

"Well, Annie Miller!" exclaimed her mother.

"I beg you, madam, to let her go," said Winterbourne, ardently; for he had never yet enjoyed the sensation of guiding through the summer starlight a skiff freighted with a fresh and beautiful young girl.

"I shouldn't think she'd want to," said her mother. "I should think she'd rather go indoors."

"I'm sure Mr. Winterbourne wants to take me," Daisy declared. "He's so awfully devoted!" 200

"I will row you over to Chillon, in the starlight."

"I don't believe it!" said Daisy.

"Well!" ejaculated the elder lady again.

"You haven't spoken to me for half an hour," her daughter went on.

"I have been having some very pleasant conversation with your mother," said Winterbourne. 205

"Well; I want you to take me out in a boat!" Daisy repeated. They had all stopped, and she had turned round and was looking at Winterbourne. Her face wore a charming smile, her pretty eyes were gleaming, she was swinging her great fan about. No; it's impossible to be prettier than that, thought Winterbourne.

"There are half a dozen boats moored at that landing-place," he said, pointing to certain steps which descended from the garden to the lake. "If you will do me the honour to accept my arm, we will go and select one of them."

Daisy stood there smiling; she threw back her head and gave a little, light laugh. "I like a gentleman to be formal!" she declared.

"I assure you it's a formal offer."

"I was bound I would make you say something," Daisy went on.

210

"You see it's not very difficult," said Winterbourne. "But I am afraid you are chaffing me."

"I think not, sir," remarked Mrs. Miller, very gently.

"Do, then, let me give you a row," he said to the young girl.

"It's quite lovely, the way you say that!" cried Daisy.

"It will be still more lovely to do it."

215

"Yes, it would be lovely!" said Daisy. But she made no movement to accompany him; she only stood there laughing.

"I should think you had better find out what time it is," interposed her mother.

"It is eleven o'clock, madam," said a voice, with a foreign accent, out of the neighbouring darkness; and Winterbourne, turning, perceived the florid personage who was in attendance upon the two ladies. He had apparently just approached.

"Oh, Eugenio," said Daisy, "I am going out in a boat!"

Eugenio bowed. "At eleven o'clock, mademoiselle?"

220

"I am going with Mr. Winterbourne. This very minute."

"Do tell her she can't," said Mrs. Miller to the courier.

"I think you had better not go out in a boat, mademoiselle," Eugenio declared.

Winterbourne wished to Heaven this pretty girl were not so familiar with her courier; but he said nothing.

"I suppose you don't think it's proper!" Daisy exclaimed. "Eugenio doesn't think anything's proper."

225

"I am at your service," said Winterbourne.

"Does mademoiselle propose to go alone?" asked Eugenio of Mrs. Miller.

"Oh, no; with this gentleman!" answered Daisy's mamma.

The courier looked for a moment at Winterbourne—the latter thought he was smiling—and then, solemnly, with a bow, "As mademoiselle pleases!" he said.

"Oh, I hoped you would make a fuss!" said Daisy. "I don't care to go now."

230

"I myself shall make a fuss if you don't go," said Winterbourne.

"That's all I want—a little fuss!" And the young girl began to laugh again.

"Mr. Randolph has gone to bed!" the courier announced, frigidly.

"Oh, Daisy; now we can go!" said Mrs. Miller.

Daisy turned away from Winterbourne, looking at him, smiling, and fanning herself. "Good-night," she said; "I hope you are disappointed, or disgusted, or something!"

235

He looked at her, taking the hand she offered him. "I am puzzled," he answered.

"Well; I hope it won't keep you awake!" she said, very smartly; and, under the escort of the privileged Eugenio, the two ladies passed towards the house.

Winterbourne stood looking after them; he was indeed puzzled. He lingered beside the lake for a quarter of an hour, turning over the mystery of the young girl's sudden familiarities and caprices. But the only very definite conclusion he came to was that he should enjoy deucedly “going off” with her somewhere.

Two days afterwards he went off with her to the Castle of Chillon. He waited for her in the large hall of the hotel, where the couriers, the servants, the foreign tourists were lounging about and staring. It was not the place he should have chosen, but she had appointed it. She came tripping downstairs, buttoning her long gloves, squeezing her folded parasol against her pretty figure, dressed in the perfection of a soberly elegant travelling-costume. Winterbourne was a man of imagination and, as our ancestors used to say, sensibility; as he looked at her dress and, on the great staircase, her little rapid, confiding step, he felt as if there were something romantic going forward. He could have believed he was going to elope with her. He passed out with her among all the idle people that were assembled there; they were all looking at her very hard; she had begun to chatter as soon as she joined him. Winterbourne’s preference had been that they should be conveyed to Chillon in a carriage; but she expressed a lively wish to go in the little steamer; she declared that she had a passion for steamboats. There was always such a lovely breeze upon the water, and you saw such lots of people. The sail was not long, but Winterbourne’s companion found time to say a great many things. To the young man himself their little excursion was so much of an escapade—an adventure—that, even allowing for her habitual sense of freedom, he had some expectation of seeing her regard it in the same way. But it must be confessed that, in this particular, he was disappointed. Daisy Miller was extremely animated, she was in charming spirits; but she was apparently not at all excited; she was not fluttered; she avoided neither his eyes nor those of any one else; she blushed neither when she looked at him nor when she felt that people were looking at her. People continued to look at her a great deal, and Winterbourne took much satisfaction in his pretty companion’s distinguished air. He had been a little afraid that she would talk loud, laugh overmuch, and even, perhaps, desire to move about the boat a good deal. But he quite forgot his fears; he sat smiling, with his eyes upon her face, while, without moving from her place, she delivered herself of a great number of original reflections. It was the most charming garrulity he had ever heard. He had assented to the idea that she was “common”; but was she so, after all, or was he simply getting used to her commonness? Her conversation was chiefly of what metaphysicians term the objective cast; but every now and then it took a subjective turn.

“What on earth are you so grave about?” she suddenly demanded, fixing her agreeable eyes upon Winterbourne’s. 240

“Am I grave?” he asked. “I had an idea I was grinning from ear to ear.”

“You look as if you were taking me to a funeral. If that’s a grin, your ears are very near together.”

“Should you like me to dance a hornpipe on the deck?”

“Pray do, and I’ll carry round your hat. It will pay the expenses of our journey.”

“I never was better pleased in my life,” murmured Winterbourne. 245

She looked at him a moment, and then burst into a little laugh. “I like to make you say those things! You’re a queer mixture!”

In the castle, after they had landed, the subjective element decidedly prevailed. Daisy tripped about the vaulted chambers, rustled her skirts in the corkscrew staircases, flirted back with a pretty little cry and a shudder from the edge of the oubliettes,<sup>20</sup> and turned a singularly well-shaped ear to everything that Winterbourne told her about the place. But he saw that she cared very little for feudal antiquities, and that the dusky traditions of Chillon made but a slight impression upon her. They had the good fortune to have been able to walk about without other companionship than that of the custodian; and Winterbourne arranged with this functionary that they should not be hurried—that they should linger and pause wherever they chose. The custodian interpreted the bargain generously—Winterbourne, on his side, had been generous—and ended by leaving them quite to themselves. Miss Miller's observations were not remarkable for logical consistency; for anything she wanted to say she was sure to find a pretext. She found a great many pretexts in the rugged embrasures of Chillon for asking Winterbourne sudden questions about himself—his family, his previous history, his tastes, his habits, his intentions—and for supplying information upon corresponding points in her own personality. Of her own tastes, habits, and intentions Miss Miller was prepared to give the most definite, and indeed the most favourable, account.

"Well; I hope you know enough!" she said to her companion, after he had told her the history of the unhappy Bonivard.<sup>21</sup> "I never saw a man that knew so much!" The history of Bonivard had evidently, as they say, gone into one ear and out of the other. But Daisy went on to say that she wished Winterbourne would travel with them and "go round" with them; they might know something, in that case. "Don't you want to come and teach Randolph?" she asked. Winterbourne said that nothing could possibly please him so much; but that he had unfortunately other occupations. "Other occupations? I don't believe it!" said Miss Daisy. "What do you mean? You are not in business." The young man admitted that he was not in business; but he had engagements which, even within a day or two, would force him to go back to Geneva. "Oh, bother!" she said: "I don't believe it!" and she began to talk about something else. But a few moments later, when he was pointing out to her the pretty design of an antique fireplace, she broke out irrelevantly, "You don't mean to say you are going back to Geneva?"

"It is a melancholy fact that I shall have to return to Geneva to-morrow."

"Well, Mr. Winterbourne," said Daisy; "I think you're horrid!"

"Oh, don't say such dreadful things!" said Winterbourne—"just at the last!"

"The last!" cried the young girl; "I call it the first. I have half a mind to leave you here and go straight back to the hotel alone." And for the next ten minutes she did nothing but call him horrid. Poor Winterbourne was fairly bewildered; no young lady had as yet done him the honour to be so agitated by the announcement of his movements. His companion, after this, ceased to pay any attention to the curiosities of Chillon or the beauties of the lake; she opened fire upon the mysterious charmer in Geneva whom she appeared to have instantly taken it for granted that he was hurrying back to see. How did Miss Daisy Miller know that there was a charmer in Geneva? Winterbourne, who denied the existence of such a person, was quite unable to discover; and he was divided between amazement at the rapidity of her induction and amusement at the frankness of her persiflage.<sup>22</sup> She seemed to him, in all this, an extraordinary mixture of innocence and crudity. “Does she never allow you more than three days at a time?” asked Daisy, ironically. “Doesn’t she give you a vacation in summer? There’s no one so hard worked but they can get leave to go off somewhere at this season. I suppose, if you stay another day, she’ll come after you in the boat. Do wait over till Friday, and I will go down to the landing to see her arrive!” Winterbourne began to think he had been wrong to feel disappointed in the temper in which the young lady had embarked. If he had missed the personal accent, the personal accent was now making its appearance. It sounded very distinctly, at last, in her telling him she would stop “teasing” him if he would promise her solemnly to come down to Rome in the winter.

“That’s not a difficult promise to make,” said Winterbourne. “My aunt has taken an apartment in Rome for the winter, and has already asked me to come and see her.”

“I don’t want you to come for your aunt,” said Daisy; “I want you to come for me.” And this was the only allusion that the young man was ever to hear her make to his invidious kinswoman. He declared that, at any rate, he would certainly come. After this Daisy stopped teasing. Winterbourne took a carriage, and they drove back to Vevey in the dusk; the young girl was very quiet.

In the evening Winterbourne mentioned to Mrs. Costello that he had spent the afternoon at Chillon, with Miss Daisy Miller. 255

“The Americans—of the courier?” asked this lady.

“Ah, happily,” said Winterbourne, “the courier stayed at home.”

“She went with you all alone?”

“All alone.”

Mrs. Costello sniffed a little at her smelling-bottle. “And that,” she exclaimed, “is the young person whom you wanted me to know!” 260

Part II

Winterbourne, who had returned to Geneva the day after his excursion to Chillon, went to Rome towards the end of January. His aunt had been established there for several weeks, and he had received a couple of letters from her. “Those people you were so devoted to last summer at Vevey have turned up here, courier and all,” she wrote. “They seem to have made several acquaintances, but the courier continues to be the most intime. The young lady, however, is also very intimate with some third-rate Italians, with whom she rackets about in a way that makes much talk. Bring me that pretty novel of Cherbuliez’s—‘Paule Méré’<sup>23</sup>—and don’t come later than the 23rd.”

In the natural course of events, Winterbourne, on arriving in Rome, would presently have ascertained Mrs. Miller's address at the American banker's, and have gone to pay his compliments to Miss Daisy. "After what happened at Vevey, I think I may certainly call upon them," he said to Mrs. Costello.

"If, after what happens—at Vevey and everywhere—you desire to keep up the acquaintance, you are very welcome. Of course a man may know every one. Men are welcome to the privilege!"

"Pray what is it that happens—here, for instance?" Winterbourne demanded.

"The girl goes about alone with her foreigners. As to what happens further, you must apply elsewhere for information. She has picked up half-a-dozen of the regular Roman fortune-hunters, and she takes them about to people's houses. When she comes to a party she brings with her a gentleman with a good deal of manner and a wonderful moustache."

"And where is the mother?"

"I haven't the least idea. They are very dreadful people."

Winterbourne meditated a moment. "They are very ignorant—very innocent only. Depend upon it they are not bad."

"They are hopelessly vulgar," said Mrs. Costello. "Whether or no being hopelessly vulgar is being 'bad' is a question for the metaphysicians. They are bad enough to dislike, at any rate; and for this short life that is quite enough."

The news that Daisy Miller was surrounded by half-a-dozen wonderful moustaches checked Winterbourne's impulse to go straightway to see her. He had perhaps not definitely flattered himself that he had made an ineffaceable impression upon her heart, but he was annoyed at hearing of a state of affairs so little in harmony with an image that had lately flitted in and out of his own meditations; the image of a very pretty girl looking out of an old Roman window and asking herself urgently when Mr. Winterbourne would arrive. If, however, he determined to wait a little before reminding Miss Miller of his claims to her consideration, he went very soon to call upon two or three other friends. One of these friends was an American lady who had spent several winters at Geneva, where she had placed her children at school. She was a very accomplished woman, and she lived in the Via Gregoriana. Winterbourne found her in a little crimson drawing-room, on a third floor; the room was filled with southern sunshine. He had not been there ten minutes when the servant came in, announcing "Madame Mila!" This announcement was presently followed by the entrance of little Randolph Miller, who stopped in the middle of the room and stood staring at Winterbourne. An instant later his pretty sister crossed the threshold; and then, after a considerable interval, Mrs. Miller slowly advanced.

"I know you!" said Randolph.

"I'm sure you know a great many things," exclaimed Winterbourne, taking him by the hand. "How is your education coming on?"

Daisy was exchanging greetings very prettily with her hostess; but when she heard Winterbourne's voice she quickly turned her head. "Well, I declare!" she said.

"I told you I should come, you know," Winterbourne rejoined, smiling.

"Well—I didn't believe it," said Miss Daisy.

265

275

"I am much obliged to you," laughed the young man.

"You might have come to see me!" said Daisy.

"I arrived only yesterday."

"I don't believe that!" the young girl declared.

Winterbourne turned with a protesting smile to her mother; but this lady evaded his glance, and, seating herself, fixed her eyes upon her son. "We've got a bigger place than this," said Randolph. "It's all gold on the walls." 280

Mrs. Miller turned uneasily in her chair. "I told you if I were to bring you, you would say something!" she murmured.

"I told you!" Randolph exclaimed. "I tell you, sir!" he added jocosely, giving Winterbourne a thump on the knee. "It is bigger, too!"

Daisy had entered upon a lively conversation with her hostess; Winterbourne judged it becoming to address a few words to her mother. "I hope you have been well since we parted at Vevey," he said.

Mrs. Miller now certainly looked at him—at his chin. "Not very well, sir," she answered.

"She's got the dyspepsia," said Randolph. "I've got it too. Father's got it. I've got it most!" 285

This announcement, instead of embarrassing Mrs. Miller, seemed to relieve her. "I suffer from the liver," she said. "I think it's this climate; it's less bracing than Schenectady, especially in the winter season. I don't know whether you know we reside at Schenectady. I was saying to Daisy that I certainly hadn't found any one like Dr. Davis, and I didn't believe I should. Oh, at Schenectady, he stands first; they think everything of him. He has so much to do, and yet there was nothing he wouldn't do for me. He said he never saw anything like my dyspepsia, but he was bound to cure it. I'm sure there was nothing he wouldn't try. He was just going to try something new when we came off. Mr. Miller wanted Daisy to see Europe for herself. But I wrote to Mr. Miller that it seems as if I couldn't get on without Dr. Davis. At Schenectady he stands at the very top; and there's a great deal of sickness there, too. It affects my sleep."

Winterbourne had a good deal of pathological gossip with Dr. Davis's patient, during which Daisy chattered unremittingly to her own companion. The young man asked Mrs. Miller how she was pleased with Rome. "Well, I must say I am disappointed," she answered. "We had heard so much about it; I suppose we had heard too much. But we couldn't help that. We had been led to expect something different."

"Ah, wait a little, and you will become very fond of it," said Winterbourne.

"I hate it worse and worse every day!" cried Randolph.

"You are like the infant Hannibal,"<sup>24</sup> said Winterbourne. 290

"No, I ain't!" Randolph declared, at a venture.

"You are not much like an infant," said his mother. "But we have seen places," she resumed, "that I should put a long way before Rome." And in reply to Winterbourne's interrogation, "There's Zurich," she concluded; "I think Zurich is lovely; and we hadn't heard half so much about it."

"The best place we've seen is the City of Richmond!" said Randolph.

"He means the ship," his mother explained. "We crossed in that ship. Randolph had a good time on the City of Richmond."

"It's the best place I've seen," the child repeated. "Only it was turned the wrong way." 295

"Well, we've got to turn the right way some time," said Mrs. Miller, with a little laugh. Winterbourne expressed the hope that her daughter at least found some gratification in Rome, and she declared that Daisy was quite carried away. "It's on account of the society—the society's splendid. She goes round everywhere; she has made a great number of acquaintances. Of course she goes round more than I do. I must say they have been very sociable; they have taken her right in. And then she knows a great many gentlemen. Oh, she thinks there's nothing like Rome. Of course, it's a great deal pleasanter for a young lady if she knows plenty of gentlemen."

By this time Daisy had turned her attention again to Winterbourne. "I've been telling Mrs. Walker how mean you were!" the young girl announced.

"And what is the evidence you have offered?" asked Winterbourne, rather annoyed at Miss Miller's want of appreciation of the zeal of an admirer who on his way down to Rome had stopped neither at Bologna nor at Florence, simply because of a certain sentimental impatience. He remembered that a cynical compatriot had once told him that American women—the pretty ones, and this gave a largeness to the axiom—were at once the most exacting in the world and the least endowed with a sense of indebtedness.

"Why, you were awfully mean at Vevey," said Daisy. "You wouldn't do anything. You wouldn't stay there when I asked you."

"My dearest young lady," cried Winterbourne, with eloquence, "have I come all the way to Rome to encounter your reproaches?" 300

"Just hear him say that!" said Daisy to her hostess, giving a twist to a bow on this lady's dress. "Did you ever hear anything so quaint?"

"So quaint, my dear?" murmured Mrs. Walker, in the tone of a partisan of Winterbourne.

"Well, I don't know," said Daisy, fingering Mrs. Walker's ribbons. "Mrs. Walker, I want to tell you something."

"Motherrr," interposed Randolph, with his rough ends to his words, "I tell you you've got to go. Eugenio'll raise something!"

"I'm not afraid of Eugenio," said Daisy, with a toss of her head. "Look here, Mrs. Walker," she went on, "you know I'm coming to your party." 305

"I am delighted to hear it."

"I've got a lovely dress."

"I am very sure of that."

"But I want to ask a favour—permission to bring a friend."

"I shall be happy to see any of your friends," said Mrs. Walker, turning with a smile to Mrs. Miller. 310

"Oh, they are not my friends," answered Daisy's mamma, smiling shyly, in her own fashion. "I never spoke to them!"

"It's an intimate friend of mine—Mr. Giovanelli," said Daisy, without a tremor in her clear little voice or a shadow on her brilliant little face.

Mrs. Walker was silent a moment; she gave a rapid glance at Winterbourne. "I shall be glad to see Mr. Giovanelli," she then said.

"He's an Italian," Daisy pursued, with the prettiest serenity. "He's a great friend of mine—he's the handsomest man in the world—except Mr. Winterbourne! He knows plenty of Italians, but he wants to know some Americans. He thinks ever so much of Americans. He's tremendously clever. He's perfectly lovely!"

It was settled that this brilliant personage should be brought to Mrs. Walker's party, and then Mrs. Miller prepared to take her leave. "I guess we'll go back to the hotel," she said. 315

"You may go back to the hotel, mother, but I'm going to take a walk," said Daisy.

"She's going to walk with Mr. Giovanelli," Randolph proclaimed.

"I am going to the Pincio,"<sup>25</sup> said Daisy, smiling.

"Alone, my dear—at this hour?" Mrs. Walker asked. The afternoon was drawing to a close—it was the hour for the throng of carriages and of contemplative pedestrians. "I don't think it's safe, my dear," said Mrs. Walker.

"Neither do I," subjoined Mrs. Miller. "You'll get the fever<sup>26</sup> as sure as you live. Remember what Dr. Davis told you!" 320

"Give her some medicine before she goes," said Randolph.

The company had risen to its feet; Daisy, still showing her pretty teeth, bent over and kissed her hostess. "Mrs. Walker, you are too perfect," she said. "I'm not going alone; I am going to meet a friend."

"Your friend won't keep you from getting the fever," Mrs. Miller observed.

"Is it Mr. Giovanelli?" asked the hostess.

Winterbourne was watching the young girl; at this question his attention quickened. She stood there smiling and smoothing her bonnet ribbons; she glanced at Winterbourne. Then, while she glanced and smiled, she answered without a shade of hesitation, "Mr. Giovanelli—the beautiful Giovanelli." 325

"My dear young friend," said Mrs. Walker, taking her hand, pleadingly, "don't walk off to the Pincio at this hour to meet a beautiful Italian."

"Well, he speaks English," said Mrs. Miller.

"Gracious me!" Daisy exclaimed, "I don't want to do anything improper. There's an easy way to settle it." She continued to glance at Winterbourne. "The Pincio is only a hundred yards distant, and if Mr. Winterbourne were as polite as he pretends he would offer to walk with me!"

<sup>26</sup>Malaria, or "Roman fever." Understood at the time to be contracted by being outdoors at night.—Eds.

Winterbourne's politeness hastened to affirm itself, and the young girl gave him gracious leave to accompany her. They passed downstairs before her mother, and at the door Winterbourne perceived Mrs. Miller's carriage drawn up, with the ornamental courier whose acquaintance he had made at Vevey seated within. "Good-by, Eugenio!" cried Daisy; "I'm going to take a walk." The distance from the Via Gregoriana to the beautiful garden at the other end of the Pincian Hill is, in fact, rapidly traversed. As the day was splendid, however, and the concourse of vehicles, walkers, and loungers numerous, the young Americans found their progress much delayed. This fact was highly agreeable to Winterbourne, in spite of his consciousness of his singular situation. The slow-moving, idly-gazing Roman crowd bestowed much attention upon the extremely pretty young foreign lady who was passing through it upon his arm; and he wondered what on earth had been in Daisy's mind when she proposed to expose herself, unattended, to its appreciation. His own mission, to her sense, apparently, was to consign her to the hands of Mr. Giovanelli; but Winterbourne, at once annoyed and gratified, resolved that he would do no such thing.

"Why haven't you been to see me?" asked Daisy. "You can't get out of that."

330

"I have had the honour of telling you that I have only just stepped out of the train."

"You must have stayed in the train a good while after it stopped!" cried the young girl, with her little laugh. "I suppose you were asleep. You have had time to go to see Mrs. Walker."

"I knew Mrs. Walker—" Winterbourne began to explain.

"I knew where you knew her. You knew her at Geneva. She told me so. Well, you knew me at Vevey. That's just as good. So you ought to have come." She asked him no other question than this; she began to prattle about her own affairs. "We've got splendid rooms at the hotel; Eugenio says they're the best rooms in Rome. We are going to stay all winter—if we don't die of the fever; and I guess we'll stay then. It's a great deal nicer than I thought; I thought it would be fearfully quiet; I was sure it would be awfully poky. I was sure we should be going round all the time with one of those dreadful old men that explain about the pictures and things. But we only had about a week of that, and now I'm enjoying myself. I know ever so many people, and they are all so charming. The society's extremely select. There are all kinds—English, and Germans, and Italians. I think I like the English best. I like their style of conversation. But there are some lovely Americans. I never saw anything so hospitable. There's something or other every day. There's not much dancing; but I must say I never thought dancing was everything. I was always fond of conversation. I guess I shall have plenty at Mrs. Walker's—her rooms are so small." When they had passed the gate of the Pincian Gardens, Miss Miller began to wonder where Mr. Giovanelli might be. "We had better go straight to that place in front," she said, "where you look at the view."

"I certainly shall not help you to find him," Winterbourne declared.

335

"Then I shall find him without you," said Miss Daisy.

"You certainly won't leave me!" cried Winterbourne.

She burst into her little laugh. "Are you afraid you'll get lost—or run over? But there's Giovanelli, leaning against that tree. He's staring at the women in the carriages: did you ever see anything so cool?"

Winterbourne perceived at some distance a little man standing with folded arms, nursing his cane. He had a handsome face, an artfully poised hat, a glass in one eye and a nosegay in his button-hole. Winterbourne looked at him a moment and then said, "Do you mean to speak to that man?"

"Do I mean to speak to him? Why, you don't suppose I mean to communicate by signs?" 340

"Pray understand, then," said Winterbourne, "that I intend to remain with you."

Daisy stopped and looked at him, without a sign of troubled consciousness in her face; with nothing but the presence of her charming eyes and her happy dimples. "Well, she's a cool one!" thought the young man.

"I don't like the way you say that," said Daisy. "It's too imperious."

"I beg your pardon if I say it wrong. The main point is to give you an idea of my meaning."

The young girl looked at him more gravely, but with eyes that were prettier than ever. "I have never allowed a gentleman to dictate to me, or to interfere with anything I do." 345

"I think you have made a mistake," said Winterbourne. "You should sometimes listen to a gentleman—the right one."

Daisy began to laugh again. "I do nothing but listen to gentlemen!" she exclaimed. "Tell me if Mr. Giovanelli is the right one?"

The gentleman with the nosegay in his bosom had now perceived our two friends, and was approaching the young girl with obsequious rapidity. He bowed to Winterbourne as well as to the latter's companion; he had a brilliant smile, an intelligent eye; Winterbourne thought him not a bad-looking fellow. But he nevertheless said to Daisy—"No, he's not the right one."

Daisy evidently had a natural talent for performing introductions; she also mentioned the name of each of her companions to the other. She strolled along with one of them on each side of her; Mr. Giovanelli, who spoke English very cleverly—Winterbourne afterwards learned that he had practised the idiom upon a great many American heiresses—addressed her a great deal of very polite nonsense; he was extremely urbane, and the young American, who said nothing, reflected upon that profundity of Italian cleverness which enables people to appear more gracious in proportion as they are more acutely disappointed. Giovanelli, of course, had counted upon something more intimate; he had not bargained for a party of three. But he kept his temper in a manner which suggested far-stretching intentions. Winterbourne flattered himself that he had taken his measure. "He is not a gentleman," said the young American; "he is only a clever imitation of one. He is a music-master, or a penny-a-liner, or a third-rate artist. Damn his good looks!" Mr. Giovanelli had certainly a very pretty face; but Winterbourne felt a superior indignation at his own lovely fellow-countrywoman's not knowing the difference between a spurious gentleman and a real one. Giovanelli chattered and jested and made himself wonderfully agreeable. It was true that if he was an imitation the imitation was brilliant. “Nevertheless,” Winterbourne said to himself, “a nice girl ought to know!” And then he came back to the question whether this was in fact a nice girl. Would a nice girl—even allowing for her being a little American flirt—make a rendezvous with a presumably low-lived foreigner? The rendezvous in this case, indeed, had been in broad day-light, and in the most crowded corner of Rome; but was it not impossible to regard the choice of these circumstances as a proof of extreme cynicism? Singular though it may seem, Winterbourne was vexed that the young girl, in joining her amoroso, should not appear more impatient of his own company, and he was vexed because of his inclination. It was impossible to regard her as a perfectly well-conducted young lady; she was wanting in a certain indispensable delicacy. It would therefore simplify matters greatly to be able to treat her as the object of one of those sentiments which are called by romancers “lawless passions.” That she should seem to wish to get rid of him would help him to think more lightly of her, and to be able to think more lightly of her would make her much less perplexing. But Daisy, on this occasion, continued to present herself as an inscrutable combination of audacity and innocence.

She had been walking some quarter of an hour, attended by her two cavaliers, and responding in a tone of very childish gaiety, as it seemed to Winterbourne, to the pretty speeches of Mr. Giovanelli, when a carriage that had detached itself from the revolving train drew up beside the path. At the same moment Winterbourne perceived that his friend Mrs. Walker—the lady whose house he had lately left—was seated in the vehicle and was beckoning to him. Leaving Miss Miller’s side, he hastened to obey her summons. Mrs. Walker was flushed; she wore an excited air. “It is really too dreadful,” she said. “That girl must not do this sort of thing. She must not walk here with you two men. Fifty people have noticed her.”

Winterbourne raised his eyebrows. “I think it’s a pity to make too much fuss about it.”

“She is very innocent,” said Winterbourne.

“She’s very crazy!” cried Mrs. Walker. “Did you ever see anything so imbecile as her mother? After you had all left me, just now, I could not sit still for thinking of it. It seemed too pitiful, not even to attempt to save her. I ordered the carriage and put on my bonnet, and came here as quickly as possible. Thank heaven, I have found you!”

“What do you propose to do with us?” asked Winterbourne, smiling.

“To ask her to get in, to drive her about here for half-an-hour, so that the world may see she is not running absolutely wild, and then to take her safely home.”

“I don’t think it’s a very happy thought,” said Winterbourne; “but you can try.”

Mrs. Walker tried. The young man went in pursuit of Miss Miller, who had simply nodded and smiled at his interlocutor in the carriage, and had gone her way with her companion. Daisy, on learning that Mrs. Walker wished to speak to her, retraced her steps with a perfect good grace and with Mr. Giovanelli at her side. She declared that she was delighted to have a chance to present this gentleman to Mrs. Walker. She immediately achieved the introduction, and declared that she had never in her life seen anything so lovely as Mrs. Walker’s carriage-rug.

"I am glad you admire it," said this lady, smiling sweetly. "Will you get in and let me put it over you?"

"Oh, no, thank you," said Daisy. "I shall admire it much more as I see you driving round with it." 360

"Do get in and drive with me," said Mrs. Walker.

"That would be charming, but it's so enchanting just as I am!" and Daisy gave a brilliant glance at the gentlemen on either side of her.

"It may be enchanting, dear child, but it is not the custom here," urged Mrs. Walker, leaning forward in her victoria<sup>27</sup> with her hands devoutly clasped.

"Well, it ought to be, then!" said Daisy. "If I didn't walk I should expire."

"You should walk with your mother, dear," cried the lady from Geneva, losing patience. 365

"With my mother dear!" exclaimed the young girl. Winterbourne saw that she scented interference. "My mother never walked ten steps in her life. And then, you know," she added with a laugh, "I am more than five years old."

"You are old enough to be more reasonable. You are old enough, dear Miss Miller, to be talked about."

Daisy looked at Mrs. Walker, smiling intensely. "Talked about? What do you mean?"

"Come into my carriage and I will tell you."

Daisy turned her quickened glance again from one of the gentlemen beside her to the other. Mr. Giovanelli was bowing to and fro, rubbing down his gloves and laughing very agreeably; Winterbourne thought it a most unpleasant scene. "I don't think I want to know what you mean," said Daisy presently. "I don't think I should like it." 370

Winterbourne wished that Mrs. Walker would tuck in her carriage-rug and drive away; but this lady did not enjoy being defied, as she afterwards told him. "Should you prefer being thought a very reckless girl?" she demanded.

"Gracious!" exclaimed Daisy. She looked again at Mr. Giovanelli, then she turned to Winterbourne. There was a little pink flush in her cheek; she was tremendously pretty. "Does Mr. Winterbourne think," she asked slowly, smiling, throwing back her head and glancing at him from head to foot, "that—to save my reputation—I ought to get into the carriage?"

Winterbourne coloured; for an instant he hesitated greatly. It seemed so strange to hear her speak that way of her "reputation." But he himself, in fact, must speak in accordance with gallantry. The finest gallantry, here, was simply to tell her the truth; and the truth, for Winterbourne, as the few indications I have been able to give have made him known to the reader, was that Daisy Miller should take Mrs. Walker's advice. He looked at her exquisite prettiness; and then he said very gently, "I think you should get into the carriage."

Daisy gave a violent laugh. "I never heard anything so stiff! If this is improper, Mrs. Walker," she pursued, "then I am all improper, and you must give me up. Good-by;

I hope you'll have a lovely ride!" and, with Mr. Giovanelli, who made a triumphantly obsequious salute, she turned away.

Mrs. Walker sat looking after her, and there were tears in Mrs. Walker's eyes. "Get in here, sir," she said to Winterbourne, indicating the place beside her. The young man answered that he felt bound to accompany Miss Miller; whereupon Mrs. Walker declared that if he refused her this favour she would never speak to him again. She was evidently in earnest. Winterbourne overtook Daisy and her companion and, offering the young girl his hand, told her that Mrs. Walker had made an imperious claim upon his society. He expected that in answer she would say something rather free, something to commit herself still further to that "recklessness" from which Mrs. Walker had so charitably endeavoured to dissuade her. But she only shook his hand, hardly looking at him; while Mr. Giovanelli bade him farewell with a too-emphatic flourish of the hat.

Winterbourne was not in the best possible humour as he took his seat in Mrs. Walker's victoria. "That was not clever of you," he said candidly, while the vehicle mingled again with the throng of carriages.

"In such a case," his companion answered, "I don't wish to be clever, I wish to be earnest!"

"Well, your earnestness has only offended her and put her off."

"It has happened very well," said Mrs. Walker. "If she is so perfectly determined to compromise herself, the sooner one knows it the better; one can act accordingly."

"I suspect she meant no harm," Winterbourne rejoined.

380

"So I thought a month ago. But she has been going too far."

"What has she been doing?"

"Everything that is not done here. Flirting with any man she could pick up; sitting in corners with mysterious Italians; dancing all the evening with the same partners; receiving visits at eleven o'clock at night. Her mother goes away when visitors come."

"But her brother," said Winterbourne, laughing, "sits up till midnight."

"He must be edified by what he sees. I'm told that at their hotel every one is talking about her, and that a smile goes round among all the servants when a gentleman comes and asks for Miss Miller."

385

"The servants be hanged!" said Winterbourne angrily. "The poor girl's only fault," he presently added, "is that she is very uncultivated."

"She is naturally indelicate," Mrs. Walker declared. "Take that example this morning. How long had you known her at Vevey?"

"A couple of days."

"Fancy, then, her making it a personal matter that you should have left the place!"

Winterbourne was silent for some moments, then he said, "I suspect, Mrs. Walker, that you and I have lived too long at Geneva!" And he added a request that she should inform him with what particular design she had made him enter her carriage.

390

"I wished to beg you to cease your relations with Miss Miller—not to flirt with her—to give her no further opportunity to expose herself—to let her alone, in short."

"I'm afraid I can't do that," said Winterbourne. "I like her extremely."

"All the more reason that you shouldn't help her to make a scandal."

"There shall be nothing scandalous in my attentions to her."

"There certainly will be in the way she takes them. But I have said what I had on my conscience," Mrs. Walker pursued. "If you wish to rejoin the young lady I will put you down. Here, by-the-way, you have a chance."

395

The carriage was traversing that part of the Pincian Garden that overhangs the wall of Rome and overlooks the beautiful Villa Borghese. It is bordered by a large parapet, near which there are several seats. One of the seats, at a distance, was occupied by a gentleman and a lady, towards whom Mrs. Walker gave a toss of her head. At the same moment these persons rose and walked towards the parapet. Winterbourne had asked the coachman to stop; he now descended from the carriage. His companion looked at him a moment in silence; then, while he raised his hat, she drove majestically away. Winterbourne stood there; he had turned his eyes towards Daisy and her cavalier. They evidently saw no one; they were too deeply occupied with each other. When they reached the low garden wall, they stood a moment looking off at the great flat-topped pine-clusters of the Villa Borghese; then Giovanelli seated himself, familiarly, upon the broad ledge of the wall. The western sun in the opposite sky sent out a brilliant shaft through a couple of cloud-bars, whereupon Daisy's companion took her parasol out of her hands and opened it. She came a little nearer and he held the parasol over her; then, still holding it, he let it rest upon her shoulder, so that both of their heads were hidden from Winterbourne. This young man lingered a moment, then he began to walk. But he walked—not towards the couple with the parasol; towards the residence of his aunt, Mrs. Costello.

He flattered himself on the following day that there was no smiling among the servants when he, at least, asked for Mrs. Miller at her hotel. This lady and her daughter, however, were not at home; and on the next day after, repeating his visit, Winterbourne again had the misfortune not to find them. Mrs. Walker's party took place on the evening of the third day, and in spite of the frigidity of his last interview with the hostess, Winterbourne was among the guests. Mrs. Walker was one of those American ladies who, while residing abroad, make a point, in their own phrase, of studying European society; and she had on this occasion collected several specimens of her diversely-born fellow-mortals to serve, as it were, as text-books. When Winterbourne arrived Daisy Miller was not there, but in a few moments he saw her mother come in alone, very shyly and ruefully. Mrs. Miller's hair above her exposed-looking temples was more frizzled than ever. As she approached Mrs. Walker, Winterbourne also drew near.

"You see I've come all alone," said poor Mrs. Miller. "I'm so frightened; I don't know what to do; it's the first time I've ever been to a party alone—especially in this country. I wanted to bring Randolph or Eugenio, or someone, but Daisy just pushed me off by myself. I ain't used to going round alone."

"And does not your daughter intend to favour us with her society?" demanded Mrs. Walker, impressively.

"Well, Daisy's all dressed," said Mrs. Miller, with that accent of the dispassionate, if not of the philosophic, historian with which she always recorded the current incidents of her daughter's career. "She got dressed on purpose before dinner. But she's got a friend of hers there; that gentleman—the Italian—that she wanted to bring. They've got going at the piano; it seems as if they couldn't leave off. Mr. Giovanelli sings splendidly. But I guess they'll come before very long," concluded Mrs. Miller hopefully.

400

"I'm sorry she should come—in that way," said Mrs. Walker.

"Well, I told her that there was no use in her getting dressed before dinner if she was going to wait three hours," responded Daisy's mamma. "I didn't see the use of her putting on such a dress as that to sit round with Mr. Giovanelli."

"This is most horrible!" said Mrs. Walker, turning away and addressing herself to Winterbourne. "Elle s'affiche."<sup>28</sup> It's her revenge for my having ventured to remonstrate with her. When she comes I shall not speak to her."

Daisy came after eleven o'clock, but she was not, on such an occasion, a young lady to wait to be spoken to. She rustled forward in radiant loveliness, smiling and chattering, carrying a large bouquet and attended by Mr. Giovanelli. Everyone stopped talking, and turned and looked at her. She came straight to Mrs. Walker. "I'm afraid you thought I never was coming, so I sent mother off to tell you. I wanted to make Mr. Giovanelli practise some things before he came; you know he sings beautifully, and I want you to ask him to sing. This is Mr. Giovanelli; you know I introduced him to you; he's got the most lovely voice and he knows the most charming set of songs. I made him go over them this evening, on purpose; we had the greatest time at the hotel." Of all this Daisy delivered herself with the sweetest, brightest audibleness, looking now at her hostess and now round the room, while she gave a series of little pats, round her shoulders, to the edges of her dress. "Is there anyone I know?" she asked.

"I think every one knows you!" said Mrs. Walker pregnantly, and she gave a very cursory greeting to Mr. Giovanelli. This gentleman bore himself gallantly. He smiled and bowed and showed his white teeth, he curled his moustaches and rolled his eyes, and performed all the proper functions of a handsome Italian at an evening party. He sang, very prettily, half-a-dozen songs, though Mrs. Walker afterwards declared that she had been quite unable to find out who asked him. It was apparently not Daisy who had given him his orders. Daisy sat at a distance from the piano, and though she had publicly, as it were, professed a high admiration for his singing, talked, not inaudibly, while it was going on.

"It's a pity these rooms are so small; we can't dance," she said to Winterbourne as if she had seen him five minutes before.

"I am not sorry we can't dance," Winterbourne answered; "I don't dance."

"Of course you don't dance; you're too stiff," said Miss Daisy. "I hope you enjoyed your drive with Mrs. Walker."

"No, I didn't enjoy it; I preferred walking with you."

"We paired off, that was much better," said Daisy. "But did you ever hear anything so cool as Mrs. Walker's wanting me to get into her carriage and drop poor Mr. Giovanelli, and under the pretext that it was proper? People have different ideas! It would have been most unkind; he had been talking about that walk for ten days."

"He should not have talked about it at all," said Winterbourne; "he would never have proposed to a young lady of this country to walk about the streets with him."

"About the streets?" cried Daisy, with her pretty stare. "Where then would he have proposed to her to walk? The Pincio is not the streets, either; and I, thank goodness, am not a young lady of this country. The young ladies of this country have a dreadfully poky time of it, so far as I can learn; I don't see why I should change my habits for them."

"I am afraid your habits are those of a flirt," said Winterbourne gravely.

"Of course they are," she cried, giving him her little smiling stare again. "I'm a fearful, frightful flirt! Did you ever hear of a nice girl that was not? But I suppose you will tell me now that I am not a nice girl."

"You're a very nice girl, but I wish you would flirt with me and me only," said Winterbourne. 415

"Ah! thank you, thank you very much; you are the last man I should think of flirting with. As I have had the pleasure of informing you, you are too stiff."

"You say that too often," said Winterbourne.

Daisy gave a delighted laugh. "If I could have the sweet hope of making you angry, I should say it again."

"Don't do that; when I am angry I'm stiffer than ever. But if you won't flirt with me, do cease at least to flirt with your friend at the piano; they don't understand that sort of thing here."

"I thought they understood nothing else!" exclaimed Daisy. 420

"Not in young unmarried women."

"It seems to me much more proper in young unmarried women than in old married ones," Daisy declared.

"Well," said Winterbourne, "when you deal with natives you must go by the custom of the place. Flirting is a purely American custom; it doesn't exist here. So when you show yourself in public with Mr. Giovanelli and without your mother—"

"Gracious! poor mother!" interposed Daisy.

"Though you may be flirting, Mr. Giovanelli is not; he means something else." 425

"He isn't preaching, at any rate," said Daisy with vivacity. "And if you want very much to know, we are neither of us flirting, we are too good friends for that; we are very intimate friends."

"Ah!" rejoined Winterbourne, "if you are in love with each other it is another affair."

She had allowed him up to this point to talk so frankly that he had no expectation of shocking her by this ejaculation; but she immediately got up, blushing visibly, and leaving him to exclaim mentally that little American flirts were the queerest creatures in the world. "Mr. Giovanelli, at least," she said, giving her interlocutor a single glance, "never says such very disagreeable things to me."

Winterbourne was bewildered; he stood staring. Mr. Giovanelli had finished singing; he left the piano and came over to Daisy. "Won't you come into the other room and have some tea?" he asked, bending before her with his ornamental smile.

Daisy turned to Winterbourne, beginning to smile again. He was still more perplexed, for this inconsequent smile made nothing clear, though it seemed to prove, indeed, that she had a sweetness and softness that reverted instinctively to the pardon of offences. "It has never occurred to Mr. Winterbourne to offer me any tea," she said, with her little tormenting manner.

"I have offered you advice," Winterbourne rejoined.

"I prefer weak tea!" cried Daisy, and she went off with the brilliant Giovanelli. She sat with him in the adjoining room, in the embrasure of the window, for the rest of the evening. There was an interesting performance at the piano, but neither of these young people gave heed to it. When Daisy came to take leave of Mrs. Walker, this lady conscientiously repaired the weakness of which she had been guilty at the moment of the young girl's arrival. She turned her back straight upon Miss Miller and left her to depart with what grace she might. Winterbourne was standing near the door; he saw it all. Daisy turned very pale and looked at her mother, but Mrs. Miller was humbly unconscious of any violation of the usual social forms. She appeared, indeed, to have felt an incongruous impulse to draw attention to her own striking observance of them. "Good-night, Mrs. Walker," she said; "we've had a beautiful evening. You see if I let Daisy come to parties without me, I don't want her to go away without me." Daisy turned away, looking with a pale, grave face at the circle near the door; Winterbourne saw that, for the first moment, she was too much shocked and puzzled even for indignation. He on his side was greatly touched.

"That was very cruel," he said to Mrs. Walker.

"She never enters my drawing-room again," replied his hostess.

Since Winterbourne was not to meet her in Mrs. Walker's drawing-room, he went as often as possible to Mrs. Miller's hotel. The ladies were rarely at home, but when he found them the devoted Giovanelli was always present. Very often the brilliant little Roman was in the drawing-room with Daisy alone, Mrs. Miller being apparently constantly of the opinion that discretion is the better part of surveillance. Winterbourne noted, at first with surprise, that Daisy on these occasions was never embarrassed or annoyed by his own entrance; but he very presently began to feel that she had no more surprises for him; the unexpected in her behaviour was the only thing to expect. She showed no displeasure at her tête-à-tête with Giovanelli being interrupted; she could chatter as freshly and freely with two gentlemen as with one; there was always, in her conversation, the same odd mixture of audacity and puerility. Winterbourne remarked to himself that if she was seriously interested in Giovanelli, it was very singular that she should not take more trouble to preserve the sanctity of their interviews, and he liked her the more for her innocent-looking indifference and her apparently inexhaustible good humour. He could hardly have said why, but she seemed to him a girl who would never be jealous. At the risk of exciting a somewhat derisive smile on the reader's part, I may affirm that with regard to the women who had hitherto interested him, it very often seemed to Winterbourne among the possibilities that, given certain contingencies, he should be afraid—literally afraid—of these ladies; he had a pleasant sense that he should never be afraid of Daisy Miller. It must be added that this sentiment was not altogether flattering to Daisy; it was part of his conviction, or rather of his apprehension, that she would prove a very light young person.

But she was evidently very much interested in Giovanelli. She looked at him whenever he spoke; she was perpetually telling him to do this and to do that; she was constantly “chaffing” and abusing him. She appeared completely to have forgotten that Winterbourne had said anything to displease her at Mrs. Walker’s little party. One Sunday afternoon, having gone to St. Peter’s with his aunt, Winterbourne perceived Daisy strolling about the great church in company with the inevitable Giovanelli. Presently he pointed out the young girl and her cavalier to Mrs. Costello. This lady looked at them a moment through her eyeglass, and then she said:

“That’s what makes you so pensive in these days, eh?”

“I had not the least idea I was pensive,” said the young man.

“You are very much pre-occupied, you are thinking of something.”

“And what is it,” he asked, “that you accuse me of thinking of?”

440

“Of that young lady’s—Miss Baker’s, Miss Chandler’s—what’s her name? Miss Miller’s intrigue with that little barber’s block.”

“Do you call it an intrigue,” Winterbourne asked—“an affair that goes on with such peculiar publicity?”

“That’s their folly,” said Mrs. Costello, “it’s not their merit.”

“No,” rejoined Winterbourne, with something of that pensiveness to which his aunt had alluded. “I don’t believe that there is anything to be called an intrigue.”

“I have heard a dozen people speak of it; they say she is quite carried away by him.”

445

“They are certainly very intimate,” said Winterbourne.

Mrs. Costello inspected the young couple again with her optical instrument. “He is very handsome. One easily sees how it is. She thinks him the most elegant man in the world, the finest gentleman. She has never seen anything like him; he is better even than the courier. It was the courier probably who introduced him, and if he succeeds in marrying the young lady, the courier will come in for a magnificent commission.”

“I don’t believe she thinks of marrying him,” said Winterbourne, “and I don’t believe he hopes to marry her.”

“You may be very sure she thinks of nothing. She goes on from day to day, from hour to hour, as they did in the Golden Age. I can imagine nothing more vulgar. And at the same time,” added Mrs. Costello, “depend upon it that she may tell you any moment that she is ‘engaged.’”

“I think that is more than Giovanelli expects,” said Winterbourne.

“Who is Giovanelli?”

“The little Italian. I have asked questions about him and learned something. He is apparently a perfectly respectable little man. I believe he is, in a small way, a cavaliere avvocato.<sup>29</sup> But he doesn’t move in what are called the first circles. I think it is really not absolutely impossible that the courier introduced him. He is evidently immensely charmed with Miss Miller. If she thinks him the finest gentleman in the world, he, on his side, has never found himself in personal contact with such splendour, such opulence, such expensiveness, as this young lady's. And then she must seem to him wonderfully pretty and interesting. I rather doubt that he dreams of marrying her. That must appear to him too impossible a piece of luck. He has nothing but his handsome face to offer, and there is a substantial Mr. Miller in that mysterious land of dollars. Giovannelli knows that he hasn't a title to offer. If he were only a count or a marchese!<sup>30</sup> He must wonder at his luck at the way they have taken him up."

"He accounts for it by his handsome face, and thinks Miss Miller a young lady qui se passe ses fantaisies!"<sup>31</sup> said Mrs. Costello.

"It is very true," Winterbourne pursued, "that Daisy and her mamma have not yet risen to that stage of—what shall I call it?—of culture, at which the idea of catching a count or a marchese begins. I believe that they are intellectually incapable of that conception."

"Ah! but the avvocato can't believe it," said Mrs. Costello.

Of the observation excited by Daisy's "intrigue," Winterbourne gathered that day at St. Peter's sufficient evidence. A dozen of the American colonists in Rome came to talk with Mrs. Costello, who sat on a little portable stool at the base of one of the great pilasters. The vesper service was going forward in splendid chants and organ-tones in the adjacent choir, and meanwhile, between Mrs. Costello and her friends, there was a great deal said about poor little Miss Miller's going really "too far." Winterbourne was not pleased with what he heard; but when, coming out upon the great steps of the church, he saw Daisy, who had emerged before him, get into an open cab with her accomplice and roll away through the cynical streets of Rome, he could not deny to himself that she was going very far indeed. He felt very sorry for her—not exactly that he believed that she had completely lost her head, but because it was painful to hear so much that was pretty, and undefended, and natural, assigned to a vulgar place among the categories of disorder. He made an attempt after this to give a hint to Mrs. Miller. He met one day in the Corso<sup>32</sup> a friend—a tourist like himself—who had just come out of the Doria Palace, where he had been walking through the beautiful gallery. His friend talked for a moment about the superb portrait of Innocent X by Velasquez,<sup>33</sup> which hangs in one of the cabinets of the palace, and then said, "And in the same cabinet, by-the-way, I had the pleasure of contemplating a picture of a different kind—that pretty American girl whom you pointed out to me last week." In answer to Winterbourne's inquiries, his friend narrated that the pretty American girl—prettier than ever—was seated with a companion in the secluded nook in which the great papal portrait was enshrined.

"Who was her companion?" asked Winterbourne.

"A little Italian with a bouquet in his buttonhole. The girl is delightfully pretty, but I thought I understood from you the other day that she was a young lady du meilleur monde."<sup>34</sup>

"So she is!" answered Winterbourne; and having assured himself that his informant had seen Daisy and her companion but five minutes before, he jumped into a cab and went to call on Mrs. Miller. She was at home; but she apologised to him for receiving him in Daisy's absence.

"She's gone out somewhere with Mr. Giovanelli," said Mrs. Miller. "She's always going round with Mr. Giovanelli." 460

"I have noticed that they are very intimate," Winterbourne observed.

"Oh! it seems as if they couldn't live without each other!" said Mrs. Miller. "Well, he's a real gentleman anyhow. I keep telling Daisy she's engaged!"

"And what does Daisy say?"

"Oh, she says she isn't engaged. But she might as well be!" this impartial parent resumed. "She goes on as if she was. But I've made Mr. Giovanelli promise to tell me, if she doesn't. I should want to write to Mr. Miller about it — shouldn't you?"

Winterbourne replied that he certainly should; and the state of mind of Daisy's mamma struck him as so unprecedented in the annals of parental vigilance that he gave up as utterly irrelevant the attempt to place her upon her guard. 465

After this Daisy was never at home, and Winterbourne ceased to meet her at the houses of their common acquaintance, because, as he perceived, these shrewd people had quite made up their minds that she was going too far. They ceased to invite her, and they intimated that they desired to express to observant Europeans the great truth that, though Miss Daisy Miller was a young American lady, her behaviour was not representative — was regarded by her compatriots as abnormal. Winterbourne wondered how she felt about all the cold shoulders that were turned towards her, and sometimes it annoyed him to suspect that she did not feel at all. He said to himself that she was too light and childish, too uncultivated and unreasoning, too provincial, to have reflected upon her ostracism or even to have perceived it. Then at other moments he believed that she carried about in her elegant and irresponsible little organism a defiant, passionate, perfectly observant consciousness of the impression she produced. He asked himself whether Daisy's defiance came from the consciousness of innocence or from her being, essentially, a young person of the reckless class. It must be admitted that holding oneself to a belief in Daisy's "innocence" came to seem to Winterbourne more and more a matter of fine-spun gallantry. As I have already had occasion to relate, he was angry at finding himself reduced to chopping logic about this young lady; he was vexed at his want of instinctive certitude as to how far her eccentricities were generic, national, and how far they were personal. From either view of them he had somehow missed her, and now it was too late. She was "carried away" by Mr. Giovanelli.

A few days after his brief interview with her mother, he encountered her in that beautiful abode of flowering desolation known as the Palace of the Caesars. The early Roman spring had filled the air with bloom and perfume, and the rugged surface of the Palatine was muffled with tender verdure. Daisy was strolling along the top of one of those great mounds of ruin that are embanked with mossy marble and paved with monumental inscriptions. It seemed to him that Rome had never been so lovely as just then. He stood looking off at the enchanting harmony of line and colour that remotely encircles the city, inhaling the softly humid odours and feeling the freshness of the year and the antiquity of the place reaffirm themselves in mysterious interfusion. It seemed to him also that Daisy had never looked so pretty; but this had been an observation of his whenever he met her. Giovanelli was at her side, and Giovanelli, too, wore an aspect of even unwonted brilliancy.

"Well," said Daisy, "I should think you would be lonesome!"

"Lonesome?" asked Winterbourne.

"You are always going round by yourself. Can't you get anyone to walk with you?" 470

"I am not so fortunate," said Winterbourne, "as your companion."

Giovanelli, from the first, had treated Winterbourne with distinguished politeness; he listened with a deferential air to his remarks; he laughed, punctiliously, at his pleasantries; he seemed disposed to testify to his belief that Winterbourne was a superior young man. He carried himself in no degree like a jealous wooer; he had obviously a great deal of tact; he had no objection to your expecting a little humility of him. It even seemed to Winterbourne at times that Giovanelli would find a certain mental relief in being able to have a private understanding with him—to say to him, as an intelligent man, that, bless you, he knew how extraordinary was this young lady, and didn't flatter himself with delusive—or at least too delusive—hopes of matrimony and dollars. On this occasion he strolled away from his companion to pluck a sprig of almond-blossom, which he carefully arranged in his button-hole.

"I know why you say that," said Daisy, watching Giovanelli. "Because you think I go round too much with him!" And she nodded at her attendant.

"Every one thinks so—if you care to know," said Winterbourne.

"Of course I care to know!" Daisy exclaimed seriously. "But I don't believe it. They are only pretending to be shocked. They don't really care a straw what I do. Besides, I don't go round so much." 475

"I think you will find they do care. They will show it—disagreeably."

Daisy looked at him a moment. "How—disagreeably?"

"Haven't you noticed anything?" Winterbourne asked.

"I have noticed you. But I noticed you were as stiff as an umbrella the first time I saw you."

"You will find I am not so stiff as several others," said Winterbourne, smiling. 480

"How shall I find it?"

"By going to see the others."

"What will they do to me?"

"They will give you the cold shoulder. Do you know what that means?"

Daisy was looking at him intently; she began to colour. "Do you mean as Mrs. Walker did the other night?" 485

"Exactly!" said Winterbourne.

She looked away at Giovanelli, who was decorating himself with his almond-blossom. Then looking back at Winterbourne—"I shouldn't think you would let people be so unkind!" she said.

"How can I help it?" he asked.

"I should think you would say something."

"I do say something"; and he paused a moment. "I say that your mother tells me that she believes you are engaged."

490

"Well, she does," said Daisy very simply.

Winterbourne began to laugh. "And does Randolph believe it?" he asked.

"I guess Randolph doesn't believe anything," said Daisy. Randolph's scepticism excited Winterbourne to further hilarity, and he observed that Giovanelli was coming back to them. Daisy, observing it too, addressed herself again to her countryman. "Since you have mentioned it," she said, "I am engaged." . . . Winterbourne looked at her; he had stopped laughing. "You don't believe it!" she added.

He was silent a moment; and then, "Yes, I believe it!" he said.

"Oh, no, you don't," she answered. "Well, then—I am not!"

495

The young girl and her cicerone were on their way to the gate of the enclosure, so that Winterbourne, who had but lately entered, presently took leave of them. A week afterwards he went to dine at a beautiful villa on the Caelian Hill, and, on arriving, dismissed his hired vehicle. The evening was charming, and he promised himself the satisfaction of walking home beneath the Arch of Constantine and past the vaguely-lighted monuments of the Forum. There was a waning moon in the sky, and her radiance was not brilliant, but she was veiled in a thin cloud-curtain which seemed to diffuse and equalise it. When, on his return from the villa (it was eleven o'clock), Winterbourne approached the dusky circle of the Colosseum, it recurred to him, as a lover of the picturesque, that the interior, in the pale moonshine, would be well worth a glance. He turned aside and walked to one of the empty arches, near which, as he observed, an open carriage—one of the little Roman street-cabs—was stationed. Then he passed in, among the cavernous shadows of the great structure, and emerged upon the clear and silent arena. The place had never seemed to him more impressive. One-half of the gigantic circus was in deep shade; the other was sleeping in the luminous dusk. As he stood there he began to murmur Byron's famous lines, out of "Manfred"; but before he had finished his quotation he remembered that if nocturnal meditations in the Colosseum are recommended by the poets, they are deprecated by the doctors. The historic atmosphere was there, certainly; but the historic atmosphere, scientifically considered, was no better than a villainous miasma. Winterbourne walked to the middle of the arena, to take a more general glance, intending thereafter to make a hasty retreat. The great cross in the centre was covered with shadow; it was only as he drew near it that he made it out distinctly. Then he saw that two persons were stationed upon the low steps which formed its base. One of these was a woman, seated; her companion was standing in front of her.

Presently the sound of the woman's voice came to him distinctly in the warm night-air. "Well, he looks at us as one of the old lions or tigers may have looked at the Christian martyrs!" These were the words he heard, in the familiar accent of Miss Daisy Miller.

"Let us hope he is not very hungry," responded the ingenious Giovanelli. "He will have to take me first; you will serve for dessert!"

Winterbourne stopped, with a sort of horror; and, it must be added, with a sort of relief. It was as if a sudden illumination had been flashed upon the ambiguity of Daisy's behaviour and the riddle had become easy to read. She was a young lady whom a gentleman need no longer be at pains to respect. He stood there looking at her — looking at her companion, and not reflecting that though he saw them vaguely, he himself must have been more brightly visible. He felt angry with himself that he had bothered so much about the right way of regarding Miss Daisy Miller. Then, as he was going to advance again, he checked himself; not from the fear that he was doing her injustice, but from a sense of the danger of appearing unbecomingly exhilarated by this sudden revulsion from cautious criticism. He turned away towards the entrance of the place; but as he did so he heard Daisy speak again.

"Why, it was Mr. Winterbourne! He saw me—and he cuts me!"

500

What a clever little reprobate she was, and how smartly she played at injured innocence! But he wouldn't cut her. Winterbourne came forward again, and went towards the great cross. Daisy had got up; Giovanelli lifted his hat. Winterbourne had now begun to think simply of the craziness, from a sanitary point of view, of a delicate young girl lounging away the evening in this nest of malaria. What if she were a clever little reprobate? that was no reason for her dying of the perniciosa.<sup>35</sup> "How long have you been here?" he asked, almost brutally.

Daisy, lovely in the flattering moonlight, looked at him a moment. Then—"All the evening," she answered gently. . . . "I never saw anything so pretty."

"I am afraid," said Winterbourne, "that you will not think Roman fever very pretty. This is the way people catch it. I wonder," he added, turning to Giovanelli, "that you, a native Roman, should countenance such a terrible indiscretion."

"Ah," said the handsome native, "for myself, I am not afraid."

"Neither am I—for you! I am speaking for this young lady."

505

Giovanelli lifted his well-shaped eyebrows and showed his brilliant teeth. But he took Winterbourne's rebuke with docility. "I told the Signorina it was a grave indiscretion; but when was the Signorina ever prudent?"

"I never was sick, and I don't mean to be!" the Signorina declared. "I don't look like much, but I'm healthy! I was bound to see the Colosseum by moonlight; I shouldn't have wanted to go home without that; and we have had the most beautiful time, haven't we, Mr. Giovanelli? If there has been any danger, Eugenio can give me some pills. He has got some splendid pills."

"I should advise you," said Winterbourne, "to drive home as fast as possible and take one!"

"What you say is very wise," Giovanelli rejoined. "I will go and make sure the carriage is at hand." And he went forward rapidly.

Daisy followed with Winterbourne. He kept looking at her; she seemed not in the least embarrassed. Winterbourne said nothing; Daisy chattered about the beauty of the place. "Well, I have seen the Colosseum by moonlight!" she exclaimed. "That's one good thing." Then, noticing Winterbourne's silence, she asked him why he didn't speak. He made no answer; he only began to laugh. They passed under one of the dark archways; Giovanelli was in front with the carriage. Here Daisy stopped a moment, looking at the young American. "Did you believe I was engaged the other day?" she asked.

"It doesn't matter what I believed the other day," said Winterbourne, still laughing.

"Well, what do you believe now?"

"I believe that it makes very little difference whether you are engaged or not!"

He felt the young girl's pretty eyes fixed upon him through the thick gloom of the archway; she was apparently going to answer. But Giovanelli hurried her forward. "Quick, quick," he said; "if we get in by midnight we are quite safe."

Daisy took her seat in the carriage, and the fortunate Italian placed himself beside her. "Don't forget Eugenio's pills!" said Winterbourne, as he lifted his hat.

"I don't care," said Daisy, in a little strange tone, "whether I have Roman fever or not!" Upon this the cab-driver cracked his whip, and they rolled away over the desultory patches of the antique pavement.

Winterbourne—to do him justice, as it were—mentioned to no one that he had encountered Miss Miller, at midnight, in the Colosseum with a gentleman; but nevertheless, a couple of days later, the fact of her having been there under these circumstances was known to every member of the little American circle, and commented accordingly. Winterbourne reflected that they had of course known it at the hotel, and that, after Daisy's return, there had been an exchange of remarks between the porter and the cab-driver. But the young man was conscious at the same moment that it had ceased to be a matter of serious regret to him that the little American flirt should be "talked about" by low-minded menials. These people, a day or two later, had serious information to give: the little American flirt was alarmingly ill. Winterbourne, when the rumour came to him, immediately went to the hotel for more news. He found that two or three charitable friends had preceded him, and that they were being entertained in Mrs. Miller's salon by Randolph.

"It's going round at night," said Randolph—"that's what made her sick. She's always going round at night. I shouldn't think she'd want to—it's so plaguey dark. You can't see anything here at night, except when there's a moon. In America there's always a moon!" Mrs. Miller was invisible; she was now, at least, giving her daughter the advantage of her society. It was evident that Daisy was dangerously ill.

Winterbourne went often to ask for news of her, and once he saw Mrs. Miller, who, though deeply alarmed, was—rather to his surprise—perfectly composed, and, as it appeared, a most efficient and judicious nurse. She talked a good deal about Dr. Davis, but Winterbourne paid her the compliment of saying to himself that she was not, after all, such a monstrous goose. "Daisy spoke of you the other day," she said to him. "Half the time she doesn't know what she's saying, but that time I think she did. She gave me a message; she told me to tell you. She told me to tell you that she never was engaged to that handsome Italian. I am sure I am very glad; Mr. Giovanelli hasn't been near us since she was taken ill. I thought he was so much of a gentleman; but I don't call that very polite! A lady told me that he was afraid I was angry with him for taking Daisy round at night. Well, so I am; but I suppose he knows I'm a lady. I would scorn to scold him. Any way, she says she's not engaged. I don't know why she wanted you to know; but she said to me three times—"Mind you tell Mr. Winterbourne." And then she told me to ask if you remembered the time you went to that castle, in Switzerland. But I said I wouldn't give any such messages as that. Only, if she is not engaged, I'm sure I'm glad to know it."

But, as Winterbourne had said, it mattered very little. A week after this the poor girl died; it had been a terrible case of the fever. Daisy's grave was in the little Protestant cemetery, in an angle of the wall of imperial Rome, beneath the cypresses and the thick spring-flowers. Winterbourne stood there beside it, with a number of other mourners; a number larger than the scandal excited by the young lady's career would have led you to expect. Near him stood Giovanelli, who came nearer still before Winterbourne turned away. Giovanelli was very pale; on this occasion he had no flower in his button-hole; he seemed to wish to say something. At last he said, "She was the most beautiful young lady I ever saw, and the most amiable." And then he added in a moment, "And she was the most innocent."

Winterbourne looked at him, and presently repeated his words, "And the most innocent?"

"The most innocent!"

Winterbourne felt sore and angry. "Why the devil," he asked, "did you take her to that fatal place?"

Mr. Giovanelli's urbanity was apparently imperturbable. He looked on the ground a moment, and then he said, "For myself, I had no fear; and she wanted to go."

"That was no reason!" Winterbourne declared.

525

The subtle Roman again dropped his eyes. "If she had lived, I should have got nothing. She would never have married me, I am sure."

"She would never have married you?"

"For a moment I hoped so. But no. I am sure."

Winterbourne listened to him; he stood staring at the raw protuberance among the April daisies. When he turned away again Mr. Giovanelli, with his light slow step, had retired.

Winterbourne almost immediately left Rome; but the following summer he again met his aunt, Mrs. Costello, at Vevey. Mrs. Costello was fond of Vevey. In the interval Winterbourne had often thought of Daisy Miller and her mystifying manners. One day he spoke of her to his aunt—said it was on his conscience that he had done her injustice.

530

"I am sure I don't know," said Mrs. Costello. "How did your injustice affect her?"

"She sent me a message before her death which I didn't understand at the time. But I have understood it since. She would have appreciated one's esteem."

"Is that a modest way," asked Mrs. Costello, "of saying that she would have reciprocated one's affection?"

Winterbourne offered no answer to this question; but he presently said, “You were right in that remark that you made last summer. I was booked to make a mistake. I have lived too long in foreign parts.”

Nevertheless, he went back to live at Geneva, whence there continue to come the most contradictory accounts of his motives of sojourn: a report that he is “studying” hard—an intimation that he is much interested in a very clever foreign lady.

Questions for Discussion

1. Throughout Daisy Miller, Winterbourne thinks of Daisy as a “pretty American flirt” (para. 66), a formula he fixes on to contrast her behavior with that of a coquette, a type he describes as “dangerous, terrible women, with whom one’s relations were liable to take a serious turn.” Later he tells Daisy that “flirting is a purely American custom” (para. 423). Why do you think Winterbourne keeps coming back to this formula? What are some of the things it suggests? Is this description of Daisy positive or negative—or both? Is it an adequate or fair description of her? What might it mean that he considers flirting an American custom?
2. What qualities make Randolph and Daisy unmistakably American? In what ways do they embody American values? How do they represent American culture just as it was beginning to come into its own? How are the other American characters, such as Winterbourne, Mrs. Walker, and Mrs. Costello, different from Randolph and Daisy? How are they the same? What point might James have been making in creating their differences and similarities?
3. Daisy’s family—without the father, who is back in Schenectady—is on a grand tour of Europe, which was once considered an essential activity for wealthy Americans. From what you can infer from the story, what did wealthy Americans look for on these tours? Did the Millers find what they were looking for?
4. Daisy comments on Europe in paragraph 65: “The only thing I don’t like . . . is the society. There isn’t any society; or, if there is, I don’t know where it keeps itself.” What do you think Daisy means by “society”? What is ironic about her statement?
5. Throughout the novella, Daisy visits several historical sites. The first is the Château de Chillon, which she sees with Winterbourne. It is an enormous castle on the shores of Lake Geneva dating from around 1100 c.e. and the subject of a poem by Byron called “The Prisoner of Chillon,” about the imprisonment of François Bonivard, a Swiss patriot. Another is the Colosseum in Rome, the site of gladiatorial games and the martyring of Christians. What was James communicating by having Daisy visit these sites? Consider both how they affect Daisy and what they reveal about the Old World in which Winterbourne lives.
6. The Americans living in Europe seem to have a double standard. Mrs. Costello, for example, considers Daisy’s behavior—but not Winterbourne’s—wrong when the two go to visit the Château de Chillon. Do you think Winterbourne applies a double standard to Daisy? Look carefully at the first conversation Winterbourne has with his aunt on the subject of Daisy (paras. 96–134).

7. What qualities do the two European characters—Eugenio, the courier, and Giovanelli, Daisy's Italian friend in Rome—have in common? How are they different? What, in particular, do the Americans find odious about them? What do you think is their opinion of the Americans?
8. Throughout the story, Daisy is either being referred to as “innocent” or having her innocence questioned. The word innocent can be taken several different ways. What are some of its possible meanings? Do you think Daisy is innocent? What meaning of the word would you apply to her?
9. Daisy is eventually snubbed by the wealthy American community in Rome, and Winterbourne wonders how she feels about all the “cold shoulders that were turned towards her” (para. 466). He vacillates between thinking that she hasn't noticed and imagining that she is conscious—and even proud—of the impression she's made. Does James provide enough information for the reader to judge how Daisy feels? Explain your answer.
10. In paragraph 349, Winterbourne feels “a superior indignation at his own lovely fellow-countrywoman's not knowing the difference between a spurious gentleman and a real one.” He feels that a “nice girl ought to know,” but wonders again if Daisy is “in fact a nice girl.” These questions plague Winterbourne throughout the novella. Does he come to any conclusions? How do you define “nice girl” and “gentleman”? Who do you think is the spurious gentleman? What do you think Winterbourne means by “nice girl”?
11. Health is an issue for several of the characters. Consider Mrs. Costello's headaches, Mrs. Miller's dyspepsia (indigestion), and Daisy's death from Roman fever (malaria). How does each illness help illuminate its suffering character? What particular significance is there in Daisy contracting malaria in the Roman Colosseum? Why do you think Mr. Giovanelli emerges unscathed?
12. Consider the names of James's main characters. What is suggested by the name Daisy? Why do you think she uses Daisy instead of Annie, her real name? What about Winterbourne? What is Mrs. Costello's intention when she pretends to be unsure of Daisy's last name: “Miss Baker's, Miss Chandler's—what's her name” (para. 441)?
13. Henry James has said that the character of Randolph, Daisy's young brother, is based on himself. Does this knowledge change your take on the story? What function does this sharp boy have in the story?

Questions on Style and Structure

1. Daisy Miller is narrated by a third person, with a limited omniscient point of view—that is, the narrator only reveals what Winterbourne is thinking. The narrator begins the story by making some assumptions about the reader. What do those assumptions tell us about the narrator? How does the third-person limited omniscient point of view both reveal and hide details about Winterbourne and Daisy?

2. Read the description of the resort town of Vevey, Switzerland, with which Daisy Miller opens. The narrator compares aspects of Vevey to resorts in America, noting that Vevey “assumes . . . some of the characteristics of an American watering-place . . . sights and sounds which evoke a vision, an echo, of Newport and Saratoga.” Why might this statement be ironic? Whose point of view does this observation tap into? Look carefully at the paragraph in which Winterbourne and Daisy first meet (para. 27). How does the narrator distinguish between Geneva and Vevey? What is the significance of that distinction with regard to the themes of the story?
3. Reread the description of Daisy’s first appearance (para. 20). What details does James include? What does he omit? Her brother says she’s “an American girl,” and Winterbourne comments that American girls are “the best girls.” What qualities in the description of Daisy seem particularly American? Who do you think “they” are in Winterbourne’s reaction: “How pretty they are”?
4. Parts of Daisy Miller are amusing, particularly the interchanges between Winterbourne and Randolph, such as the one about Mr. Miller being in “a better place” (para. 53). What purpose does the humor serve? How would you describe this particular type of humor?
5. James was known for his use of interior monologue, a technique used several times in Daisy Miller to show Winterbourne’s struggle to make sense of his attraction to Daisy. Analyze a few of these interior monologues—paragraph 349, for example—looking carefully at the syntax of the sentences. Pay close attention to the way James’s sentence patterns illustrate not just Winterbourne’s confusion but also his lack of self-knowledge.
6. How does James give characters such as Mrs. Costello and Mrs. Walker authority? How seriously does Winterbourne take their opinions of Daisy? Are his words and actions consistent? Explain.
7. Is there anything besides Daisy’s unconventional behavior that suggests differences between the Millers and the other Americans in the story? If so, does it explain the reason Daisy is snubbed? If not, why do the Americans snub her?
8. In Rome, Mrs. Costello holds court on the subject of Daisy just outside the vesper service at St. Peter’s, a venerable Roman church. Later, Winterbourne meets a friend outside the Doria Palace with whom he talks first about the Velasquez portrait of Pope Innocent X that hangs in one of its galleries and then about the “pretty American girl” (para. 456) seated with a companion inside the nook where the portrait hangs. How do these juxtapositions help James comment on the Americans living abroad?
9. Carefully reread the scene in which Winterbourne comes across Daisy and Giovanelli in the Colosseum (para. 496). How does James create a sense of foreboding? What is significant about Daisy’s observation that Winterbourne looks at her and Giovanelli “as one of the old lions or tigers may have looked at the Christian martyrs” (para. 497)?

10. The character of Mrs. Miller changes at the end of the novella. How does James portray the change in her? Why do you think she changes? What does this change say about the lives of the wealthy Americans that James portrays?
11. In the novella's last conversation, Winterbourne tells his aunt that Daisy is on his conscience, that he's afraid he did her an injustice. He says, "She would have appreciated one's esteem" (para. 532). What is the effect of the pronoun "one"? Why do you think Winterbourne uses it? How do you interpret Mrs. Costello's response—"Is that a modest way . . . of saying that she would have reciprocated one's affection" (para. 533)?
12. Daisy Miller ends with the observation that Winterbourne is "'studying' hard—an intimation that he is much interested in a very clever foreign lady." This is similar to the way Winterbourne is described at the beginning of the story: "'studying' . . . extremely devoted to a lady who lived there [Geneva]—a foreign lady—a person older than himself" (para. 2). What do you think these observations say about Winterbourne? How does their circularity comment on his character? on the characters of the Americans who live abroad?

Suggestions for Writing

1. Some readers of the novella think Winterbourne betrayed Daisy. Write an essay in which you analyze the nature of his betrayal and how it contributes to the meaning of the story.
2. Although the novella is titled Daisy Miller, many believe it is Winterbourne's story. Write an essay in which you make the case for this being either Daisy's story or Winterbourne's story.
3. Write an essay in which you analyze how Daisy Miller comments on the relationship between American and European culture.
4. In "The Art of Fiction" (1884), James argues that "the only reason for the existence of a novel is that it does attempt to present life." He considered the novelist's job similar to the historian's but felt that beyond having a working idea, it was important only that the novel "be interesting." He writes, "There is no such thing as a moral or immoral book. Books are well or badly written. That is all." Using Daisy Miller and possibly other works by James, write an essay in which you challenge or support James's assertion that there is no such thing as a moral or immoral work.
5. Choose one of the story's secondary characters, and write an essay in which you discuss how James creates his or her character. Be sure to consider the purpose of the character and how his or her portrayal is connected to that purpose.
6. In his art criticism, James was at first very critical of the French impressionists, but he later came to appreciate their work. Research the movement and James's change of heart, and write an essay in which you argue whether the impressionists had an influence on James's writing in Daisy Miller.
7. Rewrite a scene from the novella, revealing Daisy's thoughts rather than Winterbourne's.

A Good Man Is Hard to Find

FLANNERY O'CONNOR

Flannery O'Connor (1925–1964) was born on a farm in Milledgeville, Georgia. At the age of fifteen she lost her father to lupus, the same disease that would ultimately take her life at thirty-nine. In her short life, she would become one of the most acclaimed and widely read fiction writers of the twentieth century. After graduating from the Georgia State College for Women, she attended the Iowa Writers' Workshop. At twenty-six, after being diagnosed with a terminal form of lupus, O'Connor returned to the Georgia farm where she grew up. Despite her illness, she published three books—the story collection A Good Man Is Hard to Find (1955) and the novels Wise Blood (1952) and The Violent Bear It Away (1960)—before her death in 1964. Her later short stories were published posthumously as Everything That Rises Must Converge (1965). Most of O'Connor's stories are set in the American South, and critics often describe her writing as southern gothic, a genre that adapts the traditional characters of the Deep South to life after the Civil War, with results often described as “grotesque.” O'Connor famously questioned why this particular term was used to describe southern stereotypes, arguing instead for the term “realistic.” Her short stories examine the deep racial and religious divisions that exist among cultures generally lumped together as “southern.” The title story from A Good Man Is Hard to Find portrays a modern family on holiday and their encounter with The Misfit.

—ST. CYRIL OF JERUSALEM

The grandmother didn't want to go to Florida. She wanted to visit some of her connections in east Tennessee and she was seizing at every chance to change Bailey's mind. Bailey was the son she lived with, her only boy. He was sitting on the edge of his chair at the table, bent over the orange sports section of the Journal. “Now look here, Bailey,” she said, “see here, read this,” and she stood with one hand on her thin hip and the other rattling the newspaper at his bald head. “Here this fellow that calls himself The Misfit is a loose from the Federal Pen and headed toward Florida and you read here what it says he did to these people. Just you read it. I wouldn't take my children in any direction with a criminal like that a loose in it. I couldn't answer to my conscience if I did.”

Bailey didn't look up from his reading so she wheeled around then and faced the children's mother, a young woman in slacks, whose face was as broad and innocent as a cabbage and was tied around with a green head-kerchief that had two points on the top like rabbit's ears. She was sitting on the sofa, feeding the baby his apricots out of a jar. "The children have been to Florida before," the old lady said. "You all ought to take them somewhere else for a change so they would see different parts of the world and be broad. They never have been to east Tennessee."

The children's mother didn't seem to hear her but the eight-year-old boy, John Wesley, a stocky child with glasses, said, "If you don't want to go to Florida, why dontcha stay at home?" He and the little girl, June Star, were reading the funny papers on the floor.

"She wouldn't stay at home to be queen for a day," June Star said without raising her yellow head.

"Yes and what would you do if this fellow, The Misfit, caught you?" the grandmother asked. 5

"I'd smack his face," John Wesley said.

"She wouldn't stay at home for a million bucks," June Star said. "Afraid she'd miss something. She has to go everywhere we go."

"All right, Miss," the grandmother said. "Just remember that the next time you want me to curl your hair."

June Star said her hair was naturally curly.

The next morning the grandmother was the first one in the car, ready to go. She had her big black valise that looked like the head of a hippopotamus in one corner, and underneath it she was hiding a basket with Pitty Sing, the cat, in it. She didn't intend for the cat to be left alone in the house for three days because he would miss her too much and she was afraid he might brush against one of the gas burners and accidentally asphyxiate himself. Her son, Bailey, didn't like to arrive at a motel with a cat. 10

She sat in the middle of the back seat with John Wesley and June Star on either side of her. Bailey and the children's mother and the baby sat in front and they left Atlanta at eight forty-five with the mileage on the car at 55890. The grandmother wrote this down because she thought it would be interesting to say how many miles they had been when they got back. It took them twenty minutes to reach the outskirts of the city.

The old lady settled herself comfortably, removing her white cotton gloves and putting them up with her purse on the shelf in front of the back window. The children's mother still had on slacks and still had her head tied up in a green kerchief, but the grandmother had on a navy blue straw sailor hat with a bunch of white violets on the brim and a navy blue dress with a small white dot in the print. Her collars and cuffs were white organdy trimmed with lace and at her neckline she had pinned a purple spray of cloth violets containing a sachet. In case of an accident, anyone seeing her dead on the highway would know at once that she was a lady.

She said she thought it was going to be a good day for driving, neither too hot nor too cold, and she cautioned Bailey that the speed limit was fifty-five miles an hour and that the patrolmen hid themselves behind billboards and small clumps of trees and sped out after you before you had a chance to slow down. She pointed out interesting details of the scenery: Stone Mountain; the blue granite that in some places came up to both sides of the highway; the brilliant red clay banks slightly streaked with purple; and the various crops that made rows of green lace-work on the ground.

The trees were full of silver-white sunlight and the meanest of them sparkled. The children were reading comic magazines and their mother had gone back to sleep.

"Let's go through Georgia fast so we won't have to look at it much," John Wesley said.

"If I were a little boy," said the grandmother, "I wouldn't talk about my native state that way. Tennessee has the mountains and Georgia has the hills." 15

"Tennessee is just a hillbilly dumping ground," John Wesley said, "and Georgia is a lousy state too."

"You said it," June Star said.

"In my time," said the grandmother, folding her thin veined fingers, "children were more respectful of their native states and their parents and everything else. People did right then. Oh look at the cute little pickaninny!" she said and pointed to a Negro child standing in the door of a shack. "Wouldn't that make a picture, now?" she asked and they all turned and looked at the little Negro out of the back window. He waved.

"He didn't have any britches on," June Star said.

"He probably didn't have any," the grandmother explained. "Little niggers in the country don't have things like we do. If I could paint, I'd paint that picture," she said. 20

The children exchanged comic books.

The grandmother offered to hold the baby and the children's mother passed him over the front seat to her. She set him on her knee and bounced him and told him about the things they were passing. She rolled her eyes and screwed up her mouth and stuck her leathery thin face into his smooth bland one. Occasionally he gave her a far-away smile. They passed a large cotton field with five or six graves fenced in the middle of it, like a small island. "Look at the graveyard!" the grandmother said, pointing it out. "That was the old family burying ground. That belonged to the plantation."

"Where's the plantation?" John Wesley asked.

"Gone With the Wind," said the grandmother. "Ha. Ha."

When the children finished all the comic books they had brought, they opened the lunch and ate it. The grandmother ate a peanut butter sandwich and an olive and would not let the children throw the box and the paper napkins out the window. When there was nothing else to do they played a game by choosing a cloud and making the other two guess what shape it suggested. John Wesley took one the shape of a cow and June Star guessed a cow and John Wesley said, no, an automobile, and June Star said he didn't play fair, and they began to slap each other over the grandmother. 25

The grandmother said she would tell them a story if they would keep quiet. When she told a story, she rolled her eyes and waved her head and was very dramatic. She said once when she was a maiden lady she had been courted by a Mr. Edgar Atkins Teagarden from Jasper, Georgia. She said he was a very good-looking man and a gentleman and that he brought her a watermelon every Saturday afternoon with his initials cut in it, E. A. T. Well, one Saturday, she said, Mr. Teagarden brought the watermelon and there was nobody at home and he left it on the front porch and returned in his buggy to Jasper, but she never got the watermelon, she said, because a nigger boy ate it when he saw the initials, E. A. T.! This story tickled John Wesley's funny bone and he giggled and giggled but June Star didn't think it was any good. She said she wouldn't marry a man that just brought her a watermelon on Saturday. The grandmother said she would have done well to marry Mr. Teagarden because he was a gentleman and had bought Coca-Cola stock when it first came out and that he had died only a few years ago, a very wealthy man.

They stopped at The Tower for barbecued sandwiches. The Tower was a part stucco and part wood filling station and dance hall set in a clearing outside of Timothy. A fat man named Red Sammy Butts ran it and there were signs stuck here and there on the building and for miles up and down the highway saying, TRY RED SAMMY'S FAMOUS BARBECUE. NONE LIKE FAMOUS RED SAMMY'S! RED SAM! THE FAT BOY WITH THE HAPPY LAUGH. A VETERAN! RED SAMMY'S YOUR MAN!

Red Sammy was lying on the bare ground outside The Tower with his head under a truck while a gray monkey about a foot high, chained to a small chinaberry tree, chattered nearby. The monkey sprang back into the tree and got on the highest limb as soon as he saw the children jump out of the car and run toward him.

Inside, The Tower was a long dark room with a counter at one end and tables at the other and dancing space in the middle. They all sat down at a board table next to the nickelodeon and Red Sam's wife, a tall burnt-brown woman with hair and eyes lighter than her skin, came and took their order. The children's mother put a dime in the machine and played "The Tennessee Waltz," and the grandmother said that tune always made her want to dance. She asked Bailey if he would like to dance but he only glared at her. He didn't have a naturally sunny disposition like she did and trips made him nervous. The grandmother's brown eyes were very bright. She swayed her head from side to side and pretended she was dancing in her chair. June Star said play something she could tap to so the children's mother put in another dime and played a fast number and June Star stepped out onto the dance floor and did her tap routine.

"Ain't she cute?" Red Sam's wife said, leaning over the counter. "Would you like to come be my little girl?" 30

"No I certainly wouldn't," June Star said. "I wouldn't live in a broken-down place like this for a million bucks!" and she ran back to the table.

"Ain't she cute?" the woman repeated, stretching her mouth politely.

"Aren't you ashamed?" hissed the grandmother.

Red Sam came in and told his wife to quit lounging on the counter and hurry up with these people's order. His khaki trousers reached just to his hip bones and his stomach hung over them like a sack of meal swaying under his shirt. He came over and sat down at a table nearby and let out a combination sigh and yodel. "You can't win," he said. "You can't win," and he wiped his sweating red face off with a gray handkerchief. "These days you don't know who to trust," he said. "Ain't that the truth?"

"People are certainly not nice like they used to be," said the grandmother. 35

"Two fellers come in here last week," Red Sammy said, "driving a Chrysler. It was a old beat-up car but it was a good one and these boys looked all right to me. Said they worked at the mill and you know I let them fellers charge the gas they bought? Now why did I do that?"

"Because you're a good man!" the grandmother said at once.

"Yes'm, I suppose so," Red Sam said as if he were struck with this answer.

His wife brought the orders, carrying the five plates all at once without a tray, two in each hand and one balanced on her arm. "It isn't a soul in this green world of God's that you can trust," she said. "And I don't count nobody out of that, not nobody," she repeated, looking at Red Sammy.

"Did you read about that criminal, The Misfit, that's escaped?" asked the grandmother. 40

"I wouldn't be a bit surprised if he didn't attact this place right here," said the woman. "If he hears about it being here, I wouldn't be none surprised to see him. If he hears it's two cent in the cash register, I wouldn't be a tall surprised if he . . ."

"That'll do," Red Sam said. "Go bring these people their Co'-Colas," and the woman went off to get the rest of the order.

"A good man is hard to find," Red Sammy said. "Everything is getting terrible. I remember the day you could go off and leave your screen door unlatched. Not no more."

He and the grandmother discussed better times. The old lady said that in her opinion Europe was entirely to blame for the way things were now. She said the way Europe acted you would think we were made of money and Red Sam said it was no use talking about it, she was exactly right. The children ran outside into the white sunlight and looked at the monkey in the lacy chinaberry tree. He was busy catching fleas on himself and biting each one carefully between his teeth as if it were a delicacy.

They drove off again into the hot afternoon. The grandmother took cat naps 45 and woke up every few minutes with her own snoring. Outside of Toombsboro she woke up and recalled an old plantation that she had visited in this neighborhood once when she was a young lady. She said the house had six white columns across the front and that there was an avenue of oaks leading up to it and two little wooden trellis arbors on either side in front where you sat down with your suitor after a stroll in the garden. She recalled exactly which road to turn off to get to it. She knew that Bailey would not be willing to lose any time looking at an old house, but the more she talked about it, the more she wanted to see it once again and find out if the little twin arbors were still standing. "There was a secret panel in this house," she said craftily, not telling the truth but wishing that she were, "and the story went that all the family silver was hidden in it when Sherman<sup>1</sup> came through but it was never found . . ."

"Hey!" John Wesley said. "Let's go see it! We'll find it! We'll poke all the wood-work and find it! Who lives there? Where do you turn off at? Hey Pop, can't we turn off there?"

"We never have seen a house with a secret panel!" June Star shrieked. "Let's go to the house with the secret panel! Hey Pop, can't we go see the house with the secret panel!"

"It's not far from here, I know," the grandmother said. "It wouldn't take over twenty minutes."

Bailey was looking straight ahead. His jaw was as rigid as a horseshoe. "No," he said.

The children began to yell and scream that they wanted to see the house with the secret panel. John Wesley kicked the back of the front seat and June Star hung over her mother's shoulder and whined desperately into her ear that they never had any fun even on their vacation, that they could never do what THEY wanted to do. The baby began to scream and John Wesley kicked the back of the seat so hard that his father could feel the blows in his kidney.

"All right!" he shouted and drew the car to a stop at the side of the road. "Will you all shut up? Will you all just shut up for one second? If you don't shut up, we won't go anywhere."

"It would be very educational for them," the grandmother murmured.

"All right," Bailey said, "but get this: this is the only time we're going to stop for anything like this. This is the one and only time."

"The dirt road that you have to turn down is about a mile back," the grandmother directed. "I marked it when we passed."

"A dirt road," Bailey groaned.

After they had turned around and were headed toward the dirt road, the grandmother recalled other points about the house, the beautiful glass over the front doorway and the candle-lamp in the hall. John Wesley said that the secret panel was probably in the fireplace.

"You can't go inside this house," Bailey said. "You don't know who lives there."

"While you all talk to the people in front, I'll run around behind and get in a window," John Wesley suggested.

"We'll all stay in the car," his mother said.

They turned onto the dirt road and the car raced roughly along in a swirl of pink dust. The grandmother recalled the times when there were no paved roads and thirty miles was a day's journey. The dirt road was hilly and there were sudden washes in it and sharp curves on dangerous embankments. All at once they would be on a hill, looking down over the blue tops of trees for miles around, then the next minute, they would be in a red depression with the dust-coated trees looking down on them.

"This place had better turn up in a minute," Bailey said, "or I'm going to turn around."

The road looked as if no one had traveled on it in months.

"It's not much farther," the grandmother said and just as she said it, a horrible thought came to her. The thought was so embarrassing that she turned red in the face and her eyes dilated and her feet jumped up, upsetting her valise in the corner. The instant the valise moved, the newspaper top she had over the basket under it rose with a snarl and Pitty Sing, the cat, sprang onto Bailey's shoulder.

The children were thrown to the floor and their mother, clutching the baby, was thrown out the door onto the ground; the old lady was thrown into the front seat. The car turned over once and landed right-side-up in a gulch off the side of the road. Bailey remained in the driver's seat with the cat—gray-striped with a broad white face and an orange nose—clinging to his neck like a caterpillar.

As soon as the children saw they could move their arms and legs, they scrambled out of the car, shouting, "We've had an ACCIDENT!" The grandmother was curled up under the dashboard, hoping she was injured so that Bailey's wrath would not come down on her all at once. The horrible thought she had had before the accident was that the house she had remembered so vividly was not in Georgia but in Tennessee.

Bailey removed the cat from his neck with both hands and flung it out the window against the side of a pine tree. Then he got out of the car and started looking for the children's mother. She was sitting against the side of the red gutted ditch, holding the screaming baby, but she only had a cut down her face and a broken shoulder. "We've had an ACCIDENT!" the children screamed in a frenzy of delight.

"But nobody's killed," June Star said with disappointment as the grandmother limped out of the car, her hat still pinned to her head but the broken front brim standing up at a jaunty angle and the violet spray hanging off the side. They all sat down in the ditch, except the children, to recover from the shock. They were all shaking.

"Maybe a car will come along," said the children's mother hoarsely.

"I believe I have injured an organ," said the grandmother, pressing her side, but no one answered her. Bailey's teeth were clattering. He had on a yellow sport shirt with bright blue parrots designed in it and his face was as yellow as the shirt. The grandmother decided that she would not mention that the house was in Tennessee.

The road was about ten feet above and they could see only the tops of the trees on the other side of it. Behind the ditch they were sitting in there were more woods, tall and dark and deep. In a few minutes they saw a car some distance away on top of a hill, coming slowly as if the occupants were watching them. The grandmother stood up and waved both arms dramatically to attract their attention. The car continued to come on slowly, disappeared around a bend and appeared again, moving even slower, on top of the hill they had gone over. It was a big black battered hearse-like automobile. There were three men in it.

It came to a stop just over them and for some minutes, the driver looked down with a steady expressionless gaze to where they were sitting, and didn't speak. Then he turned his head and muttered something to the other two and they got out. One was a fat boy in black trousers and a red sweat shirt with a silver stallion embossed on the front of it. He moved around on the right side of them and stood staring, his mouth partly open in a kind of loose grin. The other had on khaki pants and a blue striped coat and a gray hat pulled down very low, hiding most of his face. He came around slowly on the left side. Neither spoke.

The driver got out of the car and stood by the side of it, looking down at them. He was an older man than the other two. His hair was just beginning to gray and he wore silver-rimmed spectacles that gave him a scholarly look. He had a long creased face and didn't have on any shirt or undershirt. He had on blue jeans that were too tight for him and was holding a black hat and a gun. The two boys also had guns.

"We've had an ACCIDENT!" the children screamed.

The grandmother had the peculiar feeling that the bespectacled man was someone she knew. His face was as familiar to her as if she had known him all her life but she could not recall who he was. He moved away from the car and began to come down the embankment, placing his feet carefully so that he wouldn't slip. He had on tan and white shoes and no socks, and his ankles were red and thin. "Good afternoon," he said. "I see you all had you a little spill."

"We turned over twice!" said the grandmother. 75

"Oncet," he corrected. "We seen it happen. Try their car and see will it run, Hiram," he said quietly to the boy with the gray hat.

"What you got that gun for?" John Wesley asked. "Whatcha gonna do with that gun?"

"Lady," the man said to the children's mother, "would you mind calling them children to sit down by you? Children make me nervous. I want all you all to sit down right together there where you're at."

"What are you telling US what to do for?" June Star asked.

Behind them the line of woods gaped like a dark open mouth. "Come here," said their mother. 80

"Look here now," Bailey began suddenly, "we're in a predicament! We're in . . ."

The grandmother shrieked. She scrambled to her feet and stood staring. "You're The Misfit!" she said. "I recognized you at once!"

"Yes'm," the man said, smiling slightly as if he were pleased in spite of himself to be known, "but it would have been better for all of you, lady, if you hadn't of reckernized me."

Bailey turned his head sharply and said something to his mother that shocked even the children. The old lady began to cry and The Misfit reddened.

"Lady," he said, "don't you get upset. Sometimes a man says things he don't mean. I don't reckon he meant to talk to you thataway." 85

"You wouldn't shoot a lady, would you?" the grandmother said and removed a clean handkerchief from her cuff and began to slap at her eyes with it.

The Misfit pointed the toe of his shoe into the ground and made a little hole and then covered it up again. "I would hate to have to," he said.

"Listen," the grandmother almost screamed, "I know you're a good man. You don't look a bit like you have common blood. I know you must come from nice people!"

"Yes mam," he said, "finest people in the world." When he smiled he showed a row of strong white teeth. "God never made a finer woman than my mother and my daddy's heart was pure gold," he said. The boy with the red sweat shirt had come around behind them and was standing with his gun at his hip. The Misfit squatted down on the ground. "Watch them children, Bobby Lee," he said. "You know they make me nervous." He looked at the six of them huddled together in front of him and he seemed to be embarrassed as if he couldn't think of anything to say. "Ain't a cloud in the sky," he remarked, looking up at it. "Don't see no sun but don't see no cloud neither."

"Yes, it's a beautiful day," said the grandmother. "Listen," she said, "you shouldn't call yourself The Misfit because I know you're a good man at heart. I can just look at you and tell." 90

"Hush!" Bailey yelled. "Hush! Everybody shut up and let me handle this!" He was squatting in the position of a runner about to sprint forward but he didn't move.

"I pre-chate that, lady," The Misfit said and drew a little circle in the ground with the butt of his gun.

"It'll take a half a hour to fix this here car," Hiram called, looking over the raised hood of it.

"Well, first you and Bobby Lee get him and that little boy to step over yonder with you," The Misfit said, pointing to Bailey and John Wesley. "The boys want to ast you something," he said to Bailey. "Would you mind stepping back in them woods there with them?"

"Listen," Bailey began, "we're in a terrible predicament! Nobody realizes what this is," and his voice cracked. His eyes were as blue and intense as the parrots in his shirt and he remained perfectly still. 95

The grandmother reached up to adjust her hat brim as if she were going to the woods with him but it came off in her hand. She stood staring at it and after a second she let it fall on the ground. Hiram pulled Bailey up by the arm as if he were assisting an old man. John Wesley caught hold of his father's hand and Bobby Lee followed. They went off toward the woods and just as they reached the dark edge, Bailey turned and supporting himself against a gray naked pine trunk, he shouted, "I'll be back in a minute, Mamma, wait on me!"

"Come back this instant!" his mother shrilled but they all disappeared into the woods.

"Bailey Boy!" the grandmother called in a tragic voice but she found she was looking at The Misfit squatting on the ground in front of her. "I just know you're a good man," she said desperately. "You're not a bit common!"

"Nome, I ain't a good man," The Misfit said after a second as if he had considered her statement carefully, "but I ain't the worst in the world neither. My daddy said I was a different breed of dog from my brothers and sisters. 'You know,' Daddy said, 'it's some that can live their whole life out without asking about it and it's others has to know why it is, and this boy is one of the latters. He's going to be into everything!'" He put on his black hat and looked up suddenly and then away deep into the woods as if he were embarrassed again. "I'm sorry I don't have on a shirt before you ladies," he said, hunching his shoulders slightly. "We buried our clothes that we had on when we escaped and we're just making do until we can get better. We borrowed these from some folks we met," he explained.

"That's perfectly all right," the grandmother said. "Maybe Bailey has an extra shirt in his suitcase." 100

"I'll look and see terrectly," The Misfit said.

"Where are they taking him?" the children's mother screamed.

"Daddy was a card himself," The Misfit said. "You couldn't put anything over on him. He never got in trouble with the Authorities though. Just had the knack of handling them."

"You could be honest too if you'd only try," said the grandmother. "Think how wonderful it would be to settle down and live a comfortable life and not have to think about somebody chasing you all the time."

The Misfit kept scratching in the ground with the butt of his gun as if he were thinking about it. "Yes'm, somebody is always after you," he murmured.

The grandmother noticed how thin his shoulder blades were just behind his hat because she was standing up looking down on him. "Do you ever pray?" she asked.

He shook his head. All she saw was the black hat wiggle between his shoulder blades. "Nome," he said.

There was a pistol shot from the woods, followed closely by another. Then silence. The old lady's head jerked around. She could hear the wind move through the tree tops like a long satisfied insuck of breath. "Bailey Boy!" she called.

"I was a gospel singer for a while," The Misfit said. "I been most everything. Been in the arm service, both land and sea, at home and abroad, been twict married, been an undertaker, been with the railroads, plowed Mother Earth, been in a tornado, seen a man burnt alive oncet," and he looked up at the children's mother and the little girl who were sitting close together, their faces white and their eyes glassy; "I even seen a woman flogged," he said.

"Pray, pray," the grandmother began, "pray, pray . . ."

"I never was a bad boy that I remember of," The Misfit said in an almost dreamy voice, "but somewheres along the line I done something wrong and got sent to the penitentiary. I was buried alive," and he looked up and held her attention to him by a steady stare.

"That's when you should have started to pray," she said. "What did you do to get sent to the penitentiary that first time?"

"Turn to the right, it was a wall," The Misfit said, looking up again at the cloudless sky. "Turn to the left, it was a wall. Look up it was a ceiling, look down it was a floor. I forget what I done, lady. I set there and set there, trying to remember what it was I done and I ain't recalled it to this day. Oncet in a while, I would think it was coming to me, but it never come."

"Maybe they put you in by mistake," the old lady said vaguely.

"Nome," he said. "It wasn't no mistake. They had the papers on me."

"You must have stolen something," she said.

The Misfit sneered slightly. "Nobody had nothing I wanted," he said. "It was a head-doctor at the penitentiary said what I had done was kill my daddy but I known that for a lie. My daddy died in nineteen ought nineteen of the epidemic flu<sup>2</sup> and I never had a thing to do with it. He was buried in the Mount Hopewell Baptist churchyard and you can go there and see for yourself."

<sup>2</sup>The influenza pandemic of 1918–19, the largest epidemic in history, killed between twenty and forty million people worldwide.—Eds.

"If you would pray," the old lady said, "Jesus would help you."

"That's right," The Misfit said.

"Well then, why don't you pray?" she asked trembling with delight suddenly.

120

"I don't want no hep," he said. "I'm doing all right by myself."

Bobby Lee and Hiram came ambling back from the woods. Bobby Lee was dragging a yellow shirt with bright blue parrots in it.

"Thow me that shirt, Bobby Lee," The Misfit said. The shirt came flying at him and landed on his shoulder and he put it on. The grandmother couldn't name what the shirt reminded her of. "No, lady," The Misfit said while he was buttoning it up, "I found out the crime don't matter. You can do one thing or you can do another, kill a man or take a tire off his car, because sooner or later you're going to forget what it was you done and just be punished for it."

The children's mother had begun to make heaving noises as if she couldn't get her breath. "Lady," he asked, "would you and that little girl like to step off yonder with Bobby Lee and Hiram and join your husband?"

"Yes, thank you," the mother said faintly. Her left arm dangled helplessly and she was holding the baby, who had gone to sleep, in the other. "Hep that lady up, Hiram," The Misfit said as she struggled to climb out of the ditch, "and Bobby Lee, you hold onto that little girl's hand."

125

"I don't want to hold hands with him," June Star said. "He reminds me of a pig."

The fat boy blushed and laughed and caught her by the arm and pulled her off into the woods after Hiram and her mother.

Alone with The Misfit, the grandmother found that she had lost her voice. There was not a cloud in the sky nor any sun. There was nothing around her but woods. She wanted to tell him that he must pray. She opened and closed her mouth several times before anything came out. Finally she found herself saying, "Jesus. Jesus," meaning, Jesus will help you, but the way she was saying it, it sounded as if she might be cursing.

"Yes'm," The Misfit said as if he agreed. "Jesus thown everything off balance. It was the same case with Him as with me except He hadn't committed any crime and they could prove I had committed one because they had the papers on me. Of course," he said, "they never shown me my papers. That's why I sign myself now. I said long ago, you get you a signature and sign everything you do and keep a copy of it. Then you'll know what you done and you can hold up the crime to the punishment and see do they match and in the end you'll have something to prove you ain't been treated right. I call myself The Misfit," he said, "because I can't make what all I done wrong fit what all I gone through in punishment."

There was a piercing scream from the woods, followed closely by a pistol report. "Does it seem right to you, lady, that one is punished a heap and another ain't punished at all?"

130

"Jesus!" the old lady cried. "You've got good blood! I know you wouldn't shoot a lady! I know you come from nice people! Pray! Jesus, you ought not to shoot a lady. I'll give you all the money I've got!"

"Lady," The Misfit said, looking beyond her far into the woods, "there never was a body that give the undertaker a tip."

There were two more pistol reports and the grandmother raised her head like a parched old turkey hen crying for water and called, "Bailey Boy, Bailey Boy!" as if her heart would break.

"Jesus was the only One that ever raised the dead," The Misfit continued, "and He shouldn't have done it. He thown everything off balance. If He did what He said, then it's nothing for you to do but thow away everything and follow Him, and if He didn't, then it's nothing for you to do but enjoy the few minutes you got left the best way you can—by killing somebody or burning down his house or doing some other meanness to him. No pleasure but meanness," he said and his voice had become almost a snarl.

"Maybe He didn't raise the dead," the old lady mumbled, not knowing what she was saying and feeling so dizzy that she sank down in the ditch with her legs twisted under her.

135

"I wasn't there so I can't say He didn't," The Misfit said. "I wisht I had of been there," he said, hitting the ground with his fist. "It ain't right I wasn't there because if I had of been there I would of known. Listen lady," he said in a high voice, "if I had of been there I would of known and I wouldn't be like I am now." His voice seemed about to crack and the grandmother's head cleared for an instant. She saw the man's face twisted close to her own as if he were going to cry and she murmured, "Why you're one of my babies. You're one of my own children!" She reached out and touched him on the shoulder. The Misfit sprang back as if a snake had bitten him and shot her three times through the chest. Then he put his gun down on the ground and took off his glasses and began to clean them.

Hiram and Bobby Lee returned from the woods and stood over the ditch, looking down at the grandmother who half sat and half lay in a puddle of blood with her legs crossed under her like a child's and her face smiling up at the cloudless sky.

Without his glasses, The Misfit's eyes were red-rimmed and pale and defenseless-looking. "Take her off and thow her where you thown the others," he said, picking up the cat that was rubbing itself against his leg.

"She was a talker, wasn't she?" Bobby Lee said, sliding down the ditch with a yodel.

"She would of been a good woman," The Misfit said, "if it had been somebody there to shoot her every minute of her life."

140

"Some fun!" Bobby Lee said.

"Shut up, Bobby Lee," The Misfit said. "It's no real pleasure in life."

Questions for Discussion

1. What tone does the epigraph set for the story? Reconsider it after you've read the story. How does your interpretation change?

2. What can you infer about the grandmother by reading the opening paragraph? What does she represent in the story? Consider the role she plays in her family as well as how she might embody a different era in the culture of the South. What does the grandmother mean when she tells The Misfit, "Why you're one of my babies. You're one of my own children" (para. 136)?
3. The main characters in a story usually have names. In this story, however, several main characters—The Misfit, the grandmother, and the children's mother—are unnamed. What is the purpose of not giving these characters names, referring to them only by their roles? How might leaving these characters unnamed connect to a theme of the story?
4. In what ways is the family in this story fairly typical in terms of the tensions and conflicts most families experience? How does O'Connor introduce comedy by depicting these differences between and among generations and relationships?
5. When Red Sammy says to the grandmother, "A good man is hard to find" (para. 43), what does he mean? Why did O'Connor choose this particular line for the story's title? Also consider why, in the final scene, the grandmother repeatedly tells The Misfit that she knows he is a "good man."
6. Discuss instances in which the grandmother's nostalgia for the past seems warranted and others in which it becomes limiting, even threatening. You might begin by considering some of the following: her desire to paint a picture of the "pickaninny" in the doorway, her story about Mr. Teagarden, her story of the house with the secret panel.
7. O'Connor has said that the short-story collection that included this story is about "original sin." What role does religion, specifically Christianity, play in this story? How do the grandmother's traditional views on salvation and prayer differ from The Misfit's? What does he mean when he asserts that Jesus has thrown "everything off balance" (paras. 129, 134)?
8. Were you surprised by the violence in the story? Why do you think O'Connor chose to leave the murders of everyone but the grandmother "off stage" rather than describing them directly? What is the impact of providing details about the shooting of the grandmother and describing her lifeless body?
9. How does The Misfit explain his behavior to the grandmother? Why does he shoot her precisely when he does? How do you interpret his assertion that "she would of been a good woman . . . if it had been somebody there to shoot her every minute of her life" (para. 140)? What does The Misfit understand about the grandmother's character?

Questions on Style and Structure

1. How does O'Connor use foreshadowing in "A Good Man Is Hard to Find"? What effect did the foreshadowing have on your first reading of the story? When you read about The Misfit in the first paragraph, did you think that you would meet him?

2. Contrast the description of the grandmother's outfit with the rest of the family's traveling attire (paras. 12, 69). What do the characters' clothes tell us about them? What is significant about The Misfit's appropriation of Bailey's parrot shirt (paras. 122–23)?
3. "'In my time,' said the grandmother, folding her thin veined fingers, 'children were more respectful of their native states and their parents and everything else. People did right then. Oh look at the cute little pickaninny!'" she said and pointed to a Negro child standing in the door of a shack" (para. 18). What is ironic about this passage? How does the grandmother define "did right"? What evidence suggests a contrast between the character's and the author's perspectives of what it means to "do right"?
4. What is the purpose of the scene at Red Sammy's barbecue place? Consider the conversation between the grandmother and Red Sammy about the difficulty of finding a "good man." How does this scene develop the story's themes as well as plot?
5. Take another look at the allusion the grandmother makes to Gone With the Wind in paragraph 24. What deeper meaning can you find in her joke about the plantation? How does this joke affect your reading of the story?
6. Explain how the setting shifts once the family takes a detour off the main road. Why is this shift important to the story's plot? How does the shift in setting contribute to the shift in the story's tone?
7. Why do you think O'Connor chose to capitalize "ACCIDENT!" in the children's dialogue? After the accident, a slow-moving car appears on the horizon, "a big black battered hearse-like automobile" (para. 70). Why might the author have chosen not to use commas between these adjectives? How do the punctuation and alliteration contribute to the effect of this description?
8. The Misfit's words are often given a phonetic rendering:
  - "I pre-chate that, lady." (para. 92)
  - "The boys want to ast you something." (para. 94)
  - "I'll look and see terrectly." (para. 101)
  - "Nome." (para. 107)
  - "I . . . seen a man burnt alive oncet." (para. 109)
  - "I don't want no hep." (para. 121)
 What effect does this use of dialect have on your understanding of The Misfit's character? What other characters in the story speak in dialect, and what does it say about them?
9. Examine the following similes used in "A Good Man Is Hard to Find":
  - "whose face was as broad and innocent as a cabbage" (para. 2)
  - "her big black valise that looked like the head of a hippopotamus" (para. 10)
  - "His jaw was as rigid as a horseshoe." (para. 49)
  - "She could hear the wind move through the tree tops like a long satisfied insuck of breath." (para. 108)
  - "the grandmother raised her head like a parched old turkey hen crying for water" (para. 133)

Choose three of these similes and explain how each comparison contributes to your ability to visualize the scene or character.

10. We stay close to the grandmother's point of view throughout most of the story. When does O'Connor move away from this perspective, and what effect does this have?

Suggestions for Writing

1. Write an essay in which you analyze three literary devices or techniques Flannery O'Connor uses to characterize both the grandmother and her attitudes toward other characters in the story. Be sure to include specific evidence from the story to support your analysis.
2. Discuss how O'Connor plays out her theme of the struggle between good and evil in the characters of the grandmother and The Misfit. Explore the ways that each of these characters embodies elements of both good and evil.
3. Although this story has some universal themes, it is very much a story about the South—its values, traditions, and culture. Write an essay explaining how this is a southern story.
4. Writing about violence in fiction, O'Connor claimed, "In my own stories I have found that violence is strangely capable of returning my characters to reality and preparing them to accept their moment of grace." Write an essay explaining whether you do or do not agree with this description as it applies to the grandmother, The Misfit, or both.
5. Write an essay offering two different interpretations of the ending of the story. Is it uplifting? cynical? bleak? hopeful? Have any of the characters been transformed? Then explain which of the interpretations you prefer. Include your understanding of The Misfit's final comment: "It's no real pleasure in life."
6. Write an essay that compares and contrasts the narrator in Daisy Miller with the narrator in "A Good Man Is Hard to Find." In your response, consider some or all of the following: how each narrator feels about the characters he or she is describing; which character(s) he or she is most sympathetic toward; how close (or distant) the narrator is from the action; how the storyteller hopes you, the reader, will respond; and why this particular voice has been chosen.
7. You are an up-and-coming screenwriter who wants to adapt "A Good Man Is Hard to Find" for the big screen. Write a one-page proposal persuading a producer that this movie's story and themes will appeal to a wide audience and be timely in the twenty-first century. Include suggestions for a director, a few members of the cast, and a filming location.
8. Imagine that you are June Star or John Wesley, telling a school friend about your grandmother. Write a one-page soliloquy in which you characterize (through ranting about, imitating, or telling a story about) the old woman. Look closely at the children's speech patterns, and try to use both the syntax and the language that either child would.

Everyday Use

ALICE WALKER

Alice Walker (b. 1944) is a novelist, poet, essayist, civil rights activist, and self-described eco-pacifist, best known for her depictions of the struggles and strengths of the African American woman. The youngest of eight children born to share-cropper parents, Walker grew up in the small town of Eatonton, Georgia. After high school, she attended Spelman College in Georgia, then transferred to Sarah Lawrence College in New York, which she graduated from in 1965. Her first novel, The Third Life of Grange Copeland, was published in 1969, followed by her poetry collection Revolutionary Petunias and Other Poems (1973). In 1982, she published The Color Purple, her most celebrated work, which won the Pulitzer Prize and was adapted into both a movie (directed by Steven Spielberg) and a Tony Award-winning Broadway musical. Walker is also known for her essays, in which she coined the term “womanist.” Claiming a more positive connotation than “feminist,” she writes that a womanist is “committed to survival and wholeness of entire people, male and female. Not a separatist.” Walker has taught at Wellesley College, Yale University, the University of California at Berkeley, and many other institutions. She continues to support environmental causes and is an advocate for international women’s rights. “Everyday Use,” a story from her collection In Love and Trouble: Stories of Black Women (1973), explores how different definitions of heritage and history influence identity.

for your grandmama

I will wait for her in the yard that Maggie and I made so clean and wavy yesterday afternoon. A yard like this is more comfortable than most people know. It is not just a yard. It is like an extended living room. When the hard clay is swept clean as a floor and the fine sand around the edges lined with tiny, irregular grooves, anyone can come and sit and look up into the elm tree and wait for the breezes that never come inside the house.

Maggie will be nervous until after her sister goes: she will stand hopelessly in corners, homely and ashamed of the burn scars down her arms and legs, eying her sister with a mixture of envy and awe. She thinks her sister has held life always in the palm of one hand, that “no” is a word the world never learned to say to her.

You’ve no doubt seen those TV shows where the child who has “made it” is confronted, as a surprise, by her own mother and father, tottering in weakly from backstage. (A pleasant surprise, of course: What would they do if parent and child came on the show only to curse out and insult each other?) On TV mother and child embrace and smile into each other’s faces. Sometimes the mother and father weep, the child wraps them in her arms and leans across the table to tell how she would not have made it without their help. I have seen these programs.

Sometimes I dream a dream in which Dee and I are suddenly brought together on a TV program of this sort. Out of a dark and soft-seated limousine I am ushered into a bright room filled with many people. There I meet a smiling, gray, sporty man like Johnny Carson<sup>1</sup> who shakes my hand and tells me what a fine girl I have. Then we are on the stage and Dee is embracing me with tears in her eyes. She pins on my dress a large orchid, even though she has told me once that she thinks orchids are tacky flowers.

In real life I am a large, big-boned woman with rough, man-working hands. In the winter I wear flannel nightgowns to bed and overalls during the day. I can kill and clean a hog as mercilessly as a man. My fat keeps me hot in zero weather. I can work outside all day, breaking ice to get water for washing; I can eat pork liver cooked over the open fire minutes after it comes steaming from the hog. One winter I knocked a bull calf straight in the brain between the eyes with a sledge hammer and had the meat hung up to chill before nightfall. But of course all this does not show on television. I am the way my daughter would want me to be: a hundred pounds lighter, my skin like an uncooked barley pancake. My hair glistens in the hot bright lights. Johnny Carson has much to do to keep up with my quick and witty tongue.

But that is a mistake. I know even before I wake up. Who ever knew a Johnson with a quick tongue? Who can even imagine me looking a strange white man in the eye? It seems to me I have talked to them always with one foot raised in flight, with my head turned in whichever way is farthest from them. Dee, though. She would always look anyone in the eye. Hesitation was no part of her nature.

"How do I look, Mama?" Maggie says, showing just enough of her thin body enveloped in pink skirt and red blouse for me to know she's there, almost hidden by the door.

"Come out into the yard," I say.

Have you ever seen a lame animal, perhaps a dog run over by some careless person rich enough to own a car, sidle up to someone who is ignorant enough to be kind to him? That is the way my Maggie walks. She has been like this, chin on chest, eyes on ground, feet in shuffle, ever since the fire that burned the other house to the ground.

Dee is lighter than Maggie, with nicer hair and a fuller figure. She's a woman now, though sometimes I forget. How long ago was it that the other house burned? Ten, twelve years? Sometimes I can still hear the flames and feel Maggie's arms sticking to me, her hair smoking and her dress falling off her in little black papery flakes. Her eyes seemed stretched open, blazed open by the flames reflected in them. And Dee. I see her standing off under the sweet gum tree she used to dig gum out of; a look of concentration on her face as she watched the last dingy gray board of the house fall in toward the red-hot brick chimney. Why don't you do a dance around the ashes? I'd wanted to ask her. She had hated the house that much.

I used to think she hated Maggie, too. But that was before we raised the money, the church and me, to send her to Augusta to school. She used to read to us without pity; forcing words, lies, other folks' habits, whole lives upon us two, sitting trapped and ignorant underneath her voice. She washed us in a river of make-believe, burned us with a lot of knowledge we didn't necessarily need to know. Pressed us to her with the serious way she read, to shove us away at just the moment, like dimwits, we seemed about to understand.

Dee wanted nice things. A yellow organdy dress to wear to her graduation from high school; black pumps to match a green suit she'd made from an old suit somebody gave me. She was determined to stare down any disaster in her efforts. Her eyelids would not flicker for minutes at a time. Often I fought off the temptation to shake her. At sixteen she had a style of her own: and knew what style was.

I never had an education myself. After second grade the school was closed down. Don't ask me why: in 1927 colored asked fewer questions than they do now. Sometimes Maggie reads to me. She stumbles along good-naturedly but can't see well. She knows she is not bright. Like good looks and money, quickness passed her by. She will marry John Thomas (who has mossy teeth in an earnest face) and then I'll be free to sit here and I guess just sing church songs to myself. Although I never was a good singer. Never could carry a tune. I was always better at a man's job. I used to love to milk till I was hooked in the side in '49. Cows are soothing and slow and don't bother you, unless you try to milk them the wrong way.

I have deliberately turned my back on the house. It is three rooms, just like the one that burned, except the roof is tin; they don't make shingle roofs any more. There are no real windows, just some holes cut in the sides, like the portholes in a ship, but not round and not square, with rawhide holding the shutters up on the outside. This house is in a pasture, too, like the other one. No doubt when Dee sees it she will want to tear it down. She wrote me once that no matter where we "choose" to live, she will manage to come see us. But she will never bring her friends. Maggie and I thought about this and Maggie asked me, "Mama, when did Dee ever have any friends?"

She had a few. Furtive boys in pink shirts hanging about on washday after school. Nervous girls who never laughed. Impressed with her they worshiped the well-turned phrase, the cute shape, the scalding humor that erupted like bubbles in lye. She read to them. 15

When she was courting Jimmy T she didn't have much time to pay to us, but turned all her faultfinding power on him. He flew to marry a cheap city girl from a family of ignorant flashy people. She hardly had time to recompose herself.

When she comes I will meet—but there they are!

Maggie attempts to make a dash for the house, in her shuffling way, but I stay her with my hand. "Come back here," I say. And she stops and tries to dig a well in the sand with her toe.

It is hard to see them clearly through the strong sun. But even the first glimpse of leg out of the car tells me it is Dee. Her feet were always neat-looking, as if God himself had shaped them with a certain style. From the other side of the car comes a short, stocky man. Hair is all over his head a foot long and hanging from his chin like a kinky mule tail. I hear Maggie suck in her breath. “Uhhnnh,” is what it sounds like. Like when you see the wriggling end of a snake just in front of your foot on the road. “Uhhnnh.”

Dee next. A dress down to the ground, in this hot weather. A dress so loud it hurts my eyes. There are yellows and oranges enough to throw back the light of the sun. I feel my whole face warming from the heat waves it throws out. Earrings gold, too, and hanging down to her shoulders. Bracelets dangling and making noises when she moves her arm up to shake the folds of the dress out of her armpits. The dress is loose and flows, and as she walks closer, I like it. I hear Maggie go “Uhhnnh” again. It is her sister’s hair. It stands straight up like the wool on a sheep. It is black as night and around the edges are two long pigtails that rope about like small lizards disappearing behind her ears.

20

“Wa-su-zo-Tean-ol!” she says, coming on in that gliding way the dress makes her move. The short stocky fellow with the hair to his navel is all grinning and he follows up with “Asalamalakim, my mother and sister!” He moves to hug Maggie but she falls back, right up against the back of my chair. I feel her trembling there and when I look up I see the perspiration falling off her chin.

“Don’t get up,” says Dee. Since I am stout it takes something of a push. You can see me trying to move a second or two before I make it. She turns, showing white heels through her sandals, and goes back to the car. Out she peeks next with a Polaroid. She stoops down quickly and lines up picture after picture of me sitting there in front of the house with Maggie cowering behind me. She never takes a shot without making sure the house is included. When a cow comes nibbling around the edge of the yard she snaps it and me and Maggie and the house. Then she puts the Polaroid in the back seat of the car, and comes up and kisses me on the forehead.

Meanwhile Asalamalakim is going through motions with Maggie’s hand. Maggie’s hand is as limp as a fish, and probably as cold, despite the sweat, and she keeps trying to pull it back. It looks like Asalamalakim wants to shake hands but wants to do it fancy. Or maybe he don’t know how people shake hands. Anyhow, he soon gives up on Maggie.

“Well,” I say. “Dee.”

“No, Mama,” she says. “Not ‘Dee,’ Wangero Leewanika Kemanjo!”

25

“What happened to ‘Dee?’” I wanted to know.

“She’s dead,” Wangero said. “I couldn’t bear it any longer, being named after the people who oppress me.”

“You know as well as me you was named after your aunt Dicie,” I said. Dicie is my sister. She named Dee. We called her “Big Dee” after Dee was born.

“But who was she named after?” asked Wangero.

“I guess after Grandma Dee,” I said.

30

“And who was she named after?” asked Wangero.

“Her mother,” I said, and saw Wangero was getting tired. “That’s about as far back as I can trace it,” I said. Though, in fact, I probably could have carried it back beyond the Civil War through the branches.

“Well,” said Asalamalakim, “there you are.”

"Uhhnnh," I heard Maggie say.

"There I was not," I said, "before 'Dicie' cropped up in our family, so why should I try to trace it that far back?" 35

He just stood there grinning, looking down on me like somebody inspecting a Model A car.<sup>2</sup> Every once in a while he and Wangero sent eye signals over my head.

"How do you pronounce this name?" I asked.

"You don't have to call me by it if you don't want to," said Wangero.

"Why shouldn't I?" I asked. "If that's what you want us to call you, we'll call you."

"I know it might sound awkward at first," said Wangero. 40

"I'll get used to it," I said. "Ream it out again."

Well, soon we got the name out of the way. Asalamalakim had a name twice as long and three times as hard. After I tripped over it two or three times he told me to just call him Hakim-a-barber. I wanted to ask him was he a barber, but I didn't really think he was, so I didn't ask.

"You must belong to those beef-cattle peoples down the road," I said. They said "Asalamalakim" when they met you, too, but they didn't shake hands. Always too busy: feeding the cattle, fixing the fences, putting up salt-lick shelters, throwing down hay. When the white folks poisoned some of the herd the men stayed up all night with rifles in their hands. I walked a mile and a half just to see the sight.

Hakim-a-barber said, "I accept some of their doctrines, but farming and raising cattle is not my style." (They didn't tell me, and I didn't ask, whether Wangero [Dee] had really gone and married him.)

We sat down to eat and right away he said he didn't eat collards and pork was unclean. Wangero, though, went on through the chitlins and corn bread, the greens and everything else. She talked a blue streak over the sweet potatoes. Everything delighted her. Even the fact that we still used the benches her daddy made for the table when we couldn't afford to buy chairs. 45

"Oh, Mama!" she cried. Then turned to Hakim-a-barber. "I never knew how lovely these benches are. You can feel the rump prints," she said, running her hands underneath her and along the bench. Then she gave a sigh and her hand closed over Grandma Dee's butter dish. "That's it!" she said. "I knew there was something I wanted to ask you if I could have." She jumped up from the table and went over in the corner where the churn stood, the milk in it clabber by now. She looked at the churn and looked at it.

"This churn top is what I need," she said. "Didn't Uncle Buddy whittle it out of a tree you all used to have?"

"Yes," I said.

"Uh huh," she said happily. "And I want the dasher, too."

"Uncle Buddy whittle that, too?" asked the barber. 50

Dee (Wangero) looked up at me.

"Aunt Dee's first husband whittled the dash," said Maggie so low you almost couldn't hear her. "His name was Henry, but they called him Stash."

"Maggie's brain is like an elephant's," Wangero said, laughing. "I can use the churn top as a centerpiece for the alcove table," she said, sliding a plate over the churn, "and I'll think of something artistic to do with the dasher."

When she finished wrapping the dasher the handle stuck out. I took it for a moment in my hands. You didn't even have to look close to see where hands pushing the dasher up and down to make butter had left a kind of sink in the wood. In fact, there were a lot of small sinks; you could see where thumbs and fingers had sunk into the wood. It was beautiful light yellow wood, from a tree that grew in the yard where Big Dee and Stash had lived.

After dinner Dee (Wangero) went to the trunk at the foot of my bed and started rifling through it. Maggie hung back in the kitchen over the dishpan. Out came Wangero with two quilts. They had been pieced by Grandma Dee and then Big Dee and me had hung them on the quilt frames on the front porch and quilted them. One was in the Lone Star pattern. The other was Walk Around the Mountain. In both of them were scraps of dresses Grandma Dee had worn fifty and more years ago. Bits and pieces of Grandpa Jarrell's Paisley shirts. And one teeny faded blue piece, about the size of a penny matchbox, that was from Great Grandpa Ezra's uniform that he wore in the Civil War.

"Mama," Wangero said sweet as a bird. "Can I have these old quilts?"

I heard something fall in the kitchen, and a minute later the kitchen door slammed.

"Why don't you take one or two of the others?" I asked. "These old things was just done by me and Big Dee from some tops your grandma pieced before she died."

"No," said Wangero. "I don't want those. They are stitched around the borders by machine."

"That'll make them last better," I said.

60

"That's not the point," said Wangero. "These are all pieces of dresses Grandma used to wear. She did all this stitching by hand. Imagine!" She held the quilts securely in her arms, stroking them.

"Some of the pieces, like those lavender ones, come from old clothes her mother handed down to her," I said, moving up to touch the quilts. Dee (Wangero) moved back just enough so that I couldn't reach the quilts. They already belonged to her.

"Imagine!" she breathed again, clutching them closely to her bosom.

"The truth is," I said, "I promised to give them quilts to Maggie, for when she marries John Thomas."

She gasped like a bee had stung her.

65

"Maggie can't appreciate these quilts!" she said. "She'd probably be backward enough to put them to everyday use."

"I reckon she would," I said. "God knows I been saving 'em for long enough with nobody using 'em. I hope she will!" I didn't want to bring up how I had offered Dee (Wangero) a quilt when she went away to college. Then she had told me they were old-fashioned, out of style.

"But they're priceless!" she was saying now, furiously; for she has a temper. "Maggie would put them on the bed and in five years they'd be in rags. Less than that!"

"She can always make some more," I said. "Maggie knows how to quilt."

Dee (Wangero) looked at me with hatred. "You just will not understand. The point is these quilts, these quilts!" 70

"Well," I said, stumped. "What would you do with them?"

"Hang them," she said. As if that was the only thing you could do with quilts.

Maggie by now was standing in the door. I could almost hear the sound her feet made as they scraped over each other.

"She can have them, Mama," she said, like somebody used to never winning anything, or having anything reserved for her. "I can 'member Grandma Dee without the quilts." 75

I looked at her hard. She had filled her bottom lip with checkerberry snuff and it gave her face a kind of dopey, hangdog look. It was Grandma Dee and Big Dee who taught her how to quilt herself. She stood there with her scarred hands hidden in the folds of her skirt. She looked at her sister with something like fear but she wasn't mad at her. This was Maggie's portion. This was the way she knew God to work.

When I looked at her like that something hit me in the top of my head and ran down to the soles of my feet. Just like when I'm in church and the spirit of God touches me and I get happy and shout. I did something I never had done before: hugged Maggie to me, then dragged her on into the room, snatched the quilts out of Miss Wangero's hands and dumped them into Maggie's lap. Maggie just sat there on my bed with her mouth open.

"Take one or two of the others," I said to Dee.

But she turned without a word and went out to Hakim-a-barber.

"You just don't understand," she said, as Maggie and I came out to the car.

"What don't I understand?" I wanted to know. 80

"Your heritage," she said. And then she turned to Maggie, kissed her, and said, "You ought to try to make something of yourself, too, Maggie. It's really a new day for us. But from the way you and Mama still live you'd never know it."

She put on some sunglasses that hid everything above the tip of her nose and her chin.

Maggie smiled; maybe at the sunglasses. But a real smile, not scared. After we watched the car dust settle I asked Maggie to bring me a dip of snuff. And then the two of us sat there just enjoying, until it was time to go in the house and go to bed.

Exploring the Text

1. This story boils down to one decision, one question: should Mama have given Dee the quilts she wanted? Cite passages from the story to support your viewpoint.
2. The two opening paragraphs, set off from the rest of the story, serve as a kind of exposition. What do these paragraphs tell you about Mama? How do they set up the conflicts explored in the rest of the story?

3. Mama recounts how she sometimes dreams about herself and Dee appearing in a heartwarming reunion on a television show. How accurate do you think Mama's dreams about being on television are? How do they prepare us as readers to meet Dee? Do they bias us against her? Explain.
4. The action of "Everyday Use" is quite contained: a visit back home for college-educated Dee. Yet Walker expects us to understand that action in a larger context. What information about the past does Walker incorporate into the story's present? How does it affect our understanding of, or attitude toward, the three central characters?
5. Dee brings home a young man who introduces himself with an Islamic greeting and whose appearance Walker reports only through Mama's eyes: "a short, stocky man" whose "hair is all over his head a foot long and hanging from his chin like a kinky mule tail" (para. 19). How does this minor character, referred to as "Hakim-a-barber," contribute to the development of the three central characters?
6. In many traditional African cultures, the tribe pools resources to finance the education of a promising young person, who is then expected to assist the community. How is this practice reflected in this southern small town? What does Dee's disregard of the current practice or its origin say about her?
7. In college, Dee came into contact with people and ideas quite different from those with which she grew up. What values does the "new Dee"—Wangero—claim to embrace? How do these values conflict with her family's values? How might the two value systems overlap or complement each other?
8. In the story, we gain information about the quilts—what they look like, who made them, how they are being used, different views on how they should be used. Like most symbols, the quilts have different meanings for different people. What do they symbolize to Dee? to Maggie? to Mama?
9. Where do you find irony in the story? How would you describe that irony: angry? gentle? playful? resigned? bitter? As you develop your response, consider whether you read the title as ironic.
10. Walker gives the storytelling to Mama. Why? How would the story have been different with an omniscient narrator? (Try describing Dee's entrance from a more objective viewpoint.) Explain whether you think Mama's narration is the most effective way to convey Walker's purpose.

Fenstad's Mother

CHARLES BAXTER

Charles Baxter was born in 1947 in Minneapolis, Minnesota. He received his BA from Macalester College and his PhD from the State University of New York at Buffalo. For many years he directed the creative writing program at the University of Michigan, and is currently teaching at the University of Minnesota. Baxter is the author of several story collections, including Harmony of the World (1984) and Believers (1997), and a number of novels, including The Feast of Love (2000), Saul and Patsy (2003), and The Soul Thief (2008). He is also the author of some of the most acclaimed contemporary essays on the subject of writing, many of which are collected in Burning Down the House (1997) and The Art of Subtext: Beyond Plot (2008). “Fenstad’s Mother,” which originally appeared in the Atlantic Monthly, was also published in both the 1989 edition of The Best American Short Stories and Baxter’s collection A Relative Stranger (1990).

On Sunday morning after Communion Fenstad drove across town to visit his mother. Behind the wheel, he exhaled with his hand flat in front of his mouth to determine if the wine on his breath could be detected. He didn’t think so. Fenstad’s mother was a lifelong social progressive who was amused by her son’s churchgoing, and, wine or no wine, she could guess where he had been. She had spent her life in the company of rebels and deviationists, and she recognized all their styles.

Passing a frozen pond in the city park, Fenstad slowed down to watch the skaters, many of whom he knew by name and skating style. From a distance they were dots of color ready for flight, frictionless. To express grief on skates seemed almost impossible, and Fenstad liked that. He parked his car on a residential block and took out his skates from the back seat, where he kept them all winter. With his fingertips he touched the wooden blade guards, thinking of the time. He checked his watch; he had fifteen minutes.

Out on the ice, still wearing his churchy Sunday-morning suit, tie, and overcoat, but now circling the outside edge of the pond with his bare hands in his overcoat pockets, Fenstad admired the overcast sky and luxuriated in the brittle cold. He was active and alert in winter but felt sleepy throughout the summer. He passed a little girl in a pink jacket, pushing a tiny chair over the ice. He waved to his friend Ann, an off-duty cop, practicing her twirls. He waved to other friends. Without exception they waved back. As usual, he was impressed by the way skates improved human character.

Twenty minutes later, in the doorway of her apartment, his mother said, “Your cheeks are red.” She glanced down at his trousers, damp with melted snow. “You’ve been skating.” She kissed him on the cheek and turned to walk into her living room. “Skating after church? Isn’t that some sort of error?”

“It’s just happiness,” Fenstad said. Quickly he checked her apartment for any signs of memory loss or depression. He found none and immediately felt relief. The apartment smelled of soap and Lysol, the signs of an old woman who wouldn’t tolerate nonsense. Out on her coffee table, as usual, were the letters she was writing to her congressman and to political dictators around the globe. Fenstad’s mother pleaded for enlightened behavior and berated the dictators for their bad political habits.

She grasped the arm of the sofa and let herself down slowly. Only then did she smile. “How’s your soul, Harry?” she asked. “What’s the news?”

He smiled back and smoothed his hair. Martin Luther King's eyes locked into his from the framed picture on the wall opposite him. In the picture King was shaking hands with Fenstad's mother, the two of them surrounded by smiling faces. "My soul's okay, Ma," he said. "It's a hard project. I'm always working on it." He reached down for a chocolate-chunk cookie from a box on top of the television. "Who brought you these?"

"Your daughter Sharon. She came to see me on Friday." Fenstad's mother tilted her head at him. "You want to be a good person, but she's the real article. Goodness comes to her without any effort at all. She says you have a new girlfriend. A pharmacist this time. Susan, is it?" Fenstad nodded. "Harry, why does your generation always have to find the right person? Why can't you learn to live with the wrong person? Sooner or later everyone's wrong. Love isn't the most important thing, Harry, far from it. Why can't you see that? I still don't comprehend why you couldn't live with Eleanor." Eleanor was Fenstad's ex-wife. They had been divorced for a decade, but Fenstad's mother hoped for a reconciliation.

"Come on, Ma," Fenstad said. "Over and done with, gone and gone." He took another cookie.

"You live with somebody so that you're living with somebody, and then you go out and do the work of the world. I don't understand all this pickiness about lovers. In a pinch anybody'll do, Harry, believe me."

On the side table was a picture of her late husband, Fenstad's mild, middle-of-the-road father. Fenstad glanced at the picture and let the silence hang between them before asking, "How are you, Ma?"

"I'm all right." She leaned back in the sofa, whose springs made a strange, almost human groan. "I want to get out. I spend too much time in this place in January. You should expand my horizons. Take me somewhere."

"Come to my composition class," Fenstad said. "I'll pick you up at dinnertime on Tuesday. Eat early."

"They'll notice me," she said, squinting. "I'm too old."

"I'll introduce you," her son said. "You'll fit right in."

Fenstad wrote brochures in the publicity department of a computer company during the day, and taught an extension English-composition class at the downtown campus of the state university two nights a week. He didn't need the money; he taught the class because he liked teaching strangers and because he enjoyed the sense of hope that classrooms held for him. This hopefulness and didacticism he had picked up from his mother.

On Tuesday night she was standing at the door of the retirement apartment building, dressed in a dark blue overcoat—her best. Her stylishness was belied slightly by a pair of old fuzzy red earmuffs. Inside the car Fenstad noticed that she had put on perfume, unusual for her. Leaning back, she gazed out contentedly at the nighttime lights.

"Who's in this group of students?" she asked. "Working-class people, I hope. Those are the ones you should be teaching. Anything else is just a career."

"Oh, they work, all right." He looked at his mother and saw, as they passed under a streetlight, a combination of sadness and delicacy in her face. Her usual mask of tough optimism seemed to be deserting her. He braked at a red light and said, "I have a hairdresser and a garage mechanic and a housewife, a Mrs. Nelson, and three guys who're sanitation workers. Plenty of others. One guy you'll really like is a young black man with glasses who sits in the back row and reads Workers' Vanguard and Bakunin during class. He's brilliant. I don't know why he didn't test out of this class. His name's York Follette, and he's—"

"I want to meet him," she said quickly. She scowled at the moonlit snow. "A man with ideas. People like that have gone out of my life." She looked over at her son. "What I hate about being my age is how nice everyone tries to be. I was never nice, but now everybody is pelting me with sugar cubes." She opened her window an inch and let the cold air blow over her, ruffling her stiff gray hair. 20

When they arrived at the school, snow had started to fall, and at the other end of the parking lot a police car's flashing light beamed long crimson rays through the dense flakes. Fenstad's mother walked deliberately toward the door, shaking her head mistrustfully at the building and the police. Approaching the steps, she took her son's hand. "I liked the columns on the old buildings," she said, "the old university buildings, I mean. I liked Greek Revival better than this Modernist-bunker stuff." Inside, she blinked in the light at the smooth, waxed linoleum floors and cement-block walls. She held up her hand to shade her eyes. Fenstad took her elbow to guide her over the snow melting in puddles in the entryway. "I never asked you what you're teaching tonight."

"Logic," Fenstad said.

"Ah." She smiled and nodded. "Dialectics!"

"Not quite. Just logic."

She shrugged. She was looking at the clumps of students standing in the glare of the hallway, drinking coffee from paper cups and smoking cigarettes in the general conversational din. She wasn't used to such noise: she stopped in the middle of the corridor underneath a wall clock and stared happily in no particular direction. With her eyes shut she breathed in the close air, smelling of wet overcoats and smoke, and Fenstad remembered how much his mother had always liked smoke-filled rooms, where ideas fought each other, and where some of those ideas died. 25

"Come on," he said, taking her hand again. Inside Fenstad's classroom six people sat in the angular postures of pre-boredom. York Follette was already in the back row, his copy of Workers' Vanguard shielding his face. Fenstad's mother headed straight for him and sat down in the desk next to his. Fenstad saw them shake hands, and in two minutes they were talking in low, rushed murmurs. He saw York Follette laugh quietly and nod. What was it that blacks saw and appreciated in his mother? They had always liked her—written to her, called her, checked up on her—and Fenstad wondered if they recognized something in his mother that he himself had never been able to see.

At 7:35 most of the students had arrived and were talking to each other vigorously, as if they didn't want Fenstad to start and thought they could delay him. He stared at them, and when they wouldn't quiet down, he made himself rigid and said,

"Good evening. We have a guest tonight." Immediately the class grew silent. He held his arm out straight, indicating with a flick of his hand the old woman in the back row. "My mother," he said. "Clara Fenstad." For the first time all semester his students appeared to be paying attention: they turned around collectively and looked at Fenstad's mother, who smiled and waved. A few of the students began to applaud; others joined in. The applause was quiet but apparently genuine. Fenstad's mother brought herself slowly to her feet and made a suggestion of a bow. Two of the students sitting in front of her turned around and began to talk to her. At the front of the class Fenstad started his lecture on logic, but his mother wouldn't quiet down. This was a class for adults. They were free to do as they liked.

Lowering his head and facing the blackboard, Fenstad reviewed problems in logic, following point by point the outline set down by the textbook: post hoc fallacies, false authorities, begging the question, circular reasoning, ad hominem arguments, all the rest. Explaining these problems, his back turned, he heard sighs of boredom, boldly expressed. Occasionally he glanced at the back of the room. His mother was watching him carefully, and her face was expressing all the complexity of dismay. Dismay radiated from her. Her disappointment wasn't personal, because his mother didn't think that people as individuals were at fault for what they did. As usual, her disappointed hope was located in history and in the way people agreed with already existing histories.

She was angry with him for collaborating with grammar. She would call it unconsciously installed authority. Then she would find other names for it.

"All right," he said loudly, trying to make eye contact with someone in the room besides his mother, "let's try some examples. Can anyone tell me what, if anything, is wrong with the following sentence? 'I, like most people, have a unique problem.'" 30

The three sanitation workers, in the third row, began to laugh. Fenstad caught himself glowering and singled out the middle one.

"Yes, it is funny, isn't it?"

The man in the middle smirked and looked at the floor. "I was just thinking of my unique problem."

"Right," Fenstad said. "But what's wrong with saying, 'I, like most people, have a unique problem?'"

"Solving it?" This was Mrs. Nelson, who sat by the window so that she could gaze at the tree outside, lit by a streetlight. All through class she looked at the tree as if it were a lover. 35

"Solving what?"

"Solving the problem you have. What is the problem?"

"That's actually not what I'm getting at," Fenstad said. "Although it's a good related point. I'm asking what might be wrong logically with that sentence."

"It depends," Harold Ronson said. He worked in a service station and sometimes came to class wearing his work shirt with his name tag, HAROLD, stitched into it. "It depends on what your problem is. You haven't told us your problem."

"No," Fenstad said, "my problem is not the problem." He thought of Alice in Wonderland and felt, physically, as if he himself were getting small. "Let's try this again. What might be wrong with saying that most people have a unique problem?" 40

"You shouldn't be so critical," Timothy Melville said. "You should look on the bright side, if possible."

"What?"

"He's right," Mrs. Nelson said. "Most people have unique problems, but many people do their best to help themselves, such as taking night classes or working at meditation."

"No doubt that's true," Fenstad said. "But why can't most people have a unique problem?"

"Oh, I disagree," Mrs. Nelson said, still looking at her tree. Fenstad glanced at it and saw that it was crested with snow. It was beautiful. No wonder she looked at it. "I believe that most people do have unique problems. They just shouldn't talk about them all the time." 45

"Can anyone," Fenstad asked, looking at the back wall and hoping to see something there that was not wall, "can anyone give me an example of a unique problem?"

"Divorce," Barb Kjellerud said. She sat near the door and knitted during class. She answered questions without looking up. "Divorce is unique."

"No, it isn't!" Fenstad said, failing in the crucial moment to control his voice. He and his mother exchanged glances. In his mother's face for a split second was the history of her compassionate, ambivalent attention to him. "Divorce is not unique." He waited to calm himself. "It's everywhere. Now try again. Give me a unique problem."

Silence. "This is a trick question," Arlene Hubbly said. "I'm sure it's a trick question."

"Not necessarily. Does anyone know what unique means?" 50

"One of a kind," York Follette said, gazing at Fenstad with dry amusement. Sometimes he took pity on Fenstad and helped him out of jams. Fenstad's mother smiled and nodded.

"Right," Fenstad crowed, racing toward the blackboard as if he were about to write something. "So let's try again. Give me a unique problem."

"You give us a unique problem," one of the sanitation workers said. Fenstad didn't know whether he'd been given a statement or a command. He decided to treat it as a command.

"All right," he said. He stopped and looked down at his shoes. Maybe it was a trick question. He thought for ten seconds. Problem after problem presented itself to him. He thought of poverty, of the assaults on the earth, of the awful complexities of love. "I can't think of one," Fenstad said. His hands went into his pockets.

"That's because problems aren't personal," Fenstad's mother said from the back of the room. "They're collective." She waited while several students in the class sat up and nodded. "And people must work together on their solutions." She talked for another two minutes, taking the subject out of logic and putting it neatly in politics, where she knew it belonged. 55

The snow had stopped by the time the class was over. Fenstad took his mother's arm and escorted her to the car. After letting her down on the passenger side and starting the engine, he began to clear the front windshield. He didn't have a scraper and had forgotten his gloves, so he was using his bare hands. When he brushed the snow away on his mother's side, she looked out at him, surprised, a terribly aged Sleeping Beauty awakened against her will.

Once the car had warmed up, she was in a gruff mood and repositioned herself under the seat belt while making quiet but aggressive remarks. The sight of the new snow didn't seem to calm her. "Logic," she said at last. "That wasn't logic. Those are just rhetorical tactics. It's filler and drudgery."

"I don't want to discuss it now."

"All right. I'm sorry. Let's talk about something more pleasant."

They rode together in silence. Then she began to shake her head. "Don't take me home," she said. "I want to have a spot of tea somewhere before I go back. A nice place where they serve tea, all right?"

He parked outside an all-night restaurant with huge front plate-glass windows; it was called Country Bob's. He held his mother's elbow from the car to the door. At the door, looking back to make sure that he had turned off his headlights, he saw his tracks and his mother's in the snow. His were separate footprints, but hers formed two long lines.

Inside, at the table, she sipped her tea and gazed at her son for a long time. "Thanks for the adventure, Harry, I do appreciate it. What're you doing in class next week? Oh, I remember. How-to papers. That should be interesting."

"Want to come?"

"Very much. I'll keep quiet next time, if you want me to."

Fenstad shook his head. "It's okay. It's fun having you along. You can say whatever you want. The students loved you. I knew you'd be a sensation, and you were. They'd probably rather have you teaching the class than me."

He noticed that his mother was watching something going on behind him, and Fenstad turned around in the booth so that he could see what it was. At first all he saw was a woman, a young woman with long hair wet from snow and hanging in clumps, talking in the aisle to two young men, both of whom were nodding at her. Then she moved on to the next table. She spoke softly. Fenstad couldn't hear her words, but he saw the solitary customer to whom she was speaking shake his head once, keeping his eyes down. Then the woman saw Fenstad and his mother. In a moment she was standing in front of them.

She wore two green plaid flannel shirts and a thin torn jacket. Like Fenstad, she wore no gloves. Her jeans were patched, and she gave off a strong smell, something like hay, Fenstad thought, mixed with tar and sweat. He looked down at her feet and saw that she was wearing penny loafers with no socks. Coins, old pennies, were in both shoes; the leather was wet and cracked. He looked in the woman's face. Under a hat that seemed to collapse on either side of her head, the woman's face was thin and chalk-white except for the fatigue lines under her eyes. The eyes themselves were bright blue, beautiful, and crazy. To Fenstad, she looked desperate, percolating slightly with insanity, and he was about to say so to his mother when the woman bent down toward him and said, "Mister, can you spare any money?"

Involuntarily, Fenstad looked toward the kitchen, hoping that the manager would spot this person and take her away. When he looked back again, his mother was taking her blue coat off, wriggling in the booth to free her arms from the sleeves. Stopping and starting again, she appeared to be stuck inside the coat; then she lifted herself up, trying to stand, and with a quick, quiet groan slipped the coat off. She reached down and folded the coat over and held it toward the woman. "Here," she said. "Here's my coat. Take it before my son stops me."

"Mother, you can't." Fenstad reached forward to grab the coat, but his mother pulled it away from him.

When Fenstad looked back at the woman, her mouth was open, showing several gray teeth. Her hands were outstretched, and he understood, after a moment, that this was a posture of refusal, a gesture saying no, and that the woman wasn't used to it and did it awkwardly. Fenstad's mother was standing and trying to push the coat toward the woman, not toward her hands but lower, at waist level, and she was saying, "Here, here, here, here." The sound, like a human birdcall, frightened Fenstad, and he stood up quickly, reached for his wallet, and removed the first two bills he could find, two twenties. He grabbed the woman's chapped, ungloved left hand.

"Take these," he said, putting the two bills in her icy palm, "for the love of God, and please go."

He was close to her face. Tonight he would pray for her. For a moment the woman's expression was vacant. His mother was still pushing the coat at her, and the woman was unsteadily bracing herself. The woman's mouth was open, and her stagnant-water breath washed over him. "I know you," she said. "You're my little baby cousin."

"Go away, please," Fenstad said. He pushed at her. She turned, clutching his money. He reached around to put his hands on his mother's shoulders. "Ma," he said, "she's gone now. Mother, sit down. I gave her money for a coat." His mother fell down on her side of the booth, and her blue coat rolled over on the bench beside her, showing the label and the shiny inner lining. When he looked up, the woman who had been begging had disappeared, though he could still smell her odor, an essence of wretchedness.

"Excuse me, Harry," his mother said. "I have to go to the bathroom."

She rose and walked toward the front of the restaurant, turned a corner, and was out of sight. Fenstad sat and tried to collect himself. When the waiter came, a boy with an earring and red hair in a flattop, Fenstad just shook his head and said, "More tea." He realized that his mother hadn't taken off her earmuffs, and the image of his mother in the ladies' room with her earmuffs on gave him a fit of uneasiness. After getting up from the booth and following the path that his mother had taken, he stood outside the ladies'-room door and, when no one came in or out, he knocked. He waited for a decent interval. Still hearing no answer, he opened the door.

His mother was standing with her arms down on either side of the first sink. She was holding herself there, her eyes following the hot water as it poured from the tap around the bright porcelain sink down into the drain, and she looked furious. Fenstad touched her and she snapped toward him.

"Your logic!" she said.

He opened the door for her and helped her back to the booth. The second cup of tea had been served, and Fenstad's mother sipped it in silence. They did not converse. When she had finished, she said, "All right. I do feel better now. Let's go."

At the curb in front of her apartment building he leaned forward and kissed her on the cheek. "Pick me up next Tuesday," she said. "I want to go back to that class." He nodded. He watched as she made her way past the security guard at the front desk; then he put his car into drive and started home.

That night he skated in the dark for an hour with his friend, Susan, the pharmacist. She was an excellent skater; they had met on the ice. She kept late hours and, like Fenstad, enjoyed skating at night. She listened attentively to his story about his mother and the woman in the restaurant. To his great relief she recommended no course of action. She listened. She didn't believe in giving advice, even when asked.

The following Tuesday, Fenstad's mother was again in the back row next to York Follette. One of the fluorescent lights overhead was flickering, which gave the room, Fenstad thought, a sinister quality, like a debtors' prison or a refuge for the homeless. He'd been thinking about such people for the entire week. For seven days now he had caught whiffs of the woman's breath in the air, and one morning, Friday, he thought he caught a touch of the rotten-celery smell on his own breath, after a particularly difficult sales meeting.

Tonight was how-to night. The students were expected to stand at the front of the class and read their papers, instructing their peers and answering questions if necessary. Starting off, and reading her paper in a frightened monotone, Mrs. Nelson told the class how to bake a cheese souffle. Arlene Hubbly's paper was about mushroom hunting. Fenstad was put off by the introduction. "The advantage to mushrooms," Arlene Hubbly read, "is that they are delicious. The disadvantage to mushrooms is that they can make you sick, even die." But then she explained how to recognize the common shaggymane by its cylindrical cap and dark tufts; she drew a model on the board. She warned the class against the Clitocybe illudens, the Jack-o'-Lantern. "Never eat a mushroom like this one or any mushroom that glows in the dark. Take heed!" she said, fixing her gaze on the class. Fenstad saw his mother taking rapid notes. Harold Ronson, the mechanic, reading his own prose painfully and slowly, told the class how to get rust spots out of their automobiles. Again Fenstad noticed his mother taking notes. York Follette told the class about the proper procedures for laying down attic insulation and how to know when enough was enough, so that a homeowner wouldn't be robbed blind, as he put it, by the salesmen, in whose ranks he had once counted himself.

Barb Kjellerud had brought along a cassette player, and told the class that her hobby was ballroom dancing; she would instruct them in the basic waltz. She pushed the play button on the tape machine, and "Tales from the Vienna Woods" came booming out. To the accompaniment of the music she read her paper, illustrating, as she went, how the steps were to be performed. She danced alone in front of them, doing so with flair. Her blonde hair swayed as she danced, Fenstad noticed. She looked a bit like a contestant in a beauty contest who had too much personality to win. She explained to the men the necessity of leading. Someone had to lead, she said, and tradition had given this responsibility to the male. Fenstad heard his mother snicker.

When Barb Kjellerud asked for volunteers, Fenstad's mother raised her hand. She said she knew how to waltz and would help out. At the front of the class she made a counterclockwise motion with her hand, and for the next minute, sitting at the back of the room, Fenstad watched his mother and one of the sanitation workers waltzing under the flickering fluorescent lights.

"What a wonderful class," Fenstad's mother said on the way home. "I hope you're 85 paying attention to what they tell you."

Fenstad nodded. "Tea?" he asked.

She shook her head. "Where're you going after you drop me off?"

"Skating," he said. "I usually go skating. I have a date."

"With the pharmacist? In the dark?"

"We both like it, Ma." As he drove, he made an all-purpose gesture. "The moon 90 and the stars," he said simply.

When he left her off, he felt unsettled. He considered, as a point of courtesy, staying with her a few minutes, but by the time he had this idea he was already away from the building and was headed down the street.

He and Susan were out on the ice together, skating in large circles, when Susan pointed to a solitary figure sitting on a park bench near the lake's edge. The sky had cleared; the moon gave everything a cold, fine-edged clarity. When Fenstad followed the line of Susan's finger, he saw at once that the figure on the bench was his mother. He realized it simply because of the way she sat there, drawn into herself, attentive even in the winter dark. He skated through the uncleared snow over the ice until he was standing close enough to speak to her. "Mother," he said, "what are you doing here?"

She was bundled up, a thick woolen cap drawn over her head, and two scarves covering much of her face. He could see little other than the two lenses of her glasses facing him in the dark. "I wanted to see you two," she told him.

"I thought you'd look happy, and you did. I like to watch happiness. I always have."

"How can you see us? We're so far away." 95

"That's how I saw you."

This made no sense to him, so he asked, "How'd you get here?"

"I took a cab. That part was easy."

"Aren't you freezing?"

"I don't know. I don't know if I'm freezing or not." 100

He and Susan took her back to her apartment as soon as they could get their boots on. In the car Mrs. Fenstad insisted on asking Susan what kind of safety procedures were used to ensure that drugs weren't smuggled out of pharmacies and sold illegally, but she didn't appear to listen to the answer, and by the time they reached her building, she seemed to be falling asleep. They helped her up to her apartment. Susan thought that they should give her a warm bath before putting her into bed, and, together, they did. She did not protest. She didn't even seem to notice them as they guided her in and out of the bathtub.

Fenstad feared that his mother would catch some lung infection, and it turned out to be bronchitis, which kept her in her apartment for the first three weeks of February, until her cough went down. Fenstad came by every other day to see how she was, and one Tuesday, after work, he went up to her floor and heard piano music: an old recording, which sounded much played, of the brightest and fastest jazz piano he had ever heard—music of superhuman brilliance. He swung open the door to her apartment and saw York Follette sitting near his mother's bed. On the bedside table was a small tape player, from which the music poured into the room.

Fenstad's mother was leaning back against the pillow, smiling, her eyes closed.

Follette turned toward Fenstad. He had been talking softly. He motioned toward the tape machine and said, "Art Tatum. It's a cut called 'Battery Bounce.' Your mother's never heard it."

"Jazz, Harry," Fenstad's mother said, her eyes still closed, not needing to see her son. "York is explaining to me about Art Tatum and jazz. Next week he's going to try something more progressive on me." Now his mother opened her eyes. "Have you ever heard such music before, Harry?"

They were both looking at him. "No," he said, "I never heard anything like it."

"This is my unique problem, Harry," Fenstad's mother coughed and then waited to recover her breath. "I never heard enough jazz." She smiled. "What glimpses!" she said at last.

After she recovered, he often found her listening to the tape machine that York Follette had given her. She liked to hear the Oscar Peterson Trio as the sun set and the lights of evening came on. She now often mentioned glimpses. Back at home, every night, Fenstad spoke about his mother in his prayers of remembrance and thanksgiving, even though he knew she would disapprove.

1. How does the first paragraph of "Fenstad's Mother" set up expectations about Fenstad and his mother? Are those expectations fulfilled or reversed over the course of the story?
2. What does it tell us about Fenstad that he loves to ice-skate at night? How does that hobby develop his character? How else does Baxter sketch Fenstad's character?
3. How does Baxter create the character of Fenstad's mother? Pay close attention to what she learns during the course of the story.
4. It is easy to read this story as binary: Fenstad is traditional; his mother is progressive. How does Baxter make it more complex than that?
5. Why is Fenstad such an ineffective teacher? Why does the class warm to his mother so quickly? What does his mother mean when she says, "I hope you're paying attention to what they tell you" (para. 85)?
6. In an essay entitled "Against Epiphanies," Baxter warns against "conclusive insight." He was criticizing a tendency in modern fiction to depend on one enlightening

The Free Radio

SALMAN RUSHDIE

Born in 1947, raised in Bombay (now Mumbai), and educated at Cambridge, Salman Rushdie achieved fame with his second novel, Midnight’s Children (1981), which won the Man Booker Prize. Rushdie’s life changed forever after the publication of his novel The Satanic Verses (1988); some considered the book to be blasphemous against Islam, and the ultraorthodox leadership of Iran issued a fatwa—a death sentence—against Rushdie. Assassination threats and attempts forced the author into hiding for nearly ten years. While underground in England, Rushdie continued to write and publish a half dozen books of fiction and non-fiction, as well as numerous essays and a stage adaptation of his children’s book, Haroun and the Sea of Stories. In 2007, he was knighted by Queen Elizabeth II. Rushdie’s most recent novel is The Enchantress of Florence (2008), and he is currently a distinguished writer-in-residence at Emory University. “The Free Radio” comes from Rushdie’s 1995 collection East, West, whose nine stories are divided into three setting-based sections: East, West, and East West (the latter of which features Eastern expatriates living in the West). “The Free Radio” appears in the East section of the book.

We all knew nothing good would happen to him while the thief’s widow had her claws dug into his flesh, but the boy was an innocent, a real donkey’s child, you can’t teach such people.

That boy could have had a good life. God had blessed him with God’s own looks, and his father had gone to the grave for him, but didn’t he leave the boy a brand-new first-class cycle rickshaw with plastic covered seats and all? So: looks he had, his own trade he had, there would have been a good wife in time, he should just have taken out some years to save some rupees; but no, he must fall for a thief’s widow before the hairs had time to come out on his chin, before his milk-teeth had split, one might say.

We felt bad for him, but who listens to the wisdom of the old today?

I say: who listens?

Exactly; nobody, certainly not a stone-head like Ramani the rickshaw-wallah. But I blame the widow. I saw it happen, you know, I saw most of it until I couldn’t stand any more. I sat under this very banyan, smoking this selfsame hookah, and not much escaped my notice.

And at one time I tried to save him from his fate, but it was no go . . .

The widow was certainly attractive, no point denying, in a sort of hard vicious way she was all right, but it is her mentality that was rotten. Ten years older than Ramani she must have been, five children alive and two dead, what that thief did besides robbing and making babies God only knows, but he left her not one new paisa,<sup>1</sup> so of course she would be interested in Ramani. I'm not saying a rickshaw-wallah makes much in this town but two mouthfuls are better to eat than wind. And not many people will look twice at the widow of a good-for-nothing.

They met right here.

One day Ramani rode into town without a passenger, but grinning as usual as if someone had given him a ten-chip tip, singing some playback music from the radio, his hair greased like for a wedding. He was not such a fool that he didn't know how the girls watched him all the time and passed remarks about his long and well-muscled legs.

The thief's widow had gone to the bania<sup>2</sup> shop to buy some three grains of dal<sup>3</sup> and I won't say where the money came from, but people saw men at night near her rutputty shack, even the bania himself they were telling me but I personally will not comment.

She had all her five brats with her and then and there, cool as a fan, she called out: 'Hey Rickshaah!' Loud, you know, like a truly cheap type. Showing us she can afford to ride in rickshaws, as if anyone was interested. Her children must have gone hungry to pay for the ride but in my opinion it was an investment for her, because must-be she had decided already to put her hooks into Ramani. So they all poured into the rickshaw and he took her away, and with the five kiddies as well as the widow there was quite a weight, so he was puffing hard, and the veins were standing out on his legs, and I thought, careful, my son, or you will have this burden to pull for all of your life.

But after that Ramani and the thief's widow were seen everywhere, shamelessly, in public places, and I was glad his mother was dead because if she had lived to see this her face would have fallen off from shame.

Sometimes in those days Ramani came into this street in the evenings to meet some friends, and they thought they were very smart because they would go into the back room of the Irani's canteen and drink illegal liquor, only of course everybody knew, but who would do anything, if boys ruin their lives let their relations worry.

I was sad to see Ramani fall into this bad company. His parents were known to me when alive. But when I told Ramani to keep away from those hot-shots he grinned like a sheep and said I was wrong, nothing bad was taking place.

Let it go, I thought.

I knew those cronies of his. They all wore the armbands of the new Youth Movement. This was the time of the State of Emergency,<sup>4</sup> and these friends were not peaceful persons, there were stories of beatings-up, so I sat quiet under my tree. Ramani wore no armband but he went with them because they impressed him, the fool.

<sup>4</sup>For almost two years (1975–1977), following a disputed election and the resulting unrest, civil liberties and elections were suspended in India, and the government ruled by decree.—Eds.

These armband youths were always flattering Ramani. Such a handsome chap, they told him, compared to you Shashi Kapoor and Amitabh are like lepers only, you should go to Bombay and be put in the motion pictures.

They flattered him with dreams because they knew they could take money from him at cards and he would buy them drink while they did it, though he was no richer than they. So now Ramani's head became filled with these movie dreams, because there was nothing else inside to take up any space, and this is another reason why I blame the widow woman, because she had more years and should have had more sense. In two ticks she could have made him forget all about it, but no, I heard her telling him one day for all to hear, 'Truly you have the looks of Lord Krishna himself, except you are not blue all over.' In the street! So all would know they were lovers! From that day on I was sure a disaster would happen.

The next time the thief's widow came into the street to visit the bania shop I decided to act. Not for my own sake but for the boy's dead parents I risked being shamed by a . . . no, I will not call her the name, she is elsewhere now and they will know what she is like.

'Thief's widow!' I called out.

She stopped dead, jerking her face in an ugly way, as if I had hit her with a whip.

'Come here and speak,' I told her.

Now she could not refuse because I am not without importance in the town and maybe she calculated that if people saw us talking they would stop ignoring her when she passed, so she came as I knew she would.

'I have to say this thing only,' I told her with dignity. 'Ramani the rickshaw boy is dear to me, and you must find some person of your own age, or, better still, go to the widows' ashrams<sup>5</sup> in Benares and spend the rest of your life there in holy prayer, thanking God that widow-burning is now illegal.'

So at this point she tried to shame me by screaming out and calling me curses and saying that I was a poisonous old man who should have died years ago, and then she said, 'Let me tell you, mister teacher sahib retired, that your Ramani has asked to marry me and I have said no, because I wish no more children, and he is a young man and should have his own. So tell that to the whole world and stop your cobra poison.'

For a time after that I closed my eyes to this affair of Ramani and the thief's widow, because I had done all I could and there were many other things in the town to interest a person like myself. For instance, the local health officer had brought a big white caravan into the street and was given permission to park it out of the way under the banyan tree; and every night men were taken into this van for a while and things were done to them.

I did not care to be in the vicinity at these times, because the youths with arm-bands were always in attendance, so I took my hookah and sat in another place. I heard rumours of what was happening in the caravan but I closed my ears.

But it was while this caravan, which smelled of ether, was in town that the extent of the widow's wickedness became plain; because at this time Ramani suddenly began to talk about his new fantasy, telling everyone he could find that very shortly he was to receive a highly special and personalised gift from the Central Government in Delhi itself, and this gift was to be a brand-new first-class battery-operated transistor radio.

Now then: we had always believed that our Ramani was a little soft in the head, with his notions of being a film star and what all; so most of us just nodded tolerantly and said, 'Yes, Ram, that is nice for you,' and, 'What a fine, generous Government it is that gives radios to persons who are so keen on popular music.'

But Ramani insisted it was true, and seemed happier than at any time in his life, a happiness which could not be explained simply by the supposed imminence of the transistor. 30

Soon after the dream-radio was first mentioned, Ramani and the thief's widow were married, and then I understood everything. I did not attend the nuptials—it was a poor affair by all accounts—but not long afterwards I spoke to Ram when he came past the banyan with an empty rickshaw one day.

He came to sit by me and I asked, 'My child, did you go to the caravan? What have you let them do to you?'

'Don't worry,' he replied. 'Everything is tremendously wonderful. I am in love, teacher sahib, and I have made it possible for me to marry my woman.'

I confess I became angry; indeed, I almost wept as I realised that Ramani had gone voluntarily to subject himself to a humiliation which was being forced upon the other men who were taken to the caravan. I reproved him bitterly. 'My idiot child, you have let that woman deprive you of your manhood!'

'It is not so bad,' Ram said, meaning the nasbandi.<sup>6</sup> It does not stop lovemaking or anything, excuse me, teacher sahib, for speaking of such a thing. It stops babies only and my woman did not want children any more, so now all is hundred per cent OK. Also it is in national interest,' he pointed out. 'And soon the free radio will arrive.' 35

'The free radio,' I repeated.

'Yes, remember, teacher sahib,' Ram said confidentially, 'some years back, in my kiddie days, when Laxman the tailor had this operation? In no time the radio came and from all over town people gathered to listen to it. It is how the Government says thank you. It will be excellent to have.'

'Go away, get away from me,' I cried out in despair, and did not have the heart to tell him what everyone else in the country already knew, which was that the free radio scheme was a dead duck, long gone, long forgotten. It had been over—funtoosh!—for years.

After these events the thief's widow, who was now Ram's wife, did not come into town very often, no doubt being too ashamed of what she had made him do, but

Ramani worked longer hours than ever before, and every time he saw any of the dozens of people he'd told about the radio he would put one hand up to his ear as if he were already holding the blasted machine in it, and he would mimic broadcasts with a certain energetic skill.

'Yé Akashvani hai,' he announced to the streets. 'This is All-India Radio. Here is the news. A Government spokesman today announced that Ramani rickshaw-wallah's radio was on its way and would be delivered at any moment. And now some playback music.' After which he would sing songs by Asha Bhonsle or Lata Mangeshkar in a high, ridiculous falsetto.

Ram always had the rare quality of total belief in his dreams, and there were times when his faith in the imaginary radio almost took us in, so that we half-believed it was really on its way, or even that it was already there, cupped invisibly against his ear as he rode his rickshaw around the streets of the town. We began to expect to hear Ramani, around a corner or at the far end of a lane, ringing his bell and yelling cheerfully:

'All-India Radio! This is All-India Radio!'

Time passed. Ram continued to carry the invisible radio around town. One year passed. Still his caricatures of the radio channel filled the air in the streets. But when I saw him now, there was a new thing in his face, a strained thing, as if he were having to make a phenomenal effort, which was much more tiring than driving a rickshaw, more tiring even than pulling a rickshaw containing a thief's widow and her five living children and the ghosts of two dead ones; as if all the energy of his young body was being poured into that fictional space between his ear and his hand, and he was trying to bring the radio into existence by a mighty, and possibly fatal, act of will.

I felt most helpless, I can tell you, because I had divined that Ram had poured into the idea of the radio all his worries and regrets about what he had done, and that if the dream were to die he would be forced to face the full gravity of his crime against his own body, to understand that the thief's widow had turned him, before she married him, into a thief of a stupid and terrible kind, because she had made him rob himself.

And then the white caravan came back to its place under the banyan tree and I knew there was nothing to be done, because Ram would certainly come to get his gift.

He did not come for one day, then for two, and I learned afterwards that he had not wished to seem greedy; he didn't want the health officer to think he was desperate for the radio. Besides, he was half hoping they would come over and give it to him at his place, perhaps with some kind of small, formal presentation ceremony. A fool is a fool and there is no accounting for his notions.

On the third day he came. Ringing his bicycle-bell and imitating weather forecasts, ear cupped as usual, he arrived at the caravan. And in the rickshaw behind him sat the thief's widow, the witch, who had not been able to resist coming along to watch her companion's destruction.

It did not take very long.

Ram went into the caravan gaily, waving at his armbanded cronies who were guarding it against the anger of the people, and I am told—for I had left the scene to spare myself the pain—that his hair was well-oiled and his clothes were freshly starched. The thief's widow did not move from the rickshaw, but sat there with a black sari pulled over her head, clutching at her children as if they were straws.

After a short time there were sounds of disagreement inside the caravan, and then louder noises still, and finally the youths in armbands went in to see what was becoming, and soon after that Ram was frogmarched out by his drinking-chums, and his hair-grease was smudged on to his face and there was blood coming from his mouth. His hand was no longer cupped by his ear.

And still—they tell me—the thief's black widow did not move from her place in the rickshaw, although they dumped her husband in the dust.

Yes, I know, I'm an old man, my ideas are wrinkled with age, and these days they tell me sterilisation and God knows what is necessary, and maybe I'm wrong to blame the widow as well—why not? Maybe all the views of the old can be discounted now, and if that's so, let it be. But I'm telling this story and I haven't finished yet.

Some days after the incident at the caravan I saw Ramani selling his rickshaw to the old Muslim crook who runs the bicycle-repair shop. When he saw me watching, Ram came to me and said, 'Goodbye, teacher sahib, I am off to Bombay, where I will become a bigger film star than Shashi Kapoor or Amitabh Bachchan even.'

"I am off," you say? I asked him. 'Are you perhaps travelling alone?'

He stiffened. The thief's widow had already taught him not to be humble in the presence of elders.

'My wife and children will come also,' he said. It was the last time we spoke. They left that same day on the down train.

After some months had passed I got his first letter, which was not written by himself, of course, since in spite of all my long-ago efforts he barely knew how to write. He had paid a professional letter-writer, which must have cost him many rupees, because everything in life costs money and in Bombay it costs twice as much. Don't ask me why he wrote to me, but he did. I have the letters and can give you proof positive, so maybe there are some uses for old people still, or maybe he knew I was the only one who would be interested in his news.

Anyhow: the letters were full of his new career, they told me how he'd been discovered at once, a big studio had given him a test, now they were grooming him for stardom, he spent his days at the Sun'n'Sand Hotel at Juhu beach in the company of top lady artistes, he was buying a big house at Pali Hill, built in the split-level mode and incorporating the latest security equipment to protect him from the movie fans, the thief's widow was well and happy and getting fat, and life was filled with light and success and no-questions-asked alcohol.

They were wonderful letters, brimming with confidence, but whenever I read them, and sometimes I read them still, I remember the expression which came over his face in the days just before he learned the truth about his radio, and the huge mad energy which he had poured into the act of conjuring reality, by an act of magnificent faith, out of the hot thin air between his cupped hand and his ear.

Who’s Irish?

GISH JEN

Gish Jen was born Lillian Jen in 1955 and raised in the suburbs of New York City. She graduated with a BA in English from Harvard University and received her MFA in creative writing from the University of Iowa. She has written three novels—Typical American (1991), Mona in the Promised Land (1996), and The Love Wife (2005)—and one story collection—Who’s Irish? (1999). Her short stories have appeared in many literary journals and magazines, including the New Yorker. Jen is frequently compared to other Asian American writers, such as Amy Tan and Maxine Hong Kingston, but she has said that her writing is also influenced by Jewish American writers because of what she sees as commonalities between Jewish and Chinese cultures. In her fiction, Jen explores these common experiences: questions of identity; the complexities of assimilation; and tensions across racial, cultural, and generational divides. “Who’s Irish?” was first published in the New Yorker in 1998 before becoming the title story of her 1999 short-story collection.

In China, people say mixed children are supposed to be smart, and definitely my granddaughter Sophie is smart. But Sophie is wild, Sophie is not like my daughter Natalie, or like me. I am work hard my whole life, and fierce besides. My husband always used to say he is afraid of me, and in our restaurant, busboys and cooks all afraid of me too. Even the gang members come for protection money, they try to talk to my husband. When I am there, they stay away. If they come by mistake, they pretend they are come to eat. They hide behind the menu, they order a lot of food. They talk about their mothers. Oh, my mother have some arthritis, need to take herbal medicine, they say. Oh, my mother getting old, her hair all white now.

I say, Your mother's hair used to be white, but since she dye it, it become black again. Why don't you go home once in a while and take a look? I tell them, Confucius say a filial son knows what color his mother's hair is.

My daughter is fierce too, she is vice president in the bank now. Her new house is big enough for everybody to have their own room, including me. But Sophie take after Natalie's husband's family, their name is Shea. Irish. I always thought Irish people are like Chinese people, work so hard on the railroad, but now I know why the Chinese beat the Irish. Of course, not all Irish are like the Shea family, of course not. My daughter tell me I should not say Irish this, Irish that.

How do you like it when people say the Chinese this, the Chinese that, she say.

You know, the British call the Irish heathen, just like they call the Chinese, she say. 5

You think the Opium War was bad, how would you like to live right next door to the British, she say.

And that is that. My daughter have a funny habit when she win an argument, she take a sip of something and look away, so the other person is not embarrassed. So I am not embarrassed. I do not call anybody anything either. I just happen to mention about the Shea family, an interesting fact: four brothers in the family, and not one of them work. The mother, Bess, have a job before she got sick, she was executive secretary in a big company. She is handle everything for a big shot, you would be surprised how complicated her job is, not just type this, type that. Now she is a nice woman with a clean house. But her boys, every one of them is on welfare, or so-called severance pay, or so-called disability pay. Something. They say they cannot find work, this is not the economy of the fifties, but I say, Even the black people doing better these days, some of them live so fancy, you'd be surprised. Why the Shea family have so much trouble? They are white people, they speak English. When I come to this country, I have no money and do not speak English. But my husband and I own our restaurant before he die. Free and clear, no mortgage. Of course, I understand I am just lucky, come from a country where the food is popular all over the world. I understand it is not the Shea family's fault they come from a country where everything is boiled. Still, I say.

She's right, we should broaden our horizons, say one brother, Jim, at Thanksgiving. Forget about the car business. Think about egg rolls.

Pad thai, say another brother, Mike. I'm going to make my fortune in pad thai. It's going to be the new pizza.

I say, You people too picky about what you sell. Selling egg rolls not good enough for you, but at least my husband and I can say, We made it. What can you say? Tell me. What can you say? 10

Everybody chew their tough turkey.

I especially cannot understand my daughter's husband John, who has no job but cannot take care of Sophie either. Because he is a man, he say, and that's the end of the sentence.

Plain boiled food, plain boiled thinking. Even his name is plain boiled: John. Maybe because I grew up with black bean sauce and hoisin sauce and garlic sauce, I always feel something is missing when my son-in-law talk.

But, okay: so my son-in-law can be man, I am baby-sitter. Six hours a day, same as the old sitter, crazy Amy, who quit. This is not so easy, now that I am sixty-eight, Chinese age almost seventy. Still, I try. In China, daughter take care of mother. Here it is the other way around. Mother help daughter, mother ask, Anything else I can do? Otherwise daughter complain mother is not supportive. I tell daughter, We do not have this word in Chinese, supportive. But my daughter too busy to listen, she has to go to meeting, she has to write memo while her husband go to the gym to be a man. My daughter say otherwise he will be depressed. Seems like all his life he has this trouble, depression.

No one wants to hire someone who is depressed, she say. It is important for him 15 to keep his spirits up.

Beautiful wife, beautiful daughter, beautiful house, oven can clean itself automatically. No money left over, because only one income, but lucky enough, got the baby-sitter for free. If John lived in China, he would be very happy. But he is not happy. Even at the gym things go wrong. One day, he pull a muscle. Another day, weight room too crowded. Always something.

Until finally, hooray, he has a job. Then he feel pressure.

I need to concentrate, he say. I need to focus.

He is going to work for insurance company. Salesman job. A paycheck, he say, and at least he will wear clothes instead of gym shorts. My daughter buy him some special candy bars from the health-food store. They say THINK! on them, and are supposed to help John think.

John is a good-looking boy, you have to say that, especially now that he shave so 20 you can see his face.

I am an old man in a young man's game, say John.

I will need a new suit, say John.

This time I am not going to shoot myself in the foot, say John.

Good, I say.

She means to be supportive, my daughter say. Don't start the send her back to 25
China thing, because we can't.

Sophie is three years old American age, but already I see her nice Chinese side swallowed up by her wild Shea side. She looks like mostly Chinese. Beautiful black hair, beautiful black eyes. Nose perfect size, not so flat looks like something fell down, not so large looks like some big deal got stuck in wrong face. Everything just right, only her skin is a brown surprise to John's family. So brown, they say. Even John say it. She never goes in the sun, still she is that color, he say. Brown. They say, Nothing the matter with brown. They are just surprised. So brown. Nattie is not that brown, they say. They say, It seems like Sophie should be a color in between Nattie and John. Seems funny, a girl named Sophie Shea be brown. But she is brown, maybe her name should be Sophie Brown. She never go in the sun, still she is that color, they say. Nothing the matter with brown. They are just surprised.

The Shea family talk is like this sometimes, going around and around like a Christmas-tree train.

Maybe John is not her father, I say one day, to stop the train. And sure enough, train wreck. None of the brothers ever say the word brown to me again.

Instead, John's mother, Bess, say, I hope you are not offended.

She say, I did my best on those boys. But raising four boys with no father is no picnic. 30

You have a beautiful family, I say.

I'm getting old, she say.

You deserve a rest, I say. Too many boys make you old.

I never had a daughter, she say. You have a daughter.

I have a daughter, I say. Chinese people don't think a daughter is so great, but you're right. I have a daughter. 35

I was never against the marriage, you know, she say. I never thought John was marrying down. I always thought Nattie was just as good as white.

I was never against the marriage either, I say. I just wonder if they look at the whole problem.

Of course you pointed out the problem, you are a mother, she say. And now we both have a granddaughter. A little brown granddaughter, she is so precious to me.

I laugh. A little brown granddaughter, I say. To tell you the truth, I don't know how she came out so brown.

We laugh some more. These days Bess need a walker to walk. She take so many pills, she need two glasses of water to get them all down. Her favorite TV show is about bloopers, and she love her bird feeder. All day long, she can watch that bird feeder, like a cat. 40

I can't wait for her to grow up, Bess say. I could use some female company.

Too many boys, I say.

Boys are fine, she say. But they do surround you after a while.

You should take a break, come live with us, I say. Lots of girls at our house.

Be careful what you offer, say Bess with a wink. Where I come from, people mean for you to move in when they say a thing like that. 45

Nothing the matter with Sophie's outside, that's the truth. It is inside that she is like not any Chinese girl I ever see. We go to the park, and this is what she does. She stand up in the stroller. She take off all her clothes and throw them in the fountain.

Sophie! I say. Stop!

But she just laugh like a crazy person. Before I take over as baby-sitter, Sophie has that crazy-person sitter, Amy the guitar player. My daughter thought this Amy very creative — another word we do not talk about in China. In China, we talk about whether we have difficulty or no difficulty. We talk about whether life is bitter or not bitter. In America, all day long, people talk about creative. Never mind that I cannot even look at this Amy, with her shirt so short that her belly button showing. This Amy think Sophie should love her body. So when Sophie take off her diaper, Amy laugh. When Sophie run around naked, Amy say she wouldn't want to wear a diaper either. When Sophie go shu-shu in her lap, Amy laugh and say there are no germs in pee. When Sophie take off her shoes, Amy say bare feet is best, even the pediatrician say so. That is why Sophie now walk around with no shoes like a beggar child. Also why Sophie love to take off her clothes.

Turn around! say the boys in the park. Let's see that ass!

Of course, Sophie does not understand. Sophie clap her hands, I am the only one to say, No! This is not a game. 50

It has nothing to do with John's family, my daughter say. Amy was too permissive, that's all.

But I think if Sophie was not wild inside, she would not take off her shoes and clothes to begin with.

You never take off your clothes when you were little, I say. All my Chinese friends had babies, I never saw one of them act wild like that.

Look, my daughter say. I have a big presentation tomorrow.

John and my daughter agree Sophie is a problem, but they don't know what to do. 55

You spank her, she'll stop, I say another day.

But they say, Oh no.

In America, parents not supposed to spank the child.

It gives them low self-esteem, my daughter say. And that leads to problems later, as I happen to know.

My daughter never have big presentation the next day when the subject of spanking come up. 60

I don't want you to touch Sophie, she say. No spanking, period.

Don't tell me what to do, I say.

I'm not telling you what to do, say my daughter. I'm telling you how I feel.

I am not your servant, I say. Don't you dare talk to me like that.

My daughter have another funny habit when she lose an argument. She spread out all her fingers and look at them, as if she like to make sure they are still there. 65

My daughter is fierce like me, but she and John think it is better to explain to Sophie that clothes are a good idea. This is not so hard in the cold weather. In the warm weather, it is very hard.

Use your words, my daughter say. That's what we tell Sophie. How about if you set a good example.

As if good example mean anything to Sophie. I am so fierce, the gang members who used to come to the restaurant all afraid of me, but Sophie is not afraid.

I say, Sophie, if you take off your clothes, no snack.

I say, Sophie, if you take off your clothes, no lunch. 70

I say, Sophie, if you take off your clothes, no park.

Pretty soon we are stay home all day, and by the end of six hours she still did not have one thing to eat. You never saw a child stubborn like that.

I'm hungry! she cry when my daughter come home.

What's the matter, doesn't your grandmother feed you? My daughter laugh.

No! Sophie say. She doesn't feed me anything! 75

My daughter laugh again. Here you go, she say.

She say to John, Sophie must be growing.

Growing like a weed, I say.

Still Sophie take off her clothes, until one day I spank her. Not too hard, but she cry and cry, and when I tell her if she doesn't put her clothes back on I'll spank her again, she put her clothes back on. Then I tell her she is good girl, and give her some food to eat. The next day we go to the park and, like a nice Chinese girl, she does not take off her clothes.

She stop taking off her clothes, I report. Finally!

80

How did you do it? my daughter ask.

After twenty-eight years experience with you, I guess I learn something, I say.

It must have been a phase, John say, and his voice is suddenly like an expert.

His voice is like an expert about everything these days, now that he carry a leather briefcase, and wear shiny shoes, and can go shopping for a new car. On the company, he say. The company will pay for it, but he will be able to drive it whenever he want.

A free car, he say. How do you like that.

85

It's good to see you in the saddle again, my daughter say. Some of your family patterns are scary.

At least I don't drink, he say. He say, And I'm not the only one with scary family patterns.

That's for sure, say my daughter.

Everyone is happy. Even I am happy, because there is more trouble with Sophie, but now I think I can help her Chinese side fight against her wild side. I teach her to eat food with fork or spoon or chopsticks, she cannot just grab into the middle of a bowl of noodles. I teach her not to play with garbage cans. Sometimes I spank her, but not too often, and not too hard.

Still, there are problems. Sophie like to climb everything. If there is a railing, she is never next to it. Always she is on top of it. Also, Sophie like to hit the mommies of her friends. She learn this from her playground best friend, Sinbad, who is four. Sinbad wear army clothes every day and like to ambush his mommy. He is the one who dug a big hole under the play structure, a foxhole he call it, all by himself. Very hardworking. Now he wait in the foxhole with a shovel full of wet sand. When his mommy come, he throw it right at her.

Oh, it's all right, his mommy say. You can't get rid of war games, it's part of their imaginative play. All the boys go through it.

Also, he like to kick his mommy, and one day he tell Sophie to kick his mommy too.

I wish this story is not true.

Kick her, kick her! Sinbad say.

Sophie kick her. A little kick, as if she just so happened was swinging her little leg and didn't realize that big mommy leg was in the way. Still I spank Sophie and make Sophie say sorry, and what does the mommy say?

95

Really, it's all right, she say. It didn't hurt.

After that, Sophie learn she can attack mommies in the playground, and some will say, Stop, but others will say, Oh, she didn't mean it, especially if they realize Sophie will be punished.

This is how, one day, bigger trouble come. The bigger trouble start when Sophie hide in the foxhole with that shovel full of sand. She wait, and when I come look for her, she throw it at me. All over my nice clean clothes.

Did you ever see a Chinese girl act this way?

Sophie! I say. Come out of there, say you're sorry.

100

But she does not come out. Instead, she laugh. Naaah, naah-na, naaa-naaa, she say.

I am not exaggerate: millions of children in China, not one act like this.

Sophie! I say. Now! Come out now!

But she know she is in big trouble. She know if she come out, what will happen next. So she does not come out. I am sixty-eight, Chinese age almost seventy, how can I crawl under there to catch her? Impossible. So I yell, yell, yell, and what happen? Nothing. A Chinese mother would help, but American mothers, they look at you, they shake their head, they go home. And, of course, a Chinese child would give up, but not Sophie.

I hate you! she yell. I hate you, Meanie!

Meanie is my new name these days.

Long time this goes on, long long time. The foxhole is deep, you cannot see too much, you don't know where is the bottom. You cannot hear too much either. If she does not yell, you cannot even know she is still there or not. After a while, getting cold out, getting dark out. No one left in the playground, only us.

Sophie, I say. How did you become stubborn like this? I am go home without you now.

I try to use a stick, chase her out of there, and once or twice I hit her, but still she does not come out. So finally I leave. I go outside the gate.

Bye-bye! I say. I'm go home now.

110

But still she does not come out and does not come out. Now it is dinnertime, the sky is black. I think I should maybe go get help, but how can I leave a little girl by herself in the playground? A bad man could come. A rat could come. I go back in to see what is happen to Sophie. What if she have a shovel and is making a tunnel to escape?

Sophie! I say.

No answer.

Sophie!

I don't know if she is alive. I don't know if she is fall asleep down there. If she is crying, I cannot hear her.

115

So I take the stick and poke.

Sophie! I say. I promise I no hit you. If you come out, I give you a lollipop.

No answer. By now I worried. What to do, what to do, what to do? I poke some more, even harder, so that I am poking and poking when my daughter and John suddenly appear.

What are you doing? What is going on? say my daughter.

Put down that stick! say my daughter.

120

You are crazy! say my daughter.

John wiggle under the structure, into the foxhole, to rescue Sophie.

She fell asleep, say John the expert. She's okay. That is one big hole.
 Now Sophie is crying and crying.
 Sophia, my daughter say, hugging her. Are you okay, peanut? Are you okay? 125
 She's just scared, say John.
 Are you okay? I say too. I don't know what happen, I say.
 She's okay, say John. He is not like my daughter, full of questions. He is full of answers until we get home and can see by the lamplight.
 Will you look at her? he yell then. What the hell happened?
 Bruises all over her brown skin, and a swollen-up eye. 130
 You are crazy! say my daughter. Look at what you did! You are crazy!
 I try very hard, I say.
 How could you use a stick? I told you to use your words!
 She is hard to handle, I say.
 She's three years old! You cannot use a stick! say my daughter. 135
 She is not like any Chinese girl I ever saw, I say.
 I brush some sand off my clothes. Sophie's clothes are dirty too, but at least she has her clothes on.
 Has she done this before? ask my daughter. Has she hit you before?
 She hits me all the time, Sophie say, eating ice cream.
 Your family, say John. 140
 Believe me, say my daughter.

A daughter I have, a beautiful daughter. I took care of her when she could not hold her head up. I took care of her before she could argue with me, when she was a little girl with two pigtails, one of them always crooked. I took care of her when we have to escape from China, I took care of her when suddenly we live in a country with cars everywhere, if you are not careful your little girl get run over. When my husband die, I promise him I will keep the family together, even though it was just two of us, hardly a family at all.

But now my daughter take me around to look at apartments. After all, I can cook, I can clean, there's no reason I cannot live by myself, all I need is a telephone.
 Of course, she is sorry. Sometimes she cry, I am the one to say everything will be okay.
 She say she have no choice, she doesn't want to end up divorced. I say divorce is terrible, I don't know who invented this terrible idea. Instead of live with a telephone, though, surprise, I come to live with Bess. Imagine that. Bess make an offer and, sure enough, where she come from, people mean for you to move in when they say things like that. A crazy idea, go to live with someone else's family, but she like to have some female company, not like my daughter, who does not believe in company. These days when my daughter visit, she does not bring Sophie. Bess say we should give Nattie time, we will see Sophie again soon. But seems like my daughter have more presentation than ever before, every time she come she have to leave.

I have a family to support, she say, and her voice is heavy, as if soaking wet. I have a young daughter and a depressed husband and no one to turn to.

When she say no one to turn to, she mean me.

These days my beautiful daughter is so tired she can just sit there in a chair and fall asleep. John lost his job again, already, but still they rather hire a baby-sitter than ask me to help, even they can't afford it. Of course, the new baby-sitter is much younger, can run around. I don't know if Sophie these days is wild or not wild. She call me Meanie, but she like to kiss me too, sometimes. I remember that every time I see a child on TV. Sophie like to grab my hair, a fistful in each hand, and then kiss me smack on the nose. I never see any other child kiss that way.

The satellite TV has so many channels, more channels than I can count, including a Chinese channel from the Mainland and a Chinese channel from Taiwan, but most of the time I watch bloopers with Bess. Also, I watch the bird feeder — so many, many kinds of birds come. The Shea sons hang around all the time, asking when will I go home, but Bess tell them, Get lost.

She's a permanent resident, say Bess. She isn't going anywhere.

Then she wink at me, and switch the channel with the remote control.

Of course, I shouldn't say Irish this, Irish that, especially now I am become honorary Irish myself, according to Bess. Me! Who's Irish? I say, and she laugh. All the same, if I could mention one thing about some of the Irish, not all of them of course, I like to mention this: Their talk just stick. I don't know how Bess Shea learn to use her words, but sometimes I hear what she say a long time later. Permanent resident. Not going anywhere. Over and over I hear it, the voice of Bess.

Exploring the Text

1. Characterize the narrator of “Who’s Irish?” In what ways does she see herself as traditional? as progressive?
2. Take a look at the standoff between the narrator and her granddaughter, Sophie (paras. 98–141). What techniques does Jen use to create the sense of desperation on the part of each character? Look especially at her choice of words.
3. Analyze the syntax in paragraph 142, which marks a transition in the story. How is the language of the narrator different from her language in the rest of the story?
4. The story’s narrator is comfortable stereotyping her daughter’s Irish family-in-law—for example, “Plain boiled food, plain boiled thinking” (para. 13). What do you notice about her observations? Do you think she is more open-minded by the end of the story? Explain your answer.
5. Why does Bess apologize for her boys when they talk about Sophie being “brown” (para. 29)? What does her apology mean to the narrator?
6. What is ironic about Natalie telling her mother, “Use your words” (para. 67)? Why is the narrator impressed by the way “Bess Shea learn[ed] to use her words” (para. 150)? It seems that even the narrator has learned to “use her words” by the end of the story; how does she put her own twist on some of the American expressions she adopts?
7. This story concerns several different clashes. What clashes are illustrated in the story, especially in the disagreements over how Sophie is to be raised? After the scene in the park, was Natalie right to remove the narrator from her home? Is the grandmother a danger to Sophie? Why or why not?

8. What role does the suburban setting play in the story? How does it contribute to or complicate the story's central conflicts?

THOMAS GRAY

Though he only published a mere one thousand lines of poetry during his life, Thomas Gray (1716–1771) was considered one of the greatest poets of his time. Born to a middle-class family in Cornhill, England, he was the fifth of twelve children, and the only one to survive past infancy. He was educated at Eton and later Cambridge, where, despite expectations that he would pursue law, he delved ever more deeply into literature. In 1742, Gray began writing poetry in earnest, but he was never prolific. Despite the success of many of his poems, he was very self-critical, often employing his lacerating wit at his own expense. He turned down the position of poet laureate of England, later saying that he feared his poems would be “mistaken for the words of a flea.” Instead, he accepted a largely ceremonial post teaching history at Cambridge. After his death, Gray was buried in the churchyard of Stoke Poges, which is thought to be the setting for his most famous poem, “Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard.” “Elegy” was an instant success. Today it remains one of the most imitated, parodied, and quoted poems in the English language.

The curfew<sup>1</sup> tolls the knell of parting day,
 The lowing herd wind slowly o'er the lea,
 The plowman homeward plods his weary way,
 And leaves the world to darkness and to me.

Now fades the glimmering landscape on the sight,      5
 And all the air a solemn stillness holds,
 Save where the beetle wheels his droning flight,
 And drowsy tinklings lull the distant folds;

Save that from yonder ivy-mantled tower
 The moping owl does to the moon complain      10
 Of such, as wandering near her secret bower,
 Molest her ancient solitary reign.

Beneath those rugged elms, that yew tree's shade,
 Where heaves the turf in many a moldering heap,

The breezy call of incense-breathing morn, The swallow twittering from the straw-built shed, The cock's shrill clarion, or the echoing horn, No more shall rouse them from their lowly bed.	20
For them no more the blazing hearth shall burn, Or busy housewife ply her evening care; No children run to lisp their sire's return, Or climb his knees the envied kiss to share.
Oft did the harvest to their sickle yield, Their furrow oft the stubborn glebe <sup>3</sup> has broke; How jocund did they drive their team afield! How bowed the woods beneath their sturdy stroke!	25

Left the warm precincts of the cheerful day,

“Oft have we seen him at the peep of dawn
Brushing with hasty steps the dews away
To meet the sun upon the upland lawn. 100
“There at the foot of yonder nodding beech
That wreathes its old fantastic roots so high,
His listless length at noontide would he stretch,
And pore upon the brook that babbles by.
“Hard by yon wood, now smiling as in scorn, 105
Muttering his wayward fancies he would rove,
Now drooping, woeful wan, like one forlorn,
Or crazed with care, or crossed in hopeless love.
“One morn I missed him on the customed hill,
Along the heath and near his favorite tree; 110
Another came; nor yet beside the rill,
Nor up the lawn, nor at the wood was he;
“The next with dirges due in sad array
Slow through the churchway path we saw him borne.
Approach and read (for thou canst read) the lay, 115
Graved on the stone beneath yon aged thorn.”

Exploring the Text

1. Who do you think the speaker is? Now, try to imagine the setting. Is the speaker literally in the churchyard? Why or why not?
2. Notice the use of sound imagery in stanzas 1–3. How does the toll of the “knell of parting day” (l. 1) echo throughout those stanzas? In what context do you usually hear the word knell? What is its connotation, and how does that connotation contribute to the meaning of this section of the poem? How does this sound imagery introduce stanza 4?
3. Look carefully at stanza 2. How does Gray use the natural world to comment on the issue of tradition and progress?
4. The poem shifts in stanza 8. Analyze the stanza, looking carefully at Gray’s diction and syntax choices, and explain how it works as a transition from one idea to another.
5. Stanza 13 (ll. 49–52) may be the poem’s most famous. How does Gray use figurative language to mirror the stanza’s meaning, that poverty may have forced talented people to remain unknown and unfulfilled?
6. If you read lines 61–65 grammatically—that is, as a complete sentence—you will find that the subject and verb do not appear until line 65, in a separate stanza from the object of the sentence. What is the effect of this delay? Why might Gray have considered the object worth introducing before the subject?
7. How does the speaker honor simple folk in lines 61–76?
8. Stanza 24 (ll. 93–96) begins the lead-up to the epitaph, which comprises the last twelve lines of the poem. Who is speaking beginning in line 98, and what is he or she speaking about? Whose epitaph ends the poem?
9. Some scholars believe that “Elegy” was inspired by the fact that Gray was the only one of twelve siblings to survive until adulthood. How does this knowledge affect your reading of the poem?
10. Gray’s “Elegy” is considered one of the great poems, in part because of the seamless way structure, rhyme scheme, and imagery combine to communicate Gray’s message that life is short. First consider each of these elements separately. How does each element connect to the poem’s message? Then consider the way these elements work together to elevate this simple theme.

WILLIAM BLAKE

Obscure during his lifetime, William Blake (1757–1827) has come to be recognized as one of the most significant poets and artists in English history. Born in London and educated at home by parents who held nonconformist religious and political beliefs, Blake developed highly controversial views about spirituality, women's rights, and personal liberty that informed much of his work. On occasion, his views—and his willingness to express and publish them—led to difficulties with the law, including an arrest in 1803 for “uttering seditious statements against the Crown.” Following an apprenticeship to an engraver, Blake began experimenting with relief engraving—a technique he called “illuminated printing”—to illustrate both his own books and works such as Milton's Paradise Lost and Dante's The Divine Comedy. “London” comes from Songs of Innocence and of Experience (1794), a response to his earlier collection of poems, Songs of Innocence (1789).

I wander through each chartered<sup>1</sup> street,
Near where the chartered Thames does flow,
And mark in every face I meet
Marks of weakness, marks of woe.

In every cry of every man,
In every Infant's cry of fear,
In every voice, in every ban,
The mind-forged manacles I hear.

How the Chimney-sweeper's cry
Every black'ning Church appalls; 10
And the hapless Soldier's sigh
Runs in blood down Palace walls.

But most through midnight streets I hear
How the youthful Harlot's curse
Blasts the new-born Infant's tear,
And blights with plagues the Marriage hearse.

[1794]

Exploring the Text

1. “London” takes the form of a walking tour through London. How does Blake use visual and auditory imagery to both convey the atmosphere in the streets and create a sense of foreboding?

2. What do you make of the repetition of the words “mark” and “marks” in the first stanza? Blake uses “mark” in line 3 to mean “notice.” Consider other possible meanings of the word.
3. The last two stanzas introduce a series of exploited persons: chimney sweepers, soldiers, and prostitutes. Why do you think Blake saves the “youthful Harlot” for last? What do you think he means by “Marriage hearse”?
4. The poem’s third stanza is an acrostic; the first letters of the first words in each line spell out “HEAR.” In addition, lines 8 and 13 both end with the word “hear.” What does Blake want us to hear? Why is this technique effective in this part of the poem?
5. What is your interpretation of “mind-forged manacles” (l. 8)? How might that phrase comment on the overindustrialized world of London in the eighteenth century?
6. “London,” like many of Blake’s poems, has been interpreted in different ways. Critic Camille Paglia, who writes about “London” in Break, Blow, Burn, sees it as part of Blake’s “exposé of commercial society.” What is your view? Why? Can you see another way the poem might be interpreted?

Dover Beach

MATTHEW ARNOLD

Poet, essayist, and critic Matthew Arnold (1822–1888) was brought up and educated at Rugby School, one of England’s oldest boarding schools, where his father was headmaster. After graduating from Balliol College at Oxford, he took the rather mundane position of inspector of schools at Her Majesty’s Inspectorate of Education to support his family. He held this position for thirty years, during which time he wrote the bulk of his poetry, including Empedocles on Etna (1852) and Poems (1853). Arnold was elected professor of poetry at Oxford in 1857 and 1862, and during this time he produced several collections of essays and literary, cultural, and religious criticism. His poetry is remembered for its clarity and straightforwardness, and is considered a bridge between romanticism and modernism. In 1867, Arnold published “Dover Beach,” his most famous work. Dover is the English port city from which most people traveled to France.

The sea is calm tonight.
 The tide is full, the moon lies fair
 Upon the straits;—on the French coast the light
 Gleams and is gone; the cliffs of England stand,
 Glimmering and vast, out in the tranquil bay. 5
 Come to the window, sweet is the night-air!
 Only, from the long line of spray
 Where the sea meets the moon-blanch'd land,
 Listen! you hear the grating roar

Of pebbles which the waves draw back, and fling,      10
 At their return, up the high strand,
 Begin, and cease, and then again begin,
 With tremulous cadence slow, and bring
 The eternal note of sadness in.

Sophocles long ago      15
 Heard it on the Aegean, and it brought Into his mind the turbid ebb and flow
 Of human misery;<sup>1</sup> we Find also in the sound a thought,
 Hearing it by this distant northern sea.      20

The Sea of Faith
 Was once, too, at the full, and round earth's shore
 Lay like the folds of a bright girdle furled.
 But now I only hear
 Its melancholy, long, withdrawing roar,      25
 Retreating, to the breath
 Of the night-wind, down the vast edges drear
 And naked shingles<sup>2</sup> of the world.

Ah, love, let us be true
 To one another! for the world, which seems      30
 To lie before us like a land of dreams,
 So various, so beautiful, so new,
 Hath really neither joy, nor love, nor light,
 Nor certitude, nor peace, nor help for pain;
 And we are here as on a darkling plain      35
 Swept with confused alarms of struggle and flight,
 Where ignorant armies clash by night.

[1867]

Exploring the Text

1. Analyze the series of vivid images of nighttime by the sea in the first stanza. To which senses do these images appeal? How do these images relate to the meaning of the poem? Why do you think Arnold highlights the auditory images, such as "Listen!" in line 9?
2. What do the consonance and caesura in lines 9–14 add to the imagery in those lines? How does that imagery help create the mood of sadness with which the stanza ends?

<sup>1</sup>Antigone, "the gods have rocked a house to its foundations / the ruin will never cease, cresting on and on / from one generation on throughout the race— / like a great mounting tide" (ll. 659–62). — EDS.

3. What do you think Arnold means by "The Sea of Faith" (l. 21)? What does he think has replaced it?
4. You might notice that the last stanza of the poem is self-contradictory; it almost argues with itself. What are some of the competing ideas in the stanza? How does the tone change over the course of the stanza? How does this shift in tone highlight the stanza's mixed message?
5. The last four lines of the poem are rhymed couplets, the form traditionally used to conclude and resolve a sonnet. What is the effect of that form on the meaning of those lines? How does the stanza resolve, or fail to resolve, the problem introduced by the poem?
6. There is evidence that Arnold wrote "Dover Beach" on his honeymoon in 1851. How does that possibility change the meaning of the poem for you?
7. "Dover Beach" was written when England was the most powerful and industrially sophisticated country in the world. How does the poem comment on this period in English history?

God's Grandeur

GERARD MANLEY HOPKINS

Torn between his obligations as a Jesuit and his love for poetry, Gerard Manley Hopkins (1844–1889) declined to seek an audience for his work during his lifetime; the bulk of his poems were published posthumously in 1916. Hopkins was born in Stratford, England, to a wealthy family. After converting to Catholicism near the end of his studies at Oxford, Hopkins entered the priesthood and, adhering to one of his vows, burned nearly all of his accumulated poems. He began to write again in 1875, when he was asked to commemorate the death of five Franciscan nuns who drowned in a shipwreck off the coast of England as they fled oppression in Germany. In the poem he wrote, entitled "Wreck of the Deutschland," Hopkins introduced what he called "sprung rhythm," a meter designed to imitate the rhythm of natural speech; this meter anticipated free verse and would influence new generations of poets. "God's Grandeur," written in 1877, makes occasional use of this unconventional rhythm and is representative of Hopkins's work in both subject and form.

The world is charged with the grandeur of God.
 It will flame out, like shining from shook foil;
 It gathers to a greatness, like the ooze of oil
 Crushed. Why do men then now not reck<sup>1</sup> his rod?<sup>2</sup>

Generations have trod, have trod, have trod; 5
 And all is seared with trade; bleared, smeared with toil;
 And wears man's smudge and shares man's smell: the soil
 Is bare now, nor can foot feel, being shod.

And for all this, nature is never spent;
 There lives the dearest freshness deep down things; 10
 And though the last lights off the black West went Oh, morning, at the brown brink eastward, springs—
 Because the Holy Ghost over the bent
 World broods with warm breast and with ah! bright wings.

[1877]

Exploring the Text

1. What does the word “charged” suggest in line 1? Consider several possibilities.
2. How does style reinforce meaning in line 5? What other examples of the close connection between style and meaning do you see in “God’s Grandeur”?
3. How is the sound of the poem created? Look especially at the internal rhymes. Try reading this poem aloud to hear how Hopkins uses stressed syllables to create the poem’s musical quality.
4. What does the metaphor in the poem’s last two lines evoke for you? Explain the metaphor and how and why it affects you the way it does.
5. “God’s Grandeur” follows the form of a Petrarchan sonnet, with an octet (8 lines) and a sestet (6 lines). What question or problem is posed in the octet and answered or resolved in the sestet?
6. What argument does “God’s Grandeur” make? How does Hopkins present his evidence, including a counterargument?

Crumbling is not an instant’s Act

EMILY DICKINSON

Born into a prominent family in Amherst, Massachusetts, Emily Dickinson (1830–1886) received some formal education at Amherst Academy and Mount Holyoke Female Seminary (which became Mount Holyoke College). Throughout her lifetime, Dickinson was a shy and reclusive person, who preferred to remain within her close family circle. In 1862, she enclosed four poems in a letter to literary critic and abolitionist Thomas Wentworth Higginson, who had written a piece in the Atlantic Monthly that included practical advice for young writers. Her letter began, “Mr. Higginson,—Are you too deeply occupied to say if my verse is alive? The mind is so near itself it cannot see distinctly, and I have none to ask. Should you think it breathed, and had you the leisure to tell me, I should feel quick gratitude.” Dickinson didn’t sign the letter, but instead enclosed her name on a card inside a smaller envelope. Dickinson wrote over seventeen hundred poems, but only ten were published in her lifetime. “Crumbling is not an instant’s Act,” published four years after her death, is like much of Dickinson’s work: enigmatic at first, but blossoming after a couple of readings.

Crumbling is not an instant’s Act

A fundamental pause
Dilapidation’s processes
Are organized Decays.

’Tis first a Cobweb on the Soul                      5
A Cuticle of Dust
A Borer in the Axis
An Elemental Rust—

Ruin is formal—Devil’s work
Consecutive and slow—                      10
Fail in an instant, no man did Slipping—is Crash’s law.

[1890]

Exploring the Text

1. “Crumbling is not an instant’s Act” has several examples of personification. Identify them, and then analyze their effect on the poem’s meaning. Pay careful attention to the way they help Dickinson support the poem’s argument that falling apart is a slow process.
2. The second stanza offers examples of “organized Decays.” Examine them closely, and then analyze how they function both literally and figuratively.
3. Do you think Dickinson is talking only about personal crumbling, or does the poem also apply to the ways society, or even humanity, falls victim to entropy? Use examples of her language to support your answer.
4. What do you think the poem has to say on the subject of tradition and progress?
5. How is this poem timeless? How can its meaning be applied to conditions in the world today?

Mending Wall

ROBERT FROST

Though Robert Frost (1874–1963) is considered the quintessential New England poet, he was born in San Francisco. After the death of his father when Frost was eleven years old, the family moved to Massachusetts. Frost attended Dartmouth College and Harvard University, but in both cases left early to support his family. He delivered newspapers, farmed, did factory work, and taught high school and college, but he considered poetry to be his true calling. Frost won four Pulitzer Prizes for his collections New Hampshire: A Poem with Notes and Grace Notes (1924), Collected Poems (1931), A Further Range (1937), and A Witness Tree (1943), and in 1961 he spoke at the inauguration of President John F. Kennedy. Frost believed that poetry should be a “reproduction of human speech,” a quality evident in “Mending Wall.”

Something there is that doesn't love a wall,
 That sends the frozen-ground-swell under it,
 And spills the upper boulders in the sun;
 And makes gaps even two can pass abreast.
 The work of hunters is another thing: 5
 I have come after them and made repair
 Where they have left not one stone on a stone,
 But they would have the rabbit out of hiding,
 To please the yelping dogs. The gaps I mean,
 No one has seen them made or heard them made, 10
 But at spring mending-time we find them there.
 I let my neighbor know beyond the hill;
 And on a day we meet to walk the line
 And set the wall between us once again.
 We keep the wall between us as we go. 15
 To each the boulders that have fallen to each.
 And some are loaves and some so nearly balls
 We have to use a spell to make them balance:
 “Stay where you are until our backs are turned!”
 We wear our fingers rough with handling them. 20
 Oh, just another kind of outdoor game,
 One on a side. It comes to little more:
 There where it is we do not need the wall:
 He is all pine and I am apple orchard.
 My apple trees will never get across 25
 And eat the cones under his pines, I tell him.
 He only says, “Good fences make good neighbors.”
 Spring is the mischief in me, and I wonder
 If I could put a notion in his head:
 “Why do they make good neighbors? Isn't it 30
 Where there are cows? But here there are no cows.
 Before I built a wall I'd ask to know
 What I was walling in or walling out,
 And to whom I was like to give offense.

Something there is that doesn't love a wall, 35
 That wants it down." I could say "Elves" to him,
 But it's not elves exactly, and I'd rather
 He said it for himself. I see him there
 Bringing a stone grasped firmly by the top
 In each hand, like an old-stone savage armed. 40
 He moves in darkness as it seems to me,
 Not of woods only and the shade of trees.
 He will not go behind his father's saying,
 And he likes having thought of it so well
 He says again, "Good fences make good neighbors." 45

[1914]

Exploring the Text

1. Is there a conflict in the poem? Explain.
2. Contrast the inverted syntax of lines 1 and 35—"Something there is that doesn't love a wall"—to the traditional subject-verb-object syntax of lines 27 and 45—"Good fences make good neighbors." How does the difference help develop each of the poem's characters? What effect does the difference have on the poem's meaning?
3. Read lines 12–15 carefully. How could the different meanings of the word "between," which is repeated twice, change the meaning of the poem?
4. Lines 13–18 lead up to the "spell" in line 19 that the two wall-menders use to keep the rocks from toppling. How are those lead-up lines a sort of incantation in themselves? How might they connect to the image in lines 39–40 of the speaker's neighbor "bringing a stone grasped firmly by the top / In each hand, like an old-stone savage armed"?
5. Why do you think Frost allows the neighbor to offer the proverb "Good fences make good neighbors" twice? Do you think the speaker agrees with this adage? Why do you think the neighbor gets the last word?
6. "Mending Wall" questions whether a wall that has no function in the modern world still fulfills a ritualistic need. When Frost was asked about the poem's meaning, he said his poems are "all set to trip the reader head foremost into the boundless." In what way does trying to answer the poem's question trip you "into the boundless"? Which of the poem's two characters trip "into the boundless"?
7. When President Kennedy visited the Berlin Wall, he quoted the first line of "Mending Wall." His audience knew what he meant, of course. Later, when Frost visited Russia, he found that the Russian translation of the poem left off the first line. He said he could have done better for them by saying: "Something there is that doesn't love a wall, / Something there is that does." Does that potential change alter the meaning of the poem for you? Explain.

Were vexed to nightmare by a rocking cradle,
And what rough beast, its hour come round at last,
Slouches towards Bethlehem to be born?

[1921]

Exploring the Text

1. Consider both the speaker and the imagery in the first eight lines. How do the images help create the persona of the speaker? How are the speaker and the imagery different in the last 14 lines?
2. What do you think the falcon and the falconer (l. 2) symbolize? What do you think it means that the “falcon cannot hear the falconer”? How is that metaphor connected to the image in lines 14–17?
3. What is the effect of the repetition of “loosed” in lines 4 and 5, and “Surely” in lines 9 and 10?
4. Describe the tone of the poem. How is it created?
5. Why do you think the poem ends with a question?
6. Adam Cohen, in an editorial in the New York Times, notes that phrases from “The Second Coming” are “irresistible to pundits”—analysts or commentators on politics or social policy—who find that lines such as “The best lack all conviction, while the worst / Are full of passionate intensity” (ll. 7–8) perfectly sum up any era in history. Cohen, however, believes that “The Second Coming” is “a powerful brief against punditry,” a caution against confident predictions. Do you agree? Explain your answer.

Autumn Begins in Martins Ferry, Ohio

JAMES WRIGHT

James Wright was born in 1927 in Martins Ferry, Ohio, a small industrial town on the Ohio River. After graduating from Shreve High School, Wright served in the army and then attended Kenyon College on the GI Bill. He later studied in Vienna on a Fulbright scholarship, and went on to earn graduate degrees at the University of Washington, where he studied with Theodore Roethke. His early poems tended toward traditional forms, but by the early sixties, he had largely abandoned rhyme and meter in favor of loosely structured free verse. His works include The Green Wall (1957), Saint Judas (1959), and The Branch Will Not Break (1963). His 1972 Collected Poems was awarded a Pulitzer Prize. "Autumn Begins in Martins Ferry, Ohio" is from The Branch Will Not Break, and shares with the other poems of that collection not only stylistic daring but a thematic concern for loneliness and the means human beings employ to overcome or endure it.

In the Shreve High football stadium,
I think of Polacks nursing long beers in Tiltonsville,
And gray faces of Negroes in the blast furnace at Benwood,
And the ruptured night watchman of Wheeling Steel,
Dreaming of heroes.

5

All the proud fathers are ashamed to go home.
Their women cluck like starved pullets,
Dying for love.

Therefore,
Their sons grow suicidally beautiful
At the beginning of October,
And gallop terribly against each other's bodies.

Exploring the Text

1. Why is the word “autumn” in the title significant? What associations do we make with autumn? How does each connotation affect your reading of the poem?
2. Who is the speaker? Where exactly do you picture him or her? What is it about the setting in the opening line that causes the speaker to “think” of the people in the next three lines?
3. Look carefully at the poem’s diction. How do words and phrases such as “nursing” (l. 2), “ruptured” (l. 4), and “starved pullets” (l. 7) add layers of meaning to the poem? Find at least two more examples of diction that add nuance and meaning to the poem.
4. What is the effect of line 9, a single word: “Therefore”? What is its purpose?
5. Look carefully at the poem’s last four lines. What connects them to the first stanza? What separates them from it?
6. Is this poem more about tradition or more about progress? Explain your answer.

A Bedtime Story

MITSUYE YAMADA

Born in 1923 during a family visit to Fukuoka, Japan, Mitsuye Yamada was the daughter of two first-generation Japanese Americans. Shortly after the 1941 arrest of her father, a translator for the United States Immigration Service, on suspicion of espionage, the family was uprooted and sent to an internment camp. Yamada was kept at Minidoka War Relocation Center in Idaho for two years, until she and her brother, after taking oaths renouncing any loyalty to the emperor of Japan, were permitted to leave the facility in order to work and attend school. Yamada began her studies at the University of Cincinnati, finished her degree at New York University in 1947, went on to earn an MA at the University of Chicago in 1953, and taught poetry in Southern California. Yamada began work on her first book, Camp Notes and Other Poems, during her internment, but it was not published until 1976. Her other books include Lighthouse (1976), Desert Run (1989), and Three Asian American Writers Speak Out on Feminism (2003). Yamada has said that the purpose of her writing is to encourage Asian American women to speak out and defy the unspoken cultural rules of silence and acquiescence. "A Bedtime Story," which appeared in Camp Notes, describes the changing relationship of new generations of Japanese Americans toward their inherited cultural values.

Once upon a time,
 an old Japanese legend goes as told by Papa,
 an old woman traveled through      5
 many small villages seeking refuge
 for the night.

Each door opened a sliver      10
 in answer to her knock then closed.
 Unable to walk any further she wearily climbed a hill      15 found a clearing and there lay down to rest
 a few moments to catch her breath.

The village town below      20 lay asleep except for a few starlike lights.
 Suddenly the clouds opened and a full moon came into view over the town.      25

The old woman sat up turned toward the village town
 and in supplication called out      30
 Thank you people
 of the village,

If it had not been for your kindness in refusing me a bed
for the night
these humble eyes would never have seen this memorable sight.

35

Papa paused, I waited.
In the comfort of our hilltop home in Seattle
overlooking the valley,
I shouted
“That’s the end?”

Exploring the Text

1. Why do you think the first eight lines and the last six lines are punctuated differently from lines 9–39? What is the effect of the two different types of syntax?
2. Read the poem aloud to hear, as well as see, the short lines. What are some of the effects of these short lines? Consider their connection both to the woman walking and to the bedtime story, which is the heart of the poem.
3. Do you think the poem teaches a lesson? How about the story within the poem? Are they the same lesson? If so, what is it? If not, explain your answer.
4. How does the poem’s last line, “That’s the end?” comment on traditional and modern expectations of storytelling?
5. How do you think “A Bedtime Story” helps Yamada achieve her purpose of encouraging Asian American women to defy the unspoken rules of silence and acquiescence?

Goodbye, Goldeneye

MAY SWENSON

Born in Utah, May Swenson (1913–1989) grew up speaking both Swedish and English. She received her BA from Utah State University and then moved to New York, where she spent most of her adult life. While writing poetry, Swenson worked as stenographer, secretary, editor, and writer-in-residence at such schools as Bryn Mawr, the University of North Carolina, and Purdue. Among the honors Swenson received were a MacArthur Fellowship, a Guggenheim Fellowship, and the prestigious Bollingen Prize. Her work, which includes the collections Another Animal (1954), A Cage of Spines (1958), Half Sun Half Sleep (1967), and Iconographs (1970), is known for the questions it poses about love, human nature, and the natural world. Four months before her death, Swenson wrote, “The best poetry has its roots in the subconscious to a great degree. Youthful naivety, reliance on instinct more than learning and method, a sense of freedom and play, even trust in randomness, is necessary to the making of a poem." "Goodbye, Goldeneye" appeared in the collection In Other Words (1987).

Rag of black plastic, shred of a kite caught on the telephone cable above the bay has twisted in the wind all winter, summer, fall.

Leaves of birch and maple, brown paws of the oak have all let go but this. Shiny black Mylar 5 on stem strong as fishline, the busted kite string whipped around the wire and knotted—how long will it cling there? Through another spring?
 Long barge nudged up channel by a snorting tug,
 its blunt front aproned with rot-black tires— 10
 what is being hauled in slime-green drums?
 The herring gulls that used to feed their young on the shore—puffy, wide-beaked babies standing spraddle-legged and crying—are not here this year.
 Instead, steam shovel, bulldozer, cement mixer 15 rumble over sand, beginning the big new beach house.
 There'll be a hotdog stand, flush toilets, trash—plastic and glass, greasy cartons, crushed beercans, barrels of garbage for water rats to pick through.
 So, goodbye, goldeneye, and grebe and scaup and loon. 20
 Goodbye, morning walks beside the tide tinkling among clean pebbles, blue mussel shells and snail shells that look like staring eyeballs. Goodbye, kingfisher, little green, black crowned heron, snowy egret. And, goodbye, oh faithful pair of 25 swans that used to glide—god and goddess shapes of purity—over the wide water.

Exploring the Text

1. What part does point of view play in developing the poem's images and themes? In other words, where exactly is the speaker? Does her location change? How do the questions the speaker asks in lines 8 and 11 help you locate her?

2. Swenson uses enjambment often in “Goodbye, Goldeneye” (ll. 6–7, 12–13, 15–16). What is its effect? How do the enjambed lines help develop a theme of the poem?
3. Analyze the description of the barge and the tug in lines 9–10. What’s included? What’s missing?
4. Goldeneyes, grebes, scaups, and loons are types of wild waterfowl; kingfishers, little greens, herons, and egrets are types of wading birds. Why do you think the poem calls so many birds by name?
5. Swenson is sometimes classified as a nature or ecology poet. What techniques does she use in this poem to transcend those genres and humanize and universalize her subject?
6. Swenson wrote several books for young readers. What echoes of children’s books do you hear in the poem? What effect do they have?
7. In her introduction to Nature: Poems Old and New (1994)—a posthumous collection of Swenson’s poetry—Susan Mitchell compares Swenson to Gerard Manley Hopkins. She notes especially both poets’ “exuberant attention to detail.” What other similarities do you see between “Goodbye, Goldeneye” and “God’s Grandeur” (p. 1267)? What differences do you see?

Indian Movie, New Jersey

CHITRA BANERJEE DIVAKARUNI

Novelist, short-story writer, and poet Chitra Banerjee Divakaruni was born in 1956 in Calcutta, India, to a devout Hindu family, but she attended a Catholic convent school and was taught by Irish nuns. After completing her bachelor’s degree at the University of Calcutta, Divakaruni moved to the United States in 1976 to pursue graduate study. She earned her MA from Wright State University and later received her PhD from the University of California at Berkeley. She is now a professor of writing at the University of Houston. Divakaruni has written many novels, including The Mistress of Spices (1997) and The Palace of Illusion (2006). “Indian Movie, New Jersey” comes from her 1997 collection, Leaving Yuba City: New and Collected Poems, which won the Allen Ginsberg Poetry Prize and the Pushcart Prize. Like much of Divakaruni’s work, this poem addresses the conflicts between old and new world values.

Not like the white filmstars, all rib
and gaunt cheekbone, the Indian sex-goddess smiles plumply from behind a flowery branch. Below her brief red skirt, her thighs are satisfying-solid, redeeming as tree trunks. She swings her hips and the men-viewers whistle. The lover-hero dances in to a song, his lip-sync a little off, but no matter, we know the words already and sing along. 10

 It is safe here, the day
 golden and cool so no one sweats, roses on every bush and the Dal Lake clean again.

The sex-goddess switches 15 to thickened English to emphasize a joke. We laugh and clap. Here we need not be embarrassed by words dropping like lead pellets into foreign ears.
 The flickering movie-light 20 wipes from our faces years of America, sons who want mohawks and refuse to run the family store, daughters who date on the sly.

When at the end the hero 25 dies for his friend who also loves the sex-goddess and now can marry her, we weep, understanding. Even the men clear their throats to say, "What qurbani!"<sup>1</sup>
 What dosti!"<sup>2</sup> After, we mill around 30 unwilling to leave, exchange greetings and good news: a new gold chain, a trip to India. We do not speak of motel raids, canceled permits, stones thrown through glass windows, daughters and sons 35 raped by Dotbusters.<sup>3</sup>

In this dim foyer
 we can pull around us the faint, comforting smell of incense and *pakor*as,<sup>4</sup> can arrange our children's marriages with hometown boys and girls, 40 open a franchise, win a million in the mail. We can retire in India, a yellow two-storied house with wrought-iron gates, our own Ambassador car. Or at least 45 move to a rich white suburb, Summerfield

Exploring the Text

1. Why do you think the poem begins by describing what Indian movies are “Not” (l. 1)?
2. Look carefully at the figurative language of the poem. What, for example, is the effect of similes such as “thighs / . . . redeeming / as tree trunks” (ll. 4–6) and “words / dropping like lead pellets” (ll. 18–19)?
3. Who do you think is the “we” of the poem?
4. Analyze the vivid and concrete details in the poem. What is the effect of their accumulation? How does the accumulation of details connect to the pleasure of watching “Bollywood” (Indian) films, as described here?
5. How does Divakaruni highlight the values of the audience through their response to the images on the screen?
6. How is this poem about tradition and progress? Does the speaker expect to return to the traditions of India? Why is a home in a “rich white suburb” (l. 46) only second best?

Charlotte Brontë in Leeds Point

STEPHEN DUNN

Stephen Dunn was born in Forest Hills, New York, in 1939. He studied history at Hofstra University, earning his BA in 1962. He attended the New School for Social Research, briefly played professional basketball, and worked as a copywriter before receiving his MFA in poetry from Syracuse University in 1972. Dunn is the Richard Stockton College of New Jersey Distinguished Professor in creative writing. His collections of poetry include Looking for Holes in the Ceiling (1974), A Circus of Needs (1978), Not Dancing (1984), Landscape at the End of the Century (1991), and Different Hours (2000), which was awarded the Pulitzer Prize for Poetry. “Charlotte Brontë in Leeds Point” is from Local Visitations (2003), a collection in which Dunn imagines several writers transplanted to his home state of New Jersey. Selections include “Chekhov in Point Republic,” “George Eliot in Beach Haven,” and “Twain in Atlantic City.”

From her window marshland stretched for miles.
 If not for egrets and gulls, it reminded her of the moors behind the parsonage, how the fog often hovered and descended as if sheltering some sweet compulsion the age was not ready to see. On clear days the jagged skyline of Atlantic City was visible—Atlantic City, where all compulsions had a home. 5

“Everything’s too easy now,” she said to her neighbor, “nothing resisted, nothing gained.” Once, at eighteen, she dreamed of London’s proud salons glowing with brilliant fires and dazzling chandeliers. 10 Already her own person—passionate, assertive—soon she’d create a governess insistent on rights equal to those above her rank. “The dangerous picture of a natural heart,” one offended critic carped. 15 She’d failed, he said, to let religion reign over the passions and, worse, she was a woman.

 Now she was amazed at what women had,
 doubly amazed at what they didn’t.
 But she hadn’t come back to complain or haunt. 20
 Her house on the bay was modest, adequate.

It need not accommodate brilliant sisters or dissolute brothers, spirits lost or fallen.
 Feminists would pay homage, praise her honesty and courage. Rarely was she pleased. After all, 25 she was an artist; to speak of honesty in art,
 she knew, was somewhat beside the point.
 And she had married, had even learned to respect the weakness in men, those qualities they called their strengths. Whatever the struggle, she wanted men 30 included. Charlotte missed reading chapters to Emily, Emily reading chapters to her. As ever, though, she’d try to convert present into presence, something unsung sung, some uprush of desire frankly acknowledged, even in this, her new excuse for a body. 35

Exploring the Text

1. In lines 1–7, what comparison does Dunn make between Atlantic City and the moors of England, where the novels of the Brontë sisters are set?

2. The speaker imagines the fog “sheltering some sweet compulsion” (l. 4). What is the effect of personifying fog? How does the theme of compulsion echo later in the poem?
3. What is the effect of the enjambment in lines 14–15?
4. In lines 18–19, what is the view of the Brontë character on the subject of women’s place in society? Does she believe women have made progress in the days since she created Jane Eyre?
5. In Local Visitations, which includes this poem, Dunn imagines several writers in his home state of New Jersey. Imagine a favorite writer of yours visiting your hometown. What comments do you think he or she would make? Write about the event in a poem or short story.
6. According to legend, Leeds Point, New Jersey, is the birthplace of the Jersey Devil, a creature who is commonly believed to be the thirteenth child of Deborah Leeds, who immigrated to the Leeds Point area from England. The Devil haunts the New Jersey Pine Barrens, near what is now Atlantic City. How does Dunn incorporate this legend into his poem? What part does he imagine Charlotte Brontë playing in the legend?

When All of My Cousins Are Married

AIMEE NEZHUKUMATATHIL

Born in 1974 in Chicago, Illinois, Aimee Nezhukumatathil [Nez-ZOO-koo-mah-tah-TILL] is known for poetry that draws on her Filipino and south Indian background. She is an associate professor at the State University of New York at Fredonia, where she teaches creative writing and environmental literature. Miracle Fruit (2003), her first collection of poetry, won the Tupelo Prize, ForeWord magazine’s Book of the Year Award in poetry, and the Global Filipino Award. Her newest collection, At the Drive-In Volcano (2007), was awarded the Balcones Poetry Prize. The poem “When All of My Cousins Are Married,” from At the Drive-In Volcano, considers the complications of being an unmarried Indian woman.

I read books about marriage customs in India, trying to remember that I am above words like arranged, dowry, Engineer. On page 28, it says to show approval and happiness for the new couple, throw dead-crispy spiders instead of rice or birdseed. 5

Female relatives will brush the corners of closets for months, swipe under kitchen sinks with a dry cloth to collect the basketfuls needed for the ceremony.

Four years ago, I was reading a glossy (Always reading, chides my grandmother) in her living room 10 and a spider larger than my hand sidled out from underneath a floor-length curtain and left through the front door without saying good-bye. No apologies for its size—its legs only slightly thinner than a pencil. None 15 of my cousins thought anything was wrong.

But it didn't bite you! It left, no? I know what they are thinking: She is the oldest grandchild and not married. Afraid of spiders. But it's not that I'm squeamish, it's not that I need to stand 20 on a chair if I spy a bug scooting along my baseboards—I just want someone who gasps at a gigantic jackfruit still dangling from a thin branch, thirty feet in the air. Someone who can see a dark cluster of spider eyes and our two tiny faces— 25 smashed cheek to cheek—reflected in each.

[2007]

Exploring the Text

1. The speaker of “When All of My Cousins Are Married” seems ambivalent about being the only unmarried cousin. Find evidence that shows her mixed feelings.
2. What do you think the “spider larger than my hand” (l. 11) represents? What might it mean that it “left . . . without saying / good-bye” (ll. 13–14)? How is it connected to the speaker being the oldest grandchild and unmarried?
3. Spiders are considered good luck in many cultures. Look carefully at the description of how dead spiders are used and collected in lines 3–8. Might there be another reason for the custom? How can the custom be considered ironically?
4. Why do you think Nezhukumatathil italicizes words in lines 3, 9–10, and 17–19?
5. How does the poem—and the meaning of the spider—turn in the last five lines? What does this turn reveal about the speaker and what she sees as the difference between her cousins and herself?
6. Do you believe that the speaker is really “above” the traditions surrounding Indian marriages? Explain why or why not.

AIMEE NEZHUKUMATATHIL ON WRITING

Robin Dissin Aufses (RA): When you were awarded the Balcones Poetry Prize, the judges noted that you had heeded Ezra Pound’s call to “make it new.” What do you think makes your poetry “new”?

Aimee Nezhukumatathil (AN): I'm hoping that people find moments of delight and surprise in my poems—a chance to look at elements of nature, at relationships, in a way they hadn't previously considered. I read just as many nonfiction books about nature as I do collections of poems or stories, and I often feel so overwhelmed by the sheer amount of natural beauty out there in this world that I suppose in some ways I feel compelled to get it down on the page, record it in such a way that others might find small bits of joy and delight in an accessible way in poetry.

RA: In your poem “Hippopotomonstrosesquippedaliophobia,” which appeared on Slate.com, the speaker is an instructor (you?) who addresses her students and the anxiety they might feel when they see a long, complicated last name. I assume they're not really afraid of a long name; what do you think they fear?

AN: I could venture that the easy answer is that some students face the fear of the unknown when they step into my classroom. As one of the youngest tenured professors in the state of New York, I know that my manner and demeanor means I could pass for a student (though that is becoming harder to do with each year!)—and yet I also look different from the predominantly white population of my campus. But what I think is the heart of the matter here is that in the first fifteen minutes of stepping inside my classroom, I make it quite clear that I will be asking them to work and think in ways having to do not only with their writing but with their life, and to examine their place on this earth. I let them know that this examination is not going to be easy; it will be tough and unpleasant, perhaps even embarrassing, but I also hope exuberant and joy-filled as well. And I also tell them that they will learn more about themselves (and one another) than they have in any other class. You can imagine for some—especially the ones who have never written a poem before in their lives—this could be a pretty daunting realization.

RA: So many reviews of your work remark on the balancing act you seem to do between “well-crafted formal restraint” and “unabashed exoticism of the senses,” as R. D. Pohl noted in the Buffalo News review of your collection At the Drive-In Volcano. Do you think this is a fair assessment? If so, is this balancing conscious? What other balancing acts do you perform?

AN: The balancing is conscious, insofar as craft is concerned. I honestly think many people are surprised when they find out writing a poem is more than merely jotting pretty thoughts down and voilà!—you have a poem. I go through two to three drafts of a poem, though I find that when I am enjoying a productive writing streak I have to do less revising, but the point is I am always revising. Ultimately and simply put, I want my poems to be clear to the reader—I'm not interested in confusing them—but at the same time I want there to be an “aha” moment in presenting something ordinary in a surprising way.

Now that I am beginning to write about motherhood, I feel a balancing act is taking place in a similar vein. Motherhood is a popular subject, and I know all too well that some people would rather get a root canal than read another poem about motherhood. But after avoiding the subject for some time (my son is now 20 months old), I feel like I'm a fraud by not writing about it. So I tackle that subject the same way I do any other poem—find something new and insightful to say about the subject, find ways to inject musicality and delight in the craft of writing it.

RA: Your poem “When All of My Cousins Are Married” appears in this chapter, which is entitled “Tradition and Progress.” What aspects of your work do you consider traditional? progressive? Can you also talk a little about the traditional and progressive aspects of your background and how they influence your work?

AN: I've written several poems on being a teenager, feeling hopelessly out-of-place as a teenager, wanting to fit in among my peers, and so on. These are subjects most anyone could relate to, of course, but in my case, being the only Asian American in an entire school—except for my younger sister, who was one year behind me—only amplified that feeling of isolation. It didn't help that we grew up in small, rural towns and often lived on the grounds of the state psychiatric hospital (my mom was a psychiatrist). The stares and questions, such as, “What are you, exactly?” never ceased, even from teachers who meant well but only isolated us even more with their banter about the origins of my last name during roll call. One teacher even joked that we must be descendants of the Aztec in front of the entire class! Our desire to be the same as everyone else in our sleepy western New York town—to blend in perfectly with the blond cheerleaders, to be liked by all the football players—ruled our lives.

All during elementary school and high school, I felt as if I had to explain so much of my culture to my friends/boyfriends. They knew I was American—had no accent whatsoever—yet to them I was still different in lots of ways. It's funny, because my writing is still a lot of that “explaining,” I think. Why I couldn't do this or that, why we eat this or that, and so on. But I guess it opened my eyes to two whole other cultures that are not being as heard in mainstream literature, and I wanted that to change. My parents were floored when I told them I didn't want to be a doctor (horrified, actually), but now they are very supportive and love it when they find a smidge of one of their stories in my writing.

I think because my sister and I were raised in suburban neighborhoods where my family was the only family of color, I was so used to having to “explain” my (then) unusual packed lunches of lumpia and fried rice, or having fish for breakfast. So I think in some ways you could say I spent my whole childhood and teen years building a language that is accessible yet colorful—very handy now, when I am writing, no?

The one thing I never hid while I was growing up was my curiosity and love of language and story, and I hope that element is present in my poems. So even though I may be writing about elements of my Filipina and South Indian background, I hope to do so in ways that make it accessible and meaningful to everyone. I'm very much drawn to classical poetic forms, such as the haibun and the ghazal, and try to use them to tell mini-stories in verse form.

RA: The natural world finds its way into your poetry in a way that goes beyond just glorifying its beauty. Can you talk a little about the part nature and science play in your work and how they came to be so important to you?

AN: The visual artist in me wants to present beauty in ways that are unexpected. A former grad-school classmate once told me that when he thinks of India, he thinks of poverty and dirt. That stuck with me and really burned me up. No way was I going to let people get away with thinking that of my father's beloved home country. And that was just one person! So I guess I try to present unexpected miracles in nature, myth, science, and relationships. And of course there is so much darkness in nature. If you acknowledge the beauty and joy, you have to also acknowledge the death and sorrow.

My examination of the dark side of animals and plants (such as the image of sharks stripped of their fins and thrown to the bottom of the ocean, bleeding to death, in At the Drive-In Volcano) served as a helpful metaphor while I was struggling to write about the end of a relationship. Using metaphor in this way helped create a necessary veil between the author and the speaker of the poems. If I don't surprise myself when I am writing, I usually can tell—my writing becomes flat, a matte finish if you will. I believe the writer's unpardonable sin is making the reader bored, so I guess you could say if I had one goal in using science and nature in my poems, it would be to not bore the reader while finding metaphors in science and nature to illuminate a personal experience in a more universal way.

Follow-Up

1. What do you think Aimee Nezhukumatathil means by the “necessary veil between the author and the speaker” (para. 15) of her poems? Do you agree that the veil is necessary?
2. Nezhukumatathil says that she spent much of her teenage years explaining her culture to her classmates. In what ways does “When All of My Cousins Are Married” explain the speaker's culture? What evidence is there of Nezhukumatathil's “language that is accessible yet colorful” (para. 11)?
3. Having read “When All of My Cousins Are Married” and the interview with Nezhukumatathil, do you think her college classes veer toward the traditional or the progressive? Explain your answer.

Forty Acres

DEREK WALCOTT

Poet, playwright, and critic Derek Walcott was born in 1930 on the Caribbean island of St. Lucia. He is best known for his epic poem Omeros (1990), a retelling of the Odyssey set in the Caribbean, the American West, and London. In his plays and poems, Walcott frequently explores the problems of identity that have emerged in the aftermath of colonialism and slavery. Walcott founded the Trinidad Theatre Workshop in 1951 and the Boston Playwrights' Theatre in 1981, taught poetry and theater at Boston University for many years, and now gives lectures and readings throughout the world, dividing much of his time between Trinidad and New York City. Walcott's works include the poetry collections The Castaway and Other Poems (1965), Sea Grapes (1976), and The Fortunate Traveller (1981), and the plays The Joker of Seville (1974), O Babylon! (1976), The Odyssey: A Stage Version (1993), and The Haitian Trilogy (2002). He won the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1992. "Forty Acres" was commissioned by the London Times in honor of the historic election of Barack Obama, the first black president of the United States, in November 2008.

Out of the turmoil emerges one emblem, an engraving—
 a young Negro at dawn in straw hat and overalls, an emblem of impossible prophecy, a crowd dividing like the furrow which a mule has ploughed, parting for their president: a field of snow-flecked cotton 5
 forty acres wide, of crows with predictable omens that the young ploughman ignores for his unforgotten cotton-haired ancestors, while lined on one branch, is a tense 10
 court of bespectacled owls and, on the field's receding rim—
 a gesticulating scarecrow stamping with rage at him.
 The small plough continues on this lined page beyond the moaning ground, the lynching tree, the tornado's 15 black vengeance,
 and the young ploughman feels the change in his veins,
 heart, muscles, tendons,
 till the land lies open like a flag as dawn's sure light streaks the field and furrows wait for the sower. 20

Exploring the Text

1. Look closely at the figurative language in “Forty Acres.” How do figures of speech, such as the simile in lines 3 and 4 (“a crowd / dividing like the furrow which a mule has ploughed”), connect the poem’s rural setting to its meaning as a whole?
2. Whom do you think the “court of bespectacled owls” (l. 11) and the “gesticulating scarecrow” (l. 13) refer to? Why do you think the owls are tense and the scarecrow is angry?
3. The title, “Forty Acres,” refers to the forty acres of land and a mule to plow it that was promised as compensation to freed slaves. How does the allusion in the title add a level of meaning to the poem?
4. The poem functions on several levels. Consider it first as a literal description of the work of a young farmer, then as a statement about modern politics. How does each reading add nuance to the other?
5. The poem could be considered a georgic, named after a series of poems by the Latin poet Virgil on how to manage a farm. Georgics are about rural business, as opposed to pastorals, which give us a romanticized depiction of leisurely rural life. Why is the georgic a particularly effective model for Walcott’s subject?
6. How does the poem both celebrate and criticize American history?
7. Read the poem aloud. How does the poem’s stately rhythm make a statement about America’s first African American president? about American history?

WALT WHITMAN

Walt Whitman (1819–1892) was born on Long Island, New York. Early in his life, he worked as a country schoolteacher and printer, and served as writer and editor for the Brooklyn Eagle newspaper. He continued in a variety of jobs, writing and working as a carpenter, and published his now famous Leaves of Grass in 1855. Regarded as offensive and vulgar at the time for its outspoken content, the poem celebrated individuality and the richness of life. In 1862, Whitman went to Virginia to find his brother George, who had been wounded in the Civil War. He was shocked to witness the horrors of war firsthand on the battlefield, and was deeply moved by the suffering of the wounded. He worked as an aide in army hospitals in Washington, caring first for his brother and then other soldiers as well. Among Whitman’s most well-known poems from this time are “Oh Captain, My Captain” and “When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloomed,” both about Abraham Lincoln. Whitman is considered by many critics to be the first urban poet, and his celebration of New York City, “Mannahatta,” suggests that he is the exception to the nineteenth-century rule that American intellectuals preferred the natural world.

I was asking for something specific and perfect for my city,
Whereupon lo! upsprang the aboriginal name.

Now I see what there is in a name, a word, liquid, sane, unruly, musical, self-sufficient,

I see that the word of my city is that word from of old,
Because I see that word nested in nests of water-bays, superb,

5

Rich, hemm'd thick all around with sailships and steamships, an island sixteen miles long, solid-founded,

Numberless crowded streets, high growths of iron, slender, strong, light, splendidly uprising toward clear skies,
Tides swift and ample, well-loved by me, toward sundown,
The flowing sea-currents, the little islands, larger adjoining islands, the heights, the villas,

The countless masts, the white shore-steamers, the lighters,
the ferry-boats, the black sea-steamers well-model'd,

10

The down-town streets, the jobbers' houses of business, the houses of business of the ship-merchants and money-brokers, the river-streets,

Immigrants arriving, fifteen or twenty thousand a week,

The carts hauling goods, the manly race of drivers of horses,
the brown-faced sailors,

The summer air, the bright sun shining, and the sailing clouds aloft,

The winter snows, the sleigh-bells, the broken ice in the river, passing along up or down with the flood-tide or ebb-tide,

15

The mechanics of the city, the masters, well-form'd, beautiful-faced, looking you straight in the eyes,

Trottoirs throng'd, vehicles, Broadway, the women, the shops and shows,

A million people—manners free and superb—open voices—hospitality—the most courageous and friendly young men,

City of hurried and sparkling waters! city of spires and masts!

City nested in bays! my city!

Exploring the Text

1. “Mannahatta” was the name given to Manhattan by the Native Americans who lived there before the Dutch settlers arrived. Why do you think Whitman rhapsodizes about this early name?

2. We can assume that Whitman is the speaker—he is one of the great New York poets. Describe the speaker’s persona. From what vantage point does he see the city? Is he an observer or a participant?
3. How does Whitman create the poem’s pace? What is the connection between its pace and its subject?
4. What contrasts does “Mannahatta” set up? Look carefully at how Whitman invokes the past and the present.
5. Walt Whitman is credited with the invention of American free verse, which is poetry that lacks a strict meter or rhyming sequence but is still recognizable as poetry because of its rhythmic cadence. Whitman used some conventional poetic techniques, such as iambic pentameter—the traditional meter of the sonnet—and anaphora—the repetition of the first word in a line—to achieve that cadence. Examine the cadence in “Mannahatta.” Do you see any other techniques Whitman used to achieve it? What is its effect in the poem? How does the cadence help create the vivid setting that is the subject of the poem?

Chicago

CARL SANDBURG

Carl Sandburg (1878–1967) was born in Galesburg, Illinois, the son of Swedish immigrants. He spent most of his life in the Midwest, working as a reporter and a writer of poetry—such as Good Morning, America (1928) and The People, Yes (1936)—history, biography, fiction, children’s books (most famously the Rootabaga Stories in the 1920s), and folk songs. He fought in the Spanish-American War and served as secretary to the mayor of Milwaukee, who was the country’s first Socialist mayor. Sandburg and his wife raised their family in the suburbs of Chicago. Sandburg was awarded two Pulitzers, one for his biography Abraham Lincoln: The War Years (1939) and one for his collection The Complete Poems (1950); he also received a Best Performance—Documentary or Spoken Word Grammy for his collaboration with the New York Philharmonic (1959). The poem “Chicago” is one of the most famous literary descriptions of an American city.

Hog Butcher for the World,
Tool Maker, Stacker of Wheat,
Player with Railroads and the Nation’s Freight Handler; Stormy, husky, brawling,
City of the Big Shoulders:

5

They tell me you are wicked and I believe them, for I have seen your painted women under the gas lamps luring the farm boys.
And they tell me you are crooked and I answer: Yes, it is true I have seen the gunman kill and go free to kill again.

And they tell me you are brutal and my reply is: On the faces of women and children I have seen the marks of wanton hunger.
 And having answered so I turn once more to those who sneer at this my city, and I give them back the sneer and say to them:
 Come and show me another city with lifted head singing so proud to 10 be alive and coarse and strong and cunning.
 Flinging magnetic curses amid the toil of piling job on job, here is a tall bold slugger set vivid against the little soft cities;
 Fierce as a dog with tongue lapping for action, cunning as a savage pitted against the wilderness, Bareheaded,
     Shoveling,
     Wrecking, 15
     Planning,
     Building, breaking, rebuilding,
 Under the smoke, dust all over his mouth, laughing with white teeth,
 Under the terrible burden of destiny laughing as a young man laughs,
 Laughing even as an ignorant fighter laughs who has never lost a battle, 20
 Bragging and laughing that under his wrist is the pulse, and under his ribs the heart of the people,
     Laughing!
 Laughing the stormy, husky, brawling laughter of Youth, half-naked, sweating, proud to be Hog Butcher, Tool Maker, Stacker of Wheat, Player with Railroads and Freight Handler to the Nation.

Exploring the Text

1. Personification is the principal technique in “Chicago.” Describe the persona Sandburg creates for the city.
2. Sandburg also uses apostrophe, a figure of speech in which someone or something either dead or inanimate is addressed as if it were able to reply. What is the effect of addressing Chicago? What might it reply if it could answer?
3. Describe the poem’s tone. How does Sandburg create it? How is Chicago honored through the poem’s tone?
4. In lines 18–23, the words “laughs” and “laughing” are repeated over and over. Characterize the city’s laughter. How does it both create an image and comment on Sandburg’s Chicago?
5. Sandburg’s work was inspired by Whitman, especially his use of free verse. The poet Amy Lowell said that the ideal of free verse was to “copy new rhythms—as expressions of new moods—and not to copy old rhythms, which merely echo old moods.” How does the rhythm of “Chicago” express “new moods”?

6. Nearly a third of the city burned down in the Chicago Fire of 1871; in the aftermath, the city underwent a period of rapid reconstruction and growth. What passages in the poem seem specifically to deal with this event? How does this part of Chicago history relate to the persona that Sandburg attributes to the city?

Focus on Comparison and Contrast

1. Both “Mannahatta” and “Chicago” have a cadence that is characteristic of free verse. What are the similarities and differences in their cadences?
2. Whitman was famous for his lists, a technique that is also evident in Sandburg’s “Chicago.” What is the effect of these lists? How do the poets use repetition without seeming repetitive?
3. What do the poems have in common in their descriptions of cities? What is different?
4. Compare and contrast the speakers in the two poems. What do they have in common? How are they different? How does each poet create the speaker’s persona?
5. Read “Mannahatta” and “Chicago” aloud. Compare and contrast the way free verse imbues the two poems with energy and vigor. You might also look for videos on the Internet in which filmmakers have combined images of New York City and Chicago with the poets’ words.

Writing Assignment

“Mannahatta” by Walt Whitman and “Chicago” by Carl Sandburg each praise the city in which it is set. Compare the speakers’ pride in their cities and analyze the techniques the poets use to communicate and re-create the speakers’ feelings.

Portrait of Andries Stilte II

KEHINDE WILEY

Kehinde Wiley was born in 1977 in Los Angeles. He lives in New York and is a photorealist painter whose work is inspired by traditional portraitists, such as Sir Joshua Reynolds, Thomas Gainsborough, Titian, and Jean Auguste Dominique Ingres. His paintings are in the permanent collections of the Columbus Museum of Art, the Studio Museum in Harlem, the Walker Art Center, the Miami Art Museum, and the Detroit Institute of Arts, among others. In Portrait of Andries Stilte II, the subject is posing in the style of Hyacinthe Rigaud’s Portrait of Louis XIV.

Portrait of Andries Stilte II (2006, oil on canvas, 72 x 96 in.)

Exploring the Text

1. Portrait of Andries Stilte II was inspired by Hyacinthe Rigaud's 1701 Portrait of Louis XIV, which hangs in the Louvre. Rigaud was known for his ability to create exact likenesses and for the precise details of his subjects' costumes and backgrounds. View his painting online at louvre.fr. What echoes of Rigaud's style do you find in Wiley's portrait? How does Wiley use elements of Rigaud's painting in new ways?
2. Traditionally, portraits were created through commissions. Families and governments hired artists to celebrate and memorialize individuals. The paintings often became important state or family records. What does Portrait of Andries Stilte II celebrate? What record does it make? Consider both the elements of the Rigaud portrait that remain and the representation of its modern subject.

3. Try to identify the painting's references to both traditional and modern art. How do those elements add levels of meaning to both this work and Rigaud's work?
4. Many of Wiley's paintings, including the one here (6' × 8'), are larger than life. How does their heroic size comment on both the young black men who pose and the culture of those men?
5. Wiley's method is to approach young African American men, talk to them about his work, and ask them to choose a traditional painting as an inspiration for a portrait. Look at some famous traditional portraits. Which would you choose as the inspiration for your portrait? Explain your answer.

Conversation

The Harlem Renaissance: Progress within Tradition?

A great flowering of black arts and culture, the Harlem Renaissance continues to be a source of fascination, debate, and discussion among literary critics and historians. Even the dates remain problematic. Most agree that the movement began after the 1919 "Red Summer" of race riots in urban centers throughout the United States and continued as a result of the Great Migration of African Americans from the rural South to northern cities. Some cite the economic crash of 1929 as the end; others, including African American scholar Henry Louis Gates Jr., put it at 1939, the start of World War II. Regardless of the exact beginning and ending, all agree that the period of the 1920s was a time of extraordinary creativity that centered around New York City, specifically Harlem, and left a breathtaking legacy of writers, musicians, visual artists, and intellectual productivity. Further, this period, called "more a spirit than a movement" by critic Robert Hemenway, was marked by a range of ideas and writing styles, exploration of both African and American cultural heritages, protests against racial discrimination, and a sense of self-assertion and pride. Implicit in the Harlem Renaissance, however, was a tension between those artists who believed in working within the tradition of their American and African American cultural heritage, and those who argued for a break from the past to forge an entirely new cultural consciousness. The essays, poems, fiction, and visual text that follow illustrate a range of viewpoints on this issue.

Preface to The Book of American Negro Poetry

JAMES WELDON JOHNSON

James Weldon Johnson (1871–1938) may be best remembered for writing "Lift Ev'ry Voice and Sing" (1900), which has come to be known as the Negro national anthem. Johnson had a distinguished career in academe, holding the Adam K. Spence Chair of Creative Literature at Fisk University. He wrote The Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man (1912, reissued 1927), a novel about "passing" and the psychological cost of assuming a dual identity, and edited The Book of American Negro Poetry, which Henry Louis Gates Jr. calls "a landmark in the history of African American literature." The following is an excerpt from the preface to that work.

The final measure of the greatness of all peoples is the amount and standard of the literature and art they have produced. The world does not know that a people is great until that people produces great literature and art. No people that has produced great literature and art has ever been looked upon by the world as distinctly inferior. . . .

And nothing will do more to change that mental attitude and raise his status than a demonstration of intellectual parity by the Negro through the production of literature and art. . . .

The Negro in the United States has achieved or been placed in a certain artistic niche. When he is thought of artistically, it is as a happy-go-lucky, singing, shuffling, banjo-picking being or as a more or less pathetic figure. The picture of him is in a log cabin amid fields of cotton or along the levees. Negro dialect is naturally and by long association the exact instrument for voicing this phase of Negro life; and by that very exactness it is an instrument with but two full stops, humor and pathos. So even when he confines himself to purely racial themes, the Aframerican poet realizes that there are phases of Negro life in the United States which cannot be treated in the dialect either adequately or artistically. Take, for example, the phases rising out of life in Harlem, that most wonderful Negro city in the world. I do not deny that a Negro in a log cabin is more picturesque than a Negro in a Harlem flat, but the Negro in the Harlem flat is here, and he is but part of a group growing everywhere in the country, a group whose ideals are becoming increasingly more vital than those of the traditionally artistic group, even if its members are less picturesque.

What the colored poet in the United States needs to do is something like what Synge<sup>1</sup> did for the Irish; he needs to find a form that will express the racial spirit by symbols from within rather than by symbols from without, such as the mere mutilation of English spelling and pronunciation. He needs a form that is freer and larger than dialect, but which will still hold the racial flavor; a form expressing the imagery, the idioms, the peculiar turns of thought, and the distinctive humor and pathos, too, of the Negro, but which will also be capable of voicing the deepest and highest emotions and aspirations, and allow of the widest range of subjects and the widest scope of treatment.

Negro dialect is at present a medium that is not capable of giving expression to the varied conditions of Negro life in America, and much less is it capable of giving the fullest interpretation of Negro character and psychology. This is no indictment against the dialect as dialect, but against the mould of convention in which Negro dialect in the United States has been set. In time these conventions may become lost, and the colored poet in the United States may sit down to write in dialect without feeling that his first line will put the general reader in a frame of mind which demands that the poem be humorous or pathetic. In the meantime, there is no reason why these poets should not continue to do the beautiful things that can be done, and done best, in the dialect.

In stating the need for Aframerican poets in the United States to work out a new and distinctive form of expression I do not wish to be understood to hold any theory that they should limit themselves to Negro poetry, to racial themes; the sooner they are able to write American poetry spontaneously, the better. Nevertheless, I believe that the richest contribution the Negro poet can make to the American literature of the future will be the fusion into it of his own individual artistic gifts.

LANGSTON HUGHES

During his yearlong stint at Columbia University, Langston Hughes (1902–1967) became involved with the Harlem movement. After leaving Columbia because of the endemic racial prejudice there, he traveled for three years, spending some time in Paris before returning to the United States in 1925. After completing his degree at Lincoln University, he returned to Harlem for the remainder of his life. His first volume of poetry, The Weary Blues (1926), contained "The Negro Speaks of Rivers," perhaps his most famous poem. Hughes is remembered for his celebration of the uniqueness of African American culture, which found expression in "The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain" and "Jazzonia."

The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain

One of the most promising of the young Negro poets<sup>1</sup> said to me once, "I want to be a poet—not a Negro poet," meaning, I believe, "I want to write like a white poet"; meaning subconsciously, "I would like to be a white poet"; meaning behind that, "I would like to be white." And I was sorry the young man said that, for no great poet has ever been afraid of being himself. And I doubted then that, with his desire to run away spiritually from his race, this boy would ever be a great poet. But this is the mountain standing in the way of any true Negro art in America—this urge within the race toward whiteness, the desire to pour racial individuality into the mold of American standardization, and to be as little Negro and as much American as possible.

But let us look at the immediate background of this young poet. His family is of what I suppose one would call the Negro middle class: people who are by no means rich yet never uncomfortable nor hungry—smug, contented, respectable folk, members of the Baptist church. The father goes to work every morning. He is a chief steward at a large white club. The mother sometimes does fancy sewing or supervises parties for the rich families of the town. The children go to a mixed school. In the home they read white papers and magazines. And the mother often says "Don't be like niggers" when the children are bad. A frequent phrase from the father is, "Look how well a white man does things." And so the word white comes to be unconsciously a symbol of all the virtues. It holds for the children beauty, morality, and money. The whisper of "I want to be white" runs silently through their minds. This young poet's home is, I believe, a fairly typical home of the colored middle class. One sees immediately how difficult it would be for an artist born in such a home to interest himself in interpreting the beauty of his own people. He is never taught to see that beauty. He is taught rather not to see it, or if he does, to be ashamed of it when it is not according to Caucasian patterns.

For racial culture the home of a self-styled "high-class" Negro has nothing better to offer. Instead there will perhaps be more aping of things white than in a less cultured or less wealthy home. The father is perhaps a doctor, lawyer, landowner, or politician. The mother may be a social worker, or a teacher, or she may do nothing and have a maid. Father is often dark but he has usually married the lightest woman he could find. The family attend a fashionable church where few really colored faces are to be found. And they themselves draw a color line. In the North they go to white theaters and white movies. And in the South they have at least two cars and a house “like white folks.” Nordic manners, Nordic faces, Nordic hair, Nordic art (if any), and an Episcopal heaven. A very high mountain indeed for the would-be racial artist to climb in order to discover himself and his people.

But then there are the low-down folks, the so-called common element, and they are the majority—may the Lord be praised! The people who have their nip of gin on Saturday nights and are not too important to themselves or the community, or too well fed, or too learned to watch the lazy world go round. They live on Seventh Street in Washington or State Street in Chicago and they do not particularly care whether they are like white folks or anybody else. Their joy runs, bang! into ecstasy. Their religion soars to a shout. Work maybe a little today, rest a little tomorrow. Play awhile. Sing awhile. O, let’s dance! These common people are not afraid of spirituals, as for a long time their more intellectual brethren were, and jazz is their child. They furnish a wealth of colorful, distinctive material for any artist because they still hold their own individuality in the face of American standardizations. And perhaps these common people will give to the world its truly great Negro artist, the one who is not afraid to be himself. Whereas the better-class Negro would tell the artist what to do, the people at least let him alone when he does appear. And they are not ashamed of him—if they know he exists at all. And they accept what beauty is their own without question.

Certainly there is, for the American Negro artist who can escape the restrictions 5 the more advanced among his own group would put upon him, a great field of unused material ready for his art. Without going outside his race, and even among the better classes with their “white” culture and conscious American manners, but still Negro enough to be different, there is sufficient matter to furnish a black artist with a lifetime of creative work. And when he chooses to touch on the relations between Negroes and whites in this country with their innumerable overtones and undertones, surely, and especially for literature and the drama, there is an inexhaustible supply of themes at hand. To these the Negro artist can give his racial individuality, his heritage of rhythm and warmth, and his incongruous humor that so often, as in the Blues, becomes ironic laughter mixed with tears. But let us look again at the mountain. . . .

Most of my own poems are racial in theme and treatment, derived from the life I know. In many of them I try to grasp and hold some of the meanings and rhythms of jazz. I am sincere as I know how to be in these poems and yet after every reading I answer questions like these from my own people: Do you think Negroes should always write about Negroes? I wish you wouldn’t read some of your poems to white folks. How do you find anything interesting in a place like a cabaret? Why do you write about black people? You aren’t black. What makes you do so many jazz poems?

But jazz to me is one of the inherent expressions of Negro life in America: the eternal tom-tom beating in the Negro soul—the tom-tom of revolt against weariness in a white world, a world of subway trains, and work, work, work; the tom-tom of joy and laughter, and pain swallowed in a smile. Yet the Philadelphia clubwoman is ashamed to say that her race created it and she does not like me to write about it.

The old subconscious “white is best” runs through her mind. Years of study under white teachers, a lifetime of white books, pictures, and papers, and white manners, morals, and Puritan standards made her dislike the spirituals. And now she turns up her nose at jazz and all its manifestations — likewise almost everything else distinctly racial. She doesn’t care for the Winold Reiss portraits of Negroes because they are “too Negro.” She does not want a true picture of herself from anybody. She wants the artist to flatter her, to make the white world believe that all Negroes are as smug and as near white in soul as she wants to be. But, to my mind, it is the duty of the younger Negro artist, if he accepts any duties at all from outsiders, to change through the force of his art that old whispering “I want to be white,” hidden in the aspirations of his people, to “Why should I want to be white? I am a Negro — and beautiful!”

So I am ashamed for the black poet who says, “I want to be a poet, not a Negro poet,” as though his own racial world were not as interesting as any other world. I am ashamed, too, for the colored artist who runs from the painting of Negro faces to the painting of sunsets after the manner of the academicians because he fears the strange un-whiteness of his own features. An artist must be free to choose what he does, certainly, but he must also never be afraid to do what he might choose.

Let the blare of Negro jazz bands and the bellowing voice of Bessie Smith singing Blues penetrate the closed ears of the colored near-intellectuals until they listen and perhaps understand. Let Paul Robeson singing “Water Boy,” and Rudolph Fisher writing about the streets of Harlem, and Jean Toomer holding the heart of Georgia in his hands, and Aaron Douglas drawing strange black fantasies cause the smug Negro middle class to turn from their white, respectable, ordinary books and papers to catch a glimmer of their own beauty. We younger Negro artists who create now intend to express our individual dark-skinned selves without fear or shame. If white people are pleased we are glad. If they are not, it doesn’t matter. We know we are beautiful. And ugly too. The tom-tom cries and the tom-tom laughs. If colored people are pleased we are glad. If they are not, their displeasure doesn’t matter either. We build our temples for tomorrow, strong as we know how, and we stand on top of the mountain, free within ourselves.

Questions

1. What is the “racial mountain” that Hughes decries? Why is this a fitting image for the argument he is making?
2. What are the two principal attitudes within his own community that Hughes contrasts? How does his style shift when he begins to describe “the so-called common element” in paragraph 4?
3. How does Hughes use the terms “Negro,” “colored,” and “black”? Explain why he uses each when he does.
4. Why is jazz an especially significant subject for Hughes to discuss? Why does he find it particularly relevant to the subject he is addressing?

5. What does Hughes mean when he writes, “An artist must be free to choose what he does, certainly, but he must also never be afraid to do what he might choose” (para. 8)?
6. According to Hughes, who is the audience for the African American artists of this time period?

Questions

1. What is the setting of the poem?
2. What purpose does the sensory imagery serve? What do the allusions to Eve and Cleopatra add?
3. What are “long-headed jazzers” (ll. 4, 17)?
4. How does the form of the poem—repetition, rhyme, line breaks—reinforce its meaning?
5. How would you describe the tone of the poem?

<sup>1</sup>Genesis 3:6–7 reads: “When the woman [Eve] saw that the fruit of the tree was good for food and pleasing to the eye, and also desirable for gaining wisdom, she took some and ate it. She also gave some to her husband [Adam], who was with her, and he ate it. Then the eyes of both of them were opened, and they realized they were naked; so they sewed fig leaves together and made coverings for themselves.” —EDS.

The White House

CLAUDE MCKAY

Poet, novelist, and journalist Claude McKay (1890–1948) was born in Jamaica, and immigrated to the United States at the age of twenty-two. He lived in England and France for many years, but returned to the United States in 1934, where he worked in Chicago as a journalist. He is known for his protest poetry, which speaks directly to racial issues and the trials of the working class. McKay's novels include Home to Harlem (1922), Banjo: A Story without a Plot (1929), and Banana Bottom (1933). In the following poem, McKay expresses restrained anger at being excluded, though he does not explicitly mention race.

Your door is shut against my tightened face,
 And I am sharp as steel with discontent;
 But I possess the courage and the grace
 To bear my anger proudly and unbent.
 The pavement slabs burn loose beneath my feet,                   5
 A chafing savage, down the decent street;
 And passion rends my vitals as I pass,
 Where boldly shines your shuttered door of glass.
 Oh, I must search for wisdom every hour,
 Deep in my wrathful bosom sore and raw,                   10
 And find in it the superhuman power
 To hold me to the letter of your law!
 Oh, I must keep my heart inviolate
 Against the potent poison of your hate.

[1922]

Questions

1. The poem develops a tension between the “you” and “I” in the poem. Who is the speaker, and to whom (or what) is he speaking?
2. McKay uses physical images of steel, pavement, and glass. Why? How do these contribute to the depiction of the speaker’s anger?
3. Why does the speaker refer to himself as a “chafing savage” (l. 6) with a “wrathful bosom” (l. 10)?
4. How do you interpret the final couplet—as the speaker’s resignation? defiance? compromise?
5. If you did not know the title of the poem, how would your interpretation differ? Explain why you believe that not mentioning the White House in the text of the poem strengthens or weakens the points McKay is making. In A Long Way from Home (1937), McKay’s autobiography, he claims that the poem’s title does not refer to the official presidential residence. Does this disclaimer influence your reading of the poem?

6. How do current political events affect your reading of the poem?

Spunk

ZORA NEALE HURSTON

Zora Neale Hurston (1891–1960) came to prominence in the 1920s during the Harlem Renaissance. A novelist, folklorist, and anthropologist, she first gained attention with her short stories, including “Sweat” and “Spunk.” She is best known for her novel Their Eyes Were Watching God (1937), set in Eatonville, Florida, where Hurston grew up; the town was the first incorporated African American community in the United States. Her writing is known for its celebration of African American folk culture, as well as its use of authentic vernacular speech. Hurston, who died in poverty, was all but forgotten until Alice Walker took an interest in her. Walker’s 1971 essay “Looking for Zora” described her personal journey to find Hurston’s unmarked grave. The publication of this essay prompted a resurgence of interest in Hurston, including republication of many of her books. The following short story, Hurston’s third, was published in Alain Locke’s The New Negro (1925)—a collection of essays, poetry, fiction, drama, and visual texts, considered to be the manifesto of the Harlem Renaissance.

I

A giant of a brown-skinned man sauntered up the one street of the village and out into the palmetto thickets with a small pretty woman clinging lovingly to his arm.

“Looka theah, folkses!” cried Elijah Mosley, slapping his leg gleefully. “Theah they go, big as life an’ brassy as tacks.”

All the loungers in the store tried to walk to the door with an air of nonchalance but with small success.

“Now pee-eople!” Walter Thomas gasped. “Will you look at ’em!”

“But that’s one thing Ah likes about Spunk Banks—he ain’t skeered of nothin’ on God’s green footstool—nothin’! He rides that log down at saw-mill jus’ like he struts ’round wid another man’s wife—jus’ don’t give a kitty. When Tes’ Miller got cut to giblets on that circle-saw, Spunk steps right up and starts ridin’. The rest of us was skeered to go near it.” 5

A round-shouldered figure in overalls much too large came nervously in the door and the talking ceased. The men looked at each other and winked.

“Gimme some soda-water. Sass’prilla Ah reckon,” the newcomer ordered, and stood far down the counter near the open pickled pig-feet tub to drink it.

Elijah nudged Walter and turned with mock gravity to the new-comer.

“Say, Joe, how’s everything up yo’ way? How’s yo’ wife?”

Joe started and all but dropped the bottle he was holding. He swallowed several times painfully and his lips trembled. 10

"Aw 'Lige, you oughtn't to do nothin' like that," Walter grumbled. Elijah ignored him.

"She jus' passed heah a few minutes ago goin' thata way," with a wave of his hand in the direction of the woods.

Now Joe knew his wife had passed that way. He knew that the men lounging in the general store had seen her, moreover, he knew that the men knew he knew. He stood there silent for a long moment staring blankly, with his Adam's apple twitching nervously up and down his throat. One could actually see the pain he was suffering, his eyes, his face, his hands, and even the dejected slump of his shoulders. He set the bottle down upon the counter. He didn't bang it, just eased it out of his hand silently and fiddled with his suspender buckle.

"Well, Ah'm goin' after her to-day. Ah'm goin' an' fetch her back. Spunk's done gone too fur."

He reached deep down into his trouser pocket and drew out a hollow ground razor, large and shiny, and passed his moistened thumb back and forth over the edge.

"Talkin' like a man, Joe. 'Course that's yo' fambly affairs, but Ah like to see grit in anybody."

Joe Kanty laid down a nickel and stumbled out into the street.

Dusk crept in from the woods. Ike Clarke lit the swinging oil lamp that was almost immediately surrounded by candle-flies. The men laughed boisterously behind Joe's back as they watched him shamle woodward.

"You oughtn't to said whut you said to him, 'Lige—look how it worked him up," Walter chided.

"And Ah hope it did work him up. Tain't even decent for a man to take and take like he do."

"Spunk will sho' kill him."

"Aw, Ah doan know. You never kin tell. He might turn him up an' spank him fur gettin' in the way, but Spunk wouldn't shoot no unarmed man. Dat razor he carried outa heah ain't gonna run Spunk down an' cut him, an' Joe ain't got the nerve to go to Spunk with it knowing he totes that Army .45. He makes that break outa heah to bluff us. He's gonna hide that razor behind the first palmetto root an' sneak back home to bed. Don't tell me nothin' 'bout that rabbit-foot colored man. Didn't he meet Spunk an' Lena face to face one day las week an' mumble sumthin' to Spunk 'bout lettin' his wife alone?"

"What did Spunk say?" Walter broke in. "Ah like him fine but tain't right the way he carries on wid Lena Kanty, jus' 'cause Joe's timid 'bout fightin'"

"You wrong theah, Walter. Tain't 'cause Joe's timid at all, it's 'cause Spunk wants Lena. If Joe was a passle of wile cats Spunk would tackle the job just the same. He'd go after anything he wanted the same way. As Ah wuz sayin' a minute ago, he tole Joe right to his face that Lena was his. 'Call her and see if she'll come. A woman knows her boss an' she answers when he calls.' 'Lena, ain't I yo' husband?' Joe sorter whines out. Lena looked at him real disgusted but she don't answer and she don't move outa her tracks. Then Spunk reaches out an' takes hold of her arm an' says: 'Lena, youse mine. From now on Ah works for you an' fights for you an' Ah never wants you to look to nobody for a crumb of bread, a stitch of close or a shingle to go over yo' head, but me long as Ah live. Ah'll git the lumber foh owah house to-morrow. Go home an git yo' things together!"

"Thass mah house," Lena speaks up. "Papa gimme that."

"Well," says Spunk, "doan give up whut's yours, but when youse inside doan forgit youse mine, an' let no other man git outa his place wid you!"

"Lena looked up at him with her eyes so full of love that they wuz runnin' over, an' Spunk seen it an' Joe seen it too, and his lip started to tremblin' and his Adam's apple was galloping up and down his neck like a race horse. Ah bet he's wore out half a dozen Adam's apples since Spunk's been on the job with Lena. That's all he'll do. He'll be back heah after while swallowin' an' workin' his lips like he wants to say somethin' an' can't."

"But didn't he do nothin' to stop 'em?"

"Nope, not a frazzlin' thing — jus' stood there. Spunk took Lena's arm and walked off jus' like nothin' ain't happened and he stood there gazin' after them till they was outa sight. Now you know a woman don't want no man like that. I'm jus' waitin' to see whut he's goin' to say when he gits back."

II

But Joe Kanty never came back, never. The men in the store heard the sharp report of a pistol somewhere distant in the palmetto thicket and soon Spunk came walking leisurely, with his big black Stetson set at the same rakish angle and Lena clinging to his arm, came walking right into the general store. Lena wept in a frightened manner.

30

"Well," Spunk announced calmly, "Joe came out there wid a meat axe an' made me kill him."

He sent Lena home and led the men back to Joe — crumpled and limp with his right hand still clutching his razor.

"See mah back? Mah close cut clear through. He sneaked up an' tried to kill me from the back, but Ah got him, an' got him good, first shot," Spunk said.

The men glared at Elijah, accusingly.

"Take him up an' plant him in Stony Lonesome," Spunk said in a careless voice. "Ah didn't wanna shoot him but he made me do it. He's a dirty coward, jumpin' on a man from behind."

35

Spunk turned on his heel and sauntered away to where he knew his love wept in fear for him and no man stopped him. At the general store later on, they all talked of locking him up until the sheriff should come from Orlando, but no one did anything but talk.

A clear case of self-defense, the trial was a short one, and Spunk walked out of the court house to freedom again. He could work again, ride the dangerous log-carriage that fed the singing, snarling, biting circle-saw; he could stroll the soft dark lanes with his guitar. He was free to roam the woods again; he was free to return to Lena. He did all of these things.

III

"Whut you reckon, Walt?" Elijah asked one night later. "Spunk's gittin' ready to marry Lena!"

"Naw! Why, Joe ain't had time to git cold yit. Nohow Ah didn't figger Spunk was the marryin' kind."

"Well, he is," rejoined Elijah. "He done moved most of Lena's things—and her along wid 'em — over to the Bradley house. He's buying it. Jus' like Ah told yo' all right in heah the night Joe was kilt. Spunk's crazy 'bout Lena. He don't want folks to keep on talkin' 'bout her — thass reason he's rushin' so. Funny thing 'bout that bob-cat, wan't it?"

"What bob-cat, 'Lige? Ah ain't heered 'bout none."

"Ain't cher? Well, night befo' las' as they was goin' to bed, a big black bob-cat, black all over, you hear me, black, walked round and round that house and howled like forty, an' when Spunk got his gun an' went to the winder to shoot it, he says it stood right still an' looked him in the eye, an' howled right at him. The thing got Spunk so nervous up he couldn't shoot. But Spunk says twan't no bob-cat nohow. He says it was Joe done sneaked back from Hell!"

"Humph!" sniffed Walter, "he oughter be nervous after what he done. Ah reckon Joe come back to dare him to marry Lena, or to come out an' fight. Ah bet he'll be back time and again, too. Know what Ah think? Joe wuz a braver man than Spunk."

There was a general shout of derision from the group.

"Thass a fact," went on Walter. "Lookit whut he done; took a razor an' went out to fight a man he knowed toted a gun an' wuz a crack shot, too; 'nother thing Joe wuz skeered of Spunk, skeered plumb stiff! But he went jes' the same. It took him a long time to get his nerve up. Tain't nothin' for Spunk to fight when he ain't skeered of nothin'. Now, Joe's done come back to have it out wid the man that's got all he ever had. Y'all know Joe ain't never had nothin' nor wanted nothin' besides Lena. It musta been a h'ant cause ain't nobody never seen no black bob-cat."

"'Nother thing," cut in one of the men, "Spunk was cussin' a blue streak to-day 'cause he 'lowed dat saw wuz wobblin' — almos' got 'im once. The machinist come, looked it over an' said it wuz alright. Spunk musta been leanin' t'wards it some. Den he claimed somebody pushed 'im but twan't nobody close to 'im. Ah wuz glad when knockin' off time came. I'm skeered of dat man when he gits hot. He'd beat you full of button holes as quick as he's look atcher."

IV

The men gathered the next evening in a different mood, no laughter. No badi-nage this time.

"Look, 'Lige, you goin' to set up wid Spunk?"

"Naw, Ah reckon not, Walter. Tell yuh the truth, Ah'm a li'l bit skittish. Spunk died too wicket — died cussin' he did. You know he thought he was done outa life."

"Good Lawd, who'd he think done it?"

"Joe."

"Joe Kanty? How come?"

"Walter, Ah b'leeve Ah will walk up thata way an' set. Lena would like it Ah reckon."

"But whut did he say, 'Lige?"

Elijah did not answer until they had left the lighted store and were strolling 55 down the dark street.

"Ah wuz loadin' a wagon wid scantlin' right near the saw when Spunk fell on the carriage but 'fore Ah could git to him the saw got him in the body — awful sight. Me an' Skint Miller got him off but it was too late. Anybody could see that. The fust thing he said wuz: 'He pushed me, 'Lige — the dirty hound pushed me in the back!' — he was spittin' blood at ev'ry breath. We laid him on the sawdust pile with his face to the East so's he could die easy. He helt mah han' till the last, Walter, and said: 'It was Joe, 'Lige . . . the dirty sneak shoved me . . . he didn't dare come to mah face . . . but Ah'll git the son-of-a-wood louse soon's Ah get there an' make hell too hot for him . . . Ah felt him shove me . . . !' Thass how he died."

"If spirits kin fight, there's a powerful tussle goin' on somewhere ovah Jordan 'cause Ah b'leeve Joe's ready for Spunk an' ain't skeered any more — yas, Ah b'leeve Joe pushed 'im mahself."

They had arrived at the house. Lena's lamentations were deep and loud. She had filled the room with magnolia blossoms that gave off a heavy sweet odor. The keepers of the wake tipped about whispering in frightened tones. Everyone in the village was there, even old Jeff Kanty, Joe's father, who a few hours before would have been afraid to come within ten feet of him, stood leering triumphantly down upon the fallen giant as if his fingers had been the teeth of steel that laid him low.

The cooling board consisted of three sixteen-inch boards on saw horses, a dingy sheet was his shroud.

The women ate heartily of the funeral baked meats and wondered who would be 60
Lena's next. The men whispered coarse conjectures between guzzles of whiskey.

3. This intricate story is actually a series of stories or narrations. Identify the individual story lines, and explain how they are interrelated.
4. Are the characters in the story fully formed, three-dimensional characters or flat stereotypes (racial or gender)?
5. How does the story manifest Hurston's long-standing interest in folklore?

The Spirit of Africa

AARON DOUGLAS

Aaron Douglas (1898–1979), a native of Kansas, received his BA from the University of Nebraska (the first African American to earn a bachelor of fine arts at the university), came to New York City in 1925, and began publishing his illustrations in Opportunity and Crisis magazines. Inspired by African art, he used geometrical motifs to depict the history and culture of African people. His strikingly modernist illustrations, including The Spirit of Africa, appeared in Alain Locke's The New Negro.

The Spirit of Africa (1926, woodcut)

Questions

1. What is the subject of this illustration? Literally, what is being depicted?
2. The use of geometrical forms is one of the hallmarks of the modernist movement in art, as twentieth-century artists moved away from inherited and traditional notions of art and focused instead on line, form, and color. How do the repeated geometrical forms unify the illustration? What else might they suggest in terms of connecting past and present?
3. What is the effect of Douglas's creating forms that are both literal representations of African masks and suggestions of more abstract images?
4. What is the mood of this illustration?
5. In The New Negro, this illustration appears on the left page facing the title page of the essay "The Negro Digs Up His Past" by renowned historian Arthur A. Schomburg. Do you think the visual text would or would not complement an essay about the historical legacy of African Americans? Explain your answer.

Nocturne at Bethesda

ARNA BONTEMPS

Born in Louisiana, Arna Bontemps (1902–1973) grew up in California and graduated from Pacific Union College. In 1924, he moved to Harlem to accept a teaching job and began publishing poetry and fiction. In 1943, he graduated from the University of Chicago with a master's degree in library science and was appointed a librarian at Fisk University; he remained there until his retirement in 1965 and ultimately returned as a writer-in-residence. The following poem takes its title from the biblical passage John 5:2–4: "Now there is at Jerusalem by the sheep market a pool, which is called in the Hebrew tongue Bethesda, having five porches. In these lay a great multitude of impotent folk, of blind, halt, withered, waiting for the moving of the water. For an angel went down at a certain season into the pool, and troubled the water: whosoever then first after the troubling of the water stepped in was made whole of whatsoever disease he had."

I thought I saw an angel flying low,
I thought I saw the flicker of a wing
Above the mulberry trees; but not again.
Bethesda sleeps. This ancient pool that healed
A host of bearded Jews does not awake.

5

This pool that once the angels troubled does not move.
No angel stirs it now, no Saviour comes
With healing in His hands to raise the sick
And bid the lame man leap upon the ground.

The golden days are gone. Why do we wait
So long upon the marble steps, blood

10

Falling from our open wounds? and why
 Do our black faces search the empty sky?
 Is there something we have forgotten? some precious thing
 We have lost, wandering in strange lands? 15

There was a day, I remember now,
 I beat my breast and cried, "Wash me God,
 Wash me with a wave of wind upon
 The barley; O quiet One, draw near, draw near!
 Walk upon the hills with lovely feet 20
 And in the waterfall stand and speak.

"Dip white hands in the lily pool and mourn
 Upon the harps still hanging in the trees
 Near Babylon along the river's edge,
 But oh, remember me, I pray, before 25
 The summer goes and rose leaves lose their red."

The old terror takes my heart, the fear
 Of quiet waters and of faint twilights.
 There will be better days when I am gone
 And healing pools where I cannot be healed. 30
 Fragrant stars will gleam forever and ever
 Above the place where I lie desolate.

Yet I hope, still I long to live.
 And if there can be returning after death
 I shall come back. But it will not be here; 35
 If you want me you must search for me
 Beneath the palms of Africa. Or if I am not there then you may call to me
 Across the shining dunes, perhaps I shall
 Be following a desert caravan. 40

I may pass through centuries of death
 With quiet eyes, but I'll remember still
 A jungle tree with burning scarlet birds.
 There is something I have forgotten, some precious thing.
 I shall be seeking ornaments of ivory, 45
 I shall be dying for a jungle fruit.

You do not hear, Bethesda.
 O still green water in a stagnant pool!
 Love abandoned you and me alike.
 There was a day you held a rich full moon 50
 Upon your heart and listened to the words
 Of men now dead and saw the angels fly.

There is a simple story on your face;
 Years have wrinkled you. I know, Bethesda!
 You are sad. It is the same with me.

From Plum Bun: A Novel without a Moral

JESSIE REDMON FAUSET

The most prolific novelist of the Harlem Renaissance, Jessie Redmon Fauset (1882–1961) grew up in Philadelphia and graduated from Cornell University; she was the first African American woman to become a member of Phi Beta Kappa, the prestigious academic honor society. She taught in Baltimore and Washington, D.C., before becoming the literary editor of Crisis magazine, the official publication of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. She is the author of four novels, all primarily concerned with the plight of the African American middle class. The following is the opening section of Plum Bun: A Novel without a Moral (1929).

CHAPTER 1 [BLACK PHILADELPHIA]

Opal Street, as streets go, is no jewel of the first water. It is merely an imitation, and none too good at that. Narrow, unsparkling, uninviting, it stretches meekly off from dull Jefferson Street to the dingy, drab market which forms the north side of Oxford Street. It has no mystery, no allure, either of exclusiveness or of downright depravity; its usages are plainly significant—an unpretentious little street lined with unpretentious little houses, inhabited for the most part by unpretentious little people.

The dwellings are three stories high, and contain six boxes called by courtesy, rooms—a "parlor," a midget of a dining-room, a larger kitchen and, above, a front bedroom seemingly large only because it extends for the full width of the house, a mere shadow of a bathroom, and another back bedroom with windows whose possibilities are spoiled by their outlook on sad and diminutive back-yards. And above these two, still two others built in similar wise.

In one of these houses dwelt a father, a mother and two daughters. Here, as often happens in a home sheltering two generations, opposite, unevenly matched emotions faced each other. In the houses of the rich the satisfied ambition of the older generation is faced by the overwhelming ambition of the younger. Or the elders may find themselves brought in opposition to the blank indifference and ennui of youth engendered by the realization that there remain no more worlds to conquer; their fathers having already taken all. In houses on Opal Street these niceties of distinction are hardly to be found; there is a more direct and concrete contrast. The satisfied ambition of maturity is a foil for the restless despair of youth.

Affairs in the Murray household were advancing towards this stage; yet not a soul in that family of four could have foretold its coming. To Junius and Mattie Murray, who had known poverty and homelessness, the little house on Opal Street represented the ne plus ultra<sup>1</sup> of ambition; to their daughter Angela it seemed the dingiest, drabest chrysalis that had ever fettered the wings of a brilliant butterfly. The stories which Junius and Mattie told of difficulties overcome, of the arduous learning of trades, of the pitiful scraping together of infinitesimal savings, would have made a latter-day Iliad, but to Angela they were merely a description of a life which she at any cost would avoid living. Somewhere in the world were paths which lead to broad thoroughfares, large, bright houses, delicate niceties of existence. Those paths Angela meant to find and frequent. At a very early age she had observed that the good things of life are unevenly distributed; merit is not always rewarded; hard labor does not necessarily entail adequate recompense. Certain fortuitous endowments, great physical beauty, unusual strength, a certain unswerving singleness of mind,—gifts bestowed quite blindly and disproportionately by the forces which control life,—these were the qualities which contributed toward a glowing and pleasant existence.

Angela had no high purpose in life; unlike her sister Virginia, who meant some day to invent a marvelous method for teaching the pianoforte, Angela felt no impulse to discover, or to perfect. True she thought she might become eventually a distinguished painter, but that was because she felt within herself an ability to depict which as far as it went was correct and promising. Her eye for line and for expression was already good and she had a nice feeling for color. Moreover she possessed the instinct for self-appraisal which taught her that she had much to learn. And she was sure that the knowledge once gained would flower in her case to perfection. But her gift was not for her the end of existence; rather it was an adjunct to a life which was to know light, pleasure, gaiety and freedom.

Freedom! That was the note which Angela heard oftenest in the melody of living which was to be hers. With a wildness that fell just short of unreasonableness she hated restraint. Her father's earlier days as coachman in a private family, his later successful, independent years as boss carpenter, her mother's youth spent as maid to a famous actress, all this was to Angela a manifestation of the sort of thing which happens to those enchained it might be by duty, by poverty, by weakness or by color.

Color or rather the lack of it seemed to the child the one absolute prerequisite to the life of which she was always dreaming. One might break loose from a too hampering sense of duty; poverty could be overcome; physicians conquered weakness; but color, the mere possession of a black or a white skin, that was clearly one of those fortuitous endowments of the gods. Gratitude was no strong ingredient in this girl's nature, yet very often early she began thanking Fate for the chance which in that household of four had bestowed on her the heritage of her mother's fair skin. She might so easily have been, like her father, black, or have received the melange which had resulted in Virginia's rosy bronzeness and her deeply waving black hair. But Angela had received not only her mother's creamy complexion and her soft cloudy, chestnut hair, but she had taken from Junius the aquiline nose, the gift of some remote Indian ancestor which gave to his face and his eldest daughter's that touch of chiselled immobility.

Questions

1. What information does Fauset provide to indicate the middle-class status of the family in this novel?
2. Fauset writes: "The satisfied ambition of maturity is a foil for the restless despair of youth" (para. 3). Does she indicate that race exacerbates this conflict or that it is the result of generational gaps exclusively? Explain.
3. Fauset focuses on intracommunity issues related to gradations of skin color, but how does she emphasize the origin of those conflicts in the larger society?
4. As the novel proceeds, Angela becomes estranged from her family as she chooses the material advantages of "passing" as white. What evidence do you have in this short opening excerpt that Fauset recognizes the alienation that results from such a divided self? Consider such passages as: "Color or rather the lack of it seemed to the child the one absolute prerequisite to the life of which she was always dreaming" (para. 7) and "the heritage of her mother's fair skin" (para. 7).
5. An admirer of Fauset, W. E. B. DuBois claimed that "all Art is propaganda and ever must be . . . propaganda for gaining the right of black folk to love and enjoy." In what ways can this work be seen as "propaganda" in the positive sense that DuBois uses it?

Entering the Conversation

As you develop a response to one of the following questions, refer to the texts you have read in this section. You may also draw on your own experience or knowledge relating to the Harlem Renaissance.

1. Write an essay disputing the idea of the Harlem Renaissance as a monolithic movement that reflects a community's shared values and an overarching philosophy. Discuss several different, though not necessarily conflicting, themes or concerns.

2. Discuss at least two conflicting views of the role of the artist in the Harlem Renaissance. Draw on a minimum of three texts as part of your discussion, including at least one of the nonfiction pieces.
3. One way to read this Conversation is as different attitudes toward the kind of change that would lead to racial equality and justice for African Americans. Some of the writers lean toward separatism, others toward assimilation. Discuss which you find the more compelling of those arguments. Refer to at least four texts.
4. In his seminal work The Souls of Black Folk (1903), W. E. B. DuBois used the metaphor of the veil to describe the plight of African Americans during this time.

After the Egyptian and Indian, the Greek and Roman, the Teuton and Mongolian, the Negro is a sort of seventh son, born with a veil, and gifted with second-sight in this American world,—a world which yields him no true self-consciousness, but only lets him see himself through the revelation of the other world. It is a peculiar sensation, this double consciousness, this sense of always looking at one's self through the eyes of others, of measuring one's soul by the tape of a world that looks on in amused contempt and pity. One ever feels his two-ness,—an American, a Negro; two souls, two thoughts, two unreconciled strivings; two warring ideals in one dark body, whose dogged strength alone keeps it from being torn asunder.

Using at least three of the texts in this section, discuss whether you find this metaphor of the veil an outdated or an accurate characterization of the Harlem Renaissance.

5. Alain Locke (1886–1954) published The New Negro, which became the manifesto of the Harlem Renaissance, in 1925. In the introductory essay, he defined “the New Negro” as follows:

He now becomes a conscious contributor and lays aside the status of a beneficiary and ward for that of a collaborator and participant in American civilization. The great social gain in this is the releasing of our talented group from the arid fields of controversy and debate to the productive fields of creative expression. The especially cultural recognition they win should in turn prove the key to that revaluation of the Negro which must precede or accompany any considerable further betterment of race relationships. But whatever the general effect, the present generation will have added the motives of self-expression and spiritual development to the old and still unfinished task of making material headway and progress. No one who understandingly faces the situation with its substantial accomplishment or views the new scene with its still more abundant promise can be entirely without hope. And certainly, if in our lifetime the Negro should not be able to celebrate his full initiation into American democracy, he can at least, on the warrant of these things, celebrate the attainment of a significant and satisfying new phase of group development, and with it a spiritual Coming of Age. (15–16)

Based on the texts in this Conversation and your knowledge of this period and the following decades, explain whether Locke's vision for the African American artist became a reality.

6. Assume the voice of Langston Hughes and explain your opinion of "Spunk" by Hurston, Plum Bun by Fauset, or "The White House" by McKay.
7. Some of the controversies that characterize the Harlem Renaissance continue today. Discuss one controversy from these 1920s texts that still persists—for example, in discussions about the legitimacy of hip-hop and rap as art forms, identity politics as the subject of art, and literature as social protest.

Student Writing

Working with Sources

The student essay by Cynthia Gross was written in response to Entering the Conversation question 4 (p. 1313) from the Conversation on the Harlem Renaissance. Read the essay carefully and then discuss the choices Cynthia has made to craft her essay; use the questions that follow the essay to guide your analysis.

Aspiring to Whiteness: Self-Hatred and the Distortion of the African American Image in the United States

Cynthia Gross

According to W. E. B. DuBois, the African American in the United States is only able to "see himself through the revelation of the other world." And this "peculiar sensation, this double consciousness, this sense of always looking at one's self through the eyes of others" creates an individual who feels obligated to neglect a part of him- or herself in order to be accepted by the popular culture. Although W. E. B. DuBois's pioneering work, The Souls of Black Folk, was written more than a decade before the Harlem Renaissance begins, its interpretation of the condition of the African American in the United States still resonates through the literary art movement that celebrates the spirit, pride, beauty, and positive energy of a minority group that looks optimistically to its future even in its current state of subjection to the mainstream culture.

In his essay, "The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain," Langston Hughes asserts that the dichotomies associated with the colors white and black lead many African Americans to aspire to whiteness: white, black; good, evil; superior, inferior; beautiful, ugly; pure, tainted; standard, anomaly. At the beginning of the essay, the narrator speaks of "one of the most promising of the young Negro poets" who wishes to "write like a white poet" and, by extension, desires to be white. While readers may initially be appalled by such a statement, Hughes develops his argument by explaining that the causes of this self-hatred stem from the structure of social institutions. For instance, children in the “colored middle class” go to “a mixed school” and “read white papers and magazines.” Consequently, even in the home, stereotypes of inherent white goodness and black deficiency are reinforced. Because they are comfortable and consider themselves well off or at least better than most African Americans, the middle and “high-class” African Americans feel that they are too good to associate with the majority of their people. These individuals have adopted the theory that anything closer to white is better. Hughes juxtaposes the uppity African Americans with the “so-called common element,” individuals who continue to embrace their unique identity despite the impending pressure to conform to the white archetype. Therefore, in context, readers begin to view the “young Negro poet” as more of a victim than a perpetrator, who is tangled up in the system “of always looking at [himself] through the eyes of [whites].”

The excerpt of Jessie Redmon Fauset’s Plum Bun: A Novel without a Moral involves the issue of light-skinned African Americans who attempt to pass for white. With her “creamy complexion and her soft cloudy, chestnut hair” and “aquiline nose,” Angela realizes that her near-white physical appearance is the key to “the life of which she was always dreaming.” In fact, she worships her light skin. Her appearance can be used in her community and in the larger society as a strategy to reach her goal in life: to become white. While Angela’s sister, Virginia, has goals and a sense of direction in her life, Angela’s future is ambiguous. Obtaining material possessions, such as “large, bright houses” and “delicate niceties of existence,” is the sole aim of Angela’s existence. She feels that her pale skin automatically places her in a position superior to that of Virginia, who has darker skin, and, sadly, it does. Furthermore, readers can infer that Angela’s father married the lightest woman he could find in order to enhance his middle-class status. However, as W. E. B. DuBois argues, in shaping her appearance, speech, and associations to reflect those of the dominant culture, Angela loses a part of her identity. She succumbs to “measuring [her] soul by the tape of a world that looks on in amused contempt and pity,” not yet realizing that no matter how light her skin is, she can never be white. Although Angela despises her African American heritage and feels that it acts as a “chrysalis” or prison of her desires, she will eventually discover that her aspiration to be white is actually what keeps her in bondage.

Much of the literature of the Harlem Renaissance seems to have a didactic function. W. E. B. DuBois exposes the idea of “double consciousness” not only to inform but to encourage change. For example, in Arna Bontemps’s poem, “Nocturne at Bethesda,” the narrator asks, “Why do we wait / So long upon the marble steps, blood / Falling from our open wounds?” In other words, although the pool of Bethesda, historically symbolic of healing, was once a spot for oppressed and afflicted individuals to gather and pray for deliverance from their sicknesses, the speaker argues that this pool no longer has power. The oppressed people need to take initiative and save themselves instead of waiting for a savior, who the speaker makes clear will not come, to rescue them. The oppressed people at the pool of Bethesda symbolize the situation of African Americans in the United States who are “waiting for the moving of the water,” or racial equality. However, African Americans, forsaken even by the deity, must encourage themselves and rely on their strength to create change for the better. The tone of the poem is reflective. The speaker, presumably an older individual, has waited at the pool for years to no avail. In retrospect, however, the only things important to him or her are recollections of Africa. We see that African Americans who spend their lives trying to transform their image to fit into the color-coded social system discover their later years are filled with regret over the fact that they rejected their identity.

The literature of the Harlem Renaissance illustrates the challenges facing African Americans during that period. We also see, however, that African Americans find strength in adversity by coming together. More than likely, the pool of Bethesda healed so many people because they believed, psychologically, that they would be healed. Then—and now—freedom begins in the mind. Although there is a constant pressure for minorities to conform to the standard image of white America, they must learn to see beauty in themselves. The African American people are Americans, but a distinct category based on their experiences. It will be a glorious day when we African Americans embrace our individuality and no longer strive to be anyone other than who we are.

Questions

1. Reread the texts the student writer has focused on in this essay. Do you agree with her interpretation of each? If not, explain where and why your interpretation differs.
2. This essay was written in response to the quotation by W. E. B. DuBois on page 1313. Reread the opening paragraph of this essay, and discuss how effectively it addresses the prompt.
3. Note the references to DuBois throughout the essay. Does the writer make sufficient links to and explanations of her interpretation of DuBois? Are there too many references? Explain your answers by citing specific passages in the essay.
4. Discuss the choice and use of quotations from the three literary texts by Hughes, Fauset, and Bontemps. Do they illustrate the points the writer is making? Are they clearly explained? Are they smoothly integrated into the essay?
5. This essay is organized text-by-text. That is, the writer addresses the question with a paragraph on Hughes, another on Fauset, and another on Bontemps. Discuss how the essay might be revised by organizing paragraphs by idea or topic rather than by text.
6. The conclusion offers an opinion—a commentary—about the nature of the literary texts and the society they reflect. Is this an effective ending to the essay? If you think it is, explain how the earlier part of the essay prepares for it. If you think it is ineffective, be specific in your explanation of why.

The Writer's Craft—Close Reading

Syntax

Syntax is the way a writer arranges words, phrases, and clauses into a sentence. It seems fitting to discuss syntax in a chapter with a novella by Henry James, since he is a master of complex and lengthy syntactical constructions—often challenging to understand. Yet all writers, including poets, pay attention to syntax as one strategy for developing and conveying meaning.

Syntactical Patterns

Arrangement at the sentence level affects the way a reader or listener experiences the text and usually depends on the context of one sentence among others. Thus, simple, short sentences might create a flippant effect, an emphatic effect, or a sense of urgency; a longer, discursive sentence with interruptions may convey the impression of confusion or contribute to a meditative tone, depending on the overall context and the choices the writer makes in diction and figurative language. “Short” and “long” are two of many ways to discuss syntax and describe sentence patterns, but here we’ll concentrate on a few specific types.

Simple, Declarative Sentences

Normal word order—subject/verb/object—in a relatively short declarative sentence usually makes a straightforward statement. In “Everyday Use,” Walker gives us Mama’s self-description:

In real life I am a large, big-boned woman with rough, man-working hands. In the winter I wear flannel nightgowns to bed and overalls during the day. I can kill and clean a hog as mercilessly as a man. My fat keeps me hot in zero weather. I can work outside all day. (para. 5)

Although these sentences include descriptors, the basic structure is “I am . . . I wear . . . I can kill . . . My fat keeps . . . I can work . . .”: subject/verb/object (SVO) constructions in declarative statements. The effect is to characterize Mama as a plain-spoken, unassuming woman with no frills and no pretense in the way she sees and acts in the world. What she says in that passage certainly makes that clear, but how she says it is as important as what she says.

Inverted Sentences

When a writer reverses the normal position of subject and verb (or predicate) in a declarative sentence, he or she is calling attention to something—perhaps emphasizing a point or an idea by placing it in the initial position—or slowing the pace by choosing an unusual order. In “The Free Radio,” Salman Rushdie uses inversion in the first two clauses of the following sentence:

So: looks he had, his own trade he had, there would have been a good wife in time. (para. 2)

If we put the first two clauses in standard SVO order, listen to the difference in what is emphasized:

So: he had looks, he had his own trade, there would have been a good wife in time.

In these two sentences, the same information is conveyed, yet the emphasis on his “looks” and “his own trade” in the inverted version is lost to the repetition of “he had . . . he had . . .” in the standard version.

Compound-Complex Sentences

A compound sentence contains two independent clauses joined by a coordinating conjunction (such as and, but, for, yet, or so) or a semicolon. A complex sentence contains an independent clause and one or more subordinate clauses (which begin with words such as after, before, although, because, until, when, while, and if). A compound-complex sentence combines the two and is usually fairly long. Note the two compound-complex sentences in the following passage from “The Free Radio”:

They flattered him with dreams because they knew they could take money from him at cards and he would buy them drink while they did it, though he was no richer than they. So now Ramani’s head became filled with these movie dreams, because there was nothing else inside to take up any space, and this is another reason why I blame the widow woman, because she had more years and should have had more sense. (para. 18)

Both of these sentences are compound-complex. They include subordinate clauses (starting with “because,” “while,” and “though”), but each is a compound sentence linked with the coordinating conjunction “and.” This construction reveals something about the narrator. The subordinate clauses are almost all explanatory: notice the repetition of “because.” The narrator seems to have all of the answers, or he certainly thinks he does. The sentences also accumulate by connecting with “and,” and even the second sentence seems to be an extension of the first because it begins with “So.” This rambling syntax gives us a sense that the narrator is somebody who is into everyone’s business at once: the card players, Ramani, and the widow woman. Everyone is fair game for judgment and gossip.

Cumulative and Periodic Sentences

A periodic sentence begins with a series of phrases or even clauses, and culminates in an independent clause. Cumulative sentences are the opposite: they begin with the main point and then add modifications, qualifications, and details. In this same story, Rushdie creates an unusually long cumulative sentence in his description of Ramani’s situation:

But when I saw him now, there was a new thing in his face, a strained thing, as if he were having to make a phenomenal effort, which was much more tiring than driving a rickshaw, more tiring even than pulling a rickshaw containing a thief’s widow and her five living children and the ghosts of two dead ones; as if all the energy of his young body was being poured into that fictional space between his ear and his hand, and he was trying to bring the radio into existence by a mighty, and possibly fatal, act of will. (para. 43)

The main clause is “there was a new thing in his face”; everything that follows describes what that “new thing” is. In fact, the form of the sentence underscores its content because the long accumulation of detail helps readers feel the “phenomenal effort” being described.

Let's take a look at a periodic sentence in Henry James's Daisy Miller:

As the day was splendid, however, and the concourse of vehicles, walkers, and loungers numerous, the young Americans found their progress much delayed. (para. 329)

Here James uses a periodic sentence to mimic the scene he's describing. Just as the characters are delayed by the splendid day, we as readers are delayed in getting to the final clause—which cleverly ends with the word “delayed”—by the various phrases used to describe that splendid day.

Interrupted Sentences

Any of these sentence patterns can be modified by “interruptions” that add descriptive details, state conditions, suggest uncertainty, voice possible alternative views, or present qualifications. Such sentences, quite characteristic of the style of Henry James and other pre-twentieth-century writers, often employ a combination of sentence patterns that may be difficult to understand the first time you read them. If you get tripped up, try reading the sentences aloud. You may notice that they sound more natural than they look on the page. Let's examine a sentence from Daisy Miller that demonstrates James's trademark tangent-filled “self-interrupted” syntax:

At the risk of exciting a somewhat derisive smile on the reader's part, I may affirm that with regard to the women who had hitherto interested him, it very often seemed to Winterbourne among the possibilities that, given certain contingencies, he should be afraid—literally afraid—of these ladies; he had a pleasant sense that he should never be afraid of Daisy Miller. (para. 435)

The basic idea of the sentence is that Winterbourne sometimes finds women frightening, though he's not afraid of Daisy. But look at all the nuance the complicated sentence provides. In the opening clause, the narrator makes a tentative connection with the reader by asking his or her indulgence in his speculations. Next, the narrator offers one condition or qualification after another: he “may affirm,” it “often seemed,” “among the possibilities,” and “certain contingencies.” The narrator avoids mentioning any of those “women who had hitherto interested him” by name. Together, these qualifications are the written equivalent of stammering, which corresponds to the subject of the passage: Winterbourne's anxiety around women. The narrator waits until the end of the second independent clause, after he has admitted to fearing women, to mention Daisy Miller, the novella's title character. The second independent clause is much more straightforward than the first one and thus emphasizes the relaxation of the tension expressed in the first more complicated clause, which is filled with interruptions and qualifications of thought and feeling. Anxiety has given way to ease, and the syntax reflects that change.

Syntax in Poetry

Most poems are not written as a series of sentences arranged into paragraphs, and some poems are not written in full sentences at all. Nonetheless, examining the syntax of a poem that can be divided into sentences not only helps with comprehension but leads to a deeper understanding of meaning and purpose. Let's look at the first section of "The Second Coming" by William Butler Yeats as an example.

Turning and turning in the widening gyre
 The falcon cannot hear the falconer;
 Things fall apart; the center cannot hold;
 Mere anarchy is loosed upon the world,
 The blood-dimmed tide is loosed, and everywhere      5
 The ceremony of innocence is drowned;
 The best lack all conviction, while the worst
 Are full of passionate intensity.

Technically, these eight lines comprise one long sentence made up of a series of independent clauses. But let's look at the patterns within this sentence. The opening two lines act like a periodic sentence, with line 2 serving as the main clause. Line 3 consists of two short, simple declarative clauses, whose abruptness makes them sound like forceful statements of fact. Lines 4–6 are a series of independent clauses joined by a coordinating conjunction, so they flow together as the urgency mounts. Lines 7 and 8 make up a complex sentence that contrasts "The best" and "the worst." The compound construction and complex one in lines 4–8 have a cumulative effect as they build a description of the result of "anarchy" being "loosed": a series of impending catastrophes that together create an apocalyptic vision. This single eight-line sentence builds up to this vision, which leads to the next two lines: "Surely some revelation is at hand; / Surely the Second Coming is at hand."

Enjambment and Caesura

Poets often manipulate syntax through enjambment and caesura. Enjambment is the breaking of a syntactic unit by the end of a line or between two lines; caesura denotes a pause that breaks up a line, usually indicated by punctuation marks. Sometimes poets use these techniques for practical reasons, such as adhering to a rhyme scheme; sometimes they use them to create interesting sounds or rhythms, by controlling when the reader pauses; and sometimes they use them to emphasize a word or create an effect that echoes the meaning of a line. Let's consider the opening stanza of "God's Grandeur" by Gerard Manley Hopkins:

The world is charged with the grandeur of God.
     It will flame out, like shining from shook foil;
     It gathers to a greatness, like the ooze of oil
 Crushed. Why do men then now not reck his rod?

Generations have trod, have trod, have trod;
 And all is seared with trade; bleared, smeared with toil;
 And wears man's smudge and shares man's smell: the soil
 Is bare now, nor can foot feel, being shod.

In the opening stanza, there are two instances of enjambment: lines 3–4 and lines 7–8. In the first, Hopkins puts the strong final verb (“Crushed”) not only at the end of the sentence, altering the standard word order, but also on the next line. Both of these decisions emphasize the word and produce a contrast between the vowel-rich liquid sounds of “ooze of oil” and the finality of “Crushed.” In the second example, the enjambment ensures the rhyme scheme of the two quatrains—abba / abba—but it also separates the subject (“soil”) from its predicate (“Is bare”), emphasizing the bareness by isolating it and mimicking the disconnect between how nature should be and how it is.

In line 3, the caesura produced by the comma after “gathers to a greatness” stops the poem briefly, as though the line itself had built to its climax. In line 5, the commas after “trod” combine with the repetition of “have trod” to mimic the sound of clomping footsteps. Finally, in line 7, the colon is employed to introduce the final point in the quatrain. Avoiding a break in the line after the colon (which would also interrupt the rhyme scheme), the caesura denotes a deliberate pause and links “man’s smell” and “the soil.”

• EXERCISE 1 •

Identify the syntactic pattern in each of the following sentences.

1. “Out came Wangero with two quilts.” (“Everyday Use,” para. 55)
2. “Her mother was a small, spare, light person, with a wandering eye, a very exiguous nose, and a large forehead, decorated with a certain amount of thin, much-frizzled hair.” (Daisy Miller, para. 160)
3. “Ringing his bicycle-bell and imitating weather forecasts, ear cupped as usual, he arrived at the caravan.” (“The Free Radio,” para. 47)
4. “There had not been the slightest alteration in her charming complexion; she was evidently neither offended nor flattered.” (Daisy Miller, para. 44)
5. “The car continued to come on slowly, disappeared around a bend and appeared again, moving even slower, on top of the hill they had gone over.” (“A Good Man Is Hard to Find,” para. 70)
6. Not like the white filmstars, all rib
 and gaunt cheekbone, the Indian sex-goddess smiles plumply from behind a flowery branch.
 (“Indian Movie, New Jersey,” ll. 1–4)
7. “One could actually see the pain he was suffering, his eyes, his face, his hands, and even the dejected slump of his shoulders.” (“Spunk,” para. 13)

8. “Now she could not refuse because I am not without importance in the town and maybe she calculated that if people saw us talking they would stop ignoring her when she passed, so she came as I knew she would.” (“The Free Radio,” para. 23)
9. “Daisy tripped about the vaulted chambers, rustled her skirts in the corkscrew staircases, flirted back with a pretty little cry and a shudder from the edge of the oubliettes, and turned a singularly well-shaped ear to everything that Winterbourne told her about the place.” (Daisy Miller, para. 247)
10. “This hopefulness and didacticism he had picked up from his mother.” (“Fenstad’s Mother,” para. 16)
11. I see him there
Bringing a stone grasped firmly by the top
In each hand, like an old-stone savage armed.
 (“Mending Wall,” ll. 38–40)

• EXERCISE 2 •

Although syntactical patterns contribute to a writer’s style, most authors strive for variety. Using the following passage from “Fenstad’s Mother,” discuss how Charles Baxter varies syntax effectively both to stress points of emphasis and to ensure fluency.

On Sunday morning after Communion Fenstad drove across town to visit his mother. Behind the wheel, he exhaled with his hand flat in front of his mouth to determine if the wine on his breath could be detected. He didn’t think so. Fenstad’s mother was a lifelong social progressive who was amused by her son’s churchgoing, and, wine or no wine, she could guess where he had been. She had spent her life in the company of rebels and deviationists, and she recognized all their styles. (para. 1)

• EXERCISE 3 •

Explain how Henry James’s syntactical patterns contribute to the effect of the following prose passage from Daisy Miller.

She had been walking some quarter of an hour, attended by her two cavaliers, and responding in a tone of very childish gaiety, as it seemed to Winterbourne, to the pretty speeches of Mr. Giovanelli, when a carriage that had detached itself from the revolving train drew up beside the path. At the same moment Winterbourne perceived that his friend Mrs. Walker—the lady whose house he had lately left—was seated in the vehicle and was beckoning to him. Leaving Miss Miller’s side, he hastened to obey her summons. Mrs. Walker was flushed; she wore an excited air. “It is really too dreadful,” she said. (para. 350)

• EXERCISE 4 •

Discuss how the syntax of “Forty Acres” (p. 1287) contributes to the meaning of the poem. Pay attention to Walcott’s use of enjambment and caesura in the two complete sentences that make up the poem.

• EXERCISE 5 •

Choose a poem from this chapter and rewrite it as prose (without eliminating any of the words). Compare your “revision” with the original poem, analyzing how the poet’s syntactical choices contribute to the overall meaning.

• EXERCISE 6 •

Write a brief narrative in the style of Henry James that uses an event from your life as inspiration. Pay special attention to emulating James’s syntax.

Suggestions for Writing

Tradition and Progress

1. This chapter begins with a quote from Nathaniel Hawthorne. Using the works in this chapter to support your position, write an essay in which you agree or disagree with Hawthorne that the drive toward progress is made by those who are “ill at ease,” while those who are happy embrace tradition.
2. The natural world provides the background for several of the works in this chapter. Write an essay in which you explore the way writers use the natural world to comment on tradition and progress.
3. Choose two poems from this chapter, one that criticizes progress and another that celebrates it. Write an essay in which you analyze the contrasting attitudes toward the subject. Include your own personal commentary on which view comes closer to your own.
4. Choose one of the following statements, and explain why it fits your beliefs about tradition and progress.

“Tradition is the illusion of permanence.”—Woody Allen

“Discontent is the first step in the progress of a man or a nation.”—Oscar Wilde

“A tradition without intelligence is not worth having.”—T. S. Eliot “Science and technology revolutionize our lives, but memory, tradition and myth frame our response.” —Arthur Schlesinger Jr.

“Tradition is a guide and not a jailer.” —W. Somerset Maugham

5. In many of the short stories in this chapter, the primary conflict is between generations. Write an essay in which you analyze the generational clash in two or three of the stories.
6. Some of the poetry in this chapter—“London,” “The Second Coming,” and “Dover Beach,” for example—are rather dark indictments of society and politics. Write an essay in which you examine the poets’ positions and evaluate their arguments in light of today’s world.
7. Literary movements, such as the Harlem Renaissance, often arise as the result of tension between traditional forms and the need to create new ones. Research another literary movement—the Beats or the Romantics, for example—and write an essay about the forces that encouraged the artists of that movement to create something different from what came before.
8. The plots of both Daisy Miller and “A Good Man Is Hard to Find” involve travel. Consider both stories, along with other works you’ve read, and write an essay in which you analyze the role of travel. Be sure to address the reasons you think the subject lends itself to a study of human behavior.
9. Many of the works in this chapter concern a clash between cultures. Try writing your own story about a culture clash. You might use your family background or the diversity in your home or community as a starting point.

War and Peace

Do dreams offer lessons? Do nightmares have themes, do we awaken and analyze them and live our lives and advise others as a result? Can the foot soldier teach anything important about war, merely for having been there? I think not. He can tell war stories.

— TIM O'BRIEN, If I Die in a Combat Zone

It is often said that there has never been a time in human history when there wasn't a war being waged somewhere in the world. That certainly casts a grim shadow on human history. We do not award a Nobel War Prize, yet the world seems always to have looked to warriors for its heroes. We might ask, What is it in human nature that is satisfied by what war provides—not only to the warrior but to the citizens who send the warrior to fight? If war is as horrific as reported by the warrior and as deplorable as depicted in literature, why do we continue to look to warriors as our heroes?

We prize peace, but find glory in war; we detest war, but find peace fragile, fleeting, and sometimes restive. This paradox has been a major subject of serious literature since the Iliad and the Odyssey, which tell the stories of the warrior fighting in battle and the warrior returning home, respectively. It may be simplistic to suggest, as some have, that those are the two basic stories we have to tell, but considering examples from the Iliad to Star Wars, from The Things They Carried to Saving Private Ryan, we have to acknowledge the hold these stories have on our imaginations.

In this chapter, you will read classic war stories and poems from Homer and Shakespeare as well as those inspired by Wilfred Owen's experience in World War I and Tim O'Brien's in Vietnam. You will read an ancient postwar story by Sophocles in addition to more modern ones: Herman Melville responding to the U.S. Civil War, and Bharati Mukherjee and Wislawa Szymborska to contemporary terrorism. You will read stories and poems not directly about war itself but about its motivations and repercussions and consequences—those by Luigi Pirandello, Cynthia Ozick, and Randall Jarrell regarding World War II; Robert Southey's look back on the sad wastefulness of war; and William Shakespeare's look ahead to its glories. Finally, you will read selections that consider war's aftermath and the attempt to establish peace. Throughout the chapter, you will view both war and peace from a variety of perspectives: that of the warrior and the witness, the poet and the citizen, the sufferer and the survivor. Reading these selections should cause you to reflect on the nature of conflict itself, on the nature of heroism, on the role of the citizen during wartime, and on the ongoing conflict between war and peace. Of course, reading about war will not prevent future wars; however, the vicarious immersion in experience that literature provides may increase our understanding of the nature of armed conflict, stretching from Athens to Antietam, on the sanguinary trail from the fortresses at Troy to the mountains of Afghanistan, and on urban streets from Berlin and Belfast to Baghdad and Beirut.

Antigone

SOPHOCLES

TRANSLATED BY ROBERT FAGLES

The Greek dramatist Sophocles (496?–406 B.C.E.) lived in Athens, where he was a priest, a statesman, and a general, as well as a prize-winning playwright. Sophocles fought in the Persian wars and lived in what we refer to as the Golden Age, when architecture, philosophy, art, history, and especially drama flourished. Among the three major dramatists of the time (the other two being Euripides and Aeschylus), Sophocles is generally considered the superior artist. In the Athenian drama competition of 468 B.C.E., he defeated Aeschylus, famous for the Oresteia—a trilogy of plays about King Agamemnon, Clytemnestra, and Orestes. Of over 120 plays that Sophocles is thought to have written, only seven are extant. Among them are the three that constitute the Oedipus cycle: Oedipus the King, Oedipus at Colonus, and Antigone. While the action portrayed in Antigone follows that of the other two chronologically, it was written first. Many of Sophocles' plays present a protagonist's search for truth and self-understanding in relation to the existing social and moral order, as demonstrated here in Antigone. At the beginning of the play, the audience would know that after the death of Oedipus—the former king of Thebes, whose tragic fate is told in the other plays—his sons, Eteocles and Polynices, agree to take turns ruling Thebes. When Eteocles refuses to yield his turn, Polynices is banished to Argos, where he raises armies to attack the city of Thebes and regain the throne.

GUARDS, ATTENDANTS, AND A BOY

TIME AND SCENE: The royal house of Thebes. It is still night, and the invading armies of Argos have just been driven from the city. Fighting on opposite sides, the sons of Oedipus, Eteocles and Polynices, have killed each other in combat. Their uncle, Creon, is now king of Thebes.

Enter Antigone, slipping through the central doors of the palace. She motions to her sister, Ismene, who follows her cautiously toward an altar at the center of the stage.

ANTIGONE: My own flesh and blood—dear sister, dear Ismene, how many griefs our father Oedipus handed down!

Do you know one, I ask you, one grief that Zeus will not perfect for the two of us while we still live and breathe? There's nothing,

5

no pain—our lives are pain—no private shame,

no public disgrace, nothing I haven't seen in your griefs and mine. And now this:

an emergency decree, they say, the Commander has just declared for all of Thebes.

10

What, haven't you heard? Don't you see?

The doom reserved for enemies marches on the ones we love the most.

ISMENE: Not I, I haven't heard a word, Antigone.

Nothing of loved ones,

15

no joy or pain has come my way, not since the two of us were robbed of our two brothers, both gone in a day, a double blow—

not since the armies of Argos vanished, just this very night. I know nothing more, whether our luck's improved or ruin's still to come.

20

ANTIGONE: I thought so. That's why I brought you out here, past the gates, so you could hear in private.

ISMENE: What's the matter? Trouble, clearly . . .

you sound so dark, so grim.

25

ANTIGONE: Why not? Our own brothers' burial!

Hasn't Creon graced one with all the rites, disgraced the other? Eteocles, they say, has been given full military honors,

rightly so—Creon's laid him in the earth

30 and he goes with glory down among the dead.

But the body of Polynices, who died miserably—

why, a city-wide proclamation, rumor has it, forbids anyone to bury him, even mourn him.

He's to be left unwept, unburied, a lovely treasure for birds that scan the field and feast to their heart's content.

35

Such, I hear, is the martial law our good Creon lays down for you and me—yes, me, I tell you—and he's coming here to alert the uninformed in no uncertain terms,

40 and he won't treat the matter lightly. Whoever disobeys in the least will die, his doom is sealed:

stoning to death inside the city walls!

There you have it. You'll soon show what you are, worth your breeding, Ismene, or a coward —
 for all your royal blood.

45

ISMENE: My poor sister, if things have come to this,
 who am I to make or mend them, tell me, what good am I to you?

ANTIGONE: Decide.

Will you share the labor, share the work?

50

ISMENE: What work, what's the risk? What do you mean?

ANTIGONE:

Raising her hands.

Will you lift up his body with these bare hands and lower it with me?

ISMENE: What? You'd bury him — when a law forbids the city?

ANTIGONE: Yes!

He is my brother and — deny it as you will — your brother too.

55

No one will ever convict me for a traitor.

ISMENE: So desperate, and Creon has expressly —

ANTIGONE: No,
 he has no right to keep me from my own.

ISMENE: Oh my sister, think — 60 think how our own father died, hated, his reputation in ruins, driven on by the crimes he brought to light himself to gouge out his eyes with his own hands — then mother . . . his mother and wife, both in one, mutilating her life in the twisted noose — and last, our two brothers dead in a single day, both shedding their own blood, poor suffering boys,

 battling out their common destiny hand-to-hand.

65

Now look at the two of us, left so alone . . .

70 think what a death we'll die, the worst of all if we violate the laws and override the fixed decree of the throne, its power —

we must be sensible. Remember we are women, we're not born to contend with men. Then too,

75

we're underlings, ruled by much stronger hands, so we must submit in this, and things still worse.

I, for one, I'll beg the dead to forgive me —

I'm forced, I have no choice — I must obey the ones who stand in power. Why rush to extremes? 80

It's madness, madness.

ANTIGONE: I won't insist,
no, even if you should have a change of heart,
I'd never welcome you in the labor, not with me.
So, do as you like, whatever suits you best —
I'll bury him myself. 85
And even if I die in the act, that death will be a glory.
I'll lie with the one I love and loved by him — an outrage sacred to the gods! I have longer to please the dead than please the living here:
in the kingdom down below I'll lie forever. 90
Do as you like, dishonor the laws
the gods hold in honor.

ISMENE: I'd do them no dishonor . . .
but defy the city? I have no strength for that.

ANTIGONE: You have your excuses. I am on my way,
I'll raise a mound for him, for my dear brother. 95

ISMENE: Oh Antigone, you're so rash—I'm so afraid for you!

ANTIGONE: Don't fear for me. Set your own life in order.

ISMENE: Then don't, at least, blurt this out to anyone.

Keep it a secret. I'll join you in that, I promise.

ANTIGONE: Dear god, shout it from the rooftops. I'll hate you all the more for silence—tell the world! 100

ISMENE: So fiery—and it ought to chill your heart.

ANTIGONE: I know I please where I must please the most.

ISMENE: Yes, if you can, but you're in love with impossibility.

ANTIGONE: Very well then, once my strength gives out
I will be done at last. 105

ISMENE: You're wrong from the start, you're off on a hopeless quest.

ANTIGONE: If you say so, you will make me hate you,
and the hatred of the dead, by all rights,
will haunt you night and day. 110
But leave me to my own absurdity, leave me to suffer this—dreadful thing. I'll suffer nothing as great as death without glory.

Exit to the side.

ISMENE: Then go if you must, but rest assured, wild, irrational as you are, my sister, 115
you are truly dear to the ones who love you.

Withdrawing to the palace. Enter a CHORUS, the old citizens of Thebes, chanting as the sun begins to rise.

- CHORUS: Glory!—great beam of sun, brightest of all that ever rose on the seven gates of Thebes, you burn through night at last!
         Great eye of the golden day, 120 mounting the Dirce's<sup>1</sup> banks you throw him back—the enemy out of Argos, the white shield, the man of bronze—he's flying headlong now
     the bridle of fate stampeding him with pain!
- And he had driven against our borders, 125 launched by the warring claims of Polynices—like an eagle screaming, winging havoc over the land, wings of armor shielded white as snow,
 a huge army massing, 130
 crested helmets bristling for assault.
- He hovered above our roofs, his vast maw gaping closing down around our seven gates, his spears thirsting for the kill but now he's gone, look, 135 before he could glut his jaws with Theban blood or the god of fire put our crown of towers to the torch.
 He grappled the Dragon none can master—Thebes—
     the clang of our arms like thunder at his back!
- Zeus hates with a vengeance all bravado, 140
 the mighty boasts of men. He watched them coming on in a rising flood, the pride of their golden armor ringing shrill—and brandishing his lightning blasted the fighter just at the goal, 145 rushing to shout his triumph from our walls.
- Down from the heights he crashed, pounding down on the earth!
 And a moment ago, blazing torch in hand—mad for attack, ecstatic
 he breathed his rage, the storm 150 of his fury hurling at our heads!
 But now his high hopes have laid him low and down the enemy ranks the iron god of war deals his rewards, his stunning blows—Ares<sup>2</sup> rapture of battle, our right arm in the crisis. 155

Seven captains marshaled at seven gates seven against their equals, gave their brazen trophies up to Zeus, god of the breaking rout of battle,
all but two: those blood brothers, 160
one father, one mother—matched in rage, spears matched for the twin conquest—clashed and won the common prize of death.

But now for Victory! Glorious in the morning, joy in her eyes to meet our joy 165
she is winging down to Thebes, our fleets of chariots wheeling in her wake—
Now let us win oblivion from the wars, thronging the temples of the gods in singing, dancing choirs through the night! 170
Lord Dionysus,<sup>3</sup> god of the dance that shakes the land of Thebes, now lead the way!

Enter CREON from the palace, attended by his guard.

But look, the king of the realm is coming,
Creon, the new man for the new day, whatever the gods are sending now . . . 175
what new plan will he launch?
Why this, this special session?
Why this sudden call to the old men summoned at one command?

CREON: My countrymen,
the ship of state is safe. The gods who rocked her, 180 after a long, merciless pounding in the storm, have righted her once more.

Out of the whole city
I have called you here alone. Well I know, first, your undeviating respect for the throne and royal power of King Laius. 185
Next, while Oedipus steered the land of Thebes, and even after he died, your loyalty was unshakable, you still stood by their children. Now then, since the two sons are dead—two blows of fate in the same day, cut down by each other's hands, 190 both killers, both brothers stained with blood—
as I am next in kin to the dead,
I now possess the throne and all its powers.

Of course you cannot know a man completely, his character, his principles, sense of judgment, 195 not till he's shown his colors, ruling the people, making laws. Experience, there's the test.

As I see it, whoever assumes the task,
 the awesome task of setting the city's course, and refuses to adopt the soundest policies 200
 but fearing someone, keeps his lips locked tight, he's utterly worthless. So I rate him now,

I always have. And whoever places a friend above the good of his own country, he is nothing:
 I have no use for him. Zeus my witness, 205
 Zeus who sees all things, always—

I could never stand by silent, watching destruction march against our city, putting safety to rout, nor could I ever make that man a friend of mine who menaces our country. Remember this: 210 our country is our safety.

Only while she voyages true on course can we establish friendships, truer than blood itself.
 Such are my standards. They make our city great.

Closely akin to them I have proclaimed, 215 just now, the following decree to our people concerning the two sons of Oedipus.
 Eteocles, who died fighting for Thebes, excelling all in arms: he shall be buried, crowned with a hero's honors, the cups we pour 220 to soak the earth and reach the famous dead.

But as for his blood brother, Polynices, who returned from exile, home to his father-city and the gods of his race, consumed with one desire—to burn them roof to roots—who thirsted to drink 225 his kinsmen's blood and sell the rest to slavery:
 that man—a proclamation has forbidden the city to dignify him with burial, mourn him at all.
 No, he must be left unburied, his corpse carrion for the birds and dogs to tear, 230 an obscenity for the citizens to behold!

These are my principles. Never at my hands will the traitor be honored above the patriot.
 But whoever proves his loyalty to the state:
 I'll prize that man in death as well as life. 235

LEADER: If this is your pleasure, Creon, treating our city's enemy and our friend this way . . .

The power is yours, I suppose, to enforce it with the laws, both for the dead and all of us, the living.

CREON: Follow my orders closely then,
be on your guard.

LEADER: We're too old.
Lay that burden on younger shoulders.

CREON: No, no,
I don't mean the body—I've posted guards already.

LEADER: What commands for us then? What other service?

CREON: See that you never side with those who break my orders.

LEADER: Never. Only a fool could be in love with death.

CREON: Death is the price—you're right. But all too often the mere hope of money has ruined many men.

A SENTRY enters from the side.

SENTRY: My lord,

I can't say I'm winded from running, or set out with any spring in my legs either—no sir,
I was lost in thought, and it made me stop, often,
dead in my tracks, wheeling, turning back,
and all the time a voice inside me muttering, “Idiot, why? You're going straight to your death.”
Then muttering, “Stopped again, poor fool?”
If somebody gets the news to Creon first, what's to save your neck?”

And so,
mulling it over, on I trudged, dragging my feet,
you can make a short road take forever . . .
but at last, look, common sense won out,
I'm here, and I'm all yours,
and even though I come empty-handed I'll tell my story just the same, because I've come with a good grip on one hope, what will come will come, whatever fate—

CREON: Come to the point!

What's wrong—why so afraid?

SENTRY: First, myself, I've got to tell you,
I didn't do it, didn't see who did—
Be fair, don't take it out on me.

CREON: You're playing it safe, soldier, barricading yourself from any trouble.

It's obvious, you've something strange to tell.

SENTRY: Dangerous too, and danger makes you delay for all you're worth.

240

245

250

255

260

265

270

275

CREON: Out with it — then dismiss!

SENTRY: All right, here it comes. The body — someone's just buried it, then run off . . .
 sprinkled some dry dust on the flesh,
 given it proper rites.

CREON: What?

280

What man alive would dare —

SENTRY: I've no idea, I swear it.

There was no mark of a spade, no pickaxe there,
 no earth turned up, the ground packed hard and dry,
 unbroken, no tracks, no wheelruts, nothing,
 the workman left no trace. Just at sunup the first watch of the day points it out — it was a wonder! We were stunned . . .

285

a terrific burden too, for all of us, listen:
 you can't see the corpse, not that it's buried, really, just a light cover of road-dust on it,
 as if someone meant to lay the dead to rest and keep from getting cursed.

290

Not a sign in sight that dogs or wild beasts had worried the body, even torn the skin.

But what came next! Rough talk flew thick and fast, guard grilling guard — we'd have come to blows at last, nothing to stop it; each man for himself and each the culprit, no one caught red-handed,
 all of us pleading ignorance, dodging the charges,
 ready to take up red-hot iron in our fists, go through fire, swear oaths to the gods —
 "I didn't do it, I had no hand in it either, not in the plotting, not in the work itself!"

295

300

Finally, after all this wrangling came to nothing, one man spoke out and made us stare at the ground, hanging our heads in fear. No way to counter him, no way to take his advice and come through safe and sound. Here's what he said:

305

"Look, we've got to report the facts to Creon, we can't keep this hidden." Well, that won out, and the lot fell on me, condemned me, unlucky as ever, I got the prize. So here I am, against my will and yours too, well I know —
 no one wants the man who brings bad news.

310

LEADER: My king,

ever since he began I've been debating in my mind,
 could this possibly be the work of the gods?

315

CREON:

Stop—

before you make me choke with anger—the gods!

You, you're senile, must you be insane?

You say—why it's intolerable—say the gods could have the slightest concern for that corpse?

320

Tell me, was it for meritorious service they proceeded to bury him, prized him so? The hero who came to burn their temples ringed with pillars, their golden treasures—scorch their hallowed earth and fling their laws to the winds.

325

Exactly when did you last see the gods celebrating traitors? Inconceivable!

No, from the first there were certain citizens who could hardly stand the spirit of my regime, grumbling against me in the dark, heads together,

330

tossing wildly, never keeping their necks beneath the yoke, loyally submitting to their king.

These are the instigators, I'm convinced—they've perverted my own guard, bribed them to do their work.

Money! Nothing worse

335 in our lives, so current, rampant, so corrupting.

Money—you demolish cities, root men from their homes,

you train and twist good minds and set them on to the most atrocious schemes. No limit, you make them adept at every kind of outrage,

340

every godless crime—money!

Everyone—

the whole crew bribed to commit this crime, they've made one thing sure at least:

sooner or later they will pay the price.

Wheeling on the SENTRY.

You—

345

I swear to Zeus as I still believe in Zeus,

if you don't find the man who buried that corpse,

the very man, and produce him before my eyes, simple death won't be enough for you,

not till we string you up alive

350 and wring the immorality out of you.

Then you can steal the rest of your days, better informed about where to make a killing.

You'll have learned, at last, it doesn't pay to itch for rewards from every hand that beckons.

355

Filthy profits wreck most men, you'll see—they'll never save your life.

SENTRY: Please,
may I say a word or two, or just turn and go?

CREON: Can't you tell? Everything you say offends me.

SENTRY: Where does it hurt you, in the ears or in the heart? 360

CREON: And who are you to pinpoint my displeasure?

SENTRY: The culprit grates on your feelings,
I just annoy your ears.

CREON: Still talking?
You talk too much! A born nuisance—

SENTRY: Maybe so,
but I never did this thing, so help me!

CREON: Yes you did— 365
what's more, you squandered your life for silver!

SENTRY: Oh it's terrible when the one who does the judging judges things all wrong.

CREON: Well now,
you just be clever about your judgments—
if you fail to produce the criminals for me, 370 you'll swear your dirty money brought you pain.

Turning sharply, reentering the palace.

SENTRY: I hope he's found. Best thing by far.
But caught or not, that's in the lap of fortune;
I'll never come back, you've seen the last of me.
I'm saved, even now, and I never thought, 375
I never hoped—
dear gods, I owe you all my thanks!

Rushing out.

CHORUS: Numberless wonders terrible wonders walk the world but none the match for man—that great wonder crossing the heaving gray sea, driven on by the blasts of winter 380 on through breakers crashing left and right, holds his steady course and the oldest of the gods he wears away—
the Earth, the immortal, the inexhaustible—as his plows go back and forth, year in, year out 385 with the breed of stallions turning up the furrows.

And the blithe, lightheaded race of birds he snares, the tribes of savage beasts, the life that swarms the depths—with one fling of his nets woven and coiled tight, he takes them all, 390 man the skilled, the brilliant!

He conquers all, taming with his techniques
 the prey that roams the cliffs and wild lairs, training the stallion, clamping the yoke across his shaggy neck, and the tireless mountain bull. 395

And speech and thought, quick as the wind and the mood and mind for law that rules the city—all these he has taught himself and shelter from the arrows of the frost when there's rough lodging under the cold clear sky 400 and the shafts of lashing rain—ready, resourceful man!

    Never without resources never an impasse as he marches on the future—only Death, from Death alone he will find no rescue 405 but from desperate plagues he has plotted his escapes.

Man the master, ingenious past all measure past all dreams, the skills within his grasp—he forges on, now to destruction now again to greatness. When he weaves in 410 the laws of the land, and the justice of the gods that binds his oaths together he and his city rise high—

    but the city casts out that man who weds himself to inhumanity 415 thanks to reckless daring. Never share my hearth never think my thoughts, whoever does such things.

Enter ANTIGONE from the side, accompanied by the SENTRY.

Here is a dark sign from the gods—what to make of this? I know her, how can I deny it? That young girl's Antigone! 420
 Wretched, child of a wretched father,
 Oedipus. Look, is it possible?
 They bring you in like a prisoner—why? did you break the king's laws?
 Did they take you in some act of mad defiance? 425

SENTRY: She's the one, she did it single-handed—we caught her burying the body. Where's Creon?

Enter CREON from the palace.

LEADER: Back again, just in time when you need him.

CREON: In time for what? What is it?

SENTRY: My king,
 there's nothing you can swear you'll never do — 430
 second thoughts make liars of us all.
 I could have sworn I wouldn't hurry back (what with your threats, the buffeting I just took), but a stroke of luck beyond our wildest hopes,
 what a joy, there's nothing like it. So, 435 back I've come, breaking my oath, who cares?
 I'm bringing in our prisoner — this young girl —
 we took her giving the dead the last rites.
 But no casting lots this time; this is my luck,
 my prize, no one else's.

Now, my lord, 440
 here she is. Take her, question her, cross-examine her to your heart's content.
 But set me free, it's only right —
 I'm rid of this dreadful business once for all.

CREON: Prisoner! Her? You took her — where, doing what? 445
 SENTRY: Burying the man. That's the whole story.

CREON: What?
 You mean what you say, you're telling me the truth?

SENTRY: She's the one. With my own eyes I saw her bury the body, just what you've forbidden.
 There. Is that plain and clear? 450

CREON: What did you see? Did you catch her in the act?

SENTRY: Here's what happened. We went back to our post, those threats of yours breathing down our necks —
 we brushed the corpse clean of the dust that covered it, stripped it bare . . . it was slimy, going soft, 455 and we took to high ground, backs to the wind so the stink of him couldn't hit us;
 jostling, baiting each other to keep awake, shouting back and forth — no napping on the job, not this time. And so the hours dragged by 460 until the sun stood dead above our heads, a huge white ball in the noon sky, beating, blazing down, and then it happened —
 suddenly, a whirlwind!
 Twisting a great dust-storm up from the earth, 465
 a black plague of the heavens, filling the plain, ripping the leaves off every tree in sight, choking the air and sky. We squinted hard and took our whipping from the gods.

And after the storm passed—it seemed endless—
there, we saw the girl!

470

And she cried out a sharp, piercing cry, like a bird come back to an empty nest,
peering into its bed, and all the babies gone . . .

Just so, when she sees the corpse bare she bursts into a long, shattering wail and calls down withering curses on the heads of all who did the work. And she scoops up dry dust, handfuls, quickly, and lifting a fine bronze urn, lifting it high and pouring, she crowns the dead with three full libations.

475

480

Soon as we saw
we rushed her, closed on the kill like hunters, and she, she didn't flinch. We interrogated her, charging her with offenses past and present—
she stood up to it all, denied nothing. I tell you, it made me ache and laugh in the same breath.
It's pure joy to escape the worst yourself,
it hurts a man to bring down his friends.
But all that, I'm afraid, means less to me than my own skin. That's the way I'm made.

485

CREON:

Wheeling on ANTIGONE.

You,

490 with your eyes fixed on the ground—speak up.

Do you deny you did this, yes or no?

ANTIGONE: I did it. I don't deny a thing.

CREON:

To the SENTRY.

You, get out, wherever you please—you're clear of a very heavy charge.

495

He leaves; CREON turns back to ANTIGONE.

You, tell me briefly, no long speeches—were you aware a decree had forbidden this?

ANTIGONE: Well aware. How could I avoid it? It was public.

CREON: And still you had the gall to break this law?

ANTIGONE: Of course I did. It wasn't Zeus, not in the least, who made this proclamation—not to me.

500

Nor did that Justice, dwelling with the gods

beneath the earth, ordain such laws for men.
 Nor did I think your edict had such force that you, a mere mortal, could override the gods, the great unwritten, unshakable traditions. 505
 They are alive, not just today or yesterday:
 they live forever, from the first of time,
 and no one knows when they first saw the light.

These laws—I was not about to break them, 510 not out of fear of some man's wounded pride, and face the retribution of the gods.
 Die I must, I've known it all my life—how could I keep from knowing?—even without your death-sentence ringing in my ears. 515

And if I am to die before my time
 I consider that a gain. Who on earth, alive in the midst of so much grief as I,
 could fail to find his death a rich reward?
 So for me, at least, to meet this doom of yours 520 is precious little pain. But if I had allowed my own mother's son to rot, an unburied corpse—that would have been an agony! This is nothing.
 And if my present actions strike you as foolish, let's just say I've been accused of folly 525
 by a fool.

LEADER: Like father like daughter, passionate, wild . . .
 she hasn't learned to bend before adversity.

CREON: No? Believe me, the stiffest stubborn wills 530 fall the hardest; the toughest iron, tempered strong in the white-hot fire,
 you'll see it crack and shatter first of all.
 And I've known spirited horses you can break with a light bit—proud, rebellious horses.
 There's no room for pride, not in a slave, 535 not with the lord and master standing by.

This girl was an old hand at insolence when she overrode the edicts we made public.
 But once she'd done it—the insolence, twice over—to glory in it, laughing, 540
 mocking us to our face with what she'd done.
 I'm not the man, not now: she is the man
 if this victory goes to her and she goes free.

Never! Sister's child or closer in blood than all my family clustered at my altar worshipping Guardian Zeus—she'll never escape, she and her blood sister, the most barbaric death.
Yes, I accuse her sister of an equal part in scheming this, this burial.

545

To his attendants.

Bring her here!
I just saw her inside, hysterical, gone to pieces.
It never fails: the mind convicts itself in advance, when scoundrels are up to no good, plotting in the dark. Oh but I hate it more when a traitor, caught red-handed, tries to glorify his crimes.

550

555

ANTIGONE: Creon, what more do you want than my arrest and execution?

CREON: Nothing. Then I have it all.

ANTIGONE: Then why delay? Your moralizing repels me, every word you say—pray god it always will.
So naturally all I say repels you too.

560

Enough.
Give me glory! What greater glory could I win than to give my own brother decent burial?
These citizens here would all agree,

To the CHORUS.

they'd praise me too
if their lips weren't locked in fear.

565

Pointing to CREON.

Lucky tyrants—the perquisites of power!
Ruthless power to do and say whatever pleases them.

CREON: You alone, of all the people in Thebes,
see things that way.

ANTIGONE: They see it just that way but defer to you and keep their tongues in leash.

570

CREON: And you, aren't you ashamed to differ so from them?
So disloyal!

ANTIGONE: Not ashamed for a moment,
not to honor my brother, my own flesh and blood.

CREON: Wasn't Eteocles a brother too—cut down, facing him?

575

ANTIGONE: Brother, yes, by the same mother, the same father.

ANTIGONE: He'll never testify to that,
Eteocles dead and buried.

CREON:                               He will—if you honor the traitor just as much as him.

ANTIGONE: But it was his brother, not some slave that died—

CREON: Ravaging our country!—
but Eteocles died fighting in our behalf.

ANTIGONE: No matter—Death longs for the same rites for all.

CREON: Never the same for the patriot and the traitor.

ANTIGONE: Who, Creon, who on earth can say the ones below don't find this pure and uncorrupt?

CREON: Never. Once an enemy, never a friend, not even after death.

ANTIGONE: I was born to join in love, not hate—that is my nature.

CREON:                   Go down below and love, if love you must—love the dead! While I'm alive, no woman is going to lord it over me.

Enter ISMENE from the palace, under guard.

CHORUS: Look,
Ismene's coming, weeping a sister's tears,
loving sister, under a cloud . . .
her face is flushed, her cheeks streaming.
Sorrow puts her lovely radiance in the dark.

CREON: You—
in my house, you viper, slinking undetected, sucking my life-blood! I never knew I was breeding twin disasters, the two of you rising up against my throne. Come, tell me, will you confess your part in the crime or not?
Answer me. Swear to me.

ISMENE: I did it, yes—
if only she consents—I share the guilt,
the consequences too.

ANTIGONE: No,
Justice will never suffer that — not you,
you were unwilling. I never brought you in.

ISMENE: But now you face such dangers . . . I'm not ashamed to sail through trouble with you, make your troubles mine.

ANTIGONE:                               Who did the work?
Let the dead and the god of death bear witness!
I've no love for a friend who loves in words alone.

ISMENE: Oh no, my sister, don't reject me, please, let me die beside you, consecrating
the dead together. 615

ANTIGONE:                               Never share my dying, don't lay claim to what you never touched.
My death will be enough.

ISMENE: What do I care for life, cut off from you?

ANTIGONE: Ask Creon. Your concern is all for him. 620

ISMENE: Why abuse me so? It doesn't help you now.

ANTIGONE:                               You're right — if I mock you, I get no pleasure from it, only pain.

ISMENE:                               Tell me, dear one,
what can I do to help you, even now?

ANTIGONE: Save yourself. I don't grudge you your survival. 625

ISMENE: Oh no, no, denied my portion in your death?

ANTIGONE: You chose to live, I chose to die.

ISMENE:                               Not, at least, without every kind of caution I could voice.

ANTIGONE: Your wisdom appealed to one world — mine, another.

ISMENE: But look, we're both guilty, both condemned to death. 630

ANTIGONE: Courage! Live your life. I gave myself to death, long ago, so I might serve the dead.

CREON: They're both mad, I tell you, the two of them.
One's just shown it, the other's been that way since she was born.

ISMENE:                               True, my king, 635 the sense we were born with cannot last forever . . .
commit cruelty on a person long enough and the mind begins to go.

CREON:                               Yours did, when you chose to commit your crimes with her.

ISMENE: How can I live alone, without her?

CREON:                               Her? 640
Don't even mention her — she no longer exists.

ISMENE: What? You'd kill your own son's bride?

CREON:                               Absolutely:
there are other fields for him to plow.

ISMENE:                               Perhaps,
but never as true, as close a bond as theirs.

CREON: A worthless woman for my son? It repels me. 645

ISMENE: Dearest Haemon, your father wrongs you so!

CREON: Enough, enough—you and your talk of marriage!

ISMENE: Creon—you're really going to rob your son of Antigone?

CREON: Death will do it for me—break their marriage off.

LEADER: So, it's settled then? Antigone must die? 650

CREON: Settled, yes—we both know that.

To the guards.

Stop wasting time. Take them in.

From now on they'll act like women.

Tie them up, no more running loose;

even the bravest will cut and run, 655

once they see Death coming for their lives.

The guards escort ANTIGONE and ISMENE into the palace. CREON remains while the old citizens form their chorus.

CHORUS: Blest, they are the truly blest who all their lives have never tasted devastation. For others, once the gods have rocked a house to its foundations the ruin will never cease, cresting on and on 660 from one generation on throughout the race—

like a great mounting tide driven on by savage northern gales, surging over the dead black depths roiling up from the bottom dark heavens of sand 665 and the headlands, taking the storm's onslaught full-force, roar, and the low moaning echoes on and on and now

as in ancient times I see the sorrows of the house, the living heirs of the old ancestral kings, piling on the sorrows of the dead 670 and one generation cannot free the next—some god will bring them crashing down, the race finds no release.

And now the light, the hope springing up from the late last root 675

in the house of Oedipus, that hope's cut down in turn by the long, bloody knife swung by the gods of death by a senseless word

by fury at the heart.

Zeus,

yours is the power, Zeus, what man on earth can override it, who can hold it back? 680 Power that neither Sleep, the all-ensnaring no, nor the tireless months of heaven can ever overmaster — young through all time, mighty lord of power, you hold fast
the dazzling crystal mansions of Olympus 685
And throughout the future, late and soon as through the past, your law prevails:
no towering form of greatness enters into the lives of mortals free and clear of ruin.

True,
our dreams, our high hopes voyaging far and wide bring sheer delight to many, to many others delusion, blithe, mindless lusts and the fraud steals on one slowly . . . unaware till he trips and puts his foot into the fire.
He was a wise old man who coined the famous saying: "Sooner or later foul is fair, fair is foul to the man the gods will ruin" —
He goes his way for a moment only free of blinding ruin.

Enter HAEMON from the palace.

Here's Haemon now, the last of all your sons.
Does he come in tears for his bride, his doomed bride, Antigone—bitter at being cheated of their marriage?

CREON: We'll soon know, better than seers could tell us.

705

Turning to HAEMON.

Son, you've heard the final verdict on your bride?
Are you coming now, raving against your father?
Or do you love me, no matter what I do?

HAEMON: Father, I'm your son . . . you in your wisdom set my bearings for me—I obey you.
No marriage could ever mean more to me than you, whatever good direction you may offer.

CREON: Fine, Haemon.
That's how you ought to feel within your heart, subordinate to your father's will in every way.
That's what a man prays for: to produce good sons—households full of them, dutiful and attentive, so they can pay his enemy back with interest and match the respect their father shows his friend.

 But the man who rears a brood of useless children,
 what has he brought into the world, I ask you?
 Nothing but trouble for himself, and mockery from his enemies laughing in his face.

720

Oh Haemon,
 never lose your sense of judgment over a woman.
 The warmth, the rush of pleasure, it all goes cold in your arms, I warn you . . . a worthless woman in your house, a misery in your bed.
 What wound cuts deeper than a loved one turned against you? Spit her out, like a mortal enemy—let the girl go.
 Let her find a husband down among the dead.

725

Imagine it: I caught her in naked rebellion,
 the traitor, the only one in the whole city.
 I'm not about to prove myself a liar,
 not to my people, no, I'm going to kill her!
 That's right—so let her cry for mercy, sing her hymns to Zeus who defends all bonds of kindred blood.
 Why, if I bring up my own kin to be rebels, think what I'd suffer from the world at large.
 Show me the man who rules his household well:
 I'll show you someone fit to rule the state.
 That good man, my son,
 I have every confidence he and he alone can give commands and take them too. Staunch in the storm of spears he'll stand his ground, a loyal, unflinching comrade at your side.

735

740

745

But whoever steps out of line, violates the laws or presumes to hand out orders to his superiors, he'll win no praise from me. But that man the city places in authority, his orders must be obeyed, large and small,
 right and wrong.

750

Anarchy—
 show me a greater crime in all the earth!
 She, she destroys cities, rips up houses, breaks the ranks of spearmen into headlong rout.
 But the ones who last it out, the great mass of them owe their lives to discipline. Therefore we must defend the men who live by law, never let some woman triumph over us.

755

Better to fall from power, if fall we must,
at the hands of a man — never be rated inferior to a woman, never.

760

LEADER: To us,
unless old age has robbed us of our wits,
you seem to say what you have to say with sense.

HAEMON: Father, only the gods endow a man with reason,
the finest of all their gifts, a treasure.
Far be it from me — I haven't the skill, and certainly no desire, to tell you when,
if ever, you make a slip in speech . . . though someone else might have a good suggestion.

770

Of course it's not for you,
in the normal run of things, to watch whatever men say or do, or find to criticize.
The man in the street, you know, dreads your glance, he'd never say anything displeasing to your face.
But it's for me to catch the murmurs in the dark,
the way the city mourns for this young girl.
"No woman," they say, "ever deserved death less,
and such a brutal death for such a glorious action.
She, with her own dear brother lying in his blood —
she couldn't bear to leave him dead, unburied,
food for the wild dogs or wheeling vultures.
Death? She deserves a glowing crown of gold!"
So they say, and the rumor spreads in secret, darkly . . .

775

780

I rejoice in your success, father — nothing more precious to me in the world.
What medal of honor brighter to his children than a father's growing glory? Or a child's to his proud father? Now don't, please, be quite so single-minded, self-involved,
or assume the world is wrong and you are right.
Whoever thinks that he alone possesses intelligence,
the gift of eloquence, he and no one else,
and character too . . . such men, I tell you, spread them open — you will find them empty.

785

790

No,
it's no disgrace for a man, even a wise man,
to learn many things and not to be too rigid.
You've seen trees by a raging winter torrent,
how many sway with the flood and salvage every twig,
but not the stubborn — they're ripped out, roots and all.

795

800

Bend or break. The same when a man is sailing:
 haul your sheets too taut, never give an inch, you'll capsize, go the rest of the voyage keel up and the rowing-benches under.

Oh give way. Relax your anger — change!
 I'm young, I know, but let me offer this:
 it would be best by far, I admit,
 if a man were born infallible, right by nature.
 If not — and things don't often go that way, it's best to learn from those with good advice.

805

810

LEADER: You'd do well, my lord, if he's speaking to the point,
 to learn from him,

Turning to HAEMON.

and you, my boy, from him.

You both are talking sense.

CREON: So,
 men our age, we're to be lectured, are we? — schooled by a boy his age?

815

HAEMON: Only in what is right. But if I seem young, look less to my years and more to what I do.

CREON: Do? Is admiring rebels an achievement?

HAEMON: I'd never suggest that you admire treason.

CREON: Oh? —
 isn't that just the sickness that's attacked her?

820

HAEMON: The whole city of Thebes denies it, to a man.

CREON: And is Thebes about to tell me how to rule?

HAEMON: Now, you see? Who's talking like a child?

CREON: Am I to rule this land for others — or myself?

HAEMON: It's no city at all, owned by one man alone.

825

CREON: What? The city is the king's — that's the law!

HAEMON: What a splendid king you'd make of a desert island — you and you alone.

CREON:

To the CHORUS.

This boy, I do believe,
 is fighting on her side, the woman's side.

HAEMON: If you are a woman, yes;
 my concern is all for you.

830

CREON: Why, you degenerate — bandying accusations, threatening me with justice, your own father!

HAEMON: I see my father offending justice — wrong.

CREON: Wrong?

- To protect my royal rights?
- HAEMON: Protect your rights? 835
- When you trample down the honors of the gods?
- CREON: You, you soul of corruption, rotten through—woman's accomplice!
- HAEMON: That may be,
but you'll never find me accomplice to a criminal.
- CREON: That's what she is, 840 and every word you say is a blatant appeal for her—
- HAEMON: And you, and me, and the gods beneath the earth.
- CREON: You'll never marry her, not while she's alive.
- HAEMON: Then she'll die . . . but her death will kill another.
- CREON: What, brazen threats? You go too far!
- HAEMON: What threat? 845
Combating your empty, mindless judgments with a word?
- CREON: You'll suffer for your sermons, you and your empty wisdom!
- HAEMON: If you weren't my father, I'd say you were insane.
- CREON: Don't flatter me with Father—you woman's slave!
- HAEMON: You really expect to fling abuse at me 850 and not receive the same?
- CREON: Is that so!
Now, by heaven, I promise you, you'll pay—taunting, insulting me! Bring her out, that hateful—she'll die now, here,
in front of his eyes, beside her groom! 855
- HAEMON: No, no, she will never die beside me—don't delude yourself. And you will never see me, never set eyes on my face again.
Rage your heart out, rage with friends who can stand the sight of you. 860
- Rushing out.*
- LEADER: Gone, my king, in a burst of anger.
A temper young as his . . . hurt him once,
he may do something violent.
- CREON: Let him do—dream up something desperate, past all human limit!
Good riddance. Rest assured, 865 he'll never save those two young girls from death.
- LEADER: Both of them, you really intend to kill them both?
- CREON: No, not her, the one whose hands are clean;
you're quite right.
- LEADER: But Antigone—
what sort of death do you have in mind for her? 870

CREON: I'll take her down some wild, desolate path never trod by men, and wall her up alive in a rocky vault, and set out short rations, just a gesture of piety
 to keep the entire city free of defilement. 875
 There let her pray to the one god she worships:
 Death — who knows? — may just reprieve her from death.
 Or she may learn at last, better late than never,
 what a waste of breath it is to worship Death.

Exit to the palace.

CHORUS: Love, never conquered in battle 880
 Love the plunderer laying waste the rich!
 Love standing the night-watch guarding a girl's soft cheek, you range the seas, the shepherds' steadings off in the wilds — not even the deathless gods can flee your onset, 885 nothing human born for a day —
 whoever feels your grip is driven mad.
    Love
 you wrench the minds of the righteous into outrage, swerve them to their ruin — you have ignited this,
 this kindred strife, father and son at war 890 and Love alone the victor — warm glance of the bride triumphant, burning with desire!
 Throned in power, side-by-side with the mighty laws!
 Irresistible Aphrodite,<sup>4</sup> never conquered —
 Love, you mock us for your sport. 895

ANTIGONE is brought from the palace under guard.

But now, even I'd rebel against the king,
 I'd break all bounds when I see this —
 I fill with tears, can't hold them back, not any more . . . I see Antigone make her way to the bridal vault where all are laid to rest. 900 ANTIGONE: Look at me, men of my fatherland, setting out on the last road looking into the last light of day the last I'll ever see . . .
    the god of death who puts us all to bed 905

<sup>4</sup>Greek goddess of love. — Eds.

takes me down to the banks of Acheron<sup>5</sup> alive—denied my part in the wedding-songs, no wedding-song in the dusk has crowned my marriage—
I go to wed the lord of the dark waters.

CHORUS: Not crowned with glory, crowned with a dirge, 910
you leave for the deep pit of the dead.
No withering illness laid you low,
no strokes of the sword—a law to yourself, alone, no mortal like you, ever, you go down to the halls of Death alive and breathing. 915

ANTIGONE: But think of Niobe<sup>6</sup>—well I know her story—think what a living death she died,
Tantalus' daughter, stranger queen from the east:
there on the mountain heights, growing stone binding as ivy, slowly walled her round 920 and the rains will never cease, the legends say the snows will never leave her . . .
wasting away, under her brows the tears showering down her breasting ridge and slopes—a rocky death like hers puts me to sleep. 925

CHORUS: But she was a god, born of gods, and we are only mortals born to die.
And yet, of course, it's a great thing for a dying girl to hear, just hear she shares a destiny equal to the gods, 930 during life and later, once she's dead.

ANTIGONE: O you mock me!

Why, in the name of all my fathers' gods why can't you wait till I am gone—must you abuse me to my face?
O my city, all your fine rich sons! 935
And you, you springs of the Dirce, holy grove of Thebes where the chariots gather,
you at least, you'll bear me witness, look,
unmourned by friends and forced by such crude laws
I go to my rockbound prison, strange new tomb— 940 always a stranger, O dear god,
I have no home on earth and none below,
not with the living, not with the breathless dead.

<sup>6</sup>Wife of Amphion, one of the original founders of Thebes. Her children were murdered and she was turned into stone after boasting of having had seven times more children than the titan Leto.—Eds.

CHORUS: You went too far, the last limits of daring—smashing against the high throne of Justice! 945
                   Your life's in ruins, child—I wonder . . .
                   do you pay for your father's terrible ordeal?

ANTIGONE: There—at last you've touched it, the worst pain the worst anguish! Raking up the grief for father three times over, for all the doom 950
                   that's struck us down, the brilliant house of Laius.
                   O mother, your marriage-bed
                   the coiling horrors, the coupling there—you with your own son, my father—doomstruck mother!
                   Such, such were my parents, and I their wretched child. 955
                   I go to them now, cursed, unwed, to share their home—
                   I am a stranger! O dear brother, doomed in your marriage—your marriage murders mine, your dying drags me down to death alive!

Enter CREON.

CHORUS: Reverence asks some reverence in return— 960
                   but attacks on power never go unchecked, not by the man who holds the reins of power.
                   Your own blind will, your passion has destroyed you.

ANTIGONE: No one to weep for me, my friends, no wedding-song—they take me away 965
                   in all my pain . . . the road lies open, waiting.
                   Never again, the law forbids me to see the sacred eye of day. I am agony!
                   No tears for the destiny that's mine,
                   no loved one mourns my death.

CREON: Can't you see? 970
                   If a man could wail his own dirge before he dies, he'd never finish.

To the guards.

                  Take her away, quickly!
                   Wall her up in the tomb, you have your orders.
                   Abandon her there, alone, and let her choose—death or a buried life with a good roof for shelter. 975
                   As for myself, my hands are clean. This young girl—dead or alive, she will be stripped of her rights, her stranger's rights, here in the world above.

ANTIGONE: O tomb, my bridal-bed—my house, my prison cut in the hollow rock, my everlasting watch! 980
                   I'll soon be there, soon embrace my own,

the great growing family of our dead
Persephone<sup>7</sup> has received among her ghosts.

I,

the last of them all, the most reviled by far, go down before my destined time's run out.

985

But still I go, cherishing one good hope:

my arrival may be dear to father,

dear to you, my mother,

dear to you, my loving brother, Eteocles—

When you died I washed you with my hands,

990

I dressed you all, I poured the cups across your tombs. But now, Polynices, because I laid your body out as well,

this, this is my reward. Nevertheless

I honored you—the decent will admit it—

995 well and wisely too.

Never, I tell you,

if I had been the mother of children or if my husband died, exposed and rotting—

I'd never have taken this ordeal upon myself, never defied our people's will. What law,

1000

you ask, do I satisfy with what I say?

A husband dead, there might have been another.

A child by another too, if I had lost the first.

But mother and father both lost in the halls of Death, no brother could ever spring to light again.

1005

For this law alone I held you first in honor.

For this, Creon, the king, judges me a criminal guilty of dreadful outrage, my dear brother!

And now he leads me off, a captive in his hands,

with no part in the bridal-song, the bridal-bed,

1010 denied all joy of marriage, raising children—deserted so by loved ones, struck by fate,

I descend alive to the caverns of the dead.

What law of the mighty gods have I transgressed?

Why look to the heavens any more, tormented as I am?

1015

Whom to call, what comrades now? Just think, my reverence only brands me for irreverence!

Very well: if this is the pleasure of the gods, once I suffer I will know that I was wrong.

But if these men are wrong, let them suffer

1020 nothing worse than they mete out to me—

these masters of injustice!

<sup>7</sup>Queen of the underworld.—EDS.

LEADER: Still the same rough winds, the wild passion raging through the girl.

CREON:

To the guards.

Take her away.

You're wasting time—you'll pay for it too.

1025

ANTIGONE: Oh god, the voice of death. It's come, it's here.

CREON: True. Not a word of hope—your doom is sealed.

ANTIGONE: Land of Thebes, city of all my fathers—

O you gods, the first gods of the race!

They drag me away, now, no more delay.

1030

Look on me, you noble sons of Thebes—

the last of a great line of kings,

I alone, see what I suffer now at the hands of what breed of men—

all for reverence, my reverence for the gods!

1035

She leaves under guard; the CHORUS gathers.

CHORUS: Danaë, Danaë<sup>8</sup>— even she endured a fate like yours, in all her lovely strength she traded the light of day for the bolted brazen vault—buried within her tomb, her bridal-chamber, wed to the yoke and broken.

1040

But she was of glorious birth

my child, my child

and treasured the seed of Zeus within her womb,

the cloudburst streaming gold!

1045

The power of fate is a wonder,

dark, terrible wonder—

Enter TIRESIAS, the blind prophet, led by a boy.

---

<sup>10</sup>Goddesses who inspire artists, musicians, and dancers. — Eds.

TIRESIAS: Lords of Thebes,
I and the boy have come together, hand in hand. Two see with the eyes of one . . .
so the blind must go, with a guide to lead the way.

CREON: What is it, old Tiresias? What news now?

TIRESIAS: I will teach you. And you obey the seer.

CREON: I will,
I've never wavered from your advice before.

TIRESIAS: And so you kept the city straight on course.

CREON: I owe you a great deal, I swear to that.

TIRESIAS: Then reflect, my son: you are poised,
once more, on the razor-edge of fate.

CREON: What is it? I shudder to hear you.

TIRESIAS: You will learn when you listen to the warnings of my craft.
As I sat on the ancient seat of augury,<sup>11</sup> in the sanctuary where every bird I know will hover at my hands—suddenly I heard it,
a strange voice in the wingbeats, unintelligible, barbaric, a mad scream! Talons flashing, ripping, they were killing each other—that much I knew—the murderous fury whirring in those wings made that much clear!

I was afraid,
I turned quickly, tested the burnt-sacrifice,
ignited the altar at all points—but no fire,
the god in the fire never blazed.
Not from those offerings . . . over the embers slid a heavy ooze from the long thighbones, smoking, sputtering out, and the bladder puffed and burst—spraying gall into the air—and the fat wrapping the bones slithered off and left them glistening white. No fire!
The rites failed that might have blazed the future with a sign. So I learned from the boy here;
he is my guide, as I am guide to others.

And it's you—
your high resolve that sets this plague on Thebes.
The public altars and sacred hearths are fouled,
one and all, by the birds and dogs with carrion torn from the corpse, the doomstruck son of Oedipus!
And so the gods are deaf to our prayers, they spurn

<sup>11</sup>Looking for omens in the flight patterns of birds.—EDS.

the offerings in our hands, the flame of holy flesh.
No birds cry out an omen clear and true— 1130
they're gorged with the murdered victim's blood and fat.
Take these things to heart, my son, I warn you.
All men make mistakes, it is only human.
But once the wrong is done, a man can turn his back on folly, misfortune too, 1135 if he tries to make amends, however low he's fallen, and stops his bullnecked ways. Stubbornness brands you for stupidity—pride is a crime.
No, yield to the dead!
Never stab the fighter when he's down. 1140
Where's the glory, killing the dead twice over?

I mean you well. I give you sound advice.
It's best to learn from a good adviser when he speaks for your own good:
it's pure gain.

CREON: Old man—all of you! So, 1145 you shoot your arrows at my head like archers at the target—
I even have him loosed on me, this fortune-teller.
Oh his ilk has tried to sell me short and ship me off for years. Well, drive your bargains, traffic—much as you like— 1150
in the gold of India, silver-gold of Sardis.
You'll never bury that body in the grave, not even if Zeus's eagles rip the corpse and wing their rotten pickings off to the throne of god!
Never, not even in fear of such defilement 1155 will I tolerate his burial, that traitor.
Well I know, we can't defile the gods—no mortal has the power.

No,
reverend old Tiresias, all men fall,
it's only human, but the wisest fall obscenely 1160 when they glorify obscene advice with rhetoric—
all for their own gain.

TIRESIAS: Oh god, is there a man alive who knows, who actually believes . . .

CREON: What now? 1165
What earth-shattering truth are you about to utter?

TIRESIAS: . . . just how much a sense of judgment, wisdom is the greatest gift we have?

CREON: Just as much, I'd say,
as a twisted mind is the worst affliction going.

TIRESIAS: You are the one who's sick, Creon, sick to death.

CREON: I am in no mood to trade insults with a seer.

1170

TIRESIAS: You have already, calling my prophecies a lie.

CREON:

Why not?

You and the whole breed of seers are mad for money!

TIRESIAS: And the whole race of tyrants lusts to rake it in.

CREON: This slander of yours — are you aware you're speaking to the king?

1175

TIRESIAS: Well aware. Who helped you save the city?

CREON:

You —

you have your skills, old seer, but you lust for injustice!

TIRESIAS: You will drive me to utter the dreadful secret in my heart.

CREON: Spit it out! Just don't speak it out for profit.

TIRESIAS: Profit? No, not a bit of profit, not for you.

1180

CREON: Know full well, you'll never buy off my resolve.

TIRESIAS: Then know this too, learn this by heart!

The chariot of the sun will not race through so many circuits more, before you have surrendered

one born of your own loins, your own flesh and blood,

1185

a corpse for corpses given in return, since you have thrust to the world below a child sprung for the world above, ruthlessly lodged a living soul within the grave —

then you've robbed the gods below the earth, keeping a dead body here in the bright air,

1190

unburied, unsung, unhallowed by the rites.

You, you have no business with the dead,

nor do the gods above — this is violence you have forced upon the heavens.

And so the avengers, the dark destroyers late

1195

but true to the mark, now lie in wait for you,

the Furies sent by the gods and the god of death to strike you down with the pains that you perfected!

There. Reflect on that, tell me I've been bribed.

The day comes soon, no long test of time, not now, that wakes the wails for men and women in your halls.

1200

Great hatred rises against you — cities in tumult, all whose mutilated sons

the dogs have graced with burial, or the wild beasts, some wheeling crow that wings the ungodly stench of carrion

1205 back to each city, each warrior's hearth and home.

These arrows for your heart! Since you've raked me

I loose them like an archer in my anger, arrows deadly true. You'll never escape their burning, searing force.

Motioning to his escort.

Come, boy, take me home.
So he can vent his rage on younger men,
and learn to keep a gentler tongue in his head and better sense than what he carries now.

Exit to the side.

LEADER: The old man's gone, my king—terrible prophecies. Well I know, since the hair on this old head went gray,
he's never lied to Thebes.

1215

CREON: I know it myself—I'm shaken, torn.
It's a dreadful thing to yield . . . but resist now?
Lay my pride bare to the blows of ruin?
That's dreadful too.

1220

LEADER: But good advice,
Creon, take it now, you must.

CREON: What should I do? Tell me . . . I'll obey.

LEADER: Go! Free the girl from the rocky vault and raise a mound for the body you exposed.

1225

CREON: That's your advice? You think I should give in?

LEADER: Yes, my king, quickly. Disasters sent by the gods cut short our follies in a flash.

CREON: Oh it's hard.
giving up the heart's desire . . . but I will do it—no more fighting a losing battle with necessity.

1230

LEADER: Do it now, go, don't leave it to others.

CREON: Now—I'm on my way! Come, each of you, take up axes, make for the high ground, over there, quickly! I and my better judgment have come round to this—I shackled her,
I'll set her free myself. I am afraid . . .
it's best to keep the established laws to the very day we die.

1235

Rushing out, followed by his entourage. The CHORUS clusters around the altar.

CHORUS: God of a hundred names!

Great Dionysus—
Son and glory of Semele! Pride of Thebes—
Child of Zeus whose thunder rocks the clouds—
Lord of the famous lands of evening—

1240

King of the Mysteries!

King of Eleusis, Demeter's plain<sup>12</sup> her breasting hills that welcome in the world —
Great Dionysus!

1245

Bacchus,<sup>13</sup> living in Thebes
the mother-city of all your frenzied women —

Bacchus

living along the Ismenus<sup>14</sup> rippling waters standing over the field sown with the Dragon's teeth!<sup>15</sup>

You — we have seen you through the flaring smoky fires, your torches blazing over the twin peaks where nymphs of the hallowed cave climb onward

1250 fired with you, your sacred rage — we have seen you at Castalia's running spring<sup>16</sup> and down from the heights of Nysa<sup>17</sup> crowned with ivy the greening shore rioting vines and grapes

1255 down you come in your storm of wild women ecstatic, mystic cries —

Dionysus —

down to watch and ward the roads of Thebes!

First of all cities, Thebes you honor first you and your mother, bride of the lightning — come, Dionysus! now your people lie in the iron grip of plague, come in your racing, healing stride down Parnassus<sup>18</sup> slopes

1260

1265 or across the moaning straits.

Lord of the dancing — dance, dance the constellations breathing fire!

Great master of the voices of the night!
Child of Zeus, God's offspring, come, come forth!
Lord, king, dance with your nymphs, swirling, raving

Enter a MESSENGER from the side.

MESSENGER:                      Neighbors, friends of the house of Cadmus and the kings,
 there's not a thing in this life of ours 1275
 I'd praise or blame as settled once for all.
 Fortune lifts and Fortune fells the lucky and unlucky every day. No prophet on earth can tell a man his fate. Take Creon:
 there was a man to rouse your envy once, 1280
 as I see it. He saved the realm from enemies;
 taking power, he alone, the lord of the fatherland,
 he set us true on course — flourished like a tree with the noble line of sons he bred and reared . . .
 and now it's lost, all gone.

Believe me, 1285

when a man has squandered his true joys, he's good as dead, I tell you, a living corpse.
 Pile up riches in your house, as much as you like — live like a king with a huge show of pomp, but if real delight is missing from the lot, 1290
 I wouldn't give you a wisp of smoke for it,
 not compared with joy.

LEADER:                      What now?

What new grief do you bring the house of kings?

MESSENGER: Dead, dead — and the living are guilty of their death!

LEADER: Who's the murderer? Who is dead? Tell us. 1295

MESSENGER: Haemon's gone, his blood spilled by the very hand —

LEADER: His father's or his own?

MESSENGER:                      His own . . .
 raging mad with his father for the death —

LEADER:                      Oh great seer, you saw it all, you brought your word to birth!

MESSENGER: Those are the facts. Deal with them as you will. 1300

As he turns to go, EURYDICE enters from the palace.

LEADER: Look, Eurydice. Poor woman, Creon's wife, so close at hand. By chance perhaps, unless she's heard the news about her son.

<sup>19</sup>Dionysus. — Eds.

EURYDICE:

My countrymen,

all of you—I caught the sound of your words
as I was leaving to do my part, to appeal to queen Athena<sup>20</sup> with my prayers.
I was just loosing the bolts, opening the doors,
when a voice filled with sorrow, family sorrow, struck my ears, and I fell back, terrified,
into the women's arms—everything went black.
Tell me the news, again, whatever it is . . .
sorrow and I are hardly strangers;
I can bear the worst.

1305

1310

MESSENGER:

I—dear lady,

I'll speak as an eye-witness. I was there.
And I won't pass over one word of the truth.
Why should I try to soothe you with a story,
only to prove a liar in a moment?
Truth is always best.

1315

So,

I escorted your lord, I guided him to the edge of the plain where the body lay,
Polynices, torn by the dogs and still unmourned.
And saying a prayer to Hecate of the Crossroads,
Pluto<sup>21</sup> too, to hold their anger and be kind,
we washed the dead in a bath of holy water and plucking some fresh branches, gathering . . .
what was left of him, we burned them all together and raised a high mound of native earth, and then we turned and made for that rocky vault of hers,
the hollow, empty bed of the bride of Death.
And far off, one of us heard a voice,
a long wail rising, echoing out of that unhallowed wedding-chamber;
he ran to alert the master and Creon pressed on,
closer—the strange, inscrutable cry came sharper, throbbing around him now, and he let loose
a cry of his own, enough to wrench the heart, “Oh god, am I the prophet now? going down the darkest road I’ve ever gone? My son—it’s his dear voice, he greets me! Go, men, closer, quickly! Go through the gap,
the rocks are dragged back—

<sup>21</sup>Two gods of the underworld.—EDS.

right to the tomb's very mouth—and look,
see if it's Haemon's voice I think I hear,
or the gods have robbed me of my senses.”

The king was shattered. We took his orders, 1345 went and searched, and there in the deepest, dark recesses of the tomb we found her . . .
hanged by the neck in a fine linen noose, strangled in her veils—and the boy,
his arms flung around her waist, 1350
clinging to her, wailing for his bride, dead and down below, for his father's crimes and the bed of his marriage blighted by misfortune.
When Creon saw him, he gave a deep sob,
he ran in, shouting, crying out to him, 1355
“Oh my child—what have you done? what seized you,
what insanity? what disaster drove you mad?
Come out, my son! I beg you on my knees!”
But the boy gave him a wild burning glance, spat in his face, not a word in reply, 1360
he drew his sword—his father rushed out, running as Haemon lunged and missed!—
and then, doomed, desperate with himself, suddenly leaning his full weight on the blade,
he buried it in his body, halfway to the hilt. 1365
And still in his senses, pouring his arms around her,
he embraced the girl and breathing hard,
released a quick rush of blood,
bright red on her cheek glistening white.
And there he lies, body enfolding body . . . 1370
he has won his bride at last, poor boy, not here but in the houses of the dead.

Creon shows the world that of all the ills afflicting men the worst is lack of judgment.

EURYDICE turns and reenters the palace.

LEADER: What do you make of that? The lady's gone, 1375 without a word, good or bad.

MESSENGER: I'm alarmed too
but here's my hope—faced with her son's death, she finds it unbecoming to mourn in public.
Inside, under her roof, she'll set her women to the task and wail the sorrow of the house. 1380
She's too discreet. She won't do something rash.

LEADER: I'm not so sure. To me, at least, a long heavy silence promises danger,
 just as much as a lot of empty outcries.

MESSENGER: We'll see if she's holding something back, hiding some passion in her heart.
 I'm going in. You may be right—who knows?
 Even too much silence has its dangers.

1385

Exit to the palace. Enter CREON from the side, escorted by attendants carrying HAEMON's body on a bier.

LEADER: The king himself! Coming toward us, look, holding the boy's head in his hands.
 Clear, damning proof, if it's right to say so—proof of his own madness, no one else's, no, his own blind wrongs.

1390

CREON: Ohhh,
 so senseless, so insane . . . my crimes,
 my stubborn, deadly—
 Look at us, the killer, the killed, father and son, the same blood—the misery!
 My plans, my mad fanatic heart,
 my son, cut off so young!
 Ai, dead, lost to the world,
 not through your stupidity, no, my own.

1395

1400

LEADER: Too late, too late, you see what justice means.

CREON: Oh I've learned through blood and tears! Then, it was then, when the god came down and struck me—a great weight shattering, driving me down that wild savage path, ruining, trampling down my joy. Oh the agony, the heartbreaking agonies of our lives.

1405

Enter the MESSENGER from the palace.

MESSENGER: Master,
 what a hoard of grief you have, and you'll have more.
 The grief that lies to hand you've brought yourself—

Pointing to HAEMON's body.

the rest, in the house, you'll see it all too soon.

1410

CREON: What now? What's worse than this?

MESSENGER: The queen is dead.
 The mother of this dead boy . . . mother to the end—
 poor thing, her wounds are fresh.

CREON: No, no,
harbor of Death, so choked, so hard to cleanse! —
why me? why are you killing me? 1415
Herald of pain, more words, more grief?
I died once, you kill me again and again!
What's the report, boy . . . some news for me?
My wife dead? O dear god!
Slaughter heaped on slaughter?

The doors open; the body of EURYDICE is brought out on her bier.

MESSENGER: See for yourself: 1420 now they bring her body from the palace.

CREON: Oh no,
another, a second loss to break the heart.
What next, what fate still waits for me?
I just held my son in my arms and now,
look, a new corpse rising before my eyes — 1425
wretched, helpless mother — O my son!

MESSENGER: She stabbed herself at the altar, then her eyes went dark, after she'd raised a cry for the noble fate of Megareus,<sup>22</sup> the hero killed in the first assault, then for Haemon, 1430 then with her dying breath she called down torments on your head — you killed her sons.

CREON: Oh the dread,
I shudder with dread! Why not kill me too? — run me through with a good sharp sword?
Oh god, the misery, anguish — 1435
I, I'm churning with it, going under.

MESSENGER: Yes, and the dead, the woman lying there, piles the guilt of all their deaths on you.

CREON: How did she end her life, what bloody stroke?

MESSENGER: She drove home to the heart with her own hand, 1440 once she learned her son was dead . . . that agony.

CREON: And the guilt is all mine — can never be fixed on another man, no escape for me. I killed you,
I, god help me, I admit it all! 1445

To his attendants.

Take me away, quickly, out of sight.
I don't even exist — I'm no one. Nothing.

---

<sup>22</sup>Son of Creon and Eurydice who died in the attack on Thebes. — Eds.

LEADER: Good advice, if there's any good in suffering.

Quickest is best when troubles block the way.

CREON:

Kneeling in prayer.

Come, let it come! — that best of fates for me

1450 that brings the final day, best fate of all.

Oh quickly, now —

so I never have to see another sunrise.

LEADER: That will come when it comes;

we must deal with all that lies before us.

1455

The future rests with the ones who tend the future.

CREON: That prayer — I poured my heart into that prayer!

LEADER: No more prayers now. For mortal men there is no escape from the doom we must endure.

CREON: Take me away, I beg you, out of sight.

1460

A rash, indiscriminate fool!

I murdered you, my son, against my will — you too, my wife . . .

Wailing wreck of a man, whom to look to? where to lean for support?

Desperately turning from HAEMON to EURYDICE on their biers.

Whatever I touch goes wrong — once more a crushing fate's come down upon my head.

1465

The MESSENGER and ATTENDANTS lead CREON into the palace.

CHORUS: Wisdom is by far the greatest part of joy, and reverence toward the gods must be safeguarded.

The mighty words of the proud are paid in full with mighty blows of fate, and at long last 1470

those blows will teach us wisdom.

The old citizens exit to the side.

Questions for Discussion

1. The play opens with a dialogue between Antigone and Ismene. How do their attitudes toward Creon's decree characterize the two sisters? Do you support Antigone's defense of her civil disobedience? Is she a character we are meant to admire? Do you admire her? Explain.
2. How does Antigone differentiate between human and divine law? How is this distinction at the thematic heart of the play?
3. At the start of the play, what motivates Creon? What reasons does he give for his edict? How do his definitions of terms such as "traitor" and "patriot" reveal his concerns?

4. The first encounter between Antigone and Creon begins with her statement, “I did it. I don’t deny a thing” (l. 493). From then on in the scene, each character presents an argument defending his or her position. What are these arguments? What assumptions underlie them? At what point does accusation and name-calling begin to replace logical argument?
5. How convincing is Ismene’s change of heart beginning on line 604? Do you believe her? Why or why not?
6. What words would best describe Haemon? What is Haemon’s strategy going into his conversation with Creon (l. 710)? How would you describe Creon’s reasoning in his conversation with Haemon? What does this conflict say about the power of reason and authority?
7. What role do marriage and the image of the bridal chamber play in Antigone? Consider Antigone’s speech as she is being taken away (ll. 979–1013), the scene in which Haemon is discovered in the tomb (ll. 1345–72), and the death of Eurydice.
8. In their encounter, Creon accuses Tiresias of being motivated by the desire for money (beginning l. 1091). Why? What other instances have there been of Creon responding to resistance with accusations of bribery or monetary gain? What does this pattern say about Creon as a leader?
9. Over the course of his confrontation with Tiresias (beginning l. 1091), Creon reverses his position several times. Why? What causes his shift from heeding the prophet’s advice as he has in the past to denouncing Tiresias’s prophecies and finally to taking the prophet’s advice to heart?
10. What is Sophocles’ position regarding the actions of Antigone and Creon? How can you tell? What does the play have to say about the conflict between order and civil disobedience and about the nature of justice and injustice? What does it say about the nature of peace?
11. What does the play tell us about how “a sense of judgment, wisdom / is the greatest gift we have” (ll. 1166–67)? Do you think Sophocles is arguing against acting on passion and convictions?
12. Antigone focuses our attention on the conflict between public and private realms, the divisive impact of war on families, and the consequences of differing views of honor. How do these issues manifest themselves in conflicts we see going on today?

Questions on Style and Structure

1. How does Sophocles provide exposition to ground the audience in the background of events and the characters? Consider the opening dialogue and the initial speeches of the Chorus and the sentry.
2. In lines 117–79, how does the Chorus warn against hubris, the Greek word for excessive pride? How do the various metaphors and images (the sun, the shield, the eagle, the armor, the chariots, the choirs) contribute to the meaning of this passage? How do the words of the Chorus in this passage foreshadow later events in the play?

3. Beginning with line 472, the sentry uses an analogy comparing Antigone to a bird. Explain why you do or do not find it a fitting comparison to illuminate Antigone's situation.
4. What is the purpose and effect of Antigone's rhetorical question in lines 587–88?
5. Creon's words in lines 970–78 are an example of dramatic irony. What effect does this speech have? Find another example of dramatic irony in the play, and discuss the impact it has on the plot and themes of the play.
6. Discuss the end of Antigone's final speech (ll. 1014–22). Is it consistent with her character as we have known her throughout the play, or does it mark a shift in her thinking?
7. The Chorus is meant to voice the thoughts of the people. How does the Chorus respond to Creon's edict and to the conflict between Creon and Antigone? What is the position of the Chorus? At what point does the Chorus turn on Creon? Why does it occur, and what is its significance to his ability to govern?
8. In the speech by the Chorus that begins on line 1036, Sophocles alludes to the stories of Danaë and other mythological figures. In what ways do these allusions deepen the thematic complexity of the play? Consider answering from the point of view of an audience in Sophocles' time as well as that of a contemporary audience. Should a director staging a production of Antigone today consider omitting the speech?
9. In the final scene of the play, how are the gruesome details of several deaths revealed? Why does Sophocles deliver the information this way? Would enacting the violence on stage enhance the meaning of the play? Explain.
10. An antagonist is a character who opposes the protagonist, thus creating a conflict. Ultimately, who is the protagonist of this play, Antigone or Creon? Who is the antagonist? Consider whose tragedy the play enacts. Explain your reasons for your responses.
11. What roles do the secondary characters play: Haemon, Ismene, Tiresias, and Eurydice, for example? Which ones are most important?
12. Is Creon's rhetoric consistent throughout the play? How does his purpose and tone shift from speech to speech? Compare and contrast the way Creon responds to Antigone, to Haemon, and to Tiresias. Refer specifically to the text in each case.

Suggestions for Writing

1. The Greeks believed that through witnessing tragedy an audience could reach a state of catharsis—a cleansing or purification of pity and fear resulting in a sense of renewal. Write an essay in which you discuss how catharsis is reached through the violence and tragedy in Antigone.
2. In War Is a Force That Gives Us Meaning, Chris Hedges reminds us that “the ancient Greeks linked war and love. Aphrodite, the goddess of love and the wife of Hephaestus, the lame blacksmith who forged the weapons of war and armor for the gods, became the mistress of Ares, the god of war.” What is the relationship between love and war in Antigone? Pay careful attention to the Chorus's apostrophe to Love beginning with line 880.

3. Antigone says, “Never, I tell you, / if I had been the mother of children / or if my husband died, exposed and rotting— / I’d never have taken this ordeal upon myself, / never defied our people’s will” (ll. 997–1000). If Antigone is heroic, is such a statement seemingly out of character? Explain your response, and consider what purpose this speech serves within the play.
4. In addition to being a great dramatist, Sophocles was a statesman in Athens and a general who fought in the Persian Wars. What influence on Antigone might these experiences have had? In an essay, consider how Antigone expresses the ideas of both a statesman and a soldier on war and peace.
5. Many interpret Creon’s outrage toward Antigone not as a leader responding to an action defying his decree but as a man in a patriarchal society feeling threatened by a woman who dares to challenge him. Write an essay explaining this viewpoint, and cite textual evidence that supports this interpretation.
6. While the reader or audience of Antigone does not witness violence directly—it occurs offstage and is reported by a messenger—it is graphically described. Does such disturbing content desensitize readers to violence, or does it expose the horrific consequences of tragic decisions so that we might learn from them? Write an essay explaining your view on this question. Use Antigone as your primary text, but bring in more contemporary examples of how violence is treated in today’s films and the media in general.
7. Civil disobedience, a theme central to Antigone, is a subject more recent intellectuals and activists, including Henry David Thoreau and Martin Luther King Jr., have continued to explore. Write an essay comparing and contrasting the treatment of civil disobedience in this play to either Thoreau’s “Civil Disobedience” or King’s “Letter from Birmingham Jail.”

The Things They Carried

TIM O'BRIEN

Tim O'Brien was born in 1946 in Austin, Minnesota. After graduating from Macalester College with a BA in political science in 1968, he was drafted into the army and sent to Vietnam, where he became a sergeant and earned a Purple Heart. A year after the now infamous My Lai massacre, O'Brien's unit passed through the area where it had happened, only learning about it then. The incident figures prominently in his 1994 novel, In the Lake of the Woods—begun as a graduate dissertation in history at Harvard University, where he went to graduate school after the war. O'Brien's writing career started with the publication of If I Die in a Combat Zone (1973), a memoir of his experiences in Vietnam. Going After Cacciato, a surrealistic novel set in the war, followed in 1978, winning the prestigious National Book Award and establishing O'Brien as a major American writer. His recent novels include Tomcat in Love (1998) and July, July (2002). Perhaps his most famous book, The Things They Carried—composed of a series of connected stories—appeared in 1990. Dedicated to its fictional characters and based on his actual experience, it is a novel in which O'Brien himself is the narrator. While a major theme of the novel is its treatment of war and the postwar experience, it can be said that the book is also about the relationship between truth and fiction and the transformational power of art and memory. Regarding If I Die in a Combat Zone, O'Brien has said that he had a hard time getting at the truth in that book because he stuck to the facts. The title story and first chapter of The Things They Carried, selected for inclusion in The Best American Short Stories of the Century (1999) and included here, represents his attempt to invent a fiction to get at the truth.

First Lieutenant Jimmy Cross carried letters from a girl named Martha, a junior at Mount Sebastian College in New Jersey. They were not love letters, but Lieutenant Cross was hoping, so he kept them folded in plastic at the bottom of his rucksack. In the late afternoon, after a day's march, he would dig his foxhole, wash his hands under a canteen, unwrap the letters, hold them with the tips of his fingers, and spend the last hour of light pretending. He would imagine romantic camping trips into the White Mountains in New Hampshire. He would sometimes taste the envelope flaps, knowing her tongue had been there. More than anything, he wanted Martha to love him as he loved her, but the letters were mostly chatty, elusive on the matter of love. She was a virgin, he was almost sure. She was an English major at Mount Sebastian, and she wrote beautifully about her professors and roommates and midterm exams, about her respect for Chaucer and her great affection for Virginia Woolf. She often quoted lines of poetry; she never mentioned the war, except to say, Jimmy, take care of yourself. The letters weighed ten ounces. They were signed "Love, Martha,” but Lieutenant Cross understood that “Love” was only a way of signing and did not mean what he sometimes pretended it meant. At dusk, he would carefully return the letters to his rucksack. Slowly, a bit distracted, he would get up and move among his men, checking the perimeter, then at full dark he would return to his hole and watch the night and wonder if Martha was a virgin.

The things they carried were largely determined by necessity. Among the necessities or near necessities were P-38 can openers, pocket knives, heat tabs, wrist watches, dog tags, mosquito repellant, chewing gum, candy, cigarettes, salt tablets, packets of Kool-Aid, lighters, matches, sewing kits, Military Payment Certificates, C rations, and two or three canteens of water. Together, these items weighed between fifteen and twenty pounds, depending upon a man’s habits or rate of metabolism. Henry Dobbins, who was a big man, carried extra rations; he was especially fond of canned peaches in heavy syrup over pound cake. Dave Jensen, who practiced field hygiene, carried a toothbrush, dental floss, and several hotel-size bars of soap he’d stolen on R&R in Sydney, Australia. Ted Lavender, who was scared, carried tranquilizers until he was shot in the head outside the village of Than Khe in mid-April. By necessity, and because it was SOP,<sup>1</sup> they all carried steel helmets that weighed five pounds including the liner and camouflage cover. They carried the standard fatigue jackets and trousers. Very few carried underwear. On their feet they carried jungle boots—2.1 pounds—and Dave Jensen carried three pairs of socks and a can of Dr. Scholl’s foot powder as a precaution against trench foot. Until he was shot, Ted Lavender carried six or seven ounces of premium dope, which for him was a necessity. Mitchell Sanders, the RTO,<sup>2</sup> carried condoms. Norman Bowker carried a diary. Rat Kiley carried comic books. Kiowa, a devout Baptist, carried an illustrated New Testament that had been presented to him by his father, who taught Sunday school in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma. As a hedge against bad times, however, Kiowa also carried his grandmother’s distrust of the white man, his grandfather’s old hunting hatchet. Necessity dictated. Because the land was mined and booby-trapped, it was SOP for each man to carry a steel-centered, nylon-covered flak jacket, which weighed 6.7 pounds, but which on hot days seemed much heavier. Because you could die so quickly, each man carried at least one large compress bandage, usually in the helmet band for easy access. Because the nights were cold, and because the monsoons were wet, each carried a green plastic poncho that could be used as a raincoat or ground sheet or makeshift tent. With its quilted liner, the poncho weighed almost two pounds, but it was worth every ounce. In April, for instance, when Ted Lavender was shot, they used his poncho to wrap him up, then to carry him across the paddy, then to lift him into the chopper that took him away.

They were called legs or grunts.

To carry something was to “hump” it, as when Lieutenant Jimmy Cross humped his love for Martha up the hills and through the swamps. In its intransitive form,

“to hump” meant “to walk,” or “to march,” but it implied burdens far beyond the intransitive.

Almost everyone humped photographs. In his wallet, Lieutenant Cross carried two photographs of Martha. The first was a Kodachrome snapshot signed “Love,” though he knew better. She stood against a brick wall. Her eyes were gray and neutral, her lips slightly open as she stared straight-on at the camera. At night, sometimes, Lieutenant Cross wondered who had taken the picture, because he knew she had boy-friends, because he loved her so much, and because he could see the shadow of the picture taker spreading out against the brick wall. The second photograph had been clipped from the 1968 Mount Sebastian yearbook. It was an action shot—women’s volleyball—and Martha was bent horizontal to the floor, reaching, the palms of her hands in sharp focus, the tongue taut, the expression frank and competitive. There was no visible sweat. She wore white gym shorts. Her legs, he thought, were almost certainly the legs of a virgin, dry and without hair, the left knee cocked and carrying her entire weight, which was just over one hundred pounds. Lieutenant Cross remembered touching that left knee. A dark theater, he remembered, and the movie was Bonnie and Clyde, and Martha wore a tweed skirt, and during the final scene, when he touched her knee, she turned and looked at him in a sad, sober way that made him pull his hand back, but he would always remember the feel of the tweed skirt and the knee beneath it and the sound of the gunfire that killed Bonnie and Clyde, how embarrassing it was, how slow and oppressive. He remembered kissing her good night at the dorm door. Right then, he thought, he should’ve done something brave. He should’ve carried her up the stairs to her room and tied her to the bed and touched that left knee all night long. He should’ve risked it. Whenever he looked at the photographs, he thought of new things he should’ve done.

What they carried was partly a function of rank, partly of field specialty.

As a first lieutenant and platoon leader, Jimmy Cross carried a compass, maps, code books, binoculars, and a .45-caliber pistol that weighed 2.9 pounds fully loaded. He carried a strobe light and the responsibility for the lives of his men.

As an RTO, Mitchell Sanders carried the PRC-25 radio, a killer, twenty-six pounds with its battery.

As a medic, Rat Kiley carried a canvas satchel filled with morphine and plasma and malaria tablets and surgical tape and comic books and all the things a medic must carry, including M&M’s for especially bad wounds, for a total weight of nearly twenty pounds.

As a big man, therefore a machine gunner, Henry Dobbins carried the M-60, which weighed twenty-three pounds unloaded, but which was almost always loaded. In addition, Dobbins carried between ten and fifteen pounds of ammunition draped in belts across his chest and shoulders.

As PFCs or Spec 4s, most of them were common grunts and carried the standard M-16 gas-operated assault rifle. The weapon weighed 7.5 pounds unloaded, 8.2 pounds with its full twenty-round magazine. Depending on numerous factors, such as topography and psychology, the riflemen carried anywhere from twelve to twenty magazines, usually in cloth bandoliers, adding on another 8.4 pounds at minimum, fourteen pounds at maximum. When it was available, they also carried M-16 maintenance gear—rods and steel brushes and swabs and tubes of LSA oil—all of which weighed about a pound. Among the grunts, some carried the M-79 grenade launcher, 5.9 pounds unloaded, a reasonably light weapon except for the ammunition, which was heavy. A single round weighed ten ounces. The typical load was twenty-five rounds. But Ted Lavender, who was scared, carried thirty-four rounds when he was shot and killed outside Than Khe, and he went down under an exceptional burden, more than twenty pounds of ammunition, plus the flak jacket and helmet and rations and water and toilet paper and tranquilizers and all the rest, plus the unweighed fear. He was dead weight. There was no twitching or flopping. Kiowa, who saw it happen, said it was like watching a rock fall, or a big sandbag or something—just boom, then down—not like the movies where the dead guy rolls around and does fancy spins and goes ass over teakettle—not like that, Kiowa said, the poor bastard just flat-fuck fell. Boom. Down. Nothing else. It was a bright morning in mid-April. Lieutenant Cross felt the pain. He blamed himself. They stripped off Lavender's canteens and ammo, all the heavy things, and Rat Kiley said the obvious, the guy's dead, and Mitchell Sanders used his radio to report one U.S. KIA<sup>3</sup> and to request a chopper. Then they wrapped Lavender in his poncho. They carried him out to a dry paddy, established security, and sat smoking the dead man's dope until the chopper came. Lieutenant Cross kept to himself. He pictured Martha's smooth young face, thinking he loved her more than anything, more than his men, and now Ted Lavender was dead because he loved her so much and could not stop thinking about her. When the dust-off arrived, they carried Lavender aboard. Afterward they burned Than Khe. They marched until dusk, then dug their holes, and that night Kiowa kept explaining how you had to be there, how fast it was, how the poor guy just dropped like so much concrete. Boom-down, he said. Like cement.

In addition to the three standard weapons—the M-60, M-16, and M-79—they carried whatever presented itself, or whatever seemed appropriate as a means of killing or staying alive. They carried catch-as-catch-can. At various times, in various situations, they carried M-14s and CAR-15s and Swedish Ks and grease guns and captured AK-47s and Chi-Coms and RPGs and Simonov carbines and black-market Uzis and .38-caliber Smith & Wesson handguns and 66 mm LAWs and shotguns and silencers and blackjacks and bayonets and C-4 plastic explosives. Lee Strunk carried a slingshot; a weapon of last resort, he called it. Mitchell Sanders carried brass knuckles. Kiowa carried his grandfather's feathered hatchet. Every third or fourth man carried a Claymore antipersonnel mine—3.5 pounds with its firing device. They all carried fragmentation grenades—fourteen ounces each. They all carried at least one M-18 colored smoke grenade—twenty-four ounces. Some carried CS or tear-gas grenades. Some carried white-phosphorus grenades. They carried all they could bear, and then some, including a silent awe for the terrible power of the things they carried.

In the first week of April, before Lavender died, Lieutenant Jimmy Cross received a good-luck charm from Martha. It was a simple pebble, an ounce at most. Smooth to the touch, it was a milky-white color with flecks of orange and violet, oval-shaped, like a miniature egg. In the accompanying letter, Martha wrote that she had found the pebble on the Jersey shoreline, precisely where the land touched water at high tide, where things came together but also separated. It was this separate-but-together quality, she wrote, that had inspired her to pick up the pebble and to carry it in her breast pocket for several days, where it seemed weightless, and then to send it through the mail, by air, as a token of her truest feelings for him. Lieutenant Cross found this romantic. But he wondered what her truest feelings were, exactly, and what she meant by separate-but-together. He wondered how the tides and waves had come into play on that afternoon along the Jersey shoreline when Martha saw the pebble and bent down to rescue it from geology. He imagined bare feet. Martha was a poet, with the poet's sensibilities, and her feet would be brown and bare, the toenails unpainted, the eyes chilly and somber like the ocean in March, and though it was painful, he wondered who had been with her that afternoon. He imagined a pair of shadows moving along the strip of sand where things came together but also separated. It was phantom jealousy, he knew, but he couldn't help himself. He loved her so much. On the march, through the hot days of early April, he carried the pebble in his mouth, turning it with his tongue, tasting sea salts and moisture. His mind wandered. He had difficulty keeping his attention on the war. On occasion he would yell at his men to spread out the column, to keep their eyes open, but then he would slip away into daydreams, just pretending, walking barefoot along the Jersey shore, with Martha, carrying nothing. He would feel himself rising. Sun and waves and gentle winds, all love and lightness.

What they carried varied by mission.

When a mission took them to the mountains, they carried mosquito netting, machetes, canvas tarps, and extra bug juice. 15

If a mission seemed especially hazardous, or if it involved a place they knew to be bad, they carried everything they could. In certain heavily mined AOs,<sup>4</sup> where the land was dense with Toe Poppers and Bouncing Betties, they took turns humping a twenty-eight-pound mine detector. With its headphones and big sensing plate, the equipment was a stress on the lower back and shoulders, awkward to handle, often useless because of the shrapnel in the earth, but they carried it anyway, partly for safety, partly for the illusion of safety.

On ambush, or other night missions, they carried peculiar little odds and ends. Kiowa always took along his New Testament and a pair of moccasins for silence. Dave Jensen carried night-sight vitamins high in carotin. Lee Strunk carried his sling-shot; ammo, he claimed, would never be a problem. Rat Kiley carried brandy and M&M's. Until he was shot, Ted Lavender carried the starlight scope, which weighed

6.3 pounds with its aluminum carrying case. Henry Dobbins carried his girlfriend's pantyhose wrapped around his neck as a comforter. They all carried ghosts. When dark came, they would move out single file across the meadows and paddies to their ambush coordinates, where they would quietly set up the Claymores and lie down and spend the night waiting.

Other missions were more complicated and required special equipment. In mid-April, it was their mission to search out and destroy the elaborate tunnel complexes in the Than Khe area south of Chu Lai. To blow the tunnels, they carried one-pound blocks of pentrite high explosives, four blocks to a man, sixty-eight pounds in all. They carried wiring, detonators, and battery-powered clackers. Dave Jensen carried earplugs. Most often, before blowing the tunnels, they were ordered by higher command to search them, which was considered bad news, but by and large they just shrugged and carried out orders. Because he was a big man, Henry Dobbins was excused from tunnel duty. The others would draw numbers. Before Lavender died there were seventeen men in the platoon, and whoever drew the number seventeen would strip off his gear and crawl in head first with a flashlight and Lieutenant Cross's .45-caliber pistol. The rest of them would fan out as security. They would sit down or kneel, not facing the hole, listening to the ground beneath them, imagining cobwebs and ghosts, whatever was down there—the tunnel walls squeezing in—how the flashlight seemed impossibly heavy in the hand and how it was tunnel vision in the very strictest sense, compression in all ways, even time, and how you had to wiggle in—ass and elbows—a swallowed-up feeling—and how you found yourself worrying about odd things—will your flashlight go dead? Do rats carry rabies? If you screamed, how far would the sound carry? Would your buddies hear it? Would they have the courage to drag you out? In some respects, though not many, the waiting was worse than the tunnel itself. Imagination was a killer.

On April 16, when Lee Strunk drew the number seventeen, he laughed and muttered something and went down quickly. The morning was hot and very still. Not good, Kiowa said. He looked at the tunnel opening, then out across a dry paddy toward the village of Than Khe. Nothing moved. No clouds or birds or people. As they waited, the men smoked and drank Kool-Aid, not talking much, feeling sympathy for Lee Strunk but also feeling the luck of the draw. You win some, you lose some, said Mitchell Sanders, and sometimes you settle for a rain check. It was a tired line and no one laughed.

Henry Dobbins ate a tropical chocolate bar. Ted Lavender popped a tranquilizer and went off to pee. 20

After five minutes, Lieutenant Jimmy Cross moved to the tunnel, leaned down, and examined the darkness. Trouble, he thought—a cave-in maybe. And then suddenly, without willing it, he was thinking about Martha. The stresses and fractures, the quick collapse, the two of them buried alive under all that weight. Dense, crushing love. Kneeling, watching the hole, he tried to concentrate on Lee Strunk and the war, all the dangers, but his love was too much for him, he felt paralyzed, he wanted to sleep inside her lungs and breathe her blood and be smothered. He wanted her to be a virgin and not a virgin, all at once. He wanted to know her. Intimate secrets—why poetry? Why so sad? Why the grayness in her eyes? Why so alone? Not lonely, just alone—riding her bike across campus or sitting off by herself in the cafeteria. Even dancing, she danced alone—and it was the aloneness that filled him with love. He remembered telling her that one evening. How she nodded and looked away. And how, later, when he kissed her, she received the kiss without returning it, her eyes wide open, not afraid, not a virgin's eyes, just flat and uninvolved.

Lieutenant Cross gazed at the tunnel. But he was not there. He was buried with Martha under the white sand at the Jersey shore. They were pressed together, and the pebble in his mouth was her tongue. He was smiling. Vaguely, he was aware of how quiet the day was, the sullen paddies, yet he could not bring himself to worry about matters of security. He was beyond that. He was just a kid at war, in love. He was twenty-two years old. He couldn't help it.

A few moments later Lee Strunk crawled out of the tunnel. He came up grinning, filthy but alive. Lieutenant Cross nodded and closed his eyes while the others clapped Strunk on the back and made jokes about rising from the dead.

Worms, Rat Kiley said. Right out of the grave. Fuckin' zombie.

The men laughed. They all felt great relief.

Spook City, said Mitchell Sanders.

Lee Strunk made a funny ghost sound, a kind of moaning, yet very happy, and right then, when Strunk made that high happy moaning sound, when he went Ahhooooo, right then Ted Lavender was shot in the head on his way back from peeing. He lay with his mouth open. The teeth were broken. There was a swollen black bruise under his left eye. The cheekbone was gone. Oh shit, Rat Kiley said, the guy's dead. The guy's dead, he kept saying, which seemed profound—the guy's dead. I mean really.

The things they carried were determined to some extent by superstition. Lieutenant Cross carried his good-luck pebble. Dave Jensen carried a rabbit's foot. Norman Bowker, otherwise a very gentle person, carried a thumb that had been presented to him as a gift by Mitchell Sanders. The thumb was dark brown, rubbery to the touch, and weighed four ounces at most. It had been cut from a VC corpse, a boy of fifteen or sixteen. They'd found him at the bottom of an irrigation ditch, badly burned, flies in his mouth and eyes. The boy wore black shorts and sandals. At the time of his death he had been carrying a pouch of rice, a rifle, and three magazines of ammunition.

You want my opinion, Mitchell Sanders said, there's a definite moral here.

He put his hand on the dead boy's wrist. He was quiet for a time, as if counting a pulse, then he patted the stomach, almost affectionately, and used Kiowa's hunting hatchet to remove the thumb.

Henry Dobbins asked what the moral was.

Moral?

You know. Moral.

Sanders wrapped the thumb in toilet paper and handed it across to Norman Bowker. There was no blood. Smiling, he kicked the boy's head, watched the flies scatter, and said, It's like with that old TV show—Paladin. Have gun, will travel.

Henry Dobbins thought about it.
Yeah, well, he finally said. I don't see no moral.
There it is, man.
Fuck off.

They carried USO stationery and pencils and pens. They carried Sterno, safety pins, trip flares, signal flares, spools of wire, razor blades, chewing tobacco, liberated joss sticks and statuettes of the smiling Buddha, candles, grease pencils, The Stars and Stripes, fingernail clippers, Psy Ops<sup>5</sup> leaflets, bush hats, bolos, and much more. Twice a week, when the resupply choppers came in, they carried hot chow in green Mermite cans and large canvas bags filled with iced beer and soda pop. They carried plastic water containers, each with a two-gallon capacity. Mitchell Sanders carried a set of starched tiger fatigues for special occasions. Henry Dobbins carried Black Flag insecticide. Dave Jensen carried empty sandbags that could be filled at night for added protection. Lee Strunk carried tanning lotion. Some things they carried in common. Taking turns, they carried the big PRC-77 scrambler radio, which weighed thirty pounds with its battery. They shared the weight of memory. They took up what others could no longer bear. Often, they carried each other, the wounded or weak. They carried infections. They carried chess sets, basketballs, Vietnamese-English dictionaries, insignia of rank, Bronze Stars and Purple Hearts, plastic cards imprinted with the Code of Conduct. They carried diseases, among them malaria and dysentery. They carried lice and ringworm and leeches and paddy algae and various rots and molds. They carried the land itself—Vietnam, the place, the soil—a powdery orange-red dust that covered their boots and fatigues and faces. They carried the sky. The whole atmosphere, they carried it, the humidity, the monsoons, the stink of fungus and decay, all of it, they carried gravity. They moved like mules. By daylight they took sniper fire, at night they were mortared, but it was not battle, it was just the endless march, village to village, without purpose, nothing won or lost. They marched for the sake of the march. They plodded along slowly, dumbly, leaning forward against the heat, unthinking, all blood and bone, simple grunts, soldiering with their legs, toiling up the hills and down into the paddies and across the rivers and up again and down, just humping, one step and then the next and then another, but no volition, no will, because it was automatic, it was anatomy, and the war was entirely a matter of posture and carriage, the hump was everything, a kind of inertia, a kind of emptiness, a dullness of desire and intellect and conscience and hope and human sensibility. Their principles were in their feet. Their calculations were biological. They had no sense of strategy or mission. They searched the villages without knowing what to look for, not caring, kicking over jars of rice, frisking children and old men, blowing tunnels, sometimes setting fires and sometimes not, then forming up and moving on to the next village, then other villages, where it would always be the same. They carried their own lives. The pressures were enormous. In the heat of early afternoon, they would remove their helmets and flak jackets, walking bare, which was dangerous but which helped ease the strain. They would often discard things along the route of march. Purely for comfort, they would throw away rations, blow their Claymores and grenades, no matter, because by nightfall the resupply choppers would arrive with more of the same, then a day or two later still more, fresh watermelons and crates of ammunition and sunglasses and woolen sweaters—the resources were stunning—sparklers for the Fourth of July, colored eggs for Easter. It was the great American war chest—the fruits of science, the smokestacks, the canneries, the arsenals at Hartford, the Minnesota forests, the machine shops, the vast fields of corn and wheat—they carried like freight trains; they carried it on their backs and shoulders—and for all the ambiguities of Vietnam, all the mysteries and unknowns, there was at least the single abiding certainty that they would never be at a loss for things to carry.

After the chopper took Lavender away, Lieutenant Jimmy Cross led his men into the village of Than Khe. They burned everything. They shot chickens and dogs, they trashed the village well, they called in artillery and watched the wreckage, then they marched for several hours through the hot afternoon, and then at dusk, while Kiowa explained how Lavender died, Lieutenant Cross found himself trembling. 40

He tried not to cry. With his entrenching tool, which weighed five pounds, he began digging a hole in the earth.

He felt shame. He hated himself. He had loved Martha more than his men, and as a consequence Lavender was now dead, and this was something he would have to carry like a stone in his stomach for the rest of the war.

All he could do was dig. He used his entrenching tool like an ax, slashing, feeling both love and hate, and then later, when it was full dark, he sat at the bottom of his foxhole and wept. It went on for a long while. In part, he was grieving for Ted Lavender, but mostly it was for Martha, and for himself, because she belonged to another world, which was not quite real, and because she was a junior at Mount Sebastian College in New Jersey, a poet and a virgin and uninvolved, and because he realized she did not love him and never would.

Like cement, Kiowa whispered in the dark. I swear to God—boom-down. Not a word.

I've heard this, said Norman Bowker. 45

A pisser, you know? Still zipping himself up. Zapped while zipping.

All right, fine. That's enough.

Yeah, but you had to see it, the guy just—

I heard, man. Cement. So why not shut the fuck up?

Kiowa shook his head sadly and glanced over at the hole where Lieutenant Jimmy Cross sat watching the night. The air was thick and wet. A warm, dense fog had settled over the paddies and there was the stillness that precedes rain. 50

After a time Kiowa sighed.

One thing for sure, he said. The Lieutenant's in some deep hurt. I mean that crying jag—the way he was carrying on—it wasn't fake or anything, it was real heavy-duty hurt. The man cares.

Sure, Norman Bowker said.
Say what you want, the man does care.
We all got problems.
Not Lavender.
No, I guess not, Bowker said. Do me a favor, though.
Shut up?
That's a smart Indian. Shut up.

55

Shrugging, Kiowa pulled off his boots. He wanted to say more, just to lighten up his sleep, but instead he opened his New Testament and arranged it beneath his head as a pillow. The fog made things seem hollow and unattached. He tried not to think about Ted Lavender, but then he was thinking how fast it was, no drama, down and dead, and how it was hard to feel anything except surprise. It seemed un-Christian. He wished he could find some great sadness, or even anger, but the emotion wasn't there and he couldn't make it happen. Mostly he felt pleased to be alive. He liked the smell of the New Testament under his cheek, the leather and ink and paper and glue, whatever the chemicals were. He liked hearing the sounds of night. Even his fatigue, it felt fine, the stiff muscles and the prickly awareness of his own body, a floating feeling. He enjoyed not being dead. Lying there, Kiowa admired Lieutenant Jimmy Cross's capacity for grief. He wanted to share the man's pain, he wanted to care as Jimmy Cross cared. And yet when he closed his eyes, all he could think was Boom-down, and all he could feel was the pleasure of having his boots off and the fog curling in around him and the damp soil and the Bible smells and the plush comfort of night.

60

After a moment Norman Bowker sat up in the dark.
What the hell, he said. You want to talk, talk. Tell it to me.
Forget it.
No, man, go on. One thing I hate, it's a silent Indian.

For the most part they carried themselves with poise, a kind of dignity. Now and then, however, there were times of panic, when they squealed or wanted to squeal but couldn't, when they twitched and made moaning sounds and covered their heads and said Dear Jesus and flopped around on the earth and fired their weapons blindly and cringed and sobbed and begged for the noise to stop and went wild and made stupid promises to themselves and to God and to their mothers and fathers, hoping not to die. In different ways, it happened to all of them. Afterward, when the firing ended, they would blink and peek up. They would touch their bodies, feeling shame, then quickly hiding it. They would force themselves to stand. As if in slow motion, frame by frame, the world would take on the old logic—absolute silence, then the wind, then sunlight, then voices. It was the burden of being alive. Awkwardly, the men would reassemble themselves, first in private, then in groups, becoming soldiers again. They would repair the leaks in their eyes. They would check for casualties, call in dust-offs, light cigarettes, try to smile, clear their throats and spit and begin cleaning their weapons. After a time someone would shake his head and say, No lie, I almost shit my pants, and someone else would laugh, which meant it was bad, yes, but the guy had obviously not shit his pants, it wasn't that bad, and in any case nobody would ever do such a thing and then go ahead and talk about it. They would squint into the dense, oppressive sunlight. For a few moments, perhaps, they would fall silent, lighting a joint and tracking its passage from man to man, inhaling, holding in the humiliation. Scary stuff, one of them might say. But then someone else would grin or flick his eyebrows and say, Roger-dodger, almost cut me a new asshole, almost.

There were numerous such poses. Some carried themselves with a sort of wistful resignation, others with pride or stiff soldierly discipline or good humor or macho zeal. They were afraid of dying but they were even more afraid to show it.

They found jokes to tell.

They used a hard vocabulary to contain the terrible softness. Greased they'd say. Offed, lit up, zapped while zipping. It wasn't cruelty, just stage presence. They were actors and the war came at them in 3-D. When someone died, it wasn't quite dying, because in a curious way it seemed scripted, and because they had their lines mostly memorized, irony mixed with tragedy, and because they called it by other names, as if to encyst and destroy the reality of death itself. They kicked corpses. They cut off thumbs. They talked grunt lingo. They told stories about Ted Lavender's supply of tranquilizers, how the poor guy didn't feel a thing, how incredibly tranquil he was.

There's a moral here, said Mitchell Sanders.

They were waiting for Lavender's chopper, smoking the dead man's dope. 70

The moral's pretty obvious, Sanders said, and winked. Stay away from drugs. No joke, they'll ruin your day every time.

Cute, said Henry Dobbins.

Mind-blower, get it? Talk about wiggy—nothing left, just blood and brains.

They made themselves laugh.

There it is, they'd say, over and over, as if the repetition itself were an act of poise, a balance between crazy and almost crazy, knowing without going. There it is, which meant be cool, let it ride, because oh yeah, man, you can't change what can't be changed, there it is, there it absolutely and positively and fucking well is. 75

They were tough.

They carried all the emotional baggage of men who might die. Grief, terror, love, longing—these were intangibles, but the intangibles had their own mass and specific gravity, they had tangible weight. They carried shameful memories. They carried the common secret of cowardice barely restrained, the instinct to run or freeze or hide, and in many respects this was the heaviest burden of all, for it could never be put down, it required perfect balance and perfect posture. They carried their reputations. They carried the soldier's greatest fear, which was the fear of blushing. Men killed, and died, because they were embarrassed not to. It was what had brought them to the war in the first place, nothing positive, no dreams of glory or honor, just to avoid the blush of dishonor. They died so as not to die of embarrassment. They crawled into tunnels and walked point and advanced under fire. Each morning, despite the unknowns, they made their legs move. They endured. They kept humping. They did not submit to the obvious alternative, which was simply to close the eyes and fall. So easy, really. Go limp and tumble to the ground and let the muscles unwind and not speak and not budge until your buddies picked you up and lifted you into the chopper that would roar and dip its nose and carry you off to the world. A mere matter of falling, yet no one ever fell. It was not courage, exactly; the object was not valor. Rather, they were too frightened to be cowards.

By and large they carried these things inside, maintaining the masks of composure. They sneered at sick call. They spoke bitterly about guys who had found release by shooting off their own toes or fingers. pussies, they'd say. Candyasses. It was fierce, mocking talk, with only a trace of envy or awe, but even so, the image played itself out behind their eyes.

They imagined the muzzle against flesh. They imagined the quick, sweet pain, then the evacuation to Japan, then a hospital with warm beds and cute geisha nurses.

They dreamed of freedom birds.

At night, on guard, staring into the dark, they were carried away by jumbo jets. They felt the rush of takeoff. Gone! they yelled. And then velocity, wings and engines, a smiling stewardess—but it was more than a plane, it was a real bird, a big sleek silver bird with feathers and talons and high screeching. They were flying. The weights fell off, there was nothing to bear. They laughed and held on tight, feeling the cold slap of wind and altitude, soaring, thinking It's over, I'm gone!—they were naked, they were light and free—it was all lightness, bright and fast and buoyant, light as light, a helium buzz in the brain, a giddy bubbling in the lungs as they were taken up over the clouds and the war, beyond duty, beyond gravity and mortification and global entanglements—Sin loi!<sup>6</sup> they yelled, I'm sorry, motherfuckers, but I'm out of it, I'm goofed, I'm on a space cruise, I'm gone!—and it was a restful, disencumbered sensation, just riding the light waves, sailing that big silver freedom bird over the mountains and oceans, over America, over the farms and great sleeping cities and cemeteries and highways and the golden arches of McDonald's. It was flight, a kind of fleeing, a kind of falling, falling higher and higher, spinning off the edge of the earth and beyond the sun and through the vast, silent vacuum where there were no burdens and where everything weighed exactly nothing. Gone! they screamed, I'm sorry but I'm gone! And so at night, not quite dreaming, they gave themselves over to lightness, they were carried, they were purely borne.

80

On the morning after Ted Lavender died, First Lieutenant Jimmy Cross crouched at the bottom of his foxhole and burned Martha's letters. Then he burned the two photographs. There was a steady rain falling, which made it difficult, but he used heat tabs and Sterno to build a small fire, screening it with his body, holding the photographs over the tight blue flame with the tips of his fingers.

He realized it was only a gesture. Stupid, he thought. Sentimental, too, but mostly just stupid.

Lavender was dead. You couldn't burn the blame.

Besides, the letters were in his head. And even now, without photographs, Lieutenant Cross could see Martha playing volleyball in her white gym shorts and yellow T-shirt. He could see her moving in the rain.

When the fire died out, Lieutenant Cross pulled his poncho over his shoulders and ate breakfast from a can.

There was no great mystery, he decided.

In those burned letters Martha had never mentioned the war, except to say, Jimmy, take care of yourself. She wasn't involved. She signed the letters "Love," but it wasn't love, and all the fine lines and technicalities did not matter.

The morning came up wet and blurry. Everything seemed part of everything else, the fog and Martha and the deepening rain.

It was a war, after all.

Half smiling, Lieutenant Jimmy Cross took out his maps. He shook his head hard, as if to clear it, then bent forward and began planning the day's march. In ten minutes, or maybe twenty, he would rouse the men and they would pack up and head west, where the maps showed the country to be green and inviting. They would do what they had always done. The rain might add some weight, but otherwise it would be one more day layered upon all the other days.

He was realistic about it. There was that new hardness in his stomach.

No more fantasies, he told himself.

Henceforth, when he thought about Martha, it would be only to think that she belonged elsewhere. He would shut down the daydreams. This was not Mount Sebastian, it was another world, where there were no pretty poems or midterm exams, a place where men died because of carelessness and gross stupidity. Kiowa was right. Boom-down, and you were dead, never partly dead.

Briefly, in the rain, Lieutenant Cross saw Martha's gray eyes gazing back at him.

He understood.

It was very sad, he thought. The things men carried inside. The things men did or felt they had to do.

He almost nodded at her, but didn't.

Instead he went back to his maps. He was now determined to perform his duties firmly and without negligence. It wouldn't help Lavender, he knew that, but from this point on he would comport himself as a soldier. He would dispose of his good-luck pebble. Swallow it, maybe, or use Lee Strunk's slingshot, or just drop it along the trail. On the march he would impose strict field discipline. He would be careful to send out flank security, to prevent straggling or bunching up, to keep his troops moving at the proper pace and at the proper interval. He would insist on clean weapons. He would confiscate the remainder of Lavender's dope. Later in the day, perhaps, he would call the men together and speak to them plainly. He would accept the blame for what had happened to Ted Lavender. He would be a man about it. He would look them in the eyes, keeping his chin level, and he would issue the new SOPs in a calm, impersonal tone of voice, an officer's voice, leaving no room for argument or discussion. Commencing immediately, he'd tell them, they would no longer abandon equipment along the route of march. They would police up their acts. They would get their shit together, and keep it together, and maintain it neatly and in good working order.

He would not tolerate laxity. He would show strength, distancing himself.

Among the men there would be grumbling, of course, and maybe worse, because their days would seem longer and their loads heavier, but Lieutenant Cross reminded himself that his obligation was not to be loved but to lead. He would dispense with love; it was not now a factor. And if anyone quarreled or complained, he would simply tighten his lips and arrange his shoulders in the correct command posture. He might give a curt little nod. Or he might not. He might just shrug and say Carry on, then they would saddle up and form into a column and move out toward the villages of Than Khe.

Questions for Discussion

1. The story begins with a paragraph about Jimmy Cross and his relationship with Martha. What does Martha represent to Cross? Why might it be significant that Cross obsesses about whether or not she is a virgin? How do Cross's feelings for Martha change toward the end of the story, and how does this change point the way to one of the themes of the story?
2. What role does Hollywood play in this story? How are the soldiers' expectations of war and death shaped by the movies? Where in this story does Hollywood fantasy meet reality? What point is O'Brien making?
3. According to the narrator, "The things they carried were largely determined by necessity" (para. 2), were "partly a function of rank, partly of field specialty" (para. 6), "varied by mission" (para. 14), and "were determined to some extent by superstition" (para. 28). Which is the strongest factor in determining what they carried? Do you find any irony in the things they carried?
4. Jimmy Cross carries "the responsibility for the lives of his men" (para. 7) and ultimately cannot bear that burden. What does he literally and figuratively shed in order to bear that weight following Lavender's death? What point is O'Brien making?
5. Why do you think the medic would need "M&M's for especially bad wounds" (para. 9)?
6. In paragraph 29, the soldiers find the burned corpse of a teenage Vietcong soldier at the bottom of a ditch, and Sanders says, "there's a definite moral here," before cutting off the boy's thumb and giving it to Bowker. Dobbins doesn't see the moral, and ultimately, they decide, "There it is." What do they mean by that? Look at paragraph 75, where O'Brien talks more about the meaning of that phrase. Does "The Things They Carried" have a moral? If so, what is it?
7. The soldiers react differently to Ted Lavender's death (paras. 11, 27, 40–64). Pick one soldier whose reaction seems particularly significant, and explain why you find it meaningful.
8. After studying terminally ill patients, psychologist Elisabeth Kübler-Ross described five stages in the process of dealing with death: (1) denial, or "this isn't happening"; (2) anger, or "why me?"; (3) bargaining, or "I'd do anything"; (4) depression, or "I - give up”; and (5) acceptance, or “It’s okay.” Do the soldiers facing death in this story display these behaviors? Which stages do you notice, and in what circumstances? Which stage seems most prevalent? Why do you think that is?

9. In paragraph 77, the narrator says, “They carried the soldier’s greatest fear, which was the fear of blushing.” Why do you think the soldiers were more afraid to blush than to die?
  10. Paragraph 97 says, “It was very sad, [Cross] thought. The things men carried inside. The things men did or felt they had to do.” What things do you think Cross is thinking about? What does he intend to do about it? Do you think he will succeed? Do you think it will matter? Explain your answers.
  11. What opinion do you think O’Brien has about the soldiers, the war, and, specifically, Lieutenant Cross? Support your inferences with specific references to the text.

Questions on Style and Structure

1. Paragraph 3 says, “They were called legs or grunts.” Explain why this use of synecdoche (using a part to refer to the whole) is especially appropriate not only for this story but for life in the military in general.
2. What evidence do you find that Jimmy Cross is a Christ figure? How does the symbolism of his name and initials influence your reading of the story? Is the virgin Martha akin to the Virgin Mary? Explain why or why not.
3. The story’s central event is the death of Ted Lavender, which the story returns to again and again. Why do you think the story revisits this event so often? Do you think this repetition honors Lavender or trivializes his death? Explain your answer.
4. The reader learns about Ted Lavender’s death in the second paragraph, but the narrator provides few details until paragraph 27. What is the effect of the delay on the reader? What does the delay suggest about the effects of war on the soldiers?
5. How does O’Brien characterize the soldiers by the things they carry?
6. One technique O’Brien employs is zeugma, in which one word has more than one (often incongruous) object. For example, he writes in paragraph 12, “They carried all they could bear, and then some, including a silent awe for the terrible power of the things they carried.” Look for other examples of zeugma in the story. Do you see any pattern in how O’Brien uses zeugma? In particular, consider how O’Brien exploits the incongruity of zeugma in order to develop one of the themes of the story.
7. Paragraph 18 contains a series of questions. Consider all the possible meanings of the statement “Imagination was a killer.” How does it answer the questions?
8. At the end of paragraph 39, the narrator adds the products of the “great American war chest” to “the things they carried.” Explain the political statement this extended metaphor makes.
9. How many times does the word “they” appear from paragraphs 65 through 81? (Literally, count them.) Why does O’Brien use that pronoun so often at the end of the story?

10. In paragraph 99, the conditional “would” is repeated in nearly every sentence. What does this parallelism suggest? How does it add to the characterization of Lieutenant Cross?

Suggestions for Writing

1. Read once again the epigraph to this chapter. Write an essay in which you consider how O’Brien’s remarks serve to introduce “The Things They Carried.”
2. Consider carefully the organization and narrative method O’Brien uses in this story. While some sections attempt to define and explain the nature of the soldier’s war experience, other sections are narratives about individual soldiers. Write an essay in which you explain how the structure O’Brien uses comments on war.
3. Sometimes a work of literature reveals a great deal of richness in what it leaves out or what it doesn’t say. “The Things They Carried” concentrates on what the soldiers carry, giving the soldiers little purpose beyond “humping.” Write an essay discussing what O’Brien is trying to say by focusing on the minutiae of war. Think especially about what he leaves out.
4. One might view O’Brien’s narrative structure itself to be symbolic. Each time the narrator brings order to the events by returning to an organized account of the things that they carried, the process slips into personal accounts and idiosyncratic details. How does such a method work symbolically to suggest something about the subject matter of the story?
5. Read “Naming of Parts” by Henry Reed (p. 1428). Compare and contrast that poem’s techniques and themes to those of “The Things they Carried.”
6. At the end of the story, Jimmy Cross feels responsible for Lavender’s death, and his thoughts turn again to Martha as he decides to strengthen his resolve. Assume the character of Lieutenant Cross and write a letter to Martha about the incident. Then write her reply.

LUIGI PIRANDELLO

Perhaps best known as a dramatist—especially for his play Six Characters in Search of an Author (1921)—Luigi Pirandello (1867–1936) was also a prolific short-story writer. He was born in Sicily and educated at the University of Bonn in Germany, receiving his doctorate there in 1891. For years he wrote novels, stories, and plays; worked as a professor at a teacher's college for women; and cared for his wife, who suffered from mental illness. After achieving literary success, he left teaching and devoted himself to writing, opening a theater in Rome in 1925. His company performed plays throughout Europe and also in South America. Pirandello was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1934. In many of his works, characters struggle with the nature of truth and reality itself. The story included here, "War," is among the most admired of his two-hundred-plus short stories.

The passengers who had left Rome by the night express had to stop until dawn at the small station of Fabriano in order to continue their journey by the small old-fashioned local joining the main line with Sulmona.

At dawn, in a stuffy and smoky second-class carriage in which five people had already spent the night, a bulky woman in deep mourning was hoisted in—almost like a shapeless bundle. Behind her, puffing and moaning, followed her husband—a tiny man, thin and weakly, his face death-white, his eyes small and bright and looking shy and uneasy.

Having at last taken a seat he politely thanked the passengers who had helped his wife and who had made room for her; then he turned round to the woman trying to pull down the collar of her coat, and politely inquired:

"Are you all right, dear?"

The wife, instead of answering, pulled up her collar again to her eyes, so as to hide her face. 5

"Nasty world," muttered the husband with a sad smile.

And he felt it his duty to explain to his traveling companions that the poor woman was to be pitied, for the war was taking away from her her only son, a boy of twenty to whom both had devoted their entire life, even breaking up their home at Sulmona to follow him to Rome, where he had to go as a student, then allowing him to volunteer for war with an assurance, however, that at least for six months he would not be sent to the front and now, all of a sudden, receiving a wire saying that he was due to leave in three days' time and asking them to go and see him off.

The woman under the big coat was twisting and wriggling, at times growling like a wild animal, feeling certain that all those explanations would not have aroused even a shadow of sympathy from those people who—most likely—were in the same plight as herself. One of them, who had been listening with particular attention, said:

"You should thank God that your son is only leaving now for the front. Mine has been sent there the first day of the war. He has already come back twice wounded and been sent back again to the front."

"What about me? I have two sons and three nephews at the front," said another passenger.

"Maybe, but in our case it is our only son," ventured the husband.

10

"What difference can it make? You may spoil your only son with excessive attentions, but you cannot love him more than you would all your other children if you had any. Paternal love is not like bread that can be broken into pieces and split amongst the children in equal shares. A father gives all his love to each one of his children without discrimination, whether it be one or ten, and if I am suffering now for my two sons, I am not suffering half for each of them but double . . ."

"True . . . true . . ." sighed the embarrassed husband, "but suppose (of course we all hope it will never be your case) a father has two sons at the front and he loses one of them, there is still one left to console him . . . while . . ."

"Yes," answered the other, getting cross, "a son left to console him but also a son left for whom he must survive, while in the case of the father of an only son if the son dies the father can die too and put an end to his distress. What of the two positions is the worse? Don't you see how my case would be worse than yours?"

"Nonsense," interrupted another traveler, a fat red-faced man with bloodshot eyes of the palest gray.

He was panting. From his bulging eyes seemed to spurt inner violence of an uncontrolled vitality which his weakened body could hardly contain.

15

"Nonsense," he repeated, trying to cover his mouth with his hand so as to hide the two missing front teeth. "Nonsense. Do we give life to our children for our own benefit?"

The other travelers stared at him in distress. The one who had his son at the front since the first day of the war sighed: "You are right. Our children do not belong to us, they belong to the Country. . . ."

"Bosh," retorted the fat traveler. "Do we think of the Country when we give life to our children? Our sons are born because . . . well, because they must be born and when they come to life they take our own life with them. This is the truth. We belong to them but they can never belong to us. And when they reach twenty they are exactly what we were at their age. We too had a father and mother, but there were so many other things as well . . . girls, cigarettes, illusions, new ties . . . and the Country, of course, whose call we would have answered—when we were twenty—even if father and mother had said no. Now at our age, the love of our Country is still great, of course, but stronger than it is the love for our children. Is there any one of us here who wouldn't gladly take his son's place at the front if he could?"

There was a silence all round, everybody nodding as to approve.

"Why then," continued the fat man, "shouldn't we consider the feelings of our children when they are twenty? Isn't it natural that at their age they should consider the love for their Country (I am speaking of decent boys, of course) even greater than the love for us? Isn't it natural that it should be so, as after all they must look upon us as upon old boys who cannot move any more and must stay at home? If Country exists, if Country is a natural necessity, like bread, of which each of us must eat in order not to die of hunger, somebody must go to defend it. And our sons go, when they are twenty, and they don't want tears, because if they die, they die inflamed and happy (I am speaking, of course, of decent boys). Now, if one dies young and happy, without having the ugly sides of life, the boredom of it, the pettiness, the bitterness of disillusion . . . what more can we ask for him? Everyone should stop crying, everyone should laugh as I do . . . or at least thank God—as I do—because my son, before dying sent me a message saying that he was dying satisfied at having ended his life in the best way he could have wished. That is why, as you see, I do not even wear mourning. . . .”

He shook his light fawn coat as to show it; his livid lip over his missing teeth was trembling, his eyes were watery and motionless, and soon after he ended with a shrill laugh which might well have been a sob.

“Quite so . . . quite so . . .” agreed the others.

The woman who, bundled in a corner under her coat, had been sitting and listening had—for the last three months—tried to find in the words of her husband and her friends something to console her in her deep sorrow, something that might show her how a mother should resign herself to send her son not even to death but to a probably dangerous life. Yet not a word had she found amongst the many which had been said . . . and her grief had been greater in seeing that nobody—as she thought—could share her feelings.

But now the words of the traveler amazed and almost stunned her. She suddenly realized that it wasn't the others who were wrong and could not understand her but herself who could not rise up to the same height of those fathers and mothers willing to resign themselves, without crying, not only to the departure of their sons but even to their death.

She lifted her head, she bent over from her corner trying to listen with great attention to the details which the fat man was giving to his companions about the way his son had fallen as a hero, for his King and his Country, happy and without regrets. It seemed to her that she had stumbled into a world she had never dreamt of, a world so far unknown to her and she was so pleased to hear everyone joining in congratulating that brave father who could so stoically speak of his child's death.

Then suddenly, just as if she had heard nothing of what had been said and almost as if waking up from a dream, she turned to the old man, asking him:

“Then . . . is your son really dead?”

Everybody stared at her. The old man, too, turned to look at her, fixing his great, bulging, horribly watery light gray eyes, deep in her face. For some little time he tried to answer, but words failed him. He looked at her, almost as if only then—at that silly, incongruous question—he had suddenly realized at last that his son was really dead—gone for ever—for ever. His face contracted, became horribly distorted, then he snatched in haste a handkerchief from his pocket and, to the amazement of everyone, broke into harrowing, heart-rending, uncontrollable sobs.

Exploring the Text

1. What is the significance of the title of the story? Where is the “war”?
2. Take another look at how each of Pirandello’s main characters is described. How do the physical descriptions work metaphorically? Why are some characters more developed than others? Why doesn’t he give them names?
3. What is the argument among the travelers? What do they have to say about sacrifice and bravery? about suffering and consolation? about patriotism? What do they agree on, and what do they not agree on?
4. How does the information in paragraphs 24–26 influence the reader’s expectations of how the story might end? What might the reader expect the woman to say and do? How did you expect the story to end? How does Pirandello undermine those expectations?
5. Do you interpret this as an antiwar story or a story about the honor of serving one’s country? Explain your answer. Does Pirandello honor the sacrifice of soldiers? Cite specific passages to support your interpretation.

The First Year of My Life

MURIEL SPARK

Muriel Spark was born in Scotland in 1918 and educated in Edinburgh. Spark lived and wrote in Scotland, England, the United States, Zimbabwe (called Rhodesia at the time), and Italy, where she lived for more than thirty years. She died at home in Tuscany in 2006. Author of more than twenty novels and many volumes of stories, she is well known not only for her fiction but also for her poetry and nonfiction. Among her works is a biography of Emily Brontë; a critical study of the work of Mary Shelley; and several satiric novels—including Memento Mori (1959) and The Girls of Slender Means (1963)—but it is her 1961 novel, The Prime of Miss Jean Brodie, that has endured as her most successful work. Immensely popular, the novel was adapted for the stage, film, and television. A satirist, Spark targets hypocrisy and pretense in her stories, treating some of her characters with an acerbic tongue and sarcastic bite. Spark was born during the First World War, as she reveals in “The First Year of My Life,” and worked in British Intelligence during World War II. Both wars influenced the writing of the story included here.

I was born on the first day of the second month of the last year of the First World War, a Friday. Testimony abounds that during the first year of my life I never smiled. I was known as the baby whom nothing and no one could make smile. Everyone who knew me then has told me so. They tried very hard, singing and bouncing me up and down, jumping around, pulling faces. Many times I was told this later by my family and their friends; but, anyway, I knew it at the time.

You will shortly be hearing of that new school of psychology, or maybe you have heard of it already, which after long and far-adventuring research and experiment has established that all of the young of the human species are born omniscient. Babies, in their waking hours, know everything that is going on everywhere in the world; they can tune in to any conversation they choose, switch on to any scene. We have all experienced this power. It is only after the first year that it was brainwashed out of us; for it is demanded of us by our immediate environment that we grow to be of use to it in a practical way. Gradually, our know-all brain-cells are blacked out, although traces remain in some individuals in the form of E.S.P., and in the adults of some primitive tribes.

It is not a new theory. Poets and philosophers, as usual, have been there first. But scientific proof is now ready and to hand. Perhaps the final touches are being put to the new manifesto in some cell at Harvard University. Any day now it will be given to the world, and the world will be convinced.

Let me therefore get my word in first, because I feel pretty sure, now, about the authenticity of my remembrance of things past. My autobiography, as I very well perceived at the time, started in the very worst year that the world had ever seen so far. Apart from being born bedridden and toothless, unable to raise myself on the pillow or utter anything but farmyard squawks or police-siren wails, my bladder and my bowels totally out of control, I was further depressed by the curious behaviour of the two-legged mammals around me. There were those black-dressed people, females of the species to which I appeared to belong, saying they had lost their sons. I slept a great deal. Let them go and find their sons. It was like the special pin for my nappies which my mother or some other hoverer dedicated to my care was always losing. These careless women in black lost their husbands and their brothers. Then they came to visit my mother and clucked and crowed over my cradle. I was not amused.

'Babies never really smile till they're three months old,' said my mother. 'They're not supposed to smile till they're three months old.' 5

My brother, aged six, marched up and down with a toy rifle over his shoulder:

The grand old Duke of York
He had ten thousand men;
He marched them up to the top of the hill
And he marched them down again.

And when they were up, they were up.
And when they were down, they were down.
And when they were neither down nor up
They were neither up nor down.

'Just listen to him!'
'Look at him with his rifle!'

I was about ten days old when Russia stopped fighting. I tuned in to the Czar, a prisoner, with the rest of his family, since evidently the country had put him off his throne and there had been a revolution not long before I was born. Everyone was talking about it. I tuned in to the Czar. ‘Nothing would ever induce me to sign the treaty of Brest-Litovsk,’ he said to his wife. Anyway, nobody had asked him to.

At this point I was sleeping twenty hours a day to get my strength up. And from what I discerned in the other four hours of the day I knew I was going to need it. The Western Front on my frequency was sheer blood, mud, dismembered bodies, blistered crashes, hectic flashes of light in the night skies, explosions, total terror. Since it was plain I had been born into a bad moment in the history of the world, the future bothered me, unable as I was to raise my head from the pillow and as yet only twenty inches long. ‘I truly wish I were a fox or a bird,’ D. H. Lawrence was writing to somebody. Dreary old creeping Jesus. I fell asleep.

Red sheets of flame shot across the sky. It was 21st March, the fiftieth day of my life, and the German Spring Offensive had started before my morning feed. Infinite slaughter. I scowled at the scene, and made an effort to kick out. But the attempt was feeble. Furious, and impatient for some strength, I wailed for my feed. After which I stopped wailing but continued to scowl.

The grand old Duke of York
He had ten thousand men . . .

They rocked the cradle. I never heard a sillier song. Over in Berlin and Vienna the people were starving, freezing, striking, rioting and yelling in the streets. In London everyone was bustling to work and muttering that it was time the whole damn business was over.

The big people around me bared their teeth; that meant a smile, it meant they were pleased or amused. They spoke of ration cards for meat and sugar and butter.

‘Where will it all end?’

I went to sleep. I woke and tuned in to Bernard Shaw who was telling someone to shut up. I switched over to Joseph Conrad who, strangely enough, was saying precisely the same thing. I still didn’t think it worth a smile, although it was expected of me any day now. I got on to Turkey. Women draped in black huddled and chattered in their harems; yak-yak-yak. This was boring, so I came back to home base.

In and out came and went the women in British black. My mother’s brother, dressed in his uniform, came coughing. He had been poison-gassed in the trenches. ‘Tout le monde à la bataille!’ declaimed Marshal Foch the old swine. He was now Commander-in-Chief of the Allied Forces. My uncle coughed from deep within his lungs, never to recover but destined to return to the Front. His brass buttons gleamed in the firelight. I weighed twelve pounds by now; I stretched and kicked for exercise, seeing that I had a lifetime before me, coping with this crowd. I took six feeds a day and kept most of them down by the time the Vindictive was sunk in Ostend harbour, on which day I kicked with special vigour in my bath.

In France the conscripted soldiers leapfrogged over the dead on the advance and littered the fields with limbs and hands, or drowned in the mud. The strongest men on all fronts were dead before I was born. Now the sentries used bodies for barricades and the fighting men were unhealthy from the start. I checked my toes and fingers, knowing I was going to need them. The Playboy of the Western World was playing at the Court Theatre in London, but occasionally I beamed over to the House of Commons which made me drop off gently to sleep. Generally, I preferred the Western Front where one got the true state of affairs. It was essential to know the worst, blood and explosions and all, for one had to be prepared, as the boy scouts said. Virginia Woolf yawned and reached for her diary. Really, I preferred the Western Front.

In the fifth month of my life I could raise my head from my pillow and hold it up. I could grasp the objects that were held out to me. Some of these things rattled and squawked. I gnawed on them to get my teeth started. 'She hasn't smiled yet?' said the dreary old aunties. My mother, on the defensive, said I was probably one of those late smilers. On my wavelength Pablo Picasso was getting married and early in that month of July the Silver Wedding of King George V and Queen Mary was celebrated in joyous pomp at St. Paul's Cathedral. They drove through the streets of London with their children. Twenty-five years of domestic happiness. A lot of fuss and ceremonial handing over of swords went on at the Guildhall where the King and Queen received a cheque for £53,000 to dispose of for charity as they thought fit. Tout le monde à la bataille! Income tax in England had reached six shillings in the pound. Everyone was talking about the Silver Wedding; yak-yak-yak, and ten days later the Czar and his family, now in Siberia, were invited to descend to a little room in the basement. Crack, crack, went the guns; screams and blood all over the place, and that was the end of the Romanoffs. I flexed my muscles. 'A fine healthy baby,' said the doctor; which gave me much satisfaction.

Tout le monde à la bataille! That included my gassed uncle. My health had improved to the point where I was able to crawl in my playpen. Bertrand Russell was still cheerily in prison for writing something seditious about pacifism. Tuning in as usual to the Front Lines it looked as if the Germans were winning all the battles yet losing the war. And so it was. The upper-income people were upset about the income tax at six shillings to the pound. But all women over thirty got the vote. 'It seems a long time to wait,' said one of my drab old aunts, aged twenty-two. The speeches in the House of Commons always sent me to sleep which was why I missed, at the actual time, a certain oration by Mr. Asquith following the armistice on 11th November. Mr. Asquith was a greatly esteemed former prime minister later to be an Earl, and had been ousted by Mr. Lloyd George. I clearly heard Asquith, in private, refer to Lloyd George as 'that damned Welsh goat'.

The armistice was signed and I was awake for that. I pulled myself on to my feet with the aid of the bars of my cot. My teeth were coming through very nicely in my opinion, and well worth all the trouble I was put to in bringing them forth. I weighed twenty pounds. On all the world's fighting fronts the men killed in action or dead of wounds numbered 8,538,315 and the warriors wounded and maimed were 21,219,452. With these figures in mind I sat up in my high chair and banged my spoon on the table. One of my mother's black-draped friends recited:

I have a rendezvous with Death
At some disputed barricade,

When spring comes back with rustling shade
 And apple blossoms fill the air —
 I have a rendezvous with Death.

Most of the poets, they said, had been killed. The poetry made them dab their eyes with clean white handkerchiefs. 20

Next February on my first birthday, there was a birthday-cake with one candle. Lots of children and their elders. The war had been over two months and twenty-one days. 'Why doesn't she smile?' My brother was to blow out the candle. The elders were talking about the war and the political situation. Lloyd George and Asquith, Asquith and Lloyd George. I remembered recently having switched on to Mr. Asquith at a private party where he had been drinking a lot. He was playing cards and when he came to cut the cards he tried to cut a large box of matches by mistake. On another occasion I had seen him putting his arm around a lady's shoulder in a Daimler motor car, and generally behaving towards her in a very friendly fashion. Strangely enough she said, 'If you don't stop this nonsense immediately I'll order the chauffeur to stop and I'll get out.' Mr. Asquith replied, 'And pray, what reason will you give?' Well anyway it was my feeding time.

The guests arrived for my birthday. It was so sad, said one of the black widows, so sad about Wilfred Owen who was killed so late in the war, and she quoted from a poem of his:

What passing-bells for these who die as cattle?
 Only the monstrous anger of the guns.

The children were squealing and toddling around. One was sick and another wet the floor and stood with his legs apart gaping at the puddle. All was mopped up. I banged my spoon on the table of my high chair.

But I've a rendezvous with Death
 At midnight in some flaming town;
 When spring trips north again this year,
 And I to my pledged word am true,
 I shall not fail that rendezvous.

More parents and children arrived. One stout man who was warming his behind at the fire, said, 'I always think those words of Asquith's after the armistice were so apt . . .'

They brought the cake close to my high chair for me to see, with the candle shining and flickering above the pink icing. 'A pity she never smiles.' 25

'She'll smile in time,' my mother said, obviously upset.

'What Asquith told the House of Commons just after the war,' said that stout gentleman with his backside to the fire, '—so apt, what Asquith said. He said that the war has cleansed and purged the world, by God! I recall his actual words: "All things have become new. In this great cleansing and purging it has been the privilege of our country to play her part . . ."'

That did it. I broke into a decided smile and everyone noticed it, convinced that it was provoked by the fact that my brother had blown out the candle on the cake.

‘She smiled!’ my mother exclaimed. And everyone was clucking away about how I was smiling. For good measure I crowed like a demented raven. ‘My baby’s smiling!’ said my mother.

‘It was the candle on her cake,’ they said.

The cake be damned. Since that time I have grown to smile quite naturally, like any other healthy and house-trained person, but when I really mean a smile, deeply felt from the core, then to all intents and purposes it comes in response to the words uttered in the House of Commons after the First World War by the distinguished, the immaculately dressed and the late Mr. Asquith.

Exploring the Text

1. Why do you think Spark has chosen to tell this story from such an unusual perspective? How does the information she provides in the first three paragraphs contribute to this perspective? What, for instance, does the narrator mean by her statement that after the first year, omniscience is “brainwashed out of us; for it is demanded of us by our immediate environment that we grow to be of use to it in a practical way” (para. 2)?
2. What is the purpose of such phrases as “two-legged mammals” and “black-dressed people” in paragraph 4? What is the effect of the narrator’s deliberate misunderstanding of people “losing” or “having lost” family members?
3. Why does the narrator repeat certain phrases or lyrics, such as “Tout le monde à la bataille!” (paras. 15, 17, 18), “The grand old Duke of York” (paras. 6, 11), and “I have a rendezvous with Death” (paras. 19, 23)?
4. Spark provides very specific information about World War I in the story, especially about the battles, the Western Front, and the countries involved. For instance, the narrator states, “I took six feeds a day and kept most of them down by the time the Vindictive was sunk in Ostend harbour, on which day I kicked with special vigour in my bath” (para. 15). How do the historical facts become part of the fictional narrative?
5. In addition to political figures, Spark populates her story with artists and writers, such as Virginia Woolf, D. H. Lawrence, Pablo Picasso, and Joseph Conrad. What is the purpose and effect of these references? How do they relate to the events she portrays?
6. Paragraph 16 begins, “In France the conscripted soldiers leapfrogged over the dead on the advance and littered the fields with limbs and hands, or drowned in the mud.” How would you characterize the tone in this paragraph? Why does Spark choose this tone to present horrible content? Why does Spark juxtapose the horrors of the battlefield with references to a comic play, the House of Commons, and the writing of Virginia Woolf?
7. In paragraph 18, Spark writes, “Bertrand Russell was still cheerily in prison for writing something seditious about pacifism.” What is Spark’s attitude toward Bertrand Russell’s actions? How can you tell?

8. In paragraphs 21 through 28, Spark provides details about Mr. Asquith and then smiles for the first time in her life. What details does she choose to characterize Asquith? Why does she smile? What's the connection?
9. What is the purpose of the juxtaposition of adult behavior and infant behavior throughout the story?
10. Considering the grave nature of her subject matter, how appropriate is Spark's use of point of view, irony, and sarcasm? Use specific examples from the text to support your assessment.

The Shawl

CYNTHIA OZICK

Cynthia Ozick was born in 1928 in New York City, where she fell in love with literature as a child in the Bronx. The child of Lithuanian immigrants, she was strongly influenced by both the literature of her Jewish tradition and the New York writings of Henry James. She earned her BA at New York University and her MA in English literature at Ohio State University. Ozick is highly regarded for her ideas as well as her stories. "Even when you disagree with her, she electrifies your mind," wrote critic Christopher Lehmann-Haupt in the New York Times in 2000. Ozick continues to write both fiction and essays; in 2008, she received the PEN/Nabokov Award. "The Shawl" is perhaps her most famous piece. Published in 1980 in the New Yorker and selected for inclusion in The Best American Short Stories of the Century (1999), it delivers a powerful glimpse into the personal horrors of the Holocaust. In an interview published in the spring 1987 Paris Review, Ozick discussed writing about the Holocaust: "I don't want to tamper or invent or imagine, and yet I have done it. I can't not do it. It comes. It invades."

Stella, cold, cold, the coldness of hell. How they walked on the roads together, Rosa with Magda curled up between sore breasts, Magda wound up in the shawl. Sometimes Stella carried Magda. But she was jealous of Magda. A thin girl of fourteen, too small, with thin breasts of her own, Stella wanted to be wrapped in a shawl, hidden away, asleep, rocked by the march, a baby, a round infant in arms. Magda took Rosa's nipple, and Rosa never stopped walking, a walking cradle. There was not enough milk; sometimes Magda sucked air; then she screamed. Stella was ravenous. Her knees were tumors on sticks, her elbows chicken bones.

Rosa did not feel hunger; she felt light, not like someone walking but like someone in a faint, in trance, arrested in a fit, someone who is already a floating angel, alert and seeing everything, but in the air, not there, not touching the road. As if teetering on the tips of her fingernails. She looked into Magda's face through a gap in the shawl: a squirrel in a nest, safe, no one could reach her inside the little house of the shawl's windings. The face, very round, a pocket mirror of a face: but it was not Rosa's bleak complexion, dark like cholera, it was another kind of face altogether, eyes blue as air, smooth feathers of hair nearly as yellow as the Star sewn into Rosa's coat. You could think she was one of their babies.

Rosa, floating, dreamed of giving Magda away in one of the villages. She could leave the line for a minute and push Magda into the hands of any woman on the side of the road. But if she moved out of line they might shoot. And even if she fled the line for half a second and pushed the shawl-bundle at a stranger, would the woman take it? She might be surprised, or afraid; she might drop the shawl, and Magda would fall out and strike her head and die. The little round head. Such a good child, she gave up screaming, and sucked now only for the taste of the drying nipple itself. The neat grip of the tiny gums. One mite of a tooth tip sticking up in the bottom gum, how shining, an elfin tombstone of white marble, gleaming there. Without complaining, Magda relinquished Rosa's teats, first the left, then the right; both were cracked, not a sniff of milk. The duct crevice extinct, a dead volcano, blind eye, chill hole, so Magda took the corner of the shawl and milked it instead. She sucked and sucked, flooding the threads with wetness. The shawl's good flavor, milk of linen.

It was a magic shawl, it could nourish an infant for three days and three nights. Magda did not die, she stayed alive, although very quiet. A peculiar smell, of cinnamon and almonds, lifted out of her mouth. She held her eyes open every moment, forgetting how to blink or nap, and Rosa and sometimes Stella studied their blueness. On the road they raised one burden of a leg after another and studied Magda's face. "Aryan," Stella said, in a voice grown as thin as a string; and Rosa thought how Stella gazed at Magda like a young cannibal. And the time that Stella said "Aryan," it sounded to Rosa as if Stella had really said, "Let us devour her."

But Magda lived to walk. She lived that long, but she did not walk very well, partly 5 because she was only fifteen months old, and partly because the spindles of her legs could not hold up her fat belly. It was fat with air, full and round. Rosa gave almost all her food to Magda, Stella gave nothing; Stella was ravenous, a growing child herself, but not growing much. Stella did not menstruate. Rosa did not menstruate. Rosa was ravenous, but also not; she learned from Magda how to drink the taste of a finger in one's mouth. They were in a place without pity, all pity was annihilated in Rosa, she looked at Stella's bones without pity. She was sure that Stella was waiting for Magda to die so she could put her teeth into the little thighs.

Rosa knew Magda was going to die very soon; she should have been dead already, but she had been buried away deep inside the magic shawl, mistaken there for the shivering mound of Rosa's breasts; Rosa clung to the shawl as if it covered only herself. No one took it away from her. Magda was mute. She never cried. Rosa hid her in the barracks, under the shawl, but she knew that one day someone would inform; or one day someone, not even Stella, would steal Magda to eat her. When Magda began to walk Rosa knew that Magda was going to die very soon, something would happen. She was afraid to fall asleep; she slept with the weight of her thigh on Magda's body; she was afraid she would smother Magda under her thigh. The weight of Rosa was becoming less and less, Rosa and Stella were slowly turning into air.

Magda was quiet, but her eyes were horribly alive, like blue tigers. She watched. Sometimes she laughed—it seemed a laugh, but how could it be? Magda had never seen anyone laugh. Still, Magda laughed at her shawl when the wind blew its corners, the bad wind with pieces of black in it, that made Stella's and Rosa's eyes tear. Magda's eyes were always clear and tearless. She watched like a tiger. She guarded her shawl. No one could touch it; only Rosa could touch it. Stella was not allowed. The shawl was Magda's own baby, her pet, her little sister. She tangled herself up in it and sucked on one of the corners when she wanted to be very still.

Then Stella took the shawl away and made Magda die.

Afterward Stella said: "I was cold."

And afterward she was always cold, always. The cold went into her heart: Rosa saw that Stella's heart was cold. Magda flopped onward with her little pencil legs scribbling this way and that, in search of the shawl; the pencils faltered at the barracks opening, where the light began. Rosa saw and pursued. But already Magda was in the square outside the barracks, in the jolly light. It was the roll-call arena. Every morning Rosa had to conceal Magda under the shawl against a wall of the barracks and go out and stand in the arena with Stella and hundreds of others, sometimes for hours, and Magda, deserted, was quiet under the shawl, sucking on her corner. Every day Magda was silent, and so she did not die. Rosa saw that today Magda was going to die, and at the same time a fearful joy ran in Rosa's two palms, her fingers were on fire, she was astonished, febrile: Magda, in the sunlight, swaying on her pencil legs, was howling. Ever since the drying up of Rosa's nipples, ever since Magda's last scream on the road, Magda had been devoid of any syllable; Magda was a mute. Rosa believed that something had gone wrong with her vocal cords, with her windpipe, with the cave of her larynx; Magda was defective, without a voice; perhaps she was deaf; there might be something amiss with her intelligence; Magda was dumb. Even the laugh that came when the ash-stippled wind made a clown out of Magda's shawl was only the air-blown showing of her teeth. Even when the lice, head lice and body lice, crazed her so that she became as wild as one of the big rats that plundered the barracks at daybreak looking for carrion, she rubbed and scratched and kicked and bit and rolled without a whimper. But now Magda's mouth was spilling a long viscous rope of clamor.

"Maaaa—"

It was the first noise Magda had ever sent out from her throat since the drying up of Rosa's nipples.

"Maaaa . . . aaa!"

Again! Magda was wavering in the perilous sunlight of the arena, scribbling on such pitiful little bent shins. Rosa saw. She saw that Magda was grieving the loss of her shawl, she saw that Magda was going to die. A tide of commands hammered in Rosa's nipples: Fetch, get, bring! But she did not know which to go after first, Magda or the shawl. If she jumped out into the arena to snatch Magda up, the howling would not stop, because Magda would still not have the shawl; but if she ran back into the barracks to find the shawl, and if she found it, and if she came after Magda holding it and shaking it, then she would get Magda back, Magda would put the shawl in her mouth and turn dumb again.

Rosa entered the dark. It was easy to discover the shawl. Stella was heaped under it, asleep in her thin bones. Rosa tore the shawl free and flew—she could fly, she was only air—into the arena. The sunheat murmured of another life, of butterflies in summer. The light was placid, mellow. On the other side of the steel fence, far away, there were green meadows speckled with dandelions and deep-colored violets; beyond them, even farther, innocent tiger lilies, tall, lifting their orange bonnets. In the barracks they spoke of “flowers,” of “rain”: excrement, thick turd-braids, and the slow stinking maroon waterfall that slunk down from the upper bunks, the stink mixed with a bitter fatty floating smoke that greased Rosa’s skin. She stood for an instant at the margin of the arena. Sometimes the electricity inside the fence would seem to hum; even Stella said it was only an imagining, but Rosa heard real sounds in the wire: grainy sad voices. The farther she was from the fence, the more clearly the voices crowded at her. The lamenting voices strummed so convincingly, so passionately, it was impossible to suspect them of being phantoms. The voices told her to hold up the shawl, high; the voices told her to shake it, to whip with it, to unfurl it like a flag. Rosa lifted, shook, whipped, unfurled. Far off, very far, Magda leaned across her air-fed belly, reaching out with the rods of her arms. She was high up, elevated, riding someone’s shoulder. But the shoulder that carried Magda was not coming toward Rosa and the shawl, it was drifting away, the speck of Magda was moving more and more into the smoky distance. Above the shoulder a helmet glinted. A light tapped the helmet and sparkled it into a goblet. Below the helmet a black body like a domino and a pair of black boots hurled themselves in the direction of the electrified fence. The electric voices began to chatter wildly. “Maamaa, maaamaaa,” they all hummed together. How far Magda was from Rosa now, across the whole square, past a dozen barracks, all the way on the other side! She was no bigger than a moth.

All at once Magda was swimming through the air. The whole of Magda traveled through loftiness. She looked like a butterfly touching a silver vine. And the moment Magda’s feathered round head and her pencil legs and balloonish belly and zigzag arms splashed against the fence, the steel voices went mad in their growling, urging Rosa to run and run to the spot where Magda had fallen from her flight against the electrified fence; but of course Rosa did not obey them. She only stood, because if she ran they would shoot, and if she tried to pick up the sticks of Magda’s body they would shoot, and if she let the wolf’s screech ascending now through the ladder of her skeleton break out, they would shoot; so she took Magda’s shawl and filled her own mouth with it, stuffed it in and stuffed it in, until she was swallowing up the wolf’s screech and tasting the cinnamon and almond depth of Magda’s saliva; and Rosa drank Magda’s shawl until it dried.

Exploring the Text

1. How would you describe Rosa, Stella, and Magda, the three main characters of the story? In what ways does the action of the story undermine their ability to act out their roles as mother, big sister, and baby, respectively?

2. Note the rich use of imagery and figurative language in the first three paragraphs. What is the effect of the “chicken bones,” the “little house,” and the “elfin tombstone,” for example? How does the imagery contribute to the story as a whole?
3. In paragraph 7, Ozick writes of Magda, “Sometimes she laughed—it seemed a laugh, but how could it be? Magda had never seen anyone laugh.” What is Ozick suggesting about joy?
4. Paragraphs 8 and 9 are single sentences: “Then Stella took the shawl away and made Magda die.” “Afterward Stella said: ‘I was cold.’” The next paragraph opens, “And afterward she was always cold, always.” What is the importance of the reader being catapulted into the future by this sequence of lines?
5. What is the effect of the irony and imagery in the final two paragraphs?
6. How would the story differ if it were narrated in the first person by Rosa? Why do you think Ozick tells the story in the third person?
7. What associations does a shawl have? In what ways is it ambiguous? Do you agree with Ozick’s choice of a title for the story? Why or why not?

The Management of Grief

BHARATI MUKHERJEE

Born in Calcutta, India, in 1940, Bharati Mukherjee gained international experience and immersion in the English language when her father took a job in England, where the family lived from 1947 to 1951. After returning to India, she earned a BA from the University of Calcutta in 1959. She later received a scholarship to the University of Iowa, where she earned an MFA at the Iowa Writers’ Workshop in 1963. She had planned to return to India to marry a man her father had chosen for her, but she stayed at Iowa to earn her PhD in comparative literature in 1969. She continues to write and teach at the University of California at Berkeley. She published her first novel, The Tiger’s Daughter, in 1971. Among Mukherjee’s most highly regarded works are the 1989 novel Jasmine, described as a modern Jane Eyre tale about a young Indian woman in America, and The Middleman and Other Stories, which won the National Book Critics Circle Award in 1988 and in which “The Management of Grief” appears. In June 1985, an Air India flight left Toronto on its way to Bombay (now Mumbai), with a scheduled stop in London. A bomb exploded on board and sent the plane into the Irish Sea, killing all 329 passengers. It is believed to have been a terrorist attack by Sikh separatists fighting for a Sikh homeland in the Punjab region of India. This story takes place in the aftermath of the tragedy.

A woman I don’t know is boiling tea the Indian way in my kitchen. There are a lot of women I don’t know in my kitchen, whispering and moving tactfully. They open doors, rummage through the pantry, and try not to ask me where things are kept. They remind me of when my sons were small, on Mother’s Day or when Vikram and I were tired, and they would make big, sloppy omelets. I would lie in bed pretending I didn't hear them.

Dr. Sharma, the treasurer of the Indo-Canada Society, pulls me into the hallway. He wants to know if I am worried about money. His wife, who has just come up from the basement with a tray of empty cups and glasses, scolds him. "Don't bother Mrs. Bhav with mundane details." She looks so monstrously pregnant her baby must be days overdue. I tell her she shouldn't be carrying heavy things. "Shaila," she says, smiling, "this is the fifth." Then she grabs a teenager by his shirttails. He slips his Walkman off his head. He has to be one of her four children; they have the same domed and dented foreheads. "What's the official word now?" she demands. The boy slips the headphones back on. "They're acting evasive, Ma. They're saying it could be an accident or a terrorist bomb."

All morning, the boys have been muttering, Sikh bomb, Sikh bomb. The men, not using the word, bow their heads in agreement. Mrs. Sharma touches her forehead at such a word. At least they've stopped talking about space debris and Russian lasers.

Two radios are going in the dining room. They are tuned to different stations. Someone must have brought the radios down from my boys' bedrooms. I haven't gone into their rooms since Kusum came running across the front lawn in her bathrobe. She looked so funny, I was laughing when I opened the door.

The big TV in the den is being whizzed through American networks and cable channels. 5

"Damn!" some man swears bitterly. "How can these preachers carry on like nothing's happened?" I want to tell him we're not that important. You look at the audience, and at the preacher in his blue robe with his beautiful white hair, the potted palm trees under a blue sky, and you know they care about nothing.

The phone rings and rings. Dr. Sharma's taken charge. "We're with her," he keeps saying. "Yes, yes, the doctor has given calming pills. Yes, yes, pills are having necessary effect." I wonder if pills alone explain this calm. Not peace, just a deadening quiet. I was always controlled, but never repressed. Sound can reach me, but my body is tensed, ready to scream. I hear their voices all around me. I hear my boys and Vikram cry, "Mommy, Shaila!" and their screams insulate me, like headphones.

The woman boiling water tells her story again and again. "I got the news first. My cousin called from Halifax before six A.M., can you imagine? He'd gotten up for prayers and his son was studying for medical exams and heard on a rock channel that something had happened to a plane. They said first it had disappeared from the radar, like a giant eraser just reached out. His father called me, so I said to him, what do you mean, 'something bad'? You mean a hijacking? And he said, Behn,<sup>1</sup> there is no confirmation of anything yet, but check with your neighbors because a lot of them must be on that plane. So I called poor Kusum straight-away. I knew Kusum's husband and daughter were booked to go yesterday."

Kusum lives across the street from me. She and Satish had moved in less than a month ago. They said they needed a bigger place. All these people, the Sharmas and friends from the Indo-Canada Society, had been there for the housewarming. Satish and Kusum made tandoori on their big gas grill and even the white neighbors piled their plates high with that luridly red, charred, juicy chicken. Their younger daughter had danced, and even our boys had broken away from the Stanley Cup telecast to put in a reluctant appearance. Everyone took pictures for their albums and for the community newspapers—another of our families had made it big in Toronto—and now I wonder how many of those happy faces are gone. “Why does God give us so much if all along He intends to take it away?” Kusum asks me.

I nod. We sit on carpeted stairs, holding hands like children. “I never once told him that I loved him,” I say. I was too much the well-brought-up woman. I was so well brought up I never felt comfortable calling my husband by his first name.

“It’s all right,” Kusum says. “He knew. My husband knew. They felt it. Modern young girls have to say it because what they feel is fake.”

Kusum’s daughter Pam runs in with an overnight case. Pam’s in her McDonald’s uniform. “Mummy! You have to get dressed!” Panic makes her cranky. “A reporter’s on his way here.”

“Why?”

“You want to talk to him in your bathrobe?” She starts to brush her mother’s long hair. She’s the daughter who’s always in trouble. She dates Canadian boys and hangs out in the mall, shopping for tight sweaters. The younger one, the goody-goody one according to Pam, the one with a voice so sweet that when she sang bhajans<sup>2</sup> for Ethiopian relief even a frugal man like my husband wrote out a hundred-dollar check, she was on that plane. She was going to spend July and August with grandparents because Pam wouldn’t go. Pam said she’d rather waitress at McDonald’s. “If it’s a choice between Bombay and Wonderland, I’m picking Wonderland,” she’d said.

“Leave me alone,” Kusum yells. “You know what I want to do? If I didn’t have to look after you now, I’d hang myself.”

Pam’s young face goes blotchy with pain. “Thanks,” she says, “don’t let me stop you.”

“Hush,” pregnant Mrs. Sharma scolds Pam. “Leave your mother alone. Mr. Sharma will tackle the reporters and fill out the forms. He’ll say what has to be said.”

Pam stands her ground. “You think I don’t know what Mummy’s thinking? Why her? That’s what. That’s sick! Mummy wishes my little sister were alive and I were dead.”

Kusum’s hand in mine is trembly hot. We continue to sit on the stairs.

She calls before she arrives, wondering if there’s anything I need. Her name is Judith Templeton and she’s an appointee of the provincial government. “Multiculturalism?” I ask, and she says “partially,” but that her mandate is bigger. “I’ve been told you knew many of the people on the flight,” she says. “Perhaps if you’d agree to help us reach the others . . . ?”

She gives me time at least to put on tea water and pick up the mess in the front room. I have a few samosas<sup>3</sup> from Kusum's housewarming that I could fry up, but then I think, why prolong this visit?

Judith Templeton is much younger than she sounded. She wears a blue suit with a white blouse and a polka-dot tie. Her blond hair is cut short, her only jewelry is pearl-drop earrings. Her briefcase is new and expensive looking, a gleaming cordovan leather. She sits with it across her lap. When she looks out the front windows onto the street, her contact lenses seem to float in front of her light blue eyes.

"What sort of help do you want from me?" I ask. She has refused the tea, out of politeness, but I insist, along with some slightly stale biscuits.

"I have no experience," she admits. "That is, I have an M.S.W. and I've worked in liaison with accident victims, but I mean I have no experience with a tragedy of this scale—"

"Who could?" I ask.

"—and with the complications of culture, language, and customs. Someone mentioned that Mrs. Bhavé is a pillar—because you've taken it more calmly."

At this, perhaps, I frown, for she reaches forward, almost to take my hand. "I hope you understand my meaning, Mrs. Bhavé. There are hundreds of people in Metro directly affected, like you, and some of them speak no English. There are some widows who've never handled money or gone on a bus, and there are old parents who still haven't eaten or gone outside their bedrooms. Some houses and apartments have been looted. Some wives are still hysterical. Some husbands are in shock and profound depression. We want to help, but our hands are tied in so many ways. We have to distribute money to some people, and there are legal documents—these things can be done. We have interpreters, but we don't always have the human touch, or maybe the right human touch. We don't want to make mistakes, Mrs. Bhavé, and that's why we'd like to ask you to help us."

"More mistakes, you mean," I say.

"Police matters are not in my hands," she answers.

"Nothing I can do will make any difference," I say. "We must all grieve in our own way."

"But you are coping very well. All the people said, Mrs. Bhavé is the strongest person of all. Perhaps if the others could see you, talk with you, it would help them."

"By the standards of the people you call hysterical, I am behaving very oddly and very badly, Miss Templeton." I want to say to her, I wish I could scream, starve, walk into Lake Ontario, jump from a bridge. "They would not see me as a model. I do not see myself as a model."

I am a freak. No one who has ever known me would think of me reacting this way. This terrible calm will not go away.

She asks me if she may call again, after I get back from a long trip that we all must make. "Of course," I say. "Feel free to call, anytime."

Four days later, I find Kusum squatting on a rock overlooking a bay in Ireland. It isn't a big rock, but it juts sharply out over water. This is as close as we'll ever get to them. June breezes balloon out her sari and unpin her knee-length hair. She has the bewildered look of a sea creature whom the tides have stranded. 35

It's been one hundred hours since Kusum came stumbling and screaming across my lawn. Waiting around the hospital, we've heard many stories. The police, the diplomats, they tell us things thinking that we're strong, that knowledge is helpful to the grieving, and maybe it is. Some, I know, prefer ignorance, or their own versions. The plane broke into two, they say. Unconsciousness was instantaneous. No one suffered. My boys must have just finished their breakfasts. They loved eating on planes, they loved the smallness of plates, knives, and forks. Last year they saved the airline salt and pepper shakers. Half an hour more and they would have made it to Heathrow.

Kusum says that we can't escape our fate. She says that all those people—our husbands, my boys, her girl with the nightingale voice, all those Hindus, Christians, Sikhs, Muslims, Parsis, and atheists on that plane—were fated to die together off this beautiful bay. She learned this from a swami in Toronto.

I have my Valium.

Six of us “relatives”—two widows and four widowers—choose to spend the day today by the waters instead of sitting in a hospital room and scanning photographs of the dead. That's what they call us now: relatives. I've looked through twenty-seven photos in two days. They're very kind to us, the Irish are very understanding. Sometimes understanding means freeing a tourist bus for this trip to the bay, so we can pretend to spy our loved ones through the glassiness of waves or in sun-speckled cloud shapes.

I could die here, too, and be content. 40

“What is that, out there?” She's standing and flapping her hands, and for a moment I see a head shape bobbing in the waves. She's standing in the water, I, on the boulder. The tide is low, and a round, black, head-sized rock has just risen from the waves. She returns, her sari end dripping and ruined and her face is a twisted remnant of hope, the way mine was a hundred hours ago, still laughing but inwardly knowing that nothing but the ultimate tragedy could bring two women together at six o'clock on a Sunday morning. I watch her face sag into blankness.

“That water felt warm, Shaila,” she says at length.

“You can't,” I say. “We have to wait for our turn to come.”

I haven't eaten in four days, haven't brushed my teeth.

“I know,” she says. “I tell myself I have no right to grieve. They are in a better place than we are. My swami says I should be thrilled for them. My swami says depression is a sign of our selfishness.” 45

Maybe I'm selfish. Selfishly I break away from Kusum and run, sandals slapping against stones, to the water's edge. What if my boys aren't lying pinned under the debris? What if they aren't stuck a mile below that innocent blue chop? What if, given the strong currents . . .

Now I've ruined my sari, one of my best. Kusum has joined me, knee-deep in water that feels to me like a swimming pool. I could settle in the water, and my husband would take my hand and the boys would slap water in my face just to see me scream.

"Do you remember what good swimmers my boys were, Kusum?"

"I saw the medals," she says.

One of the widowers, Dr. Ranganathan from Montreal, walks out to us, carrying his shoes in one hand. He's an electrical engineer. Someone at the hotel mentioned his work is famous around the world, something about the place where physics and electricity come together. He has lost a huge family, something indescribable. "With some good luck," Dr. Ranganathan suggests to me, "a good swimmer could make it safely to some island. It is quite possible that there may be many, many microscopic islets scattered around."

"You're not just saying that?" I tell Dr. Ranganathan about Vinod, my elder son. Last year he took diving as well.

"It's a parent's duty to hope," he says. "It is foolish to rule out possibilities that have not been tested. I myself have not surrendered hope."

Kusum is sobbing once again. "Dear lady," he says, laying his free hand on her arm, and she calms down.

"Vinod is how old?" he asks me. He's very careful, as we all are. Is, not was.

"Fourteen. Yesterday he was fourteen. His father and uncle were going to take him down to the Taj and give him a big birthday party. I couldn't go with them because I couldn't get two weeks off from my stupid job in June." I process bills for a travel agent. June is a big travel month.

Dr. Ranganathan whips the pockets of his suit jacket inside out. Squashed roses, in darkening shades of pink, float on the water. He tore the roses off creepers in somebody's garden. He didn't ask anyone if he could pluck the roses, but now there's been an article about it in the local papers. When you see an Indian person, it says, please give him or her flowers.

"A strong youth of fourteen," he says, "can very likely pull to safety a younger one."

My sons, though four years apart, were very close. Vinod wouldn't let Mithun drown. Electrical engineering, I think, foolishly perhaps: this man knows important secrets of the universe, things closed to me. Relief spins me lightheaded. No wonder my boys' photographs haven't turned up in the gallery of photos of the recovered dead. "Such pretty roses," I say.

"My wife loved pink roses. Every Friday I had to bring a bunch home. I used to say, Why? After twenty-odd years of marriage you're still needing proof positive of my love?" He has identified his wife and three of his children. Then others from Montreal, the lucky ones, intact families with no survivors. He chuckles as he wades back to shore. Then he swings around to ask me a question. "Mrs. Bhav, you are wanting to throw in some roses for your loved ones? I have two big ones left."

But I have other things to float: Vinod's pocket calculator; a half-painted model B-52 for my Mithun. They'd want them on their island. And for my husband? For him I let fall into the calm, glassy waters a poem I wrote in the hospital yesterday. Finally he'll know my feelings for him.

"Don't tumble, the rocks are slippery," Dr. Ranganathan cautions. He holds out a hand for me to grab.

Then it's time to get back on the bus, time to rush back to our waiting posts on hospital benches.

Kusum is one of the lucky ones. The lucky ones flew here, identified in multiply their loved ones, then will fly to India with the bodies for proper ceremonies. Satish is one of the few males who surfaced. The photos of faces we saw on the walls in an office at Heathrow and here in the hospital are mostly of women. Women have more body fat, a nun said to me matter-of-factly. They float better.

Today I was stopped by a young sailor on the street. He had loaded bodies, he'd gone into the water when—he checks my face for signs of strength—when the sharks were first spotted. I don't blush, and he breaks down. "It's all right," I say. "Thank you." I heard about the sharks from Dr. Ranganathan. In his orderly mind, science brings understanding, it holds no terror. It is the shark's duty. For every deer there is a hunter, for every fish a fisherman.

The Irish are not shy; they rush to me and give me hugs and some are crying. I cannot imagine reactions like that on the streets of Toronto. Just strangers, and I am touched. Some carry flowers with them and give them to any Indian they see. 65

After lunch, a policeman I have gotten to know quite well catches hold of me. He says he thinks he has a match for Vinod. I explain what a good swimmer Vinod is.

"You want me with you when you look at photos?" Dr. Ranganathan walks ahead of me into the picture gallery. In these matters, he is a scientist, and I am grateful. It is a new perspective. "They have performed miracles," he says. "We are indebted to them."

The first day or two the policemen showed us relatives only one picture at a time; now they're in a hurry, they're eager to lay out the possibles, and even the probables.

The face on the photo is of a boy much like Vinod; the same intelligent eyes, the same thick brows dipping into a V. But this boy's features, even his cheeks, are puffier, wider, mushier.

"No." My gaze is pulled by other pictures. There are five other boys who look like Vinod. 70

The nun assigned to console me rubs the first picture with a fingertip. "When they've been in the water for a while, love, they look a little heavier." The bones under the skin are broken, they said on the first day—try to adjust your memories. It's important.

"It's not him. I'm his mother. I'd know."

"I know this one!" Dr. Ranganathan cries out, and suddenly from the back of the gallery. "And this one!" I think he senses that I don't want to find my boys. "They are the Kutty brothers. They were also from Montreal." I don't mean to be crying. On the contrary, I am ecstatic. My suitcase in the hotel is packed heavy with dry clothes for my boys.

The policeman starts to cry. "I am so sorry, I am so sorry, ma'am. I really thought we had a match."

With the nun ahead of us and the policeman behind, we, the unlucky ones without our children's bodies, file out of the makeshift gallery. 75

From Ireland most of us go on to India. Kusum and I take the same direct flight to Bombay, so I can help her clear customs quickly. But we have to argue with a man in uniform. He has large boils on his face. The boils swell and glow with sweat as we argue with him. He wants Kusum to wait in line and he refuses to take authority because his boss is on a tea break. But Kusum won't let her coffins out of sight, and I shan't desert her though I know that my parents, elderly and diabetic, must be waiting in a stuffy car in a scorching lot.

"You bastard!" I scream at the man with the popping boils. Other passengers press closer. "You think we're smuggling contraband in those coffins!"

Once upon a time we were well-brought-up women; we were dutiful wives who kept our heads veiled, our voices shy and sweet.

In India, I become, once again, an only child of rich, ailing parents. Old friends of the family come to pay their respects. Some are Sikh, and inwardly, involuntarily, I cringe. My parents are progressive people; they do not blame communities for a few individuals.

In Canada it is a different story now. 80

"Stay longer," my mother pleads. "Canada is a cold place. Why would you want to be all by yourself?" I stay.

Three months pass. Then another.

"Vikram wouldn't have wanted you to give up things!" they protest. They call my husband by the name he was born with. In Toronto he'd changed to Vik so the men he worked with at his office would find his name as easy as Rod or Chris. "You know, the dead aren't cut off from us!"

My grandmother, the spoiled daughter of a rich zamindar,<sup>4</sup> shaved her head with rusty razor blades when she was widowed at sixteen. My grandfather died of childhood diabetes when he was nineteen, and she saw herself as the harbinger of bad luck. My mother grew up without parents, raised indifferently by an uncle, while her true mother slept in a hut behind the main estate house and took her food with the servants. She grew up a rationalist. My parents abhor mindless mortification.

The zamindar's daughter kept stubborn faith in Vedic rituals; my parents rebelled. I am trapped between two modes of knowledge. At thirty-six, I am too old to start over and too young to give up. Like my husband's spirit, I flutter between worlds. 85

Courting aphasia, we travel. We travel with our phalanx of servants and poor relatives. To hill stations and to beach resorts. We play contract bridge in dusty gymkhana clubs. We ride stubby ponies up crumbly mountain trails. At tea dances, we let ourselves be twirled twice round the ballroom. We hit the holy spots we hadn't made time for before. In Varanasi, Kalighat, Rishikesh, Hardwar, astrologers and palmists seek me out and for a fee offer me cosmic consolations.

Already the widowers among us are being shown new bride candidates. They cannot resist the call of custom, the authority of their parents and older brothers. They must marry; it is the duty of a man to look after a wife. The new wives will be young widows with children, destitute but of good family. They will make loving wives, but the men will shun them. I've had calls from the men over crackling Indian telephone lines. "Save me," they say, these substantial, educated, successful men of forty. "My parents are arranging a marriage for me." In a month they will have buried one family and returned to Canada with a new bride and partial family.

I am comparatively lucky. No one here thinks of arranging a husband for an unlucky widow.

Then, on the third day of the sixth month into this odyssey, in an abandoned temple in a tiny Himalayan village, as I make my offering of flowers and sweetmeats to the god of a tribe of animists, my husband descends to me. He is squatting next to a scrawny sadhu<sup>5</sup> in moth-eaten robes. Vikram wears the vanilla suit he wore the last time I hugged him. The sadhu tosses petals on a butter-fed flame, reciting Sanskrit mantras, and sweeps his face of flies. My husband takes my hands in his.

You're beautiful, he starts. Then, What are you doing here?

90

Shall I stay? I ask. He only smiles, but already the image is fading. You must finish alone what we started together. No seaweed wreathes his mouth. He speaks too fast, just as he used to when we were an envied family in our pink split-level. He is gone.

In the windowless altar room, smoky with joss sticks and clarified butter lamps, a sweaty hand gropes for my blouse. I do not shriek. The sadhu arranges his robe. The lamps hiss and sputter out.

When we come out of the temple, my mother says, "Did you feel something weird in there?"

My mother has no patience with ghosts, prophetic dreams, holy men, and cults.

"No," I lie. "Nothing."

95

But she knows that she's lost me. She knows that in days I shall be leaving.

Kusum's put up her house for sale. She wants to live in an ashram in Hardwar. Moving to Hardwar was her swami's idea. Her swami runs two ashrams, the one in Hardwar and another here in Toronto.

"Don't run away," I tell her.

"I'm not running away," she says. "I'm pursuing inner peace. You think you or that Ranganathan fellow are better off?"

Pam's left for California. She wants to do some modeling, she says. She says when she comes into her share of the insurance money she'll open a yoga-cum-aerobics studio in Hollywood. She sends me postcards so naughty I daren't leave them on the coffee table. Her mother has withdrawn from her and the world.

The rest of us don't lose touch, that's the point. Talk is all we have, says Dr. Ranganathan, who has also resisted his relatives and returned to Montreal and to his job, alone. He says, Whom better to talk with than other relatives? We've been melted down and recast as a new tribe.

He calls me twice a week from Montreal. Every Wednesday night and every Saturday afternoon. He is changing jobs, going to Ottawa. But Ottawa is over a hundred miles away, and he is forced to drive two hundred and twenty miles a day from his home in Montreal. He can't bring himself to sell his house. The house is a temple, he says; the king-sized bed in the master bedroom is a shrine. He sleeps on a folding cot. A devotee.

There are still some hysterical relatives. Judith Templeton's list of those needing help and those who've "accepted" is in nearly perfect balance. Acceptance means you speak of your family in the past tense and you make active plans for moving ahead with your life. There are courses at Seneca and Ryerson we could be taking. Her gleaming leather briefcase is full of college catalogues and lists of cultural societies that need our help. She has done impressive work, I tell her.

"In the textbooks on grief management," she replies—I am her confidante, I realize, one of the few whose grief has not sprung bizarre obsessions—"there are stages to pass through: rejection, depression, acceptance, reconstruction." She has compiled a chart and finds that six months after the tragedy, none of us still rejects reality, but only a handful are reconstructing. "Depressed acceptance" is the plateau we've reached. Remarriage is a major step in reconstruction (though she's a little surprised, even shocked, over how quickly some of the men have taken on new families). Selling one's house and changing jobs and cities is healthy.

How to tell Judith Templeton that my family surrounds me, and that like creatures in epics, they've changed shapes? She sees me as calm and accepting but worries that I have no job, no career. My closest friends are worse off than I. I cannot tell her my days, even my nights, are thrilling.

105

She asks me to help with families she can't reach at all. An elderly couple in Agincourt whose sons were killed just weeks after they had brought their parents over from a village in Punjab. From their names, I know they are Sikh. Judith Templeton and a translator have visited them twice with offers of money for airfare to Ireland, with bank forms, power-of-attorney forms, but they have refused to sign, or to leave their tiny apartment. Their sons' money is frozen in the bank. Their sons' investment apartments have been trashed by tenants, the furnishings sold off. The parents fear that anything they sign or any money they receive will end the company's or the country's obligations to them. They fear they are selling their sons for two airline tickets to a place they've never seen.

The high-rise apartment is a tower of Indians and West Indians, with a sprinkling of Orientals. The nearest bus-stop kiosk is lined with women in saris. Boys practice cricket in the parking lot. Inside the building, even I wince a bit from the ferocity of onion fumes, the distinctive and immediate Indianness of frying ghee,<sup>6</sup> but Judith Templeton maintains a steady flow of information. These poor old people are in imminent danger of losing their place and all their services.

I say to her, "They are Sikh. They will not open up to a Hindu woman." And what I want to add is, as much as I try not to, I stiffen now at the sight of beards and turbans. I remember a time when we all trusted each other in this new country, it was only the new country we worried about.

The two rooms are dark and stuffy. The lights are off, and an oil lamp sputters on the coffee table. The bent old lady has let us in, and her husband is wrapping a white turban over his oiled, hip-length hair. She immediately goes to the kitchen, and I hear the most familiar sound of an Indian home, tap water hitting and filling a teapot.

They have not paid their utility bills, out of fear and inability to write a check. The telephone is gone, electricity and gas and water are soon to follow. They have told Judith their sons will provide. They are good boys, and they have always earned and looked after their parents.

We converse a bit in Hindi. They do not ask about the crash and I wonder if I should bring it up. If they think I am here merely as a translator, then they may feel insulted. There are thousands of Punjabi speakers, Sikhs, in Toronto to do a better job. And so I say to the old lady, "I too have lost my sons, and my husband, in the crash."

Her eyes immediately fill with tears. The man mutters a few words which sound like a blessing. "God provides and God takes away," he says.

I want to say, But only men destroy and give back nothing. "My boys and my husband are not coming back," I say. "We have to understand that."

Now the old woman responds. "But who is to say? Man alone does not decide these things." To this her husband adds his agreement.

Judith asks about the bank papers, the release forms. With a stroke of the pen, they will have a provincial trustee to pay their bills, invest their money, send them a monthly pension.

"Do you know this woman?" I ask them.

The man raises his hand from the table, turns it over, and seems to regard each finger separately before he answers. "This young lady is always coming here, we make tea for her, and she leaves papers for us to sign." His eyes scan a pile of papers in the corner of the room. "Soon we will be out of tea, then will she go away?"

The old lady adds, "I have asked my neighbors and no one else gets angrezi<sup>7</sup> visitors. What have we done?"

"It's her job," I try to explain. "The government is worried. Soon you will have no place to stay, no lights, no gas, no water."

"Government will get its money. Tell her not to worry, we are honorable people."

<sup>6</sup>Clarified butter.—EDs.

I try to explain the government wishes to give money, not take. He raises his hand. "Let them take," he says. "We are accustomed to that. That is no problem."

"We are strong people," says the wife. "Tell her that."

"Who needs all this machinery?" demands the husband. "It is unhealthy, the bright lights, the cold air on a hot day, the cold food, the four gas rings. God will provide, not government."

"When our boys return," the mother says.

Her husband sucks his teeth. "Enough talk," he says.

Judith breaks in. "Have you convinced them?" The snaps on her cordovan briefcase go off like firecrackers in that quiet apartment. She lays the sheaf of legal papers on the coffee table. "If they can't write their names, an X will do—I've told them that."

Now the old lady has shuffled to the kitchen and soon emerges with a pot of tea and two cups. "I think my bladder will go first on a job like this," Judith says to me, smiling. "If only there was some way of reaching them. Please thank her for the tea. Tell her she's very kind."

I nod in Judith's direction and tell them in Hindi, "She thanks you for the tea. She thinks you are being very hospitable but she doesn't have the slightest idea what it means."

I want to say, Humor her. I want to say, My boys and my husband are with me too, more than ever. I look in the old man's eyes and I can read his stubborn, peasant's message: I have protected this woman as best I can. She is the only person I have left. Give to me or take from me what you will, but I will not sign for it. I will not pretend that I accept.

In the car, Judith says, "You see what I'm up against? I'm sure they're lovely people, but their stubbornness and ignorance are driving me crazy. They think signing a paper is signing their sons' death warrants, don't they?"

I am looking out the window. I want to say, In our culture, it is a parent's duty to hope.

"Now Shaila, this next woman is a real mess. She cries day and night, and she refuses all medical help. We may have to—"

"Let me out at the subway," I say.

"I beg your pardon?" I can feel those blue eyes staring at me.

It would not be like her to disobey. She merely disapproves, and slows at a corner to let me out. Her voice is plaintive. "Is there anything I said? Anything I did?"

I could answer her suddenly in a dozen ways, but I choose not to. "Shaila? Let's talk about it," I hear, then slam the door.

A wife and mother begins her life in a new country, and that life is cut short. Yet her husband tells her: Complete what we have started. We, who stayed out of politics and came half way around the world to avoid religious and political feuding, have been the first in the New World to die from it. I no longer know what we started, nor how to complete it. I write letters to the editors of local papers and to members of Parliament. Now at least they admit it was a bomb. One MP answers back, with sympathy, but with a challenge. You want to make a difference? Work on a campaign. Work on mine. Politicize the Indian voter.

My husband's old lawyer helps me set up a trust. Vikram was a saver and a careful investor. He had saved the boys' boarding school and college fees. I sell the pink house at four times what we paid for it and take a small apartment downtown. I am looking for a charity to support.

We are deep in the Toronto winter, gray skies, icy pavements. I stay indoors, watching television. I have tried to assess my situation, how best to live my life, to complete what we began so many years ago. Kusum has written me from Hardwar that her life is now serene. She has seen Satish and has heard her daughter sing again. Kusum was on a pilgrimage, passing through a village, when she heard a young girl's voice, singing one of her daughter's favorite bhajans. She followed the music through the squalor of a Himalayan village, to a hut where a young girl, an exact replica of her daughter, was fanning coals under the kitchen fire. When she appeared, the girl cried out, "Ma!" and ran away. What did I think of that?

I think I can only envy her.

140

Pam didn't make it to California, but writes me from Vancouver. She works in a department store, giving makeup hints to Indian and Oriental girls. Dr. Ranganathan has given up his commute, given up his house and job, and accepted an academic position in Texas, where no one knows his story and he has vowed not to tell it. He calls me now once a week.

I wait, I listen and I pray, but Vikram has not returned to me. The voices and the shapes and the nights filled with visions ended abruptly several weeks ago.

I take it as a sign.

One rare, beautiful, sunny day last week, returning from a small errand on Yonge Street, I was walking through the park from the subway to my apartment. I live equidistant from the Ontario Houses of Parliament and the University of Toronto. The day was not cold, but something in the bare trees caught my attention. I looked up from the gravel, into the branches and the clear blue sky beyond. I thought I heard the rustling of larger forms, and I waited a moment for voices. Nothing.

"What?" I asked.

145

Then as I stood in the path looking north to Queen's Park and west to the university, I heard the voices of my family one last time. Your time has come, they said. Go, be brave.

I do not know where this voyage I have begun will end. I do not know which direction I will take. I dropped the package on a park bench and started walking.

Exploring the Text

1. What information do you learn in the opening three paragraphs? How do they set up a sense of foreboding? Why do you think Mukherjee chose not to open the story with a more traditional exposition?
2. What evidence do you see that indicates a clash in cultural attitudes and values? How does the relationship between Kusum and Pam illustrate cultural differences at the beginning of the story?

3. How is Judith Templeton depicted? Does Mukherjee want us to see her as being totally insensitive? How does Shaila's attitude toward Judith change during the course of the story? Pay special attention to Judith's characterization of the elderly Sikh couple as "lovely people" motivated by "stubbornness and ignorance" (para. 130).
4. What elements of irony do you find in this story? What purpose do they serve? For instance, consider the irony in paragraph 55 when Shaila reveals the reason she stayed home, and in paragraph 59 when she talks about "the lucky ones." What does Shaila's ironic tone say about her?
5. What does Shaila mean when she says, "I am trapped between two modes of knowledge" (para. 85)? What are these modes of knowledge, and which one does she ultimately choose?
6. In paragraph 103, the narrator says, "Acceptance means you speak of your family in the past tense and you make active plans for moving ahead with your life." Does she agree with that definition? What is the narrator's tone in that remark? Explain what evidence in the text leads you to your conclusion.
7. In paragraph 105, Shaila says, "my family surrounds me," and in paragraph 129, she says, "my boys and my husband are with me too, more than ever." What do these remarks suggest about Shaila's grief?
8. Regarding Kusum, why does Shaila say, "I think I can only envy her" (para. 140)? What is it about Kusum that Shaila says she envies? Do you believe her? Why or why not?
9. Describe the differences between Kusum's and Shaila's reactions to the loss of their families, and the ways they manage their grief. What is the significance of Shaila's saying "I have my Valium" in response to paragraph 38 and "Maybe I'm selfish" in response to paragraph 46? What does Shaila mean when she distinguishes between "peace" and "a deadening quiet" (para. 7)? By the end of the story, how well has Shaila done with "the management of grief"?
10. How does the story end? Is Shaila honoring or betraying her belief that "it is a parent's duty to hope" (para. 131)?

The Champion Arms for Battle

From Book 19 of the Iliad

HOMER

TRANSLATED BY ROBERT FAGLES

Although little is known about Homer, he is thought to have lived in the ninth century B.C.E., and at least seven cities in Greece claim to be his birthplace. Scholars disagree on whether Homer actually composed the Iliad and its sequel, the Odyssey, but there is general consensus that both epics are the work of a single author, and we attribute both to him. One of the first and most influential literary works in the Western world, the Iliad consists of twenty-four books of verse, capturing stories and legends that had been circulating orally for hundreds of years prior. It tells the tale of the last part of the Trojan War, which was prompted by Paris's abduction of Helen of Troy, wife of the Achaean (Greek) king Menelaus. A key theme of the Iliad is the all-consuming rage of the Achaean warrior Achilles after the death of his friend, Patroclus, at the hands of Hector, the Trojan champion. The passage here, from Book 19, presents Achilles arming for battle against the Trojan forces.

Thick-and-fast as the snow comes swirling down from Zeus, frozen sharp when the North Wind born in heaven blasts it on—so massed, so dense the glistening burnished helmets shone, streaming out of the ships, and shields with jutting bosses, 5 breastplates welded front and back and the long ashen spears.
The glory of armor lit the skies and the whole earth laughed,
rippling under the glitter of bronze, thunder resounding under trampling feet of armies. And in their midst
the brilliant Achilles began to arm for battle . . .
A sound of grinding came from the fighter's teeth, 10
his eyes blazed forth in searing points of fire, unbearable grief came surging through his heart
and now, bursting with rage against the men of Troy,
he donned Hephaestus' gifts—magnificent armor
the god of fire forged with all his labor. 15
First he wrapped his legs with well-made greaves, fastened behind his heels with silver ankle-clasps, next he strapped the breastplate round his chest
then over his shoulder Achilles slung his sword, the fine bronze blade with its silver-studded hilt, 20
then hoisted the massive shield flashing far and wide like a full round moon—and gleaming bright as the light that reaches sailors out at sea, the flare of a watchfire burning strong in a lonely sheepfold up some mountain slope when the gale-winds hurl the crew that fights against them 25 far over the fish-swarming sea, far from loved ones—so the gleam from Achilles' well-wrought blazoned shield shot up and hit the skies. Then lifting his rugged helmet he set it down on his brows, and the horsehair crest shone like a star and the waving golden plumes shook 30 that Hephaestus drove in bristling thick along its ridge.
And brilliant Achilles tested himself in all his gear, Achilles spun on his heels to see if it fitted tightly,
see if his shining limbs ran free within it, yes,
and it felt like buoyant wings lifting the great captain. 35
And then, last, Achilles drew his father's spear from its socket-stand—weighted, heavy, tough.

No other Achaean fighter could heft that shaft,
 only Achilles had the skill to wield it well:
 Pelian ash it was, a gift to his father Peleus 40 presented by Chiron once, hewn on Pelion's crest to be the death of heroes.

[c. 700 B.C.E.]

“If we are marked to die . . .”

From Henry V, Act IV, scene iii

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

William Shakespeare (1554–1616) was born in Stratford-upon-Avon, England. Little is known of his life aside from the fact that he married Anne Hathaway when he was eighteen, worked as an actor-playwright in London, and retired in 1613. His plays fall into four principal categories: early comedies (1585–1594); more sophisticated comedies and histories (1595–1599); the great tragedies (1599–1607); and the final phase (1608–1613). His most accomplished works—including Hamlet (1601), Othello (1603), King Lear (1605), and Macbeth (1606)—belong to the third period. In his time, his contemporaries—and likely Shakespeare himself—looked to his sonnets and other poems as the more important works. The 154 sonnets were written at various stages in Shakespeare's life, but when and to whom they were written remains unclear. Wordsworth believed that only through the sonnets could one understand Shakespeare. The following selection, commonly known as the “St. Crispian's Day Speech,” is from Henry V and presents King Henry's address at the field of Agincourt, scene of the famous victory of the English over a much larger French army in the Hundred Years' War.

If we are marked to die, we are enough
To do our country loss; and if to live,
The fewer men, the greater share of honour.
God's will, I pray thee wish not one man more.
By Jove, I am not covetous for gold, 5
Nor care I who doth feed upon my cost;
It ernes me not if men my garments wear;
Such outward things dwell not in my desires.
But if it be a sin to covet honour
I am the most offending soul alive. 10
No, faith, my coz, wish not a man from England.
God's peace, I would not lose so great an honour
As one man more methinks would share from me
For the best hope I have. O do not wish one more.
Rather proclaim it presently through my host 15
That he which hath no stomach to this fight,
Let him depart. His passport shall be made
And crowns for convoy put into his purse.
We would not die in that man's company
That fears his fellowship to die with us. 20
This day is called the Feast of Crispian.
He that outlives this day and comes safe home
Will stand a-tiptoe when this day is named
And rouse him at the name of Crispian.
He that shall see this day and live t'old age 25
Will yearly on the vigil feast his neighbours
And say, 'Tomorrow is Saint Crispian.'
Then will he strip his sleeve and show his scars
And say, 'These wounds I had on Crispin's day.'
Old men forget; yet all shall be forgot, 30
But he'll remember, with advantages,
What feats he did that day. Then shall our names,
Familiar in his mouth as household words—
Harry the King, Bedford and Exeter,
Warwick and Talbot, Salisbury and Gloucester— 35
Be in their flowing cups freshly remembered.
This story shall the good man teach his son,
And Crispin Crispian shall ne'er go by
From this day to the ending of the world
But we in it shall be remembered, 40
We few, we happy few, we band of brothers.
For he today that sheds his blood with me
Shall be my brother; be he ne'er so vile,
This day shall gentle his condition;

And gentlemen in England now abed
 Shall think themselves accursed they were not here;
 And hold their manhoods cheap whiles any speaks
 That fought with us upon Saint Crispin's day.

1. What words would you use to describe the tone of this passage from Henry V? What is the speaker's attitude toward his audience? Cite specific words and lines to support your response.
2. The speaker says that he esteems "honour" above all else. Based on what he says and on the examples he offers, consider how the speaker would define honour. In a full sentence, how would his definition read?
3. This speech includes many examples of inverted syntax, such as line 37, which reads, "This story shall the good man teach his son" instead of "The good man shall teach his son this story." Take three other examples—for instance, lines 7, 36, and 40—and rewrite each line in normal order, beginning with the subject, followed by the verb and then the object. How does the inverted syntax of each sentence affect its tone? How does it change the rhythm and meter of the lines? Why would inverted syntax be appropriate for this passage?
4. Notice the word "gentle" (an adjective used as a verb) in line 44. In the context of lines 37–44, what does it mean?
5. How does the speaker use references to money and quantifiable rewards throughout the poem to convey his own values?
6. What does this speech say about memory and the legacy of war for the warrior?
7. This passage is widely regarded as one of the most inspirational speeches in all of English literature. What accounts for its success in inspiring people through so many generations? What particular parts of the speech do you find inspirational beyond the battlefield?

The Battle of Blenheim

ROBERT SOUTHEY

Robert Southey (1774–1843) was born in Bristol, England. He began writing poetry at the age of nine, and by the time he was fifteen, he had written three cantos as a continuation of Spenser's Faerie Queene. Early on, he revealed an unusual independence of mind and behavior. Expelled from the Westminster School for criticizing its policy on corporal punishment, he later attended Oxford but did not graduate. A contemporary of Wordsworth and Coleridge, he wrote romantic verse and was poet laureate of England from 1813 until his death. Southey is chiefly remembered for two poems: "The Inchcape Rock"—a romantic narrative poem—and “The Battle of Blenheim,” included here. A major victory for the Duke of Marlborough and a turning point in the War of the Spanish Succession, the battle took place in 1704 in the small village of Blenheim, Bavaria (now Blindheim, Germany).

It was a summer evening,
Old Kaspar’s work was done;
And he before his cottage door
Was sitting in the sun,
And by him sported on the green 5
His little grandchild Wilhelmine.

She saw her brother Peterkin
Roll something large and round,
That he beside the rivulet,
In playing there, had found; 10
He came to ask what he had found,
That was so large, and smooth, and round.

Old Kaspar took it from the boy,
Who stood expectant by;
And then the old man shook his head, 15
And with a natural sigh,
’Tis some poor fellow’s skull, said he,
Who fell in the great victory.

I find them in the garden, for
There’s many here about, 20
And often when I go to plough
The ploughshare turns them out;
For many thousand men, said he,
Were slain in the great victory.

Now tell us what ’twas all about, 25
Young Peterkin he cries,
And little Wilhelmine looks up
With wonder-waiting eyes;
Now tell us all about the war,
And what they kill’d each other for. 30

It was the English, Kaspar cried,
That put the French to rout;
But what they kill’d each other for,
I could not well make out.
But everybody said, quoth he, 35
That ’twas a famous victory.

My father lived at Blenheim then,
 Yon little stream hard by;
 They burnt his dwelling to the ground,
 And he was forced to fly: 40
 So with his wife and child he fled,
 Nor had he where to rest his head.

With fire and sword the country round
 Was wasted far and wide,
 And many a childing mother then, 45
 And new-born infant, died.
 But things like that, you know, must be
 At every famous victory.

They say it was a shocking sight,
 After the field was won, 50
 For many thousand bodies here
 Lay rotting in the sun;
 But things like that, you know, must be
 After a famous victory.

Great praise the Duke of Marlbro' won, 55
 And our good Prince Eugene.—
 Why, 'twas a very wicked thing!
 Said little Wilhelmine.—
 Nay—nay—my little girl, quoth he,
 It was a famous victory. 60

And everybody praised the Duke
 Who such a fight did win.—
 But what good came of it at last?
 Quoth little Peterkin.—
 Why that I cannot tell, said he, 65
 But 'twas a famous victory.

Exploring the Text

1. Read the poem aloud, listening to the sound of the lines and stanzas. To what extent do you find the rhyme and rhythm fitting for Southey's subject? Explain.
2. Note the inverted syntax in the first stanza. Rewrite the lines in normal order, and then compare your versions with the originals. How do the inversions affect the rhythm and meter of the poem? How do they contribute to the poem? Do the same for another stanza of the poem.
3. How would you characterize Southey's attitude toward Kaspar? How does this attitude contribute to the overall tone of the poem?

4. Consider Wilhelmine's and Peterkin's remarks in stanzas 5, 10, and 11. Are they childish? Are they reasonable? Why does Southey deliver these statements in the voices of children?
5. To what effect does Southey use repetition of the final line in multiple stanzas?

Vigil strange I kept on the field one night

WALT WHITMAN

Walt Whitman (1819–1892) was born on Long Island, New York. Early in his life, he worked as a country schoolteacher and printer, and served as writer and editor for the Brooklyn Eagle newspaper. He continued in a variety of jobs, writing and working as a carpenter, and published his now famous Leaves of Grass in 1855. Regarded as offensive and vulgar at the time for its outspoken content, the poem celebrated individuality and the richness of life. In 1862, Whitman went to Virginia to find his brother George, who had been wounded in the Civil War. He was shocked to witness the horrors of war firsthand and was deeply moved by the suffering of the wounded. He worked as an aide in army hospitals in Washington, caring first for his brother and then other soldiers as well. Among Whitman's most well-known poems from this time are "Oh Captain, My Captain" and "When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom'd," both about Abraham Lincoln. The poem included here was inspired by Whitman's war experience.

Vigil strange I kept on the field one night;
 When you my son and my comrade dropt at my side that day,
 One look I but gave which your dear eyes return'd with a look I shall never forget,
 One touch of your hand to mine O boy, reach'd up as you lay on the ground,
 Then onward I sped in the battle, the even-contested battle, 5
 Till late in the night reliev'd to the place at last again I made my way, Found you in death so cold dear comrade, found your body son of responding kisses, (never again on earth responding,) Bared your face in the starlight, curious the scene, cool blew the moderate night-wind,
 Long there and then in vigil I stood, dimly around me the battle-field spreading,
 Vigil wondrous and vigil sweet there in the fragrant silent night, 10
 But not a tear fell, not even a long-drawn sigh, long, long I gazed,
 Then on the earth partially reclining sat by your side leaning my chin in my hands, Passing sweet hours, immortal and mystic hours with you dearest comrade—not a tear, not a word,
 Vigil of silence, love and death, vigil for you my son and my soldier,
 As onward silently stars aloft, eastward new ones upward stole, 15
 Vigil final for you brave boy, (I could not save you, swift was your death,
 I faithfully loved you and cared for you living, I think we shall surely meet again,)

Till at latest lingering of the night, indeed just as the dawn appear'd,
 My comrade I wrapt in his blanket, envelop'd well his form,
 Folded the blanket well, tucking it carefully over head and carefully under feet, 20
 And there and then and bathed by the rising sun, my son in his grave, in his rude-dug grave I deposited,
 Ending my vigil strange with that, vigil of night and battle-field dim,
 Vigil for boy of responding kisses, (never again on earth responding,) Vigil for comrade swiftly slain, vigil I never forget, how as day brighten'd,
 I rose from the chill ground and folded my soldier well in his blanket, 25
 And buried him where he fell.

[1865]

Exploring the Text

1. Notice that the poem is presented as a “vigil.” What is significant about the choice of that particular word? Why is the word repeated throughout the poem? Why is it a “vigil strange” (l. 1), and why is the scene described as “curious” in line 8?
2. How would you describe the speaker of the poem? Use specific evidence from the text to support your description.
3. There is an important shift in line 19, where the “you” and “your” of line 16 become “My comrade” and “his.” What is the significance of this shift in terms of the relationship of the speaker to his dying son? How does the final wrapping of his comrade in a blanket complicate this shift?
4. The careful attention to detail in this poem is reminiscent of the use of fine detail in the passage from the Iliad (p. 1413). How would you compare Homer’s and Whitman’s attitudes toward their subjects? Cite specific words and lines to support your response.

Shiloh

A Requiem (April, 1862)

HERMAN MELVILLE

Herman Melville (1819–1891), best known for his novel Moby-Dick, was born in New York City. By the time he was in his early twenties, he went off to sea, sailing first to Liverpool, England, then to the Marquesas Islands and other parts of the South Seas on a whaling ship. Based on his experiences, he wrote the novels Typee and Omoo, which were both published in 1847; Redburn, an autobiographical novel based on his first voyage, appeared in 1849. Largely self-educated, Melville read widely, especially William Shakespeare and Ralph Waldo Emerson, both of whom influenced Melville’s legendary novel, Moby-Dick (1851). In the book, Melville’s narrator, Ishmael, tells of the epic quest of Captain Ahab after the white whale. Now widely regarded as one of the greatest novels of American literature for its gripping epic adventure and its profound metaphysical journey, it was not well received in its time; nor were the later novels Pierre; or, The Ambiguities (1852), The Confidence Man (1857), or Billy Budd (published posthumously in 1924). Although Melville is most known for his novels, later in his life he also wrote short stories—including “Bartleby the Scrivener” (p. 854)—and poems, such as the one that follows, about the American Civil War battlefield Shiloh in southwestern Tennessee.

Skimming lightly, wheeling still,
     The swallows fly low
 Over the field in clouded days,
     The forest field of Shiloh—
 Over the field where April rain
     5 Solaced the parched one stretched in pain
 Through the pause of night
 That followed the Sunday fight
     Around the church of Shiloh —
 The church so lone, the log-built one,
     10 That echoed to many a parting groan
 And natural prayer
     Of dying foemen mingled there—
 Foemen at morn, but friends at eve—
     Fame or country least their care:
 (What like a bullet can undeceive!)
     15 But now they lie low,
 While over them the swallows skim,
     And all is hushed at Shiloh.

Exploring the Text

1. Note that Melville subtitled his poem “A Requiem.” How does that affect your interpretation of the poem?
2. Identify at least three images that Melville uses to describe the setting. How does the imagery contribute to the tone of the poem? How would you describe that tone?
3. Consider the juxtaposition in line 14, “Foemen at morn, but friends at eve.” Look for other juxtapositions in the poem. What do these juxtapositions add to the meaning of the poem as a whole? Are they especially apt for a poem about this particular war, or could they apply to war in general? Explain.
4. How do you interpret line 16? Why did Melville write that line as a parenthetical statement? Is it a rhetorical question?

5. Listen to the poem as you read it, noticing especially the long o sounds in “low,” “Shiloh,” “followed,” “lone,” and so on. How do those sounds affect your reading? How do they make you feel as you read?
6. Why does Melville begin and end with the swallows? What are the implications of the final line?

Lamentations

SIEGFRIED SASSOON

On August 2, 1914, two days before England’s declaration of war, British poet Siegfried Sassoon (1886–1967) enlisted in the army and went to the front lines. Called “Mad Jack” for his reckless behavior and ferocity, Sassoon was regarded as a modern Achilles. He was wounded twice, and received two medals for bravery. While recovering from an injury in England, he became critical of the war and declined to return to duty. His 1917 letter to his commanding officer, “A Soldier’s Declaration,” was read to the House of Commons and published in the London Times. In it he stated, “I am not protesting against the conduct of the war, but against the political errors and insincerities for which the fighting men are being sacrificed. On behalf of those who are suffering now, I make this protest against the deception which is being practised upon them; also I believe it may help to destroy the callous complacency with which the majority of those at home regard the continuance of agonies which they do not share and which they have not enough imagination to realise.” Deemed mentally unfit for court-martial, he was sent to the hospital to recover from shell shock and there met fellow soldier and poet Wilfred Owen, whom he encouraged to write. After the war, he taught and lectured for many years. Sassoon wrote more than twenty collections of poetry, the most famous being Counter-Attack and Other Poems (1918)—a small group of poems about the horrors of war, which includes “Lamentations.”

I found him in the guard-room at the Base.
 From the blind darkness I had heard his crying
 And blundered in. With puzzled, patient face
 A sergeant watched him; it was no good trying
 To stop it; for he howled and beat his chest. 5
 And, all because his brother had gone west,
 Raved at the bleeding war; his rampant grief
 Moaned, shouted, sobbed, and choked, while he was kneeling Half-naked on the floor. In my belief
 Such men have lost all patriotic feeling. 10

[1918]

Exploring the Text

1. The speaker says he “blundered” (l. 3) into the “blind darkness” (l. 2) and that the sergeant is “puzzled” (l. 3). What does Sassoon achieve by placing so much emphasis on the confusion of the situation?
2. Note the repetition of the past tense verbs beginning with “Moaned” (l. 8). What is the effect of this repetition? Now, find the subject of that series of verbs. What do you find significant about that subject, and how does it affect your interpretation of the poem?
3. Note the shift in tone in the middle of line 9. How would you characterize the tone of that final statement? If you had been the one to “find” the man, how would you complete the statement, “In my belief . . .”?
4. Although the poem’s title might seem straightforward, try to come up with three interpretations of it. Think about what is being lamented, and by whom.

Dulce et Decorum Est

WILFRED OWEN

Born in Shropshire, England, in 1893, Wilfred Owen is the most well-known and most highly regarded of the World War I poets. He enlisted in the army in 1915 and fought in France. In May 1917, he was evacuated from the front and hospitalized with shell shock (a condition now referred to as post-traumatic stress disorder). He returned to the battlefield and won the Military Cross in October 1918. Five of his poems were published that year—the only five he lived to see in print. His work exposes the horrors of the war firsthand. He was killed in battle one week before the armistice. Owen’s work remained virtually unknown until 1920, when his friend, Siegfried Sassoon, collected his work and published it as Poems. Although Owen’s life was short, and his career as a writer even shorter, his influence on the next generation of British writers was profound. While recovering from shell shock, he drafted what was to become one of the most famous and gripping poems about war in the English language, “Dulce et Decorum Est.” The title comes from the Roman poet Horace (65–8 B.C.E.), whose line “Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori” means “It is sweet and fitting to die for one’s country” in Latin.

Bent double, like old beggars under sacks,
 Knock-kneed, coughing like hags, we cursed through sludge,
 Till on the haunting flares we turned our backs
 And towards our distant rest began to trudge.
 Men marched asleep. Many had lost their boots
 But limped on, blood-shod. All went lame; all blind;
 Drunk with fatigue; deaf even to the hoots
 Of tired, outstripped Five-Nines that dropped behind.

Gas! GAS! Quick, boys! — An ecstasy of fumbling,
 Fitting the clumsy helmets just in time; 10
 But someone still was yelling out and stumbling
 And flound'ring like a man in fire or lime . . .
 Dim, through the misty panes and thick green light,
 As under a green sea, I saw him drowning.

In all my dreams, before my helpless sight, 15
 He plunges at me, guttering, choking, drowning.

If in some smothering dreams you too could pace
 Behind the wagon that we flung him in,
 And watch the white eyes writhing in his face,
 His hanging face, like a devil's sick of sin; 20
 If you could hear, at every jolt, the blood
 Come gargling from the froth-corrupted lungs,
 Obscene as cancer, bitter as the cud
 Of vile, incurable sores on innocent tongues, —
 My friend, you would not tell with such high zest 25
 To children ardent for some desperate glory,
 The old Lie: Dulce et decorum est
 Pro patria mori.

[1920]

Exploring the Text

1. Note the title of the poem and the translation provided in the headnote. What expectations does the title create for the reader, and at what point did you realize that this was not going to be a poem about the glories of war?
2. In the first stanza, how does Owen use diction and imagery to bring the experience of a night march to life for the reader? What is the purpose of the similes comparing the troops to “old beggars” and “hags”?
3. Note the diction in the second stanza. Why does the speaker call it an “ecstasy of fumbling” (l. 9)? Why does he use “or” in “fire or lime?” (l. 12)? What does this ambiguity suggest?
4. The third stanza shifts in tense, from the past tense “saw” of line 14 to the present tense “plunges” in line 16. What accounts for this temporal shift? A shift in perspective occurs in line 17. How do the shifts in time and perspective influence your response to the poem?
5. Lines 17 through 28 conclude the poem in one sentence addressed to the “you” in line 17. Who is the speaker addressing? How would you describe the tone the speaker uses to say the phrase “My friend” in line 25?
6. The poem uses graphic—some might say grotesque—imagery throughout. How does that imagery influence your understanding of the purpose of the poem?
7. This poem is arguably the most famous war poem in the English language. What accounts for its lasting popularity? Is its fame deserved? Why or why not?

The First Long-Range Artillery Shell in Leningrad

ANNA AKHMATOVA

TRANSLATED BY LYN COFFIN

Born Anna Gorenko in Odessa, in the Ukraine, Anna Akhmatova (1889–1966) began writing as a child, and showed early promise as a poet. Her father believed that having a “decadent poetess” in the family would disgrace the family name, so he forced her to take a pen name. She married the Russian poet Nikolai Gumilyov in 1910, but he soon left her to go off traveling. In 1912, she gave birth to their son, Lev, and published her first book of poetry, Vecher. The couple divorced in 1918. In 1921, Gumilyov was arrested by the Bolsheviks, charged with betraying the revolution, and executed. Because of their connection, Akhmatova was persecuted by Stalin’s regime, and except for periods during World War II, her work was banned from publication between 1925 and 1952. Despite the difficulties she faced as a writer, she is now known as one of the greatest poets of the Soviet Union. The poem included here is set during the siege of Leningrad by German artillery bombardment, which occurred from September 1941 to January 1944.

A rainbow of people rushing around,
 And suddenly everything changed completely,
 This wasn’t a normal city sound,
 It came from unfamiliar country.
 True, it resembled, like a brother, 5
 One peal of thunder or another,
 But every natural thunder contains
 The moisture of clouds, fresh and high,
 And the thirst of fields with drought gone dry,
 A harbinger of happy rains, 10
 And this was as arid as hell ever got,
 And my distracted hearing would not Believe it, if only because of the wild
 Way it started, grew, and caught,
 And how indifferently it brought 15
 Death to my child.

[1941]

Exploring the Text

1. Try to forget the title of this poem, and then reread it. At what point does this poem have to be about an artillery shell? Before that point, could it be about something else? What is Akhmatova’s point in writing about this event in such an indirect way?

2. This poem chronicles a drastic change in the lives of the citizens of Leningrad. What familiar things does the speaker call on in order to understand the “unfamiliar” (l. 4)? In particular, why does the speaker present the situation in terms of weather?
3. What is the significance of the adverb “indifferently” in line 15? How does it help the poet express her theme?
4. Does the tone remain consistent throughout the poem, or does it shift at the very end?
5. Akhmatova wrote this poem about the first assault in a series of artillery attacks that continued for almost three years. How does knowing that information influence your understanding of and response to the poem?

The Death of the Ball Turret Gunner

RANDALL JARRELL

Randall Jarrell (1914–1965) was born in Nashville, Tennessee, and went to Vanderbilt University and Kenyon College. He earned his MA in English at Vanderbilt, and in 1939 he went to teach at the University of Texas, where he met his wife. He enlisted in the Army Air Corps in 1942, and served in World War II in Europe. He trained as a flying cadet but did not qualify as a pilot; instead, he worked as a celestial navigation tower operator and trainer, spending most of the war in Tucson, Arizona. After the war, he taught at Sarah Lawrence College for a year, and then the University of North Carolina at Greensboro for two decades. Jarrell’s fame and influence as a deft and acerbic literary critic is as great as his reputation as a poet. He achieved fame with his National Book Award–winning collection The Woman at the Washington Zoo (1960). In addition to his poetry, criticism, and teaching, Jarrell’s work was wide-ranging: he composed The Bat Poet (1964) and other works for children, in addition to translating German literature by Rainer Maria Rilke and Johann Wolfgang von Goethe. “The Death of the Ball Turret Gunner” is from Jarrell’s first book, Little Friend, Little Friend (1945). It was inspired by his service in the war and is perhaps his most famous poem. About the poem, Jarrell wrote: “A ball turret was a plexiglass sphere set into the belly of a B-17 or B-24, and inhabited by two .50 caliber machine guns and one man, a short small man. When this gunner tracked with his machine guns a fighter attacking his bomber from below, he revolved with the turret; hunched upside-down in his little sphere, he looked like the fetus in the womb. The fighters which attacked him were armed with cannon-firing explosive shells. The hose was a steam hose.”

From my mother’s sleep I fell into the State,
 And I hunched in its belly till my wet fur froze.
 Six miles from earth, loosed from its dream of life,
 I woke to black flak and the nightmare fighters.
 When I died they washed me out of the turret with a hose.

5

[1945]

Exploring the Text

1. Note the imagery that the poet employs in the first three lines: “mother’s sleep,” “belly,” “wet fur,” “dream of life.” What impression does the imagery create for you? What is the cumulative effect of such imagery?
2. How does the irony in line 4 (that he woke to a nightmare) contribute to the meaning of the poem? How else is the poem ironic?
3. How would you describe the tone of the final line? Why is the poem so short?
4. In a review of Richard Wilbur’s poetry, Randall Jarrell remarked, “Mr. Wilbur never goes too far, but he never goes far enough.” How might that statement apply to “The Death of the Ball Turret Gunner,” a poem in which some readers might think that Jarrell has gone “too far”?

Naming of Parts

HENRY REED

Henry Reed (1914–1986) was born in Birmingham, England. He won a scholarship to Birmingham University, where he earned an MA, writing his thesis on the novels of Thomas Hardy. In 1941, he was conscripted into the Royal Army Ordnance Corps. During the war, he served as a soldier and cryptographer, working in both the Italian and the Japanese sections of the Government Code and Cypher School. The poems for which he is best known are based on his experience in basic training, where he entertained his friends with imitations of drill sergeants. Later he wrote about those experiences in a series of poems entitled “Lessons of the War,” which includes the following selection. Thus, “Naming of Parts”—arguably the most famous poem of World War II—was inspired not by an actual war experience but by Reed’s time spent in basic training.

Today we have naming of parts. Yesterday,
 We had daily cleaning. And tomorrow morning,
 We shall have what to do after firing. But today,
 Today we have naming of parts. Japonica
 Glistens like coral in all of the neighboring gardens, 5
 And today we have naming of parts.

This is the lower sling swivel. And this
 Is the upper sling swivel, whose use you will see,
 When you are given your slings. And this is the piling swivel,
 Which in your case you have not got. The branches 10
 Hold in the gardens their silent, eloquent gestures,
 Which in our case we have not got.

This is the safety-catch, which is always released
 With an easy flick of the thumb. And please do not let me

See anyone using his finger. You can do it quite easy 15
 If you have any strength in your thumb. The blossoms
 Are fragile and motionless, never letting anyone see
     Any of them using their finger.

And this you can see is the bolt. The purpose of this Is to open the breech, as you see. We can slide it 20
 Rapidly backwards and forwards: we call this Easing the spring. And rapidly backwards and forwards
 The early bees are assaulting and fumbling the flowers:
     They call it easing the Spring.

They call it easing the Spring: it is perfectly easy 25
 If you have any strength in your thumb: like the bolt,
 And the breech, and the cocking-piece, and the point of balance,
 Which in our case we have not got; and the almond-blossom
 Silent in all of the gardens and the bees going backwards and forwards,
     For today we have naming of parts. 30

Exploring the Text

1. Each of the first four stanzas seems to be spoken in two voices. Where does the shift in perspective occur in each of them? Does this poem have two different speakers, or one speaker with two different voices? Explain.
2. Were you surprised by the imagery of the poem? What is the poet suggesting through the juxtaposition of war and nature imagery?
3. How would you explain the shift from “your case” to “our case” in lines 9–12? How do the things “Which in your case you have not got” (l. 10) compare to the things “Which in our case we have not got” (l. 12)?
4. How does the fifth stanza differ from those that precede it?
5. Judging from the poem, what is Reed’s attitude toward his experience as a soldier in World War II?
6. Henry Reed and Richard Wilbur (below) both juxtapose the imagery of warfare with that of nature. How would you compare the way that each poet uses imagery to present his attitude toward his subject?

First Snow in Alsace

RICHARD WILBUR

Richard Wilbur was born in 1921 in New York City. He graduated from Amherst College in 1942, and then served in World War II. In 1944, he participated in two of the most crucial battles in Italy: the amphibious landing at Anzio and the attack on Monte Cassino, where thousands of troops were killed. Wilbur saw many of his fellow soldiers killed in battle before leaving the army in 1945 with the rank of sergeant. After the war, he went to Harvard Graduate School. It was there that he met Robert Frost, who recognized his talent and encouraged him to be a poet. Wilbur has taught at Harvard, Wellesley, Wesleyan, and Smith colleges, and was named the 1987 U.S. poet laureate. His first collection of poetry, The Beautiful Changes and Other Poems (1947), includes "First Snow in Alsace," a poem that reflects his war experience. A decade later, his collection Things of This World would earn both the Pulitzer Prize and the National Book Award. Wilbur is also known for his translations of French literature, especially the plays of Molière. Alsace is a small region of eastern France that borders Germany and Switzerland. From 1940 to 1944, it was under the control of Nazi Germany.

The snow came down last night like moths
Burned on the moon; it fell till dawn,
Covered the town with simple cloths.

Absolute snow lies rumped on
What shellbursts scattered and deranged,                   5
Entangled railings, crevassed lawn.

As if it did not know they'd changed,
Snow smoothly clasps the roofs of homes
Fear-gutted, trustless and estranged.

The ration stacks are milky domes;                   10
Across the ammunition pile
The snow has climbed in sparkling combs.

You think: beyond the town a mile
Or two, this snowfall fills the eyes
Of soldiers dead a little while.                   15

Persons and persons in disguise,
Walking the new air white and fine,
Trade glances quick with shared surprise.

At children's windows, heaped, benign,
As always, winter shines the most,                   20
And frost makes marvelous designs.

The night guard coming from his post,
Ten first-snows back in thought, walks slow
And warms him with a boyish boast:

He was the first to see the snow.                   25

Exploring the Text

1. In the first stanza, the snow comes down “like moths / Burned on the moon” and lies in “simple cloths” on the town. What is the effect of the differing imagery created by the simile and the metaphor in that stanza? Ultimately, what impression of the snow does the first stanza convey?
2. The snow’s presence is so strong that it might be seen as a character in the first four stanzas. How does this personification prepare you for the shift (“You think:”) in line 13?
3. Who is the speaker of the poem? What is the speaker’s attitude toward the events and scene described?
4. What is the meaning of line 16: “Persons and persons in disguise”?
5. What is the significance of the final line of the poem? In a poem about Alsace—a disputed territory that has seen the horrors of war time and again over the centuries—why does Wilbur write about the snow? What does the snow change in this poem, and how does it change it?

The Terrorist, He Watches

WISLAWA SZYMBORSKA

TRANSLATED BY ROBERT A. MAGUIRE AND MAGNUS JAN KRYNSKI

Wisława Szymborska [vis-lah-vah sim-bawrs-kah] was born in 1923 in western Poland and has lived there all her life. After studying literature and sociology at Jagiellonian University in Krakow, she began to make her way as a poet. She published her first poem, “I am Looking for a World,” in 1945, and her first book, Dłatego Żygemy (That’s What We Live For), in 1952. Although she had published eighteen volumes of poetry, which had been translated into more than a dozen languages, she was not well known in the English-speaking world until she was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1996. In her acceptance speech, Szymborska said, “Inspiration is not the exclusive privilege of poets or artists generally. There is, has been, and will always be a certain group of people whom inspiration visits. It’s made up of all those who’ve consciously chosen their calling and do their job with love and imagination. It may include doctors, teachers, gardeners—and I could list a hundred more professions.” Two characteristics of her work—close observation and understatement—are evident in the poem included here.

The bomb will go off in the bar at one twenty p.m.
 Now it’s only one sixteen p.m.
 Some will still have time to get in,
 Some to get out.

The terrorist has already crossed to the other side of the street. 5
The distance protects him from any danger, and what a sight for sore eyes:

A woman in a yellow jacket, she goes in.
A man in dark glasses, he comes out.
Guys in jeans, they are talking. 10
One seventeen and four seconds.
That shorter guy's really got it made, and gets on a scooter, and that taller one, he goes in.

One seventeen and forty seconds.
That girl there, she's got a green ribbon in her hair. 15
Too bad that bus just cut her off.
One eighteen p.m.
The girl's not there any more.
Was she dumb enough to go in, or wasn't she?
That we'll see when they carry them out. 20

One nineteen p.m.
No one seems to be going in.
Instead a fat baldy's coming out.
Like he's looking for something in his pockets and at one nineteen and fifty seconds 25 he goes back for those lousy gloves of his.

It's one twenty p.m.
The time, how it drags.
Should be any moment now.
Not yet. 30
Yes, this is it.
The bomb, it goes off.

An Iraqi Evening

YOUSIF AL-SA'IGH

TRANSLATED BY SAADI A SIMAWA, RALPH SAVARESE, AND CHUCK MILLER

The reputation of Iraqi poet and writer Yousif al-Sa'igh in the West is based almost entirely on this simple, haunting poem. Yousif al-Sa'igh continues to live in Iraq. In this poem, he writes about the Iran-Iraq War, which waged from 1980 to 1988 and took approximately 150,000 Iraqi lives.

Clips from the battlefield
 in an Iraqi evening:
 a peaceable home
 two boys preparing their homework 5
 a little girl
 absentmindedly drawing on scrap paper funny pictures.
 —breaking news coming shortly.
 The entire house becomes ears 10
 ten Iraqi eyes glued to the screen in frightened silence.
 Smells mingle:
 the smell of war
 and the smell of just baked bread.
 The mother raises her eyes to a photo on the wall 15 whispering
 —May God protect you and she begins preparing supper quietly and in her mind 20
 clips float past of the battlefield carefully selected for hope.

2. Which of the senses are engaged by the imagery in this poem? Which images are the most effective? What is the effect of juxtaposing the smell of war with the smell of just-baked bread?
3. What is the effect of the personification in the poem?
4. Who do you think is pictured in the “photo on the wall” (l. 15)? What evidence can you find in the poem to support this view?
5. What is the tone of the poem? Discuss three elements of style that contribute to its development.
6. One critic has described this poem as “a song of survival.” Explain why you do or do not find that an apt description.

BRIAN TURNER

Born in 1967 in California, Brian Turner earned an MFA in poetry at the University of Oregon before enlisting in the army at the age of twenty-nine. During the seven years he spent as a soldier, he was deployed to Bosnia and Herzegovina, and served as an army infantry team leader with the Third Stryker Brigade Combat Team in Iraq in 2003. His work has been published in various journals as well as in Voices in Wartime: The Anthology—published in 2005 in conjunction with the feature-length documentary film of the same name. His first collection of poems, Here, Bullet (2005), won the Beatrice Hawley Award and was a New York Times Editors’ Choice selection. In 2007, Turner received a National Endowment for the Arts Literature Fellowship in poetry. He currently lives in Fresno, California, where he teaches poetry at Fresno State. “Sadiq,” the title of the poem included here, is Arabic for “friend.”

Exploring the Text

1. How do you interpret the epigraph from Sa'di, a revered thirteenth-century Persian poet? How does this epigraph inform your understanding of Turner's poem?
2. In line 8, the speaker directly addresses "my friend." What is the speaker's attitude toward the "friend"? How does Turner's use of the word compare to Wilfred Owen's direct address to "My friend" in "Dulce et Decorum Est" (p. 1424)?
3. How does the poem reveal the speaker's attitude toward his war experience?
4. In Regarding the Pain of Others, Susan Sontag says of war, "We do not and cannot imagine what it was like, how dreadful or terrifying it was, how normal it becomes." How might "Sadiq" be regarded as a response to Sontag's statement?

BRIAN TURNER ON WRITING

Lawrence Scanlon (LS): What prompted the writing of "Sadiq"? Is the poem based on a particular incident?

Brian Turner (BT): There's no particular incident that prompted this poem. Prior to deploying to Iraq and when my unit was back in garrison, training, I often heard soldiers say, "I'm gonna go shoot somebody in the face." I share this not to shock people. I share this because I realized then that this was mostly being said because of fear—a recognition of the combat zone where we were preparing to go. As a side note, I never heard that phrase said again as my unit returned from our time in Iraq.

LS: In Voices in Wartime: The Anthology, "Sadiq" concludes with an additional line that does not appear in Here, Bullet: "It should never be so easy as this." Which is the definitive version? Which do you prefer?

BT: I much prefer the version in the book [Here, Bullet]. I think the first version doesn't properly recognize the difficulties and nuances involved, the inner psychology of the people involved in a combat zone.

LS: There is a great tradition of war poetry, from Homer through Wilfred Owen and on to Yusef Komunyakaa, to name a few. But the poetry of World War I stands out in many minds as the richest. Do you agree? Why do you think that war in particular has produced such rich poetry?

BT: I'm not sure I agree. In fact, I think we'll need another hundred years or so to see how much of the poetry of this past century will last in the larger public discourse. In terms of World War I, though, I think a great many factors converged to produce the meaningful poetry of that time, including the industrial age; the “advances” in warfare itself, which led to carnage on a mammoth scale; and much, much more. Still, whether it lasts through the centuries or not is not a true test of how meaningful and deep the poetry is for those who’ve written it and those who interact with it (the reader/audience).

LS: How did your fellow soldiers—your “brothers and sisters in arms,” if you will—respond to your being a poet?

BT: I’ve heard good things back from the soldiers I served with while in Iraq. I haven’t stayed in contact with those I didn’t get along with—I have no idea what they think of it. I didn’t share the fact that I was writing poetry at the time, simply not to undermine my position as an infantry sergeant. I’ve had some people outside of the military suggest that I was undermining the art by “hiding” it, but in my opinion they don’t quite understand the interpersonal dynamics of being an infantry sergeant. The stereotype of the poet as the sensitive guy is not one that inspires the infantry. This isn’t said to undermine the art or to limit the humanity of those I served with in uniform; if they were to read the work, I’m certain they’d be surprised by the range of what poetry can offer the reader.

LS: With “Night in Blue” and “Katyusha Rockets” as notable, postwar exceptions, most of the poems in Here, Bullet depict war experiences in Iraq. Did you write most of them while in Iraq or after you returned to the United States?

BT: I wrote all but two or three while I was in Iraq. I wrote the two or three others during the first month I returned to America (as I was typing up all of the poems I’d written in my journals while overseas). There were about ten to fifteen more poems written in Iraq that didn’t make it into the final book, though two of those poems were included in the Bloodaxe Books version of the book put out in the U.K.

LS: Given their subject matter, it is no surprise that many of your poems are about sadness and loss. You seem to make an implicit appeal in your poems, as if to ask the reader—the citizen—to pay attention, to look and listen. What would you want your readers to think about after reading your poems?

BT: As a writer, it’s a great honor to have a reader complete the dialogue begun on the page. I always say the poem finishes in the reader. Each reader brings his or her own wealth of experience, his or her own lifetime of knowledge, to the reading. So, in a sense, there’s no way to answer this because I would hope different things for different readers. I’m not trying to obfuscate here and to dodge the question—I'm simply trying to recognize and to respect the unique character of each reader my work is honored by and not limit the individual reader's experience.

Follow-Up

1. In an earlier draft, "Sadiq" ended with the line, "It should never be so easy as this." In this interview, Brian Turner makes the case for leaving out that extra line, saying that it "doesn't properly recognize the difficulties and nuances involved, the inner psychology of the people involved in a combat zone" (para. 4). Do you agree or disagree that not including that line improves the poem?
2. Do you agree or disagree with those who criticize Turner for hiding the fact that he was a poet while he was on duty in Iraq? Explain. Even if you disagree, why might some say that he was "undermining the art by 'hiding' it" (para. 8)? What cultural forces are at odds in this debate?
3. In the interview, Turner says, "the poem finishes in the reader. Each reader brings his or her own wealth of experience, his or her own lifetime of knowledge, to the reading" (para. 12). What experiences do you bring to the reading of Turner's poem "Sadiq"? How do those experiences affect your reaction to the poem?

Elegy for the Native Guards

NATASHA TRETHEWEY

Natasha Trethewey was born in Gulfport, Mississippi, in 1966, and grew up in an intellectual environment. She would accompany her father—a college professor and author of three collections of poetry—on trips to the library, and get lost in a world of books. Her father encouraged her to be a hardworking risk taker in both her writing and her life. Trethewey earned an MA in literature at Hollins University in Virginia and an MFA in poetry at the University of Massachusetts. Her first collection of poetry, Domestic Work (2000), was selected by Rita Dove as the winner of the inaugural Cave Canem Poetry Prize for the best first book by an African American poet and won the 2001 Mississippi Institute of Arts and Letters award. She is currently a professor of English and creative writing at Emory University in Atlanta, Georgia. "Elegy for the Native Guards" is from Native Guard, for which she was awarded a Pulitzer Prize in 2006. Commenting on the poem in an interview in the New York Times, she says, "I've been interested in historical erasure and historical amnesia for a long time, those things that get left out of the record." The poem tells the story of a tourist boat to Ship Island, a barrier island off the coast of Mississippi that is now a national park. During the Civil War, it housed Confederate prisoners of war and served a vital strategic role in the Union invasions of the ports of New Orleans and Mobile. The Louisiana Native Guards—the first black combat regiments in the Union Army to be led by black officers—manned the island. As of 2006, there was no monument to the Native Guards’ service on Ship Island.

Now that the salt of their blood Stiffens the saltier oblivion of the sea . . .

—ALLEN TATE

We leave Gulfport at noon; gulls overhead trailing the boat—streamers, noisy fanfare—all the way to Ship Island. What we see first is the fort, its roof of grass, a lee—half reminder of the men who served there— 5
a weathered monument to some of the dead.

Inside we follow the ranger, hurried though we are to get to the beach. He tells of graves lost in the Gulf, the island split in half when Hurricane Camille hit, 10 shows us casemates, cannons, the store that sells souvenirs, tokens of history long buried.

The Daughters of the Confederacy has placed a plaque here, at the fort’s entrance—each Confederate soldier’s name raised hard 15 in bronze; no names carved for the Native Guards—2nd Regiment, Union men, black phalanx.
What is monument to their legacy?

All the grave markers, all the crude headstones—water-lost. Now fish dart among their bones, 20 and we listen for what the waves intone.
Only the fort remains, near forty feet high,
round, unfinished, half open to the sky,
the elements—wind, rain—God’s deliberate eye.

Exploring the Text

1. How does the epigraph from Allen Tate inform your reading of the poem? The quotation is from his poem “Ode to the Confederate Dead.” Does this information change your reaction to the quotation or the way it relates to Trethewey’s poem? If so, how?

2. What is the speaker's attitude toward the "tokens" in line 12?
3. Line 18 asks, "What is monument to their legacy?" Do you think to means "compared with" or "in honor of"? Which reading fits your interpretation of the poem? Why?
4. Why is God's eye "deliberate" in the final line? What might be the connection to the hurricane introduced in line 10? Explain what such a connection might mean.
5. The poem contains several references to splitting, such as "half reminder" in line 5, "some of the dead" in line 6, and "island split / in half" in lines 9 and 10 (notice the enjambment there, as well). How do such phrases suggest one theme of this poem?
6. The poem tells us that a plaque dedicated to Confederate soldiers has been placed in the national park by the Daughters of the Confederacy. Do you find that fitting? ironic? Explain. How does Trethewey view it?
7. How might Trethewey's elegy be regarded as the "monument" called for in line 18?

PAIRED POEMS

The Parable of the Old Man and the Young and Arms and the Boy

WILFRED OWEN

Born in Shropshire, England, in 1893, Wilfred Owen is the most well-known and most highly regarded of the World War I poets. He enlisted in the army in 1915 and fought in France. In May 1917, he was evacuated from the front and hospitalized with shell shock (a condition now referred to as post-traumatic stress disorder). He returned to the battlefield and won the Military Cross in October 1918. Five of his poems were published that year—the only five he lived to see in print. His work exposes the horrors of the war firsthand. He was killed in battle one week before the armistice. Owen's work remained virtually unknown until 1920, when his friend, Siegfried Sassoon, collected his work and published it as Poems. Although Owen's life was short, and his career as a writer even shorter, his influence on the next generation of British writers was profound. The selections here were printed back-to-back in Poems (1920).

The Parable of the Old Man and the Young

So Abram rose, and clave the wood, and went,
And took the fire with him, and a knife.

And as they sojourned both of them together,
 Isaac the first-born spake and said, My Father,
 Behold the preparations, fire and iron, 5
 But where the lamb for this burnt-offering?
 Then Abram bound the youth with belts and straps,
 And builded parapets and trenches there,
 And stretchèd forth the knife to slay his son.
 When lo! An angel called him out of heaven, 10
 Saying, Lay not thy hand upon the lad,
 Neither do anything to him. Behold,
 A ram, caught in a thicket by its horns;
 Offer the Ram of Pride instead of him.
 But the old man would not so, but slew his son, 15
 And half the seed of Europe, one by one.

[1920]

Exploring the Text

1. This poem alludes to Genesis 22:1–19. Look up this passage of the Bible and find out what happens in the original story. Where does this poem begin to deviate from the story in Genesis? What is the significance of these deviations?
2. What does the “Ram of Pride” (l. 14) represent?
3. At line 15, the poem shifts dramatically. How do you interpret the final couplet? What does he mean by “half the seed of Europe” (l. 16)?
4. Owen refers to a parable from the Bible and also calls his poem a parable. How does Owen’s poem serve as a parable for his time?

Arms and the Boy

Let the boy try along this bayonet-blade
 How cold steel is, and keen with hunger of blood;
 Blue with all malice, like a madman’s flash;
 And thinly drawn with famishing for flesh.

 Lend him to stroke these blind, blunt bullet-leads 5
 Which long to nuzzle in the hearts of lads,
 Or give him cartridges of fine zinc teeth,
 Sharp with the sharpness of grief and death.

 For his teeth seem for laughing round an apple.
 There lurk no claws behind his fingers supple; 10
 And God will grow no talons at his heels,
 Nor antlers through the thickness of his curls.

[1920]

Exploring the Text

1. The title of this poem evokes Virgil's Aeneid, a late first-century B.C.E. Latin epic poem that tells the story of Aeneas, a Trojan warrior who voyages to Italy and becomes the ancestor of the Romans. The Aeneid begins, "I sing of arms and the man." How does Owen's use of the allusion contribute to the meaning of his poem?
2. Trace the imagery throughout the poem. What conclusions can you draw from it? Some of the imagery creates dramatic contrasts. Find some examples of this technique, and explain how they contribute to the meaning of the poem.
3. In the first two stanzas, the speaker suggests letting the boy become familiar with weapons. What reason does the speaker give? Do you find the poem's argument convincing? Explain why or why not.
4. What is the tone of the speaker? What is Owen's attitude toward what the speaker says? toward weapons? toward war?
5. Owen classified this poem in his draft table of contents under "protest—the unnaturalness of weapons." How does this information influence your understanding of the poem? What is ironic about this classification, given the imagery in this poem?

Focus on Comparison and Contrast

1. What do these poems have in common in terms of the way they portray violence? How do they differ?
2. Each of the poems depends on an allusion—one to the Bible, the other to a classical epic poem. Compare the effects of the allusions and their contribution to each poem's tone.
3. Both poems explore the nature of youth confronted with the reality of war. Compare and contrast the two, and evaluate which one is more satisfactory in its delivery of theme.

Writing Assignment

In both "The Parable of the Old Man and the Young" and "Arms and the Boy," young men are confronted with violence. Read the poems carefully. Then write an essay in which you compare and contrast the way Owen uses these confrontations, analyzing their effectiveness in communicating his antiwar message.

Boy Fascist

NEW YORK TIMES

The following photo, taken by a staff photographer at the New York Times, was published on April 25, 1932. It was taken at a ceremony for the Leva fascista in the Place du Peuple, Rome. The Leva fascista celebrated the promotion of youth to the next level of the Italian Fascist youth organization. This organization included members ranging from four years old to college age.

1. How would you describe the expression on the face of the soldier to the left? How would you describe the little boy? What do you think their relationship is?
2. What is the photographer's purpose in juxtaposing the little boy with the line of soldiers?
3. What attitude toward war does this photograph suggest? What connections can you find to other pieces you have read in this chapter?

Conversation

Finding Peace

What does it mean to find peace at the end of a war? While governments can end a war with the stroke of a pen, what of the soldiers and those left behind when a soldier falls? Knowing what we do about shell shock, or post-traumatic stress disorder, it seems reasonable to wonder if the war ever leaves the soldier—even after the soldier has left the war. Antigone, the first selection in this chapter, shows the difficulty—especially for Creon—of adjusting to peacetime. Perhaps only Antigone herself can be regarded as having found peace, but how did she achieve it, and how great was the cost? In this Conversation, we'll read literature about people—soldiers, societies, and families left behind—trying to find peace after war.

Ulysses

ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON

The life of Alfred, Lord Tennyson (1809–1892), spanned the Victorian age, and his work—noteworthy for its metrical skill, mythological subject matter (particularly his use of Arthurian legend), and high idealism—is considered the hallmark of the period. His most famous poems include “The Charge of the Light Brigade,” “The Lady of Shalott,” “Ulysses,” and “In Memoriam”—published in 1850, the year that he succeeded William Wordsworth as poet laureate. In this poem, Ulysses (the Latin name for Odysseus, hero of Homer’s Odyssey) reflects on his past, including ten years fighting in the Trojan War and his subsequent ten-year adventure returning home.

A Wife in London (December, 1899)

THOMAS HARDY

Among the greatest nineteenth-century British novelists, Thomas Hardy (1840–1928) was born in Dorset, England. Among his most famous works are Far from the Madding Crowd—whose title comes from Thomas Gray’s “Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard” (p. 1259)—published in 1874; The Return of the Native (1878); Tess of the D’Urbervilles (1891); and Jude the Obscure (1895). After the less than appreciative reaction that Jude the Obscure received—many people found it too shocking and pessimistic—Hardy wrote only poetry. In “A Wife in London,” he writes about the aftermath of the Boer War, which waged from 1899 to 1902 in South Africa.

I—The Tragedy

She sits in the tawny vapour
That the Thames-side lanes have uprolled,
Behind whose webby fold on fold

Like a waning taper
The street-lamp glimmers cold.

5

A messenger’s knock cracks smartly,
Flashed news is in her hand
Of meaning it dazes to understand

Though shaped so shortly:
He—has fallen—in the far South Land. . . .

II—The Irony

’Tis the morrow; the fog hangs thicker,
The postman nears and goes:
A letter is brought whose lines disclose

By the firelight flicker
     His hand, whom the worm now knows: 15

Fresh—firm—penned in highest feather—
     Page-full of his hoped return,
     And of home-planned jaunts by brake and burn
 In the summer weather,
     And of new love that they would learn. 20

Questions

1. Trace the imagery of this poem as it is introduced in the first part and then picked up again in the second part. What role does the imagery play in establishing mood and conveying theme?
2. Why does Hardy call the two parts of the poem “The Tragedy” and “The Irony”? Explain, using evidence from the text.
3. Imagine that the wife lives not in London but in your hometown. In a contemporary poem about her as a widow of the war in Iraq or Afghanistan, what would be different in the poem? What would be similar? How universal is the poem’s message? Explain.

Soldier’s Home

ERNEST HEMINGWAY

Born in Illinois, Ernest Hemingway (1899–1961) served in a volunteer ambulance unit in Italy in World War I, where he was wounded and hospitalized. After the war, he worked as a reporter for American newspapers and then as a foreign correspondent in Europe. Among his most famous works are the novels The Sun Also Rises (1926), A Farewell to Arms (1929), and The Old Man and the Sea (1955). He was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1954, and the influence of his “simple,” “journalistic” style on modern writing is incalculable. “Soldier’s Home”—one of Hemingway’s early stories—is from In Our Time (1925).

Krebs went to the war from a Methodist college in Kansas. There is a picture which shows him among his fraternity brothers, all of them wearing exactly the same height and style collar. He enlisted in the Marines in 1917 and did not return to the United States until the second division returned from the Rhine in the summer of 1919.

There is a picture which shows him on the Rhine with two German girls and another corporal. Krebs and the corporal look too big for their uniforms. The German girls are not beautiful. The Rhine does not show in the picture.

By the time Krebs returned to his home town in Oklahoma the greeting of heroes was over. He came back much too late. The men from the town who had been drafted had all been welcomed elaborately on their return. There had been a great deal of hysteria. Now the reaction had set in. People seemed to think it was rather ridiculous for Krebs to be getting back so late, years after the war was over.

At first Krebs, who had been at Belleau Wood, Soissons, the Champagne, St. Mihiel, and in the Argonne did not want to talk about the war at all. Later he felt the need to talk but no one wanted to hear about it. His town had heard too many atrocity stories to be thrilled by actualities. Krebs found that to be listened to at all he had to lie, and after he had done this twice he, too, had a reaction against the war and against talking about it. A distaste for everything that had happened to him in the war set in because of the lies he had told. All of the times that had been able to make him feel cool and clear inside himself when he thought of them; the times so long back when he had done the one thing, the only thing for a man to do, easily and naturally, when he might have done something else, now lost their cool, valuable quality and then were lost themselves.

His lies were quite unimportant lies and consisted in attributing to himself 5 things other men had seen, done, or heard of, and stating as facts certain apocryphal incidents familiar to all soldiers. Even his lies were not sensational at the pool room. His acquaintances, who had heard detailed accounts of German women found chained to machine guns in the Argonne forest and who could not comprehend, or were barred by their patriotism from interest in, any German machine gunners who were not chained, were not thrilled by his stories.

Krebs acquired the nausea in regard to experience that is the result of untruth or exaggeration, and when he occasionally met another man who had really been a soldier and they talked a few minutes in the dressing room at a dance he fell into the easy pose of the old soldier among other soldiers: that he had been badly, sickeningly frightened all the time. In this way he lost everything.

During this time, it was late summer, he was sleeping late in bed, getting up to walk down town to the library to get a book, eating lunch at home, reading on the front porch until he became bored, and then walking down through the town to spend the hottest hours of the day in the cool dark of the pool room. He loved to play pool.

In the evening he practiced on his clarinet, strolled down town, read, and went to bed. He was still a hero to his two young sisters. His mother would have given him breakfast in bed if he had wanted it. She often came in when he was in bed and asked him to tell her about the war, but her attention always wandered. His father was noncommittal.

Before Krebs went away to the war he had never been allowed to drive the family motor car. His father was in the real estate business and always wanted the car to be at his command when he required it to take clients out into the country to show them a piece of farm property. The car always stood outside the First National Bank building where his father had an office on the second floor. Now, after the war, it was still the same car.

Nothing was changed in the town except that the young girls had grown up. But 10 they lived in such a complicated world of already defined alliances and shifting feuds that Krebs did not feel the energy or the courage to break into it. He liked to look at them, though. There were so many good-looking young girls. Most of them had their hair cut short. When he went away only little girls wore their hair like that or girls that were fast. They all wore sweaters and shirt waists with round Dutch collars. It was a pattern. He liked to look at them from the front porch as they walked on the other side of the street. He liked to watch them walking under the shade of the trees. He liked the round Dutch collars above their sweaters. He liked their silk stockings and flat shoes. He liked their bobbed hair and the way they walked.

When he was in town their appeal to him was not very strong. He did not like them when he saw them in the Greek's ice cream parlor. He did not want them themselves really. They were too complicated. There was something else. Vaguely he wanted a girl but he did not want to have to work to get her. He would have liked to have a girl but he did not want to have to spend a long time getting her. He did not want to get into the intrigue and the politics. He did not want to have to do any courting. He did not want to tell any more lies. It wasn't worth it.

He did not want any consequences. He did not want any consequences ever again. He wanted to live alone without consequences. Besides he did not really need a girl. The army had taught him that. It was all right to pose as though you had to have a girl. Nearly everybody did that. But it wasn't true. You did not need a girl. That was the funny thing. First a fellow boasted how girls mean nothing to him, that he never thought of them, that they could not touch him. Then a fellow boasted that he could not get along without girls, that he had to have them all the time, that he could not go to sleep without them.

That was all a lie. It was all a lie both ways. You did not need a girl unless you thought about them. He learned that in the army. Then sooner or later you always got one. When you were really ripe for a girl you always got one. You did not have to think about it. Sooner or later it would come. He had learned that in the army.

Now he would have liked a girl if she had come to him and not wanted to talk. But here at home it was all too complicated. He knew he could never get through it all again. It was not worth the trouble. That was the thing about French girls and German girls. There was not all this talking. You couldn't talk much and you did not need to talk. It was simple and you were friends. He thought about France and then he began to think about Germany. On the whole he had liked Germany better. He did not want to leave Germany. He did not want to come home. Still, he had come home. He sat on the front porch.

He liked the girls that were walking along the other side of the street. He liked the look of them much better than the French girls or the German girls. But the world they were in was not the world he was in. He would like to have one of them. But it was not worth it. They were such a nice pattern. He liked the pattern. It was exciting. But he would not go through all the talking. He did not want one badly enough. He liked to look at them all, though. It was not worth it. Not now when things were getting good again.

He sat there on the porch reading a book on the war. It was a history and he was reading about all the engagements he had been in. It was the most interesting reading he had ever done. He wished there were more maps. He looked forward with a good feeling to reading all the really good histories when they would come out with good detail maps. Now he was really learning about the war. He had been a good soldier. That made a difference.

One morning after he had been home about a month his mother came into his bedroom and sat on the bed. She smoothed her apron.

"I had a talk with your father last night, Harold," she said, "and he is willing for you to take the car out in the evenings."

"Yeah?" said Krebs, who was not fully awake. "Take the car out? Yeah?"

"Yes. Your father has felt for some time that you should be able to take the car out in the evenings whenever you wished but we only talked it over last night." 20

"I'll bet you made him," Krebs said.

"No. It was your father's suggestion that we talk the matter over."

"Yeah. I'll bet you made him," Krebs sat up in bed.

"Will you come down to breakfast, Harold?" his mother said.

"As soon as I get my clothes on," Krebs said. 25

His mother went out of the room and he could hear her frying something downstairs while he washed, shaved, and dressed to go down into the dining-room for breakfast. While he was eating breakfast his sister brought in the mail.

"Well, Hare," she said. "You old sleepyhead. What do you ever get up for?"

Krebs looked at her. He liked her. She was his best sister.

"Have you got the paper?" he asked.

She handed him the Kansas City Star and he shucked off its brown wrapper and opened it to the sporting page. He folded the Star open and propped it against the water pitcher with his cereal dish to steady it, so he could read while he ate. 30

"Harold," his mother stood in the kitchen doorway, "Harold, please don't muss up the paper. Your father can't read his Star if it's been mussed."

"I won't muss it," Krebs said.

His sister sat down at the table and watched him while he read.

"We're playing indoor over at school this afternoon," she said. "I'm going to pitch." 35

"Good," said Krebs. "How's the old wing?"

"I can pitch better than lots of the boys. I tell them all you taught me. The other girls aren't much good."

"Yeah?" said Krebs.

"I tell them all you're my beau. Aren't you my beau, Hare?"

"You bet."

"Couldn't your brother really be your beau just because he's your brother?" 40

"I don't know."

"Sure you know. Couldn't you be my beau, Hare, if I was old enough and if you wanted to?"

"Sure. You're my girl now."

"Am I really your girl?"

"Sure." 45

"Do you love me?"

"Uh, huh."

"Will you love me always?"

"Sure."

"Will you come over and watch me play indoor?"

50

"Maybe."

"Aw, Hare, you don't love me. If you loved me, you'd want to come over and watch me play indoor."

Krebs's mother came into the dining-room from the kitchen. She carried a plate with two fried eggs and some crisp bacon on it and a plate of buckwheat cakes.

"You run along, Helen," she said. "I want to talk to Harold."

She put the eggs and bacon down in front of him and brought in a jug of maple syrup for the buckwheat cakes. Then she sat down across the table from Krebs.

55

"I wish you'd put down the paper a minute, Harold," she said.

Krebs took down the paper and folded it.

"Have you decided what you are going to do yet, Harold?" his mother said, taking off her glasses.

"No," said Krebs.

"Don't you think it's about time?" His mother did not say this in a mean way. She seemed worried.

60

"I hadn't thought about it," Krebs said.

"God has some work for everyone to do," his mother said. "There can be no idle hands in His Kingdom."

"I'm not in His Kingdom," Krebs said.

"We are all of us in His Kingdom."

Krebs felt embarrassed and resentful as always.

65

"I've worried about you so much, Harold," his mother went on. "I know the temptations you must have been exposed to. I know how weak men are. I know what your own dear grandfather, my own father, told us about the Civil War and I have prayed for you. I pray for you all day long, Harold."

Krebs looked at the bacon fat hardening on his plate.

"Your father is worried, too," his mother went on. "He thinks you have lost your ambition, that you haven't got a definite aim in life. Charley Simmons, who is just your age, has a good job and is going to be married. The boys are all settling down; they're all determined to get somewhere; you can see that boys like Charley Simmons are on their way to being really a credit to the community."

Krebs said nothing.

"Don't look that way, Harold," his mother said. "You know we love you and I want to tell you for your own good how matters stand. Your father does not want to hamper your freedom. He thinks you should be allowed to drive the car. If you want to take some of the nice girls out riding with you, we are only too pleased. We want you to enjoy yourself. But you are going to have to settle down to work, Harold. Your father doesn't care what you start in at. All work is honorable as he says. But you've got to make a start at something. He asked me to speak to you this morning and then you can stop in and see him at his office."

70

"Is that all?" Krebs said.

"Yes. Don't you love your mother, dear boy?"

"No," Krebs said.

His mother looked at him across the table. Her eyes were shiny. She started crying.
 “I don’t love anybody,” Krebs said. 75

It wasn’t any good. He couldn’t tell her, he couldn’t make her see it. It was silly to have said it. He had only hurt her. He went over and took hold of her arm. She was crying with her head in her hands.

“I didn’t mean it,” he said. “I was just angry at something. I didn’t mean I didn’t love you.”

His mother went on crying. Krebs put his arm on her shoulder.
 “Can’t you believe me, mother?”

His mother shook her head. 80
 “Please, please, mother. Please believe me.”

“All right,” his mother said chokily. She looked up at him. “I believe you, Harold.”

Krebs kissed her hair. She put her face up to him.
 “I’m your mother,” she said. “I held you next to my heart when you were a tiny baby.”

Krebs felt sick and vaguely nauseated. 85
 “I know, Mummy,” he said. “I’ll try and be a good boy for you.”

“Would you kneel and pray with me, Harold?” his mother asked.
 They knelt down beside the dining-room table and Krebs’s mother prayed.
 “Now, you pray, Harold,” she said.
 “I can’t,” Krebs said. 90
 “Try, Harold.”
 “I can’t.”
 “Do you want me to pray for you?”
 “Yes.”

So his mother prayed for him and then they stood up and Krebs kissed his mother and went out of the house. He had tried so to keep his life from being complicated. Still, none of it had touched him. He had felt sorry for his mother and she had made him lie. He would go to Kansas City and get a job and she would feel all right about it. There would be one more scene maybe before he got away. He would not go down to his father’s office. He would miss that one. He wanted his life to go smoothly. It had just gotten going that way. Well, that was all over now, anyway. He would go over to the schoolyard and watch Helen play indoor baseball.

Questions

1. The story begins with a startlingly direct sentence: “Krebs went to the war from a Methodist college in Kansas.” What does it imply?
2. Why does the narrator mention the collars the fraternity brothers are wearing in the picture (para. 1) and the collars the girls in the town are wearing (para. 10)? What is the implication beyond the repetition?

3. At the end of paragraph 6, the narrator states, “In this way he lost everything.” What does he mean?
4. In paragraph 11, Hemingway writes about Krebs: “Vaguely he wanted a girl but he did not want to have to work to get her. He would have liked to have a girl but he did not want to have to spend a long time getting her. He did not want to get into the intrigue and the politics. He did not want to have to do any courting. He did not want to tell any more lies.” What assumptions about love and war and truth underlie this passage?
5. Notice the syntax in paragraphs 14 and 15. Why does Hemingway present Krebs in such short and simple sentences? How does the syntax reflect the content and affect the meaning of these sentences?
6. In paragraph 16, we learn that Krebs is reading “about all the engagements he had been in.” The narrator states, “It was the most interesting reading he had ever done.” Read the paragraph carefully. How does it relate Krebs’s state of mind to his attempt to find peace?
7. Consider Krebs’s home and family. What is significant about the father’s absence? Why does his mother have such difficulty understanding Krebs? Why does he have such difficulty making himself understood? Describe Krebs’s relationship with his sister, Helen. Is the soldier home in “Soldier’s Home?” Is the title ironic? Explain.
8. In paragraph 67, Hemingway writes, “Krebs looked at the bacon fat hardening on his plate.” What does that image suggest about Krebs? How does it contribute to the story? In paragraph 85, Hemingway writes, “Krebs felt sick and vaguely nauseated.” How would you explain the causes of his unease?
9. Upon finishing the story, how do you feel about Krebs? Will he find peace? If so, explain how. If not, why not?

Facing It

YUSEF KOMUNYAKAA

Yusef Komunyakaa (b. 1947) was born James Willie Brown Jr. and raised in Bogalusa, Louisiana. He has taught in the New Orleans public schools, at Indiana University, at Princeton University, and is currently teaching at New York University. Fresh out of high school, he enlisted in the army and served in Vietnam, an experience that permeates his poetry. After returning from Vietnam, it was many years before Komunyakaa felt he could write about his time spent there. Speaking of his war experience to the New York Times, he said, “I never used the word ‘gook’ or ‘dink’ in Vietnam. There is a certain kind of dehumanization that takes place to create an enemy, to call up the passion to kill this person. I knew something about that growing up in Louisiana.” He was awarded the 1994 Pulitzer Prize for Neon Vernacular: New and Selected Poems. One of his finest poems, “Facing It”—about an encounter with the Vietnam Veterans Memorial—is from his collection Dien Cai Dau (1988).

My black face fades, hiding inside the black granite.
I said I wouldn't,
dammit: No tears.
I'm stone. I'm flesh. 5
My clouded reflection eyes me like a bird of prey, the profile of night slanted against morning. I turn this way—the stone lets me go.
I turn that way—I'm inside 10
the Vietnam Veterans Memorial again, depending on the light to make a difference.
I go down the 58,022 names,
half-expecting to find 15
my own in letters like smoke.
I touch the name Andrew Johnson;
I see the booby trap's white flash.
Names shimmer on a woman's blouse
but when she walks away 20
the names stay on the wall.
Brushstrokes flash, a red bird's wings cutting across my stare.
The sky. A plane in the sky.
A white vet's image floats 25 closer to me, then his pale eyes look through mine. I'm a window.
He's lost his right arm inside the stone. In the black mirror a woman's trying to erase names: 30
No, she's brushing a boy's hair.

From Boundaries

MAYA LIN

Maya Lin was born in 1959 in Ohio, where her mother and father were professors at Ohio University. When she was twenty-one years old and an architecture student at Yale University, Lin was selected from over 1,420 competitors to design the Vietnam Veterans Memorial in Washington, D.C. Since then, she has designed many major public installations, including one for the federal courthouse in New York City and the Civil Rights Memorial in Montgomery, Alabama. In 2000, she published the memoir Boundaries, in which she describes the process of designing the Vietnam Veterans memorial.

I made a conscious decision not to do any specific research on the Vietnam War and the political turmoil surrounding it. I felt that the politics had eclipsed the veterans, their service and their lives. I wanted to create a memorial that everyone would be able to respond to, regardless of whether one thought our country should or should not have participated in the war. The power of a name was very much with me at the time, partly because of the Memorial Rotunda at Yale. In Woolsey Hall, the walls are inscribed with the names of all the Yale alumni who have been killed in wars. I had never been able to resist touching the names cut into these marble walls, and no matter how busy or crowded the place is, a sense of quiet, a reverence, always surrounds those names. Throughout my freshman and sophomore years, the stonecutters were carving in by hand the names of those killed in the Vietnam War, and I think it left a lasting impression on me . . . the sense of the power of a name.

One memorial I came across also made a strong impression on me. It was a monument to the missing soldiers of the World War I battle of the Somme by Sir Edwin Lutyens in Thiepval, France. The monument includes more than 100,000 names of people who were listed as missing because, without ID tags, it was impossible to identify the dead. (The cemetery contains the bodies of 70,000 dead.) To walk past those names and realize the lives lost—the effect of that is the strength of the design. This memorial acknowledged those lives without focusing on the war or on creating a political statement of victory or loss. This apolitical approach became the essential aim of my design; I did not want to civilize war by glorifying it or by forgetting the sacrifices involved. The price of human life in war should always be clearly remembered.

But on a personal level, I wanted to focus on the nature of accepting and coming to terms with a loved one's death. Simple as it may seem, I remember feeling that accepting a person's death is the first step in being able to overcome that loss.

I felt that as a culture we were extremely youth oriented and not willing or able to accept death or dying as a part of life. The rites of mourning, which in more primitive and older cultures were very much a part of life, have been suppressed in our modern times. In the design of the memorial, a fundamental goal was to be honest about death, since we must accept that loss in order to begin to overcome it. The pain of the loss will always be there, it will always hurt, but we must acknowledge the death in order to move on.

What then would bring back the memory of a person? A specific object or image would be limiting. A realistic sculpture would be only one interpretation of that time. I wanted something that all people could relate to on a personal level. At this time I had as yet no form, no specific artistic image. 5

The use of names was a way to bring back everything someone could remember about a person. The strength in a name is something that has always made me wonder at the “abstraction” of the design; the ability of a name to bring back every single memory you have of that person is far more realistic and specific and much more comprehensive than a still photograph, which captures a specific moment in time or a single event or a generalized image that may or may not be moving for all who have connections to that time.

Then someone in the class received the design program, which stated the basic philosophy of the memorial’s design and also its requirements: all the names of those missing and killed (57,000) must be a part of the memorial; the design must be apolitical, harmonious with the site, and conciliatory.

These were all the thoughts that were in my mind before I went to see the site.

Without having seen it, I couldn’t design the memorial, so a few of us traveled to Washington, D.C., and it was at the site that the idea for the design took shape. The site was a beautiful park surrounded by trees, with traffic and noise coming from one side—Constitution Avenue.

I had a simple impulse to cut the earth. 10

I imagined taking a knife and cutting into the earth, opening it up, an initial violence and pain that in time would heal. The grass would grow back; but the initial cut would remain a pure flat surface in the earth with a polished, mirrored surface, much like the surface on a geode when you cut it and polish the edge. The need for the names to be on the memorial would become the memorial; there was no need to embellish the design further. The people and their names would allow everyone to respond and remember.

It would be an interface, between our world and the quieter, darker, more peaceful world beyond. I chose black granite in order to make the surface reflective and peaceful. I never looked at the memorial as a wall, an object, but as an edge to the earth, an opened side. The mirrored effect would double the size of the park, creating two worlds, one we are a part of and one we cannot enter. The two walls were positioned so that one pointed to the Lincoln Memorial and the other pointed to the Washington Monument. By linking these two strong symbols for the country, I wanted to create a unity between the nation’s past and present.

Questions

1. At the end of paragraph 2, Lin writes, “The price of human life in war should always be clearly remembered.” How does this assertion serve as a thesis statement for the first two paragraphs?
2. Lin designates three “requirements” in paragraph 7. Why is it crucial that the memorial be “apolitical, harmonious with the site, and conciliatory”?
3. Lin says that she had “a simple impulse to cut the earth” (para. 10). How does this impulse relate to the purpose of this memorial?
4. In what ways does Lin believe her design encourages “accepting and coming to terms with a loved one’s death” (para. 3)?
5. We commonly refer to the Vietnam Veterans Memorial as “the Wall,” but its designer didn’t see it that way. In the final paragraph, Lin writes, “I never looked at the memorial as a wall, an object, but as an edge to the earth, an opened side.” How does her description affect your attitude toward the monument? If you have been to see it, how does her account influence your impression? If you haven’t, how does it affect your expectations?
6. Generally speaking, what do you think the purpose of a public memorial is? Who is it for? families? returning soldiers? fallen soldiers? society as a whole? If you have not visited the Vietnam Veterans Memorial, explore some of the images online. Does this memorial do what you think a war memorial should do? Why or why not?

Fallen Soldiers Arriving at Dover Air Force Base

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

Prior to February 2009, the Department of Defense refused to release images of fallen soldiers returning from Iraq and Afghanistan. This image—and others like it—was released in 2003 after Russ Kick, operator of the Web site The Memory Hole (www.thememoryhole.org), successfully filed a Freedom of Information Act request. Taken by a Department of Defense photographer, the image on the following page shows an honor guard unloading flag-draped coffins from a cargo plane at Dover Air Force Base in Delaware.

Questions

1. Of all the pictures that were released via the Freedom of Information Act, this image was reproduced repeatedly in magazines and newspapers. What about this image is compelling, or striking?
2. Why do you think the Department of Defense did not want to release this photograph? Do you think it should or should not release such photos? Why?
3. At the heart of the debate about whether to release this photograph is the tension between private grief and public grief. What elements of the public and the private do you see in this photo? How does this tension play out in Maya Lin’s Vietnam Veterans memorial?

Satisfy My Soul

RACHELLE JONES

Rachelle Jones lives in Arkansas. At her blog, ArmyWifeToddlerMom.blogspot.com, she describes herself: "I have been a SAHM [stay-at-home mom] for the last 7 years. I am married to a full time National Guardsman. I have been an active duty spouse, a civilian spouse, and a National Guard spouse. I have had ALMOST every blue collar job imaginable. I am an LPN [licensed practical nurse], with primary experience in end of life care in pulmonary, hospice, geriatrics. I am also a contributor at military.com for <http://spousebuzz.typepad.com/blog/>." In the following excerpt from her blog, she describes her feelings regarding the return of her husband, who had been deployed in Iraq.

Saturday, March 19, 2005

I am still feeling "separate" from Dear Husband.

Eighteen months of different day to day existence can do this. So I stand on the outside now and try and imagine his life.

He is a "rules" kind of guy, he doesn't tell, and I don't ask.

The other day we were in the truck on the way to the bookstore and I asked, "Does it feel weird driving your truck?"

I got a small glimpse into his head. He said, "I still don't like driving under the overpasses and over bridges. Random garbage on the shoulders makes me edgy." 5

That small glimpse was enough for me that day. I haven't asked another question. Maybe later.

That first night alone in the hotel, when the children finally fell asleep, I clung to him and cried. I am not a big crier—try not to be, anyway. Reunion is frightening, and you feel lucky, blessed, cheated, alone, and guilty.

You want to hear "the story" that proves you have every right to feel lucky and blessed, but you don't want to hear it.

So you lie on a bed in a dimly lit hotel room, and you watch your babies sleep in peace. You put your head on your husband's chest, and you hear his heart beating, and you can smell him for the first time in months, and you can feel his hands on your back, and you cry as quietly as you can.

The tears come . . . and you try and stop them. All of the worry, gratefulness, sorrow, and love. You cry for him, and his lost brothers, and for the widows that must cry in the shower, so their children can't hear them. 10

You feel guilty for the tears on his chest, and he pulls you to his mouth and tries to kiss your tears away. No one says a word, and you swear you can hear your tears dropping onto his flesh, and you can hear his heart beating . . .

. . . And it is the best sound in the World.

Questions

1. What is poignant and ironic about Jones's feeling "'separate' from Dear Husband" (para. 1)? Why does she put separate in quotation marks? What is significant about her not using her husband's name but calling him "Dear Husband" instead?

2. How would you describe the communication between Jones and her husband in this blog post? Do they seem effusive? chatty? confessional? What does their style of communication tell you about the challenges of military families finding peace?
3. How would you describe the tone of this blog post?

Entering the Conversation

As you develop a response to one of the following questions, refer to the texts you have read in this section. You may also draw on your own experience or knowledge relating to finding peace after war.

1. Consider the extent to which the speakers and characters of these selections have found peace. Which have been the most successful? Which have been the least? Write an essay in which you compare and contrast at least three of the selections, and come to a conclusion as to what a person needs to do, or understand, to find peace after war.
2. We often think of war in terms of battles and conflicts involving men. Several of the selections included here present the perspectives of women in response to war. Referring to some of these texts, write an essay that discusses the ways in which women respond to war and analyzes their attempts to find peace.
3. As quoted in the epigraph to this chapter, Tim O'Brien, who fought in Vietnam, asks, "Can the foot soldier teach anything important about war, merely for having been there?" He goes on to answer, "I think not. He can tell war stories." Using evidence from several of the texts, write an essay about the role of war stories and storytelling in the quest to find peace. Consider "storytelling" in its broadest sense, which includes a range of art forms not limited to fiction.
4. Memory plays a significant role in several selections, as characters and speakers recall the past and attempt to find peace. Write an essay in which you analyze the role of memory as either a healing or a disquieting agent in several of the selections.
5. Yusef Komunyakaa wrote "Facing It" about a visit to the Vietnam Veterans Memorial, designed by Maya Lin. In the voice of Komunyakaa, Lin, and two other authors in this Conversation, write a roundtable discussion on the role of monuments and memorials in helping both soldiers and the general public find peace after war.
6. Write a letter to a political candidate or organization in which you make a case for what you think would most help veterans find peace, whether it's improved medical care, psychiatric care, increased educational or vocational opportunities, or a special monument or ceremony. Refer to a few of the selections in this Conversation to support your position for why this initiative would help veterans find peace.

Student Writing

Analyzing Theme in Drama

The paper by Rebecca Roycraft was written outside of class as a response to the following prompt.

One well-known piece of literature ends with the shocked line, “People don’t do such things!” Using Antigone as a model, discuss the effect of Antigone’s shocking actions on her society. Include in your discussion both rational and emotional arguments for and against her actions, and be sure to discuss the effect of her actions on the work as a whole.

Theme in Antigone

Rebecca Roycraft

In Sophocles’ play Antigone, the protagonist, a young woman named Antigone, defies the state’s laws and societal norms in order to follow the rules of the gods. She realizes the injustice being perpetrated against the gods when Creon, king of Thebes, arbitrarily chooses to bury one of her brothers as a hero and leave the other in the streets, unburied. Though Antigone’s sister, Ismene, tries to dissuade her, telling her that she is only a woman and therefore unimportant, Antigone goes out to bury her brother, and though Creon questions her, she remains defiant, sticking to her principles and disregarding the laws of the state. Antigone originally defies her society in two ways (by acting independently even though she is a woman and by disobeying the law), and by the end of the play, the people of Thebes turn over to Antigone’s side and realize that her adherence to the laws of the gods is, in fact, the correct response to Creon’s refusal to bury one of her brothers. Since the people of Thebes and Creon himself eventually realize that Antigone was correct, her actions and her death change society’s perception of what she did and allow the play to convey its message: people should not defy or disregard the laws of the gods under any circumstances.

After realizing that she must bury her brother, Antigone attempts to enlist the help of her sister, Ismene, arguing “[Creon] has no right to keep me from my own” (l. 59). Ismene has more conventional views, however, and reminds Antigone, “we are women, / we’re not born to contend with men” (ll. 74–75). As women, Antigone and Ismene are not supposed to act independently and are told to leave important decisions and actions to men. Antigone does not dispute the fact that men are generally stronger than women and have the right to be the rulers and the lawmakers, but she knows that her reasons for burying her brother transcend society’s idea that women should not make independent decisions. She believes that the gods want her brother to be buried, and she knows that she has to obey the laws of the gods, no matter what. Even though she is a woman, she has no choice but to obey the gods and tells Ismene as much: “Do as you like, dishonor the laws / the gods hold in honor” (ll. 91–92). Antigone does not necessarily disagree with the societal idea that women should allow men to rule over them and make decisions for them, but she knows that the gods are more important than anything else.

In her quest to obey the laws of the gods, Antigone not only defies her role as a woman in ancient Greek society but also defies the laws of the state of Thebes. Creon believes that the laws of the state are more important than anything else and thinks of Antigone’s defiance as a personal threat: “she is the man / if this victory goes to her and she goes free” (ll. 542–43). However, when Creon asks Antigone why she feels perfectly justified in openly defying him, she simply tells him, “Death longs for the same rites for all” (l. 585). Though Creon feels personally insulted by Antigone’s defiance, Antigone simply believes that the laws of the gods are more important than the laws of the state, that this fact should be apparent to everyone, and that Creon is mistaken. Antigone again does not aim to take away power from the state or the society, but wishes to obey only the laws that are most important: the laws of the gods. For her, the state and the society in which she lives are completely eclipsed by the will of the gods.

After defying the society by making an independent decision as a woman and openly contradicting Creon’s laws, Antigone is sentenced to death. However, her legacy doesn’t end when she is taken off to be buried alive. Creon is informed that “the city [of Thebes] mourns for this young girl. / ‘No woman,’ they say, ‘ever deserved death less, / and such a brutal death for such a glorious action’” (ll. 777–79). Antigone’s actions are indicative of how the rest of the city feels, and her adherence to the gods’ laws makes everyone else in the city realize that the gods’ laws do, in fact, transcend societal norms and the laws of the state. After Antigone’s death, Creon still refuses to bury Antigone’s brother, despite the fact that the people of Thebes realize the importance of the gods. At this point, the gods become angry with the city of Thebes: “deaf to [their] prayers, they spurn / the offerings in [their] hands” (ll. 1128–29). Once Creon realizes that the gods truly are more important than any political power he has, he admits, “reverence toward the gods must be safeguarded” (l. 1468). Though Antigone originally defied the society in which she lived to do her duty to the gods, in the end, society comes to realize that Antigone’s decisions were the correct ones.

Antigone does not set out to directly defy her country or to confront her place in society: all she attempts over the course of Antigone is to obey the laws of the gods, which are, and ought always to be, more important than societal norms or the laws of men. The message of Antigone is that while people in general are supposed to conform to their place and to obey the government, no pressure from men should keep people from following the will of the gods. Antigone’s ability to see beyond the constraints placed on her by society is a catalyst for the entire population of Thebes’s realization that the gods do, in fact, transcend society and state. Antigone is able to sway the opinion of the population with her righteous actions, and thus Sophocles is able to convey his message: hubris leads to tragedy, and following the gods is the only way to avoid the death and destruction that pervades Antigone.

Questions

1. Deconstruct the prompt: What exactly is the student being asked to do? What are the key terms? Then explain how effectively you believe the student addressed the prompt. Cite specific passages in the essay.
2. What are the effects of Antigone's shocking actions on her society, according to Rebecca's analysis?
3. Throughout the essay, Rebecca refers to Antigone's actions and decisions as "correct." Explain whether you do or do not find this description appropriate within the terms of the play.
4. Analyze the structure of paragraph 2. What is the purpose of this paragraph? How might a stronger topic sentence achieve this purpose more effectively?
5. What assumptions about the reader's knowledge of the play does Rebecca make? Does she summarize the plot adequately? Does she give too much detail? Cite specific instances to support your response.

The Writer's Craft—Close Reading

Imagery

Reflecting on the writer's craft, Joseph Conrad wrote, "My task which I am trying to achieve is, by the power of the written word, to make you hear, to make you feel—it is, above all, to make you see. That—and no more, and it is everything." What Conrad is referring to is called imagery—language that evokes a response in the reader through an appeal to one or more of the senses. Surely you have heard the age-old advice for writers: "Show, don't tell." One way for a writer to show is through imagery. It can make the abstract more concrete and thus help the reader experience the poem or story directly through the senses.

The literal meaning of image is "a picture of something." But in literature, imagery can be language that addresses any of the senses. Visual images are most common, but images can be auditory, appealing to our sense of hearing; olfactory, appealing to our sense of smell; gustatory, appealing to our sense of taste; tactile, appealing to our sense of touch; and kinesthetic, appealing to physical sensations such as movement or tension. Essentially, through concrete detail and precise language, imagery mentally reproduces sensations that trigger emotion and memory. You can use these emotions and memories to set a mood, reinforce a theme, or achieve other literary purposes. For instance, in the following passage from "The Management of Grief," Bharati Mukherjee uses imagery to create mood.

The two rooms are dark and stuffy. The lights are off, and an oil lamp sputters on the coffee table. The bent old lady has let us in, and her husband is wrapping a white turban over his oiled, hip-length hair. She immediately goes to the kitchen, and I hear the most familiar sound of an Indian home, tap water hitting and filling a teapot.

Mukherjee appeals to the visual, tactile, and auditory in the first two sentences describing the look and feel of the room. The next sentence extends the visual image to the couple. The last sentence shifts from a description of unfamiliar sights to a description of a very familiar sound, the “tap water hitting and filling a teapot.” This change in imagery (both in quality and in type) shifts the mood, taking us from an uncomfortable situation to a more welcoming one.

It is important to note that while a writer can add emotional power through images and image patterns, not all writers choose this strategy. Ernest Hemingway, for instance, is famous for his spare literal prose, almost entirely devoid of imagery and figurative language. Consider the second paragraph of the story “Soldier’s Home”:

There is a picture which shows him on the Rhine with two German girls and another corporal. Krebs and the corporal look too big for their uniforms. The German girls are not beautiful. The Rhine does not show in the picture.

Compare that description of a picture with this one from Tim O’Brien’s “The Things They Carried”:

The first was a Kodachrome snapshot signed “Love,” though he knew better. She stood against a brick wall. Her eyes were gray and neutral, her lips slightly open as she stared straight-on at the camera.

Hemingway describes a picture but without providing descriptive images to appeal to any of our senses. In fact, he tells us that the girls are “not beautiful” and that the Rhine River “does not show”—both negatives. What do the girls look like? What is in the picture if the Rhine is not? It is precisely that lack of detail—and emotion—that begins to characterize Krebs’s past experience in World War I. O’Brien, on the other hand, gains emotional power by providing details of the kind of photo (“Kodachrome snapshot”), an inscription, the backdrop, the color of the girl’s eyes, the set of her mouth, and her stance relative to the camera. This description gives the reader a sense of how emotionally invested Cross is in every detail of this photo. And this sets the stage for the poignant collapse of his daydreams in the next sentence: “At night, sometimes, Lieutenant Cross wondered who had taken the picture, because he knew she had boyfriends, because he loved her so much, and because he could see the shadow of the picture taker spreading out against the brick wall.”

Imagery and Figurative Language

Imagery and figurative language (metaphor, simile, and so on) are close siblings; both help us visualize and experience literature. For our purposes, we’ll make a distinction between the two, acknowledging all the while that they often work together. Imagery is a literal but artful description of how something looks, feels, tastes, smells, and sounds, while figurative language compares two or more things and is not literal. These lines, from Wilfred Owen's "Dulce et Decorum Est," incorporate both literal imagery and figurative language:

Dim, through the misty panes and thick green light,
As under a green sea, I saw him drowning.

The imagery in the first line helps us experience what a mustard gas attack would look like through a gas mask. It's "Dim." The panes are "misty" and the light is "thick green" as it filters through the mustard gas and is viewed through the tinted lenses of the World War I gas mask. The second line turns the corner from a literal description of the scene to a figurative depiction: it was like being "under a green sea." In this case, as in many, literal imagery and figurative language work together to get the point across.

Analyzing Patterns of Imagery

Analyzing imagery means not only connecting the image to the context and themes of the story or poem, but also paying attention to the other imagery surrounding it. While a single image will often have a multiplicity of meanings and implications, an author will sometimes use a pattern of similar or contrasting images to point us in the right interpretive direction. For example, depending on the context, descriptions of the deep red of wine can suggest passion, blood (and therefore violence), Christian communion, or simply the fellowship of a good meal well enjoyed. And each of these possible meanings brings with it a mood: romantic, foreboding, solemn, satisfied. If the description of the deep red of wine is accompanied by imagery of light streaming through a stained glass window, or a white dove, then we can deduce that the author is appealing to Christian imagery.

The following passage is from the Iliad. Even though it is a translation, notice how the vivid imagery appeals to the senses:

The glory of armor lit the skies and the whole earth laughed,
rippling under the glitter of bronze, thunder resounding under trampling feet of armies. And in their midst
the brilliant Achilles began to arm for battle . . .
A sound of grinding came from the fighter's teeth,
his eyes blazed forth in searing points of fire,
unbearable grief came surging through his heart
and now, bursting with rage against the men of Troy,
he donned Hephaestus' gifts—magnificent armor
the god of fire forged with all his labor.

As we read this passage, we see the rippling glitter of bronze, we hear the resounding thunder of trampling feet as the brilliant Achilles begins to arm, we both see and hear the sound of his grinding teeth, we see and feel the heat of his blazing eyes, and Achilles is brought to life. If we follow the pattern of the imagery, we see that it is not consistent. Homer contrasts the "glory of armor" with the "thunder[ous] resounding . . . of armies," the "glitter of bronze" with the "grinding . . . from the fighter's teeth." This juxtaposition of the beautiful and the terrible might lead us to an interpretation of what Homer is saying about war and warriors in the Iliad.

The following exercises will help you become familiar with identifying imagery and determining its effect on the meaning of a work of literature.

• EXERCISE 1 •

Identify the images in each of the following passages and the senses to which they appeal.

1. A dark theater, he remembered, and the movie was Bonnie and Clyde, and Martha wore a tweed skirt, and during the final scene, when he touched her knee, she turned and looked at him in a sad, sober way that made him pull his hand back, but he would always remember the feel of the tweed skirt and the knee beneath it and the sound of the gunfire that killed Bonnie and Clyde, how embarrassing it was, how slow and oppressive. ("The Things They Carried," para. 5)
2. Mostly he felt pleased to be alive. He liked the smell of the New Testament under his cheek, the leather and ink and paper and glue, whatever the chemicals were. He liked hearing the sounds of night. Even his fatigue, it felt fine, the stiff muscles and the prickly awareness of his own body, a floating feeling. ("The Things They Carried," para. 60.)
3. He shook his light fawn coat as to show it [why he did not wear mourning]; his livid lip over his missing teeth was trembling, his eyes were watery and motionless, and soon after he ended with a shrill laugh which might well have been a sob. ("War," para. 21)
4. [Magda] did not walk very well, partly because she was only fifteen months old, and partly because the spindles of her legs could not hold up her fat belly. It was fat with air, full and round. ("The Shawl," para. 5)
5. The day was not cold, but something in the bare trees caught my attention. I looked up from the gravel, into the branches and the clear blue sky beyond. I thought I heard the rustling of larger forms, and I waited a moment for voices. Nothing. ("The Management of Grief," para. 144)
6. The church so lone, the log-built one,
That echoed to many a parting groan
    And natural prayer
    Of dying foemen mingled there—
("Shiloh," ll. 10–13)
7. Absolute snow lies rumpled on
What shellbursts scattered and deranged,
Entangled railings, crevassed lawn.
("First Snow in Alsace," ll. 4–6)

• EXERCISE 2 •

Discuss the image patterns in the following excerpts. How do they work together to develop a specific mood or meaning? In cases in which the images are dissimilar, how does the contrast contribute to mood or meaning? Also, consider how, in some cases, figurative language works together with the images.

1. They imagined the muzzle against flesh. They imagined the quick, sweet pain, then the evacuation to Japan, then a hospital with warm beds and cute geisha nurses.

They dreamed of freedom birds.

At night, on guard, staring into the dark, they were carried away by jumbo jets. They felt the rush of takeoff. Gone! they yelled. And then velocity, wings and engines, a smiling stewardess—but it was more than a plane, it was a real bird, a big sleek silver bird with feathers and talons and high screeching. They were flying. The weights fell off, there was nothing to bear. They laughed and held on tight, feeling the cold slap of wind and altitude, soaring, thinking It's over, I'm gone! (“The Things They Carried,” paras. 79–81)

2. Then, on the third day of the sixth month into this odyssey, in an abandoned temple in a tiny Himalayan village, as I make my offering of flowers and sweetmeats to the god of a tribe of animists, my husband descends to me. He is squatting next to a scrawny sadhu in moth-eaten robes. Vikram wears the vanilla suit he wore the last time I hugged him. The sadhu tosses petals on a butter-fed flame, reciting Sanskrit mantras, and sweeps his face of flies. My husband takes my hands in his. (“The Management of Grief,” para. 89)

3. If you could hear, at every jolt, the blood
Come gargling from the froth-corrupted lungs,
Obscene as cancer, bitter as the cud
Of vile, incurable sores on innocent tongues.
 (“Dulce et Decorum Est,” ll. 21–24)

4. Let the boy try along this bayonet-blade
How cold steel is, and keen with hunger of blood;
Blue with all malice, like a madman's flash;
And thinly drawn with famishing for flesh. (“Arms and the Boy,” ll. 1–4)

5. I touch the name Andrew Johnson;
I see the booby trap's white flash.
Names shimmer on a woman's blouse
but when she walks away
the names stay on the wall.
Brushstrokes flash, a red bird's wings cutting across my stare. (“Facing It,” ll. 17–23)

• EXERCISE 3 •

Writers will often use imagery to highlight contrasts. For example, throughout “Naming of Parts,” Henry Reed juxtaposes elements from the natural world with the parts of a rifle, and in paragraphs 15 and 16 of “The Shawl,” Cynthia Ozick juxtaposes images of nature outside the fence with images of the barracks within. Divide your page into two columns. Choose one of these texts, and identify on either side of the page the images that the writer juxtaposes. Then explain how that contrast contributes to the meaning of the work.

• EXERCISE 4 •

Read the following poem by Brian Turner, whose “Sadiq” is included in the chapter. Notice how rich in imagery this poem is, and how some images describe what the speaker sees through the scope and others, what he imagines. Identify the images and the figurative language, and discuss how they work together to achieve the writer’s purpose in the poem as a whole.

In the Leupold Scope

With a 40×60mm spotting scope
 I traverse the Halabjah skyline, scanning rooftops two thousand meters out to find a woman in sparkling green, standing among antennas and satellite dishes, 5 hanging laundry on an invisible line.

She is dressing the dead, clothing them as they wait in silence, the pigeons circling as fumestacks billow a noxious black smoke.
 She is welcoming them back to the dry earth, 10 giving them dresses in tangerine and teal, woven cotton shirts dyed blue.

She waits for them to lean forward into the breeze, for the wind’s breath to return the bodies they once had, 15 women with breasts swollen by milk, men with shepherd-thin bodies, children running hard into the horizon’s curving lens.

• EXERCISE 5 •

Write a prose description or a poem based on a war photograph from a current newspaper or Web site. Use imagery or image patterns to add vividness to your description.

Suggestions for Writing

War and Peace

1. On November 11, 1985, Siegfried Sassoon was among sixteen Great War poets commemorated on a slate stone unveiled in Poets' Corner in Westminster Abbey. The inscription on the stone was written by friend and fellow poet Wilfred Owen. It reads: "My subject is War, and the pity of War. The Poetry is in the pity." Write an essay that supports Owen's statement about "the pity of war" as expressed in at least three of the texts in this chapter.
2. In the conclusion to her book Regarding the Pain of Others, Susan Sontag—who witnessed firsthand the horrors of war—writes:

We don't get it. We truly can't imagine what it was like. We can't imagine how dreadful, how terrifying war is; and how normal it becomes. Can't understand, can't imagine. That's what every soldier, and every journalist and aid worker and independent observer who has put in time under fire, and had the luck to elude the death that struck down others nearby, stubbornly feels. And they are right.

Write an essay that discusses the extent to which Sontag's statement is true, using at least four of the texts as support. Consider that several of the selections were written by people who have personally experienced war (O'Brien, Owen, Hemingway, Komunyakaa, Turner), whereas others were written by those who have created imagined voices of experience based on observation and study (Shakespeare, Tennyson, Ozick, Trethewey).

3. The epigraph at the beginning of this chapter is from Tim O'Brien's If I Die in a Combat Zone: "Do dreams offer lessons? Do nightmares have themes, do we awaken and analyze them and live our lives and advise others as a result? Can the foot soldier teach anything important about war, merely for having been there? I think not. He can tell war stories." Using at least three of the texts to support your argument, write an essay that discusses the validity of O'Brien's statement.
4. Consider this statement from Chris Hedges.

The enduring attraction to war is this: Even with its destruction and carnage it can give us what we long for in life. It can give us purpose, meaning, a reason for living. Only when we are in the midst of conflict does the shallowness and vapidity of much of our lives become apparent. Trivia dominates our conversations and increasingly our airwaves. And war is an enticing elixir. It gives us resolve, a cause. It allows us to be noble.

Write an essay that compares and contrasts the views expressed in the literature in this chapter with the view expressed by Hedges in this quotation. Refer to at least three texts for support.

5. Some of the main selections from this chapter — Antigone, “The Things They Carried,” “War,” “The Management of Grief” — present attempts to find peace. Write an essay in which you compare one of these main selections with two or more of the Conversation selections as you discuss the extent to which peace is achieved in postwar experience.
6. In the introductory essay to his book The Government of the Tongue, Seamus Heaney discusses reading Wilfred Owen’s poetry, particularly “Dulce et Decorum Est,” with students. He writes:

And it seemed to me that “Dulce et Decorum Est,” a poem which it was easy for them to like, was the poem where I could engage them with the question of over-writing. ‘Is Owen overdoing it here?’ I would ask. ‘Inside of five lines we have “devil’s sick of sin,” “gargling,” froth-corrupted,” “bitter as the cud,” “vile, incurable sores.” Is he not being a bit overinsistent? A bit explicit?’ However hangdog I might feel about such intrusions, I also felt that it was right to raise questions. Yet there was obviously an immense disparity between the nit-picking criticism I was conducting on the poem and the heavy price, in terms of emotional and physical suffering, the poet paid in order to bring it into being.

Considering not only the subject matter of the poem but also the experience and intent of the poet, is it right to ask the questions Heaney is asking? Write an essay in response to Heaney, using the text of Owen’s poem or others in this chapter for support.

7. In their selections, William Shakespeare, Walt Whitman, Wilfred Owen, Siegfried Sassoon, Henry Reed, Anna Akhmatova, Randall Jarrell, and Alfred, Lord Tennyson, speak across the years in the first person. Consider the power of voice in these selections. Write an essay in which you explain which voice speaks most eloquently to our time. Refer specifically to your selected text as you relate it to contemporary events.
8. Each of the following quotations addresses the nature of war and peace. Select one that interests you, and use it to develop a thesis for an essay. Use several selections from the chapter to support your thesis.

There is nothing easier than lopping off heads and nothing harder than developing ideas.

—Fyodor Dostoevsky

People sleep peaceably in their beds at night only because rough men stand ready to do violence on their behalf.

—George Orwell

We know how to organize warfare, but do we know how to act when confronted with peace?

—Jacques-Yves Cousteau

Peace is not merely a distant goal that we seek, but a means by which we arrive at that end.

—Martin Luther King Jr.

Of course the people don't want war . . . that is understood. But voice or no voice, the people can always be brought to the bidding of the leaders. That is easy. All you have to do is tell them they are being attacked, and denounce the pacifists for lack of patriotism and exposing the country to danger. It works the same in any country.

—Hermann Goering

The first casualty when war comes is truth.

—Senator Hiram Johnson

The nation that makes a great distinction between its scholars and its warriors will have its thinking done by cowards, and its fighting done by fools.

—Thucydides

9. If you enjoyed Tim O'Brien's story, you might want to read "Speaking of Courage," also from the book The Things They Carried. Then either write an essay comparing the postwar experiences of Harold Krebs—the protagonist of Hemingway's "Soldier's Home"—and Norman Bowker—the main character in "Speaking of Courage"—or write a personal response to "Soldier's Home" in Bowker's voice.

Glossary of Terms

abstract An abstract term is a general term, referring to a broad concept, as opposed to a term that refers to a specific, particular thing (e.g., personhood as opposed to Seamus Heaney); opposite of concrete.

EXAMPLE:

*Beauty is truth, truth beauty, — that is all
Ye know on earth, and all ye need to know.*

—JOHN KEATS, “Ode on a Grecian Urn,” p. 1103 act The major subunit into which the action of a play is divided. The number of acts in a play typically ranges between one and five, and are usually further divided into scenes.

allegory A literary work that portrays abstract ideas concretely. Characters in an allegory are frequently personifications of abstract ideas and are given names that refer to these ideas.

EXAMPLE:

“Young Goodman Brown” by Nathaniel Hawthorne, p. 452

alliteration The repetition of the same initial consonant sounds in a sequence of words or syllables.

EXAMPLE:

*Methinks ’tis pretty sport to hear a child,
Rocking a word in mouth yet undefiled;
The tender racquet rudely plays the sound
Which, weakly bandied, cannot back rebound.*

—THOMAS BASTARD, “De Puero Balbutiente,” p. 296

allusion A reference to another work of literature, or to art, history, or current events.

EXAMPLE:

In “Sound and Sense” (p. 1095), Alexander Pope alludes to characters from classical Greek literature:

*When Ajax strives, some rock’s vast weight to throw
The line too labors, and the words move slow;
Not so, when swift Camilla scours the plain,
Flies o’er th’ unbending corn, and skims along the main.*

analogy In literature, a comparison between two things that helps explain or illustrate one or both of them.

EXAMPLE:

There is Mr. Marblehall's ancestral home. It's not so wonderfully large—it has only four columns—but you always look toward it, the way you always glance into tunnels and see nothing.

—EUDORA WELTY, “Old Mr. Marblehall,” p. 24

anapest See meter.

anaphora Repetition of an initial word or words to add emphasis.

EXAMPLE:

*Whose herds with milk, whose fields with bread,
Whose flocks supply him with attire;
Whose trees in summer yield him shade,
In winter, fire.*

—ALEXANDER POPE, “The Quiet Life,” p. 497

annotation The act of noting observations directly on a text, especially anything striking or confusing, in order to record ideas and impressions for later analysis.

EXAMPLE: See pp. 1154–55 for an annotation of Robert Browning’s “My Last Duchess.”

antagonist Character in a story or play who opposes the protagonist; while not necessarily an enemy, the antagonist creates or intensifies a conflict for the protagonist. An evil antagonist is a villain.

EXAMPLE:

In William Shakespeare’s Hamlet (p. 720), Claudius is the antagonist.

apostrophe A direct address to an abstraction (such as Time), a thing (the Wind), an animal, or an imaginary or absent person.

EXAMPLE:

*Leave me, O Love which reachest but to dust;
And thou, my mind, aspire to higher things.*

—SIR PHILIP SIDNEY, “Leave me, O Love, which reachest but to dust,” p. 669

archaic language Words that were once common but that are no longer used.

EXAMPLES:

*HORATIO: What art thou that usurp’st this time of night,
Together with that fair and warlike form
In which the majesty of buried Denmark
Did sometimes march? by heaven I charge thee, speak!*

—WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE, Hamlet, p. 722

ars poetica Literally, “the art of poetry”; a form of poetry written about poetry.

EXAMPLE:

“On the Sonnet” by John Keats, p. 1101

assonance The repetition of vowel sounds in a sequence of words.

EXAMPLE:

*That church so lone, the log-built one,
That echoed to many a parting groan
And natural prayer
Of dying foemen mingled there.*

—HERMAN MELVILLE, “Shiloh: A Requiem (April, 1862),” p. 1422

atmosphere The feeling created for the reader by a work of literature. Atmosphere can be generated by many things, but especially style, tone, and setting. Synonymous with mood.

EXAMPLE:

See the discussion of how setting creates atmosphere in Edgar Allan Poe’s The Masque of the Red Death (p. 67).

ballad First taking shape in the later Middle Ages, the ballad was a sung poem that recounted a dramatic story. Ballads were passed down orally from generation to generation. Arising in the Romantic period, the literary ballad—a poem intentionally imitative of the ballad’s style and structure—attempted to capture the sentiments of the common people in the same way the traditional ballad had. See also stanza.

EXAMPLE:

“We Are Seven” by William Wordsworth, p. 300

Beat movement A movement of American writers in the 1950s who saw American society as oppressively conformist. These writers rejected mainstream values, seeking ways to escape through drugs, various forms of spirituality, and sexual experimentation. The writers of the Beat generation, among them Allen Ginsberg and Jack Kerouac, celebrated freedom of expression and held generally antiestablishment views about politics. Their writing, likewise, rejected conventional norms of structure and diction, and their books prompted several notorious obscenity trials, which helped reshape censorship laws in the United States.

EXAMPLE:

“Is About” by Allen Ginsburg, p. 934.

bildungsroman A novel that explores the maturation of the protagonist, with the narrative usually moving the main character from childhood into adulthood. Also called a coming-of-age story.

EXAMPLE:

Daisy Miller by Henry James, p. 1166

blank verse Unrhymed iambic pentameter, blank verse is the most commonly used verse form in English because it is the verse form that comes closest to natural patterns of speaking in English. See also iambic pentameter.

EXAMPLE:

*This is my son, mine own Telemachus,
To whom I leave the sceptre and the isle—
Well-loved of me, discerning to fulfil*

*This labour, by slow prudence to make mild
A rugged people, and through soft degrees
Subdue them to the useful and the good.
Most blameless is he, centred in the sphere
Of common duties, decent not to fail
In offices of tenderness, and pay
Meet adoration to my household gods,
When I am gone. He works his work, I mine.*

—ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON, “Ulysses,” pp. 1444–45

cadence Quality of spoken text formed from combining the text’s rhythm with the rise and fall in the inflection of the speaker’s voice.

EXAMPLE:

In Matthew Arnold’s “Dover Beach” (pp. 1265–66), the poet creates a cadence that imitates a changing wave pattern by using caesura (with commas)

*Listen! you hear the grating roar
Of pebbles which the waves draw back, and fling,
At their return, up the high strand,
Begin, and cease, and then again begin,
With tremulous cadence slow, and bring
The eternal note of sadness in.*

caesura A pause within a line of poetry, sometimes punctuated, sometimes not, often mirroring natural speech.

EXAMPLE:

*O could I lose all father now! for why
Will man lament the state he should envy.*

—BEN JONSON, “On My First Son,” p. 297

caricature A character with features or traits that are exaggerated so that the character seems ridiculous. The term is usually applied to graphic depictions but can also be applied to written depictions.

EXAMPLE:

The characters in David Zane Mairowitz and Robert Crumb’s Kafka (p. 981) are caricatures.

carpe diem A widespread literary theme meaning “seize the day” in Latin and found especially in lyric poetry, carpe diem encourages readers to enjoy the present and make the most of their short lives.

EXAMPLE:

“To the Virgins, to Make Much of Time” by Robert Herrick, p. 672

catharsis Refers to the emotional release felt by the audience at the end of a tragic drama. The term comes from Aristotle’s Poetics, in which he explains this frequently felt relief in terms of a purification of the emotions caused by watching the tragic events. (Catharsis means “purgation” or “purification” in Greek.)

EXAMPLE:

Antigone by Sophocles, p. 1327

character A person depicted in a narrative. While this term generally refers to human beings, it can also include animals or inanimate objects that are given human characteristics. Several more specific terms are used to refer to types of characters frequently employed by authors:

flat character A character embodying only one or two traits and who lacks character development; for this reason, a flat character is also called a static character. Often such characters exist only to provide background or adequate motivation for a protagonist's actions.

EXAMPLE:

In Gish Jen's "Who's Irish?" (p. 1250), the narrator's son-in-law is described only as being lazy and depressed; his role in the story is to step into a stereotypical, stock role, providing the narrator with fuel for her prejudice.

round character A character exhibiting a range of emotions and who evolves over the course of the story.

EXAMPLE:

In Shakespeare's Hamlet (p. 720), Hamlet is a round character who experiences complex emotional development throughout the play.

secondary character A supporting character; while not as prominent or central as a main character, he or she is still important to the events of a story or play.

EXAMPLE:

In Sophocles' Antigone (p. 1327), Haemon is a secondary character.

stock character A type of flat character based on a stereotype; one who falls into an immediately recognizable category or type—such as the absentminded professor or the town drunk—and thus resists unique characterization. Stock characters can be artfully used for humor or satire.

EXAMPLE:

In Flannery O'Connor's "A Good Man Is Hard to Find" (p. 1211), June Star and John Wesley are portrayed as stock characters—spoiled, bratty children.

characterization The method by which the author builds, or reveals, a character; it can be direct or indirect. Indirect characterization means that an author shows rather than tells us what a character is like through what the character says, does, or thinks, or what others say about the character. Direct characterization occurs when a narrator tells the reader who a character is by describing the background, motivation, temperament, or appearance of a character.

EXAMPLE:

Direct characterization: "Fenstad's Mother" by Charles Baxter (p. 1233):

Fenstad's mother was a lifelong social progressive who was amused by her son's church-going, and, wine or no wine, she could guess where he had been. She had spent her life in the company of rebels and deviationists, and she recognized all their styles.

Indirect characterization: Pride and Prejudice by Jane Austen, p. 65

Mr. Darcy danced only once with Mrs. Hurst and once with Miss Bingley, declined being introduced to any other lady, and spent the rest of the evening in walking about the room, speaking occasionally to one of his own party. His character was decided. He was the proudest, most disagreeable man in the world, and every body hoped that he would never come there again.

chorus In drama, especially classical Greek drama, the chorus refers to a group of participants in a play who deliver commentary on the play's action. The role of the chorus is no longer a regular feature of modern drama, although it has been employed in a few prominent works, such as T. S. Eliot's Murder in the Cathedral. See also drama.

EXAMPLE:

Antigone by Sophocles, p. 1327

climax The point in a story when the conflict reaches its highest intensity.

EXAMPLE:

In Alice Walker's "Everyday Use" (p. 1226), the climax occurs when Mama (the narrator) makes the forceful decision to take the family quilts from her daughter Dee (who intends to hang them as artwork, a symbol of her heritage) and return them to her daughter Maggie (who would use them for their intended purpose—as quilts).

colloquial language/colloquialism An expression or language construction appropriate only for casual, informal speaking or writing.

EXAMPLE:

"I toldja shut up, Ellie," Arnold Friend said, "you're deaf, get a hearing aid, right? Fix yourself up. This little girl's no trouble and's gonna be nice to me, so Ellie keep to yourself, this ain't your date right? Don't hem in on me, don't hog, don't crush, don't bird dog, don't trail me," he said in a rapid, meaningless voice, as if he were running through all the expressions he'd learned but was no longer sure which of them was in style, then rushing on to new ones, making them up with his eyes closed.

—JOYCE CAROL OATES, "Where Are You Going, Where Have You Been?" p. 467

colonialism The occupation of one country by another. In the early 1800s, European countries controlled 35 percent of the world, but by 1914, that number had risen to nearly 85 percent and included parts of Africa, Asia, Latin America, and the Caribbean. The legacy of colonialism has extended beyond the political independence that many countries gained in the 1960s and 1970s.

EXAMPLE:

See the works on pp. 533–62.

comedy Usually used to refer to a dramatic work that, in contrast to tragedy, has a light, amusing plot, features a happy ending, centers around ordinary people, and is written and performed in the vernacular.

EXAMPLE:

The Importance of Being Earnest by Oscar Wilde, p. 574

comedy of manners A satiric dramatic form that lampoons social conventions.

EXAMPLE:

Oscar Wilde's The Importance of Being Earnest (p. 574) is a comedy of manners.

coming-of-age story See bildungsroman.

complex sentence See sentence.

compound sentence See sentence.

compound-complex sentence See sentence.

concrete A concrete term is one that refers to a specific, particular thing, as opposed to a term that refers to a broad concept (e.g., Seamus Heaney as opposed to personhood); opposite of abstract.

EXAMPLE:

Krebs went to the war from a Methodist college in Kansas. There is a picture which shows him among his fraternity brothers, all of them wearing exactly the same height and style collar. He enlisted in the Marines in 1917 and did not return to the United States until the second division returned from the Rhine in the summer of 1919.

—ERNEST HEMINGWAY, "Soldier's Home," p. 1447

conflict The tension, opposition, or struggle that drives a plot. External conflict is the opposition or tension between two characters or forces. Internal conflict occurs within a character. Conflict usually arises between the protagonist and the antagonist in a story.

EXAMPLE:

In Herman Melville's "Bartleby, the Scrivener" (p. 854), the story's external conflict is between Bartleby, who won't leave his office after being fired, and the narrator, who is trying to remove him.

connotation Meanings or associations readers have with a word or item beyond its dictionary definition, or denotation. Connotations may reveal another layer of meaning of a piece, affect the tone, or suggest symbolic resonance.

EXAMPLE:

In the following lines from Ben Jonson's "On My First Son" (p. 297), the word lament—as opposed to synonyms such as cry or feel bad about—has formal and religious connotations.

*Will man lament the state he should envy,
To have so soon 'scaped world's and flesh's rage,
And, if no other misery, yet age!*

consonance An instance in which identical final consonant sounds in nearby words follow different vowel sounds. See also rhyme.

EXAMPLE:

*Let the boy try along this bayonet-blade
How cold steel is, and keen with hunger of blood;
Blue with all malice, like a madman's flash;
And thinly drawn with famishing for flesh.*

—WILFRED OWEN, "Arms and the Boy," p. 1440

couplet See stanza.

cumulative sentence See sentence.

dactyl See meter.

denotation The literal definition of a word, often referred to as the “dictionary definition.”

denouement Pronounced day-noo-moh, this literally means “untying the knot”; in this phase of a story’s plot, the conflict has been resolved and balance is restored to the world of the story.

EXAMPLE:

In Fences (p. 195) by August Wilson, the conflicts of the play are resolved with the death of Troy in Act II, scene iv. The scene that follows (Act II, scene v) is the play’s denouement.

dialect Dialogue or narration written to simulate regional or cultural speech patterns.

EXAMPLE:

TROY: . . . Man ain’t had two dimes to rub together. He walking around with his shoes all run over bumming money for cigarettes.

—AUGUST WILSON, Fences, p. 207

dialogue The written depiction of conversation between characters.

EXAMPLE:

“Who is this?” I demanded, thinking: heavy breather, prank caller.

“Who d’you think?” Sourdi was crying, a tiny crimped sound that barely crept out of the receiver. Then her voice steadied with anger and grew familiar. “Is Ma there?”

“What’s the matter? What happened?”

“Just let me speak to Ma, O.K.?” There was a pause, as Sourdi blew her nose. “Tell her it’s important.”

—MAY-LEE CHAI, “Saving Sourdi,” p. 288

diction A writer’s choice of words. In addition to choosing words with precise denotations and connotations, an author must choose whether to use words that are abstract or concrete, formal or informal, or literal or figurative. See colloquial language.

EXAMPLE:

See the close reading of a section from Robert Herrick’s “Delight in Disorder” (pp. 31–2).

direct characterization See characterization.

dramatic irony See irony, dramatic.

dramatic monologue A type of poem in which the speaker, who is clearly distinct from the poet, addresses an audience that is present in the poem.

EXAMPLE:

“My Last Duchess” by Robert Browning, p. 1104

ekphrastic poetry A form of poetry that comments on a work of art in another genre, such as a painting or a piece of music.

EXAMPLE:

"Hopper's 'Nighthawks' (1942)" by Ira Sadoff, p. 1118

elegy A contemplative poem, on death and mortality, often written for someone who has died.

EXAMPLE:

"Elegy for the Native Guards" by Natasha Trethewey, p. 1437

end rhyme See rhyme.

end-stopped line An end-stopped line of poetry concludes with punctuation that marks a pause. The line is completely meaningful in itself, unlike run-on lines, which require the reader to move to the next line to grasp the poet's complete thought. See also enjambment.

EXAMPLE:

*Surely some revelation is at hand;
Surely the Second Coming is at hand.*

—WILLIAM BUTLER YEATS, "The Second Coming," p. 1272

English sonnet See sonnet.

enjambment A poetic technique in which one line ends without a pause and must continue on to the next line to complete its meaning; also referred to as a "run-on line."

EXAMPLE:

*Once more the storm is howling, and hid
Under this cradle-hood and coverlids
My child sleeps on. There is no obstacle
But Gregory's wood and one bare hill
Whereby the haystack- and roof-levelling wind, Bred on the Atlantic, can be stayed.*

epigraph A quotation preceding a work of literature that helps set the text's mood or suggests its themes.

—FLANNERY O'CONNOR, "A Good Man Is Hard to Find," p. 1211

epiphany A character's transformative moment of realization. James Joyce, often credited with coining this as a literary term, defined it as the "sudden revelation of the whatness of a thing," the moment in which "the soul of the commonest object . . .

seems to us radiant . . . a sudden spiritual manifestation [either] in the vulgarity of speech or of a gesture or in a memorable phrase of the mind itself.”

EXAMPLE:

I put in windows with arches. I drew flying buttresses. I hung great doors. I couldn't stop. . . . So we kept on with it. His fingers rode my fingers as my hand went over the paper. It was like nothing else in my life up to now.

Then he said, "I think that's it. I think you got it," he said. "Take a look. What do you think?"

But I had my eyes closed. I thought I'd keep them that way for a little longer. I thought it was something I ought to do.

"Well?" he said. "Are you looking?"

My eyes were still closed. I was in my house. I knew that. But I didn't feel like I was inside anything.

"It's really something," I said.

—RAYMOND CARVER, “Cathedral,” p. 1089

eulogy A poem, speech, or other work written in great praise of something or someone, usually a person no longer living.

EXAMPLE:

exposition In a literary work, contextual and background information told to readers (rather than shown through action) about the characters, plot, setting, and situation.

EXAMPLE:

In Antigone (p. 1327), Sophocles uses the opening dialogue and initial speeches of the chorus and sentry to provide background on the play's events and characters.

extended metaphor See metaphor, extended.

eye rhyme See rhyme.

falling action In a plot diagram, this is the result (or fallout) of the climax or turning point. In this phase, the conflict is being resolved. See also plot.

EXAMPLE:

See the analysis of the plot of Gabriel García Márquez's "One of These Days," including its falling action, on pp. 62–3.

farce A dramatic form marked by wholly absurd situations, slapstick, raucous word-play, and sometimes innuendo.

EXAMPLE:

Oscar Wilde's The Importance of Being Earnest (p. 574) contains moments of farce, particularly the section on pp. 575–81 regarding cucumber sandwiches.

feminist literature Literary works that explore (either overtly or implicitly) women's identity and role in society. Feminist criticism reexamines literary works and the role of women in literature.

EXAMPLES:

“Homage to My Hips” by Lucille Clifton, p. 932, and “The Yellow Wallpaper” by Charlotte Perkins Gilman, p. 1066

figurative language Language that uses figures of speech; nonliteral language usually evoking strong images. Sometimes referred to as metaphorical language, most of its forms explain, clarify, or enhance an idea by comparing it to something else; the comparison can be explicit (simile) or implied (metaphor). Other forms of figurative language include personification, paradox, overstatement (hyperbole), understatement, and irony.

EXAMPLE:

There is a knocker shaped like a gasping fish on the door. . . . There’s many a big, deathly looking tapestry, wrinkling and thin, many a sofa shaped like an S. Brocades as tall as wicked queens in Italian tales stand gathered before the windows. Everything is draped and hooded and shaded, of course, unaffectionate but close.

—EUDORA WELTY, “Old Mr. Marblehall,” p. 24

first-person narrator See narrator.

After the novels, after the teacups, after the skirts that trail along the floor
And this, and so much more?—
It is impossible to say just what I mean!*

—T. S. ELIOT, “The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock,” p. 1036

genre This term can refer broadly to the general category that a literary work falls into (drama or poetry, fiction or nonfiction) or more specifically to a certain subset of literary works grouped together on the basis of similar characteristics (science fiction, local color, western).

EXAMPLE:

You know how children with cameras learn to work the exposed moments that define the family cluster. They break every trust, spy out the undefended space, catching Mom coming out of the bathroom in her cumbrous robe and turbaned towel, looking bloodless and plucked. It is not a joke. They will shoot you sitting on the pot if they can manage a suitable vantage.

—DON DELILLO, "Videotape," p. 1091

iamb See meter.

iambic pentameter An iamb, the most common metrical foot in English poetry, is made up of an unstressed syllable followed by a stressed one. Iambic pentameter, then, is a rhythmic meter containing five iambs. Unrhymed iambic pentameter is called blank verse. See also meter; blank verse.

EXAMPLE:

—WILLA CATHER, My Antonia, pp. 19–20

imperative sentence See sentence.

impressionism A movement of French painters that reached its apex in the 1870s and 1880s. The impressionists attempted to capture the subjective experience of seeing things rather than create accurate reproductions. Key representatives include Claude Monet, Pierre-Auguste Renoir, and Edgar Degas. The impressionists' attempts to capture subjective experience in art was very influential on symbolist poets and writers of stream-of-consciousness prose, such as James Joyce (p. 77) and Virginia Woolf (p. 77–78).

EXAMPLE:

"The Laundresses" by Edgar Degas, p. 1121

indirect characterization See characterization.

informal diction See diction.

internal rhyme See rhyme.

interrupted sentence See sentence.

inversion Also called an inverted sentence, it is created by alteration of the standard English word order of a subject (S) being followed by a verb (V) and its object (O) in a declarative sentence. Often used to call attention to something, perhaps to emphasize a point or an idea by placing it in the initial position, or to slow the pace by choosing an unusual order.

EXAMPLE:

So: <sup>O</sup> <sup>S</sup> <sup>V</sup> looks he had, his own <sup>O</sup> <sup>S</sup> <sup>V</sup> trade he had, there would have been a good wife in time.

—SALMAN RUSHDIE, "The Free Radio," p. 1244

irony, dramatic Tension created by the contrast between what a character says or thinks and what the audience or readers know to be true; as a result of this technique, some words and actions in a story or play take on a different meaning for the reader than they do for the characters.

EXAMPLE:

Once readers learn of Mr. Kapasi's hope for a relationship with Mrs. Das, in Jhumpa Lahiri's "Interpreter of Maladies" (p. 434), his actions take on a different meaning for the readers than for her.

irony, situational A pointed discrepancy between what seems fitting or expected in a story and what actually happens.

EXAMPLE:

T. C. Boyle's story "Admiral" (p. 887) is ripe with situational irony. While pet-sitting for Admiral II, a cloned dog, Nisha falls for an anti-cloning activist. Also, Nisha's instructions from the cloned dog's owners are to, in essence, bring their original pet back to life by treating this dog exactly as she did the original, who was struck by a car; to do so she must let Admiral II indulge his love of playing in traffic, which could lead him, ironically, to share Admiral I's fate.

irony, verbal A figure of speech that occurs when a speaker or character says one thing but means something else, or when what is said is the opposite of what is expected, creating a noticeable incongruity. Sarcasm involves verbal irony used derisively.

EXAMPLE:

JACK (pulling off his gloves): When one is in town one amuses oneself. When one is in the country one amuses other people. It is excessively boring.

ALGERNON: And who are the people you amuse?

JACK (airily): Oh, neighbors, neighbors.

ALGERNON: Got nice neighbors in your part of Shropshire?

JACK: Perfectly horrid! Never speak to one of them.

ALGERNON: How immensely you must amuse them!

—OSCAR WILDE, The Importance of Being Earnest, p. 576

Italian sonnet See sonnet.

juxtaposition Placing two things side by side for the sake of comparison or contrast. Authors sometimes use incongruous juxtapositions to produce verbal irony.

EXAMPLE:

HAMLET: To be, or not to be: that is the question:

Whether 'tis nobler in the mind to suffer

The slings and arrows of outrageous fortune,

Or to take arms against a sea of troubles,

And by opposing end them? To die: to sleep;

—WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE, Hamlet, p. 768

Kafkaesque Having the nightmarish, uncanny characteristics of Kafka's stories.

limited omniscient point of view See point of view.

literary elements The components that together create a literary work. This term encompasses elements of style, such as imagery, syntax, figurative language, and tone; as well as storytelling elements, such as plot, character, setting, and point of view.

lyric A short poem expressing the personal feelings of a first-person speaker. The term comes from the Greek word lyre, and the form is descended from poems intended to be sung with a lyre.

EXAMPLE:

"Those Winter Sundays" by Robert Hayden, p. 308

masque Now extremely rare, this genre of lush spectacle, song, dance, masks, and elaborate staging was popular among sixteenth- and seventeenth-century British nobles, who also made up its amateur and occasionally royal cast.

EXAMPLE:

Ben Jonson (p. 297) wrote many masques for the court of King James I and Queen Anne.

metaphor A figure of speech that compares or equates two things without using like or as. For comparisons made using like or as, see simile.

EXAMPLE:

For this, for everything we are out of tune;

—WILLIAM WORDSWORTH, "The World Is Too Much With Us," p. 498

metaphor, extended A metaphor that continues over several lines or throughout an entire literary work.

EXAMPLE:

In "One Art" by Elizabeth Bishop (p. 677), the metaphor of losing as an art to be practiced and perfected is repeated and developed throughout.

metaphysical conceit A literary device that sets up a striking analogy between two entities that would not usually invite comparison, often drawing connections between the physical and the spiritual. This literally device is famously used by metaphysical poets, including John Donne and George Herbert.

EXAMPLE:

"The Flea" by John Donne, p. 670

meter The formal, regular organization of stressed and unstressed syllables, measured in feet. A foot is distinguished by the number of syllables it contains and how stress is placed on the syllables—stressed (´) or unstressed (˘). There are five typical feet in English verse: iamb (˘ ´), trochee (´ ˘), anapest (˘ ˘ ´), dactyl (´ ˘ ˘), and spondee (´ ´). Some meters dictate the number of feet per line, the most common being tetrameter, pentameter, and hexameter, having four, five, and six feet, respectively. See iambic pentameter.

metonymy A figure of speech in which something is represented by another thing that is related to it. Compare to synecdoche; see also metaphor.

EXAMPLE:

In this excerpt from "London, 1802" by William Wordsworth (p. 1099), an altar is used to represent religion, a sword to represent the military, and a pen to represent the arts:

England hath need of thee: she is a fen

Of stagnant waters: altar, sword, and pen.

minimalism A style in prose or verse that emphasizes economy of words and unadorned sentences.

EXAMPLE:

“Cathedral” by Raymond Carver, p. 1079

Modernism In literature, Modernism refers to a movement of writers who reached their apex between the 1920s and 1930s and expressed views of disillusionment with contemporary Western civilization, especially in the wake of World War I’s mindless slaughter. Rejecting the conventions of the Victorian era, these writers experimented with form and took insights from recent writings by Freud and Jung about the unconscious. They viewed art as restorative and frequently ordered their writing around symbols and allusions. Representative modernist writers include T. S. Eliot, James Joyce, and Virginia Woolf.

EXAMPLE:

“The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock” by T. S. Eliot, p. 1033

monologue In a play, a speech given by one person. See also soliloquy.

EXAMPLE:

Troy delivers a monologue in Act I, scene iv, of Fences, p. 221.

mood Synonymous with atmosphere, mood is the feeling created for the reader by a work of literature. Many things can generate mood—especially style, tone, and setting.

motif A recurring pattern of images, words, or symbols that reveals a theme in a work of literature.

EXAMPLE:

In Shakespeare’s Hamlet (p. 720), the repeated use of words such as play, act, see, assume, show, reveal, appear, form, and shape, as well as the inclusion of a play within the play, become a motif, which helps to reveal one of the play’s central themes: the contrast between appearance and reality.

naive narrator See narrator.

narrative A story. Narratives may be written either in prose or in verse, as in narrative poetry.

EXAMPLE:

narrative frame Also known as a frame story, a narrative frame is a plot device in which the author places the main narrative of his or her work within another narrative—the narrative frame. This exterior narrative usually serves to explain the main narrative in some way.

EXAMPLES:

Heart of Darkness by Joseph Conrad, p. 369

narrator The character, or persona, that the author uses to tell a narrative, or story. Narrators may tell stories from several different points of view, including first person, second person (very rare), and third person. See point of view.

EXAMPLE:

In Daisy Miller by Henry James, the narrator is a third-person limited omniscient voice, who usually sticks closely to Winterbourne's thoughts and experiences:

After this Daisy was never at home, and Winterbourne ceased to meet her at the houses of their common acquaintance, because, as he perceived, these shrewd people had quite made up their minds that she was going too far. They ceased to invite her, and they intimated that they desired to express to observant Europeans the great truth that, though Miss Daisy Miller was a young American lady, her behaviour was not representative—was regarded by her compatriots as abnormal. Winterbourne wondered how she felt about all the cold shoulders that were turned towards her, and sometimes it annoyed him to suspect that she did not feel at all. (p. 1201)

More specific terms are used to discuss the role a narrator plays in interpreting the events in a narrative:

objective narrator A narrator who recounts only what characters say and do, offering no insight into their thinking or analysis of events. All interpretation is left to the reader.

EXAMPLE:

In her short story "The Lottery" (p. 77), author Shirley Jackson uses the perspective of the objective narrator effectively to stand back and suspend judgment on an incident that turns ugly and violent.

unreliable narrator A narrator who is biased and doesn't give a full or accurate picture of events in a narrative. Narrators may be unreliable because of youth, inexperience, madness, intentional or unintentional bias, or even a lack of morals. Authors often use this technique to distinguish the character's point of view from their own. Sometimes an author will use an unreliable narrator to make an ironic point.

EXAMPLE:

As Salman Rushdie's "The Free Radio" (p. 1244) progresses, readers realize that the narrator is unreliable in his account (and perception) of the rickshaw boy's fate.

near rhyme See rhyme.

non sequitur In literature, a reply or remark that does not have any relevance to what occasioned or preceded it; in rhetoric, a conclusion that does not logically follow from the premises.

—WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE, Hamlet, p. 760

EXAMPLE:

*For whose sake henceforth all his vows be such
As what he loves may never like too much.*

—BEN JONSON, "On My First Son," p. 297

parallel structure Also known as parallelism, this term refers to the repeated use of similar grammatical structures for the purpose of emphasis. Compare with anaphora, a type of parallel structure concerned only with the repetitions of an initial word or words.

EXAMPLE:

He would dispose of his good luck pebble. Swallow it, maybe, or use Lee Strunk's slingshot, or just drop it along the trail. On the march he would impose strict field discipline. He would be careful to send out flank security, to prevent straggling or bunching up, to keep his troops moving at the proper pace and at the proper interval. He would insist on clean weapons. He would confiscate the remainder of Lavender's dope. Later in the day, perhaps, he would call the men together and speak to them plainly. He would accept the blame for what had happened to Ted Lavender. He would be a man about it. He would look them in the eyes, keeping his chin level, and he would issue the new SOPs in a calm, impersonal tone of voice, an officer's voice, leaving no room for argument or discussion.

—TIM O'BRIEN, "The Things They Carried," p. 1383

parody A comic or satiric imitation of a particular literary work or style. Parodies can run the gamut from lighthearted imitations intended merely to play with something well known, to exaggerations intended to criticize by making a work or literary style look ridiculous.

Tomorrow will be dying.*

—ROBERT HERRICK, "To the Virgins, to Make Much of Time," p. 672

Petrarchan sonnet See sonnet.

plot The arrangement of events in a narrative. Almost always, a conflict is central to a plot, and traditionally a plot develops in accordance with the following model: exposition, rising action, climax, falling action, denouement. There can be more than one sequence of events in a work, although typically there is one major sequence along with other minor sequences. These minor sequences are called subplots.

EXAMPLE:

See analysis of the plot of "One of These Days" by Gabriel García Márquez on pp. 62–3.

point of view The perspective from which a work is told. The most common narrative vantage points are:

first person Told by a narrator who is a character in the story and who refers to him- or herself as “I.” First-person narrators are sometimes unreliable narrators.

second person Though rare, some stories are told using second-person pronouns (you). This casts the reader as a character in the story.

third-person limited omniscient Told by a narrator who relates the action using third-person pronouns (he, she, it). This narrator is usually privy to the thoughts and actions of only one character.

third-person omniscient Told by a narrator using third-person pronouns. This narrator is privy to the thoughts and actions of all of the characters in the story.

EXAMPLES:

First person: “I Stand Here Ironing” by Tillie Olsen, p. 266

I nursed her. They feel that’s important nowadays. I nursed all the children, but with her, with all the fierce rigidity of first motherhood, I did like the books then said. Though her cries battered me to trembling and my breasts ached with swollenness, I waited till the clock decreed.

Second person: “Videotape” by Don DeLillo, p. 1093

You don’t usually call your wife over to the TV set. She has her programs, you have yours. But there’s a certain urgency here. You want her to see how it looks. The tape has been running forever and now the thing is finally going to happen and you want her to be here when he’s shot.

Third-person limited omniscient: “Interpreter of Maladies” by Jhumpa Lahiri, p. 440

Third-person omniscient: “The Lady with the Little Dog” by Anton Chekhov, p. 643

She looked at him with fear, with entreaty, with love, looked at him intently, the better to keep his features in her memory. “I’ve been suffering so!” she went on, not listening to him. “I think only of you all the time, I’ve lived by my thoughts of you. And I’ve tried to forget, to forget, but why, why did you come?” Further up, on the landing, two high-school boys were smoking and looking down, but Gurov did not care; he drew Anna Sergeevna to him and began kissing her face, her cheeks, her hands.

See narrator.

Postmodernism In literature, Postmodernism refers to a loose grouping of writers in the post–World War II era who carry on the agenda of Modernism, inasmuch as they reject traditional literary conventions, embrace experimentation, and see contemporary life as bleak and fragmented. Rather than attempt to instill order through some literary device—as T. S. Eliot did with his use of allusions and myth, or William Butler Yeats with his symbolic system—postmodern writers tend to eschew attempts to treat art as a corrective to modern malaises, and their writing celebrates or plays with the fragmentation of life instead of seeking to fix it. In addition, postmodern writers attack the distinction between “high” and “low” art maintained by modernists, and their writing engages with popular art forms like cartoons and television. Representative postmodern writers include Don DeLillo, Thomas Pynchon, and Kurt Vonnegut.

EXAMPLE:

“Videotape” by Don DeLillo, p. 1090

propaganda Work that aims to influence an audience about a debatable position or affiliation, not through rational or supported appeals but through one or more of the following: emotional manipulation, the selective use (and omission) of facts, spin, or any number of fallacious techniques. The word has mostly negative connotations.

EXAMPLE:

See the discussion of art as propaganda (and a prompt suggesting alternative ways to define this term) in the questions following Plum Bun: A Novel without a Moral, p. 1310.

prose poem A blending of prose and poetry, usually resembling prose in its use of sentences without line breaks, and poetry in its use of quintessentially poetic devices such as figurative language. A prose poem makes traditional genre distinctions problematic. See also form.

EXAMPLE:

“Hopper’s ‘Nighthawks’ (1942)” by Ira Sadoff, p. 1118

protagonist The main character in a work; often a hero or heroine, but not always.

EXAMPLE:

In Conrad’s Heart of Darkness (p. 369), the protagonist is Marlow, who is also the novella’s narrator.

pun A play on words that derives its humor from the replacement of one word with another that has a similar pronunciation or spelling but a different meaning. A pun can also derive humor from the use of a single word that has more than one meaning.

EXAMPLE:

The title of Oscar Wilde’s The Importance of Being Earnest (p. 574) is a pun on the name of the play’s protagonist, Ernest.

quatrain See stanza.

Realism Describing a literary technique, the goal of which is to render work that feels true, immediate, natural, and realistic.

EXAMPLE:

Realism characterizes Hemingway’s technique in “Soldier’s Home” (p. 1447)

refrain A line, lines, or a stanza in a poem that repeat(s) at intervals.

EXAMPLE:

“‘twas a famous victory”

This refrain appears, slightly modified each time, in Robert Southey's "The Battle of Blenheim" (p. 1417).

resolution The working out of a plot's conflicts, following the climax. See also plot.

reversal When, in a narrative, the protagonist's fortunes take an unforeseen turn.

EXAMPLE:

In Antigone, Creon's reversal of fortune begins when his son, Haemon, commits suicide upon hearing of Antigone's death (p. 1362).

See also plot.

rhetorical question A question asked for stylistic effect and emphasis to make a point rather than to solicit an answer.

EXAMPLE:

For the lords who lay ye low?*

—PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY, "Song: To the Men of England," p. 917

rhyme The repetition of the same (or similar) vowel or consonant sounds or constructions. A rhyme at the end of two or more lines of poetry is called an end rhyme. A rhyme that occurs within a line is called an internal rhyme. A rhyme that pairs sounds that are similar but not exactly the same is called a near rhyme or a slant rhyme. A rhyme that only works because the words look the same is called an eye rhyme or a sight rhyme. Rhyme often follows a pattern, called a rhyme scheme.

EXAMPLES:

End rhyme:

*England hath need of thee: she is a fen
Of stagnant waters: altar, sword, and pen,*

—WILLIAM WORDSWORTH, "London, 1802" p. 1099

Internal rhyme:

A child sitting under the piano, in the boom of the tingling strings.

—D. H. LAWRENCE, "Piano," p. 1111

Near rhyme or slant rhyme:

*The alphabet is searched for letters soft,
To try a word before it can be wrought.*

—THOMAS BASTARD, "De Puero Balbutiente," p. 296

Eye rhyme:

*"Sisters and brothers, little Maid,
How many may you be?"
"How many? Seven in all," she said,
And wondering looked at me.*

—WILLIAM WORDSWORTH, "We Are Seven," p. 300

rhythm The general pattern of stressed and unstressed syllables. See also meter.

EXAMPLE:

Whōse herds | with mīlk, | whōse fiēlds | with bread,
 Whōse flocks | supplý | him with | attiré;
 Whōse trées | in sum | mēr yield | him shade,
 In win | ter, firē.

—ALEXANDER POPE, “The Quiet Life,” p. 497

rising action The events, marked by increasing tension and conflict, that build up to a story’s climax.

EXAMPLE:

In “Everyday Use” by Alice Walker (p. 1226), the rising action centers around the growing conflict between Dee’s new culture and values and those of her family. This conflict increases as the disagreement about who should have the quilts intensifies, ultimately leading to the climax of the story.

Romanticism In literature, a late eighteenth- to early nineteenth-century movement that emphasized beauty for beauty’s sake, the natural world, emotion, imagination, the value of a nation’s past and its folklore, and the heroic roles of the individual and the artist. Some prominent Romantic poets in this book include Percy Bysshe Shelley, Lord Byron, Samuel Taylor Coleridge, and John Keats.

EXAMPLE:

“Ode on a Grecian Urn” by John Keats, p. 1102

round character See character.

run-on line See enjambment.

sarcasm See irony, verbal.

satire A literary work that uses irony to critique society or an individual.

EXAMPLE:

“Harrison Bergeron” by Kurt Vonnegut, p. 881

scene A subdivision of an act in a play. Scenes usually break up the action into logical chunks. Many contemporary plays, however, contain only sequences of scenes, without an overarching act structure. See also act.

secondary character See character.

sentence Specific types of sentences discussed in this book:

complex sentence A sentence containing an independent clause and one or more subordinate clauses (beginning with words such as after, before, although, because, until, when, while, and if).

EXAMPLE:

In the castle, after they had landed, the subjective element decidedly prevailed.

—HENRY JAMES, Daisy Miller, p. 1184

compound sentence Two independent clauses joined by a coordinating conjunction (and, but, or, nor, for, yet, or so) or a semicolon.

EXAMPLE:

His voice seemed about to crack, and the grandmother's head cleared for a moment.

—FLANNERY O'CONNOR, "A Good Man Is Hard to Find," p. 1222

compound-complex sentence A combination of a compound sentence and a complex sentence; it is often fairly long.

EXAMPLE:

They flattered him with dreams because they knew they could take money away from him at cards and he would buy them drink while they did it, though he was no richer than they.

—SALMAN RUSHDIE, "The Free Radio," p. 1246

cumulative sentence A sentence in which an independent clause is followed by details, qualifications, or modifications in subordinate clauses or phrases.

EXAMPLE:

Connie liked the way he was dressed, which was the way all of them dressed: tight faded jeans stuffed into black, scuffed boots, a belt that pulled his waist in and showed how lean he was, and a white pull-over shirt that was a little soiled and showed the hard small muscles of his arms and shoulders.

—JOYCE CAROL OATES, "Where Are You Going, Where Have You Been?" p. 472

imperative sentence A sentence that issues a command. The subject of an imperative sentence is often implied rather than explicit.

EXAMPLE:

Make sure you show how Africans have music and rhythm deep in their souls, and eat things no other humans eat.

—BINYAVANGA WAINAINA, "How to Write about Africa," p. 560 interrupted sentence A sentence of any pattern modified by interruptions that add descriptive details, state conditions, suggest uncertainty, voice possible alternative views, or present qualifications.

EXAMPLE:

At the risk of exciting a somewhat derisive smile on the reader's part, I may affirm that with regard to the women who had hitherto interested him, it very often seemed to Winterbourne among the possibilities that, given certain contingencies, he should be afraid—literally afraid—of these ladies; he had a pleasant sense that he should never be afraid of Daisy Miller.

—HENRY JAMES, Daisy Miller, p. 1198

periodic sentence A sentence that begins with details, qualifications, or modifications, building toward the main clause.

EXAMPLE:

As the day was splendid, however, and the concourse of vehicles, walkers, and loungers numerous, the young American found their progress much delayed.

—HENRY JAMES, Daisy Miller, p. 1190

simple sentence A sentence composed of one main clause without any subordinate clauses.

EXAMPLE:

Winterbourne was much amused.

—HENRY JAMES, Daisy Miller, p. 1168

sestet See stanza.

setting Where and when a story takes place.

EXAMPLE:

It was a big, squarish frame house that had once been white, decorated with cupolas and spire and scrolled balconies in the heavily lightsome style of the seventies, set on what had once been our most select street. But garages and cotton gins had encroached and obliterated even the august names of that neighborhood; only Miss Emily's house was left, lifting its stubborn and coquettish decay above the cotton wagons and the gasoline pumps—an eyesore among eyesores. And now Miss Emily had gone to join the representatives of those august names where they lay in the cedar bemused cemetery among the ranked and anonymous graves of Union and Confederate soldiers who fell in the battle of Jefferson.

—WILLIAM FAULKNER, “A Rose for Emily,” p. 657

setting, social The manners, mores, customs, rituals, and codes of conduct in a work; an author may suggest approval or disapproval of any of these through a description of place.

EXAMPLE:

See the excerpt from 1984 by George Orwell, p. 71.

Shakespearean sonnet See sonnet.

sight rhyme See rhyme.

simile A figure of speech used to explain or clarify an idea by comparing it explicitly to something else, using the words like, as, or as though to do so.

EXAMPLE:

Martha was a poet, with the poet's sensibilities, and her feet would be brown and bare, the toenails unpainted, the eyes chilly and somber like the ocean in March, and though it was painful, he wondered who had been with her that afternoon.

—TIM O'BRIEN, “The Things They Carried,” p. 1375

simple sentence See sentence.

slang See colloquial language / colloquialism.

slant rhyme See rhyme.

soliloquy In a play, a monologue in which a character, alone on the stage, reveals his or her thoughts or emotions.

EXAMPLE:

See Hamlet's “To be, or not to be” speech in Hamlet by William Shakespeare, p. 768.

sonnet A poetic form composed of fourteen lines in iambic pentameter that adheres to a particular rhyme scheme. The two most common types are:

Petrarchan sonnet Also known as the Italian sonnet, its fourteen lines are divided into an octave and a sestet. The octave rhymes abba, abba; the sestet that follows can have a variety of different rhyme schemes: cdcdcd, cdecde, cddcdd.

EXAMPLE:

"The World Is Too Much with Us" by William Wordsworth, p. 498

Shakespearean sonnet Also known as the English sonnet, its fourteen lines are composed of three quatrains and a couplet, and its rhyme scheme is abab, cdcd, efef, gg.

EXAMPLE:

"My mistress' eyes are nothing like the sun" by William Shakespeare, p. 684 sound The musical quality of poetry, as created through techniques such as rhyme, enjambment, caesura, alliteration, assonance, onomatopoeia, rhythm, and cadence.

speaker This term is most frequently used in the context of drama and poetry. In drama, the speaker is the character who is currently delivering lines. In poetry, the speaker is the person who is expressing a point of view in the poem, either the author or a persona created by the author. See also narrator; persona; point of view.

EXAMPLE:

In Ben Jonson's "On My First Son" (p. 297), the speaker is a father, presumably Jonson, addressing his dead son.

*Farewell, thou child of my right hand, and joy;
My sin was too much hope of thee, loved boy:
Seven years thou wert lent to me, and I thee pay,
Exacted by thy fate, on the just day.*

spondee See meter.

sprung rhythm A meter developed out of Gerard Manley Hopkins's attempt to mirror natural speech patterns in his poetry. In sprung rhythm, the number of stressed syllables in each line is the same, while the number of unstressed syllables can vary. This means that the types of feet employed in each line can vary.

EXAMPLE:

"God's Grandeur" by Gerard Manley Hopkins, p. 1267

stage directions Any notes in the script of a play written by the author that set guidelines for the performance, explaining, for example, what the setting should look like, how actors should move and deliver certain lines, and so on. They are generally set in italics.

EXAMPLE:

See stage directions for A Raisin in the Sun by Lorraine Hansberry on p. 97.

stanza Lines in a poem that the poet has chosen to group together, usually separated from other lines by a space. Stanzas within a poem usually have repetitive forms, often sharing rhyme schemes or rhythmic structures.

A number of frequently used stanza types have specific names:

couplet A two-line, rhyming stanza.

EXAMPLE:

*And yet, by heaven, I think my love as rare
As any she, belied with false compare.*

—WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE, “My mistress’ eyes are nothing like the sun,” p. 684

tercet A three-line stanza.

EXAMPLE:

“Siren Song” by Margaret Atwood, p. 676

quatrain A four-line stanza.

EXAMPLE:

*Think me not unkind and rude
That I walk alone in grove and glen;
I go to the god of the wood
To fetch his word to men.*

—RALPH WALDO EMERSON, “The Apology,” p. 500

sestet A six-line stanza.

EXAMPLE:

*It was a summer evening,
Old Kaspar’s work was done;
And he before his cottage door
Was sitting in the sun,
And by him sported on the green
His little grandchild Wilhelmine.*

—ROBERT SOUTHEY, “The Battle of Blenheim,” p. 1418

octet An eight-line stanza.

EXAMPLE:

*I have walked and prayed for this young child an hour
And heard the sea-wind scream upon the tower
And under the arches of the bridge, and scream
In the elms above the flooded stream;
Imagining in excited reverie
That the future years had come,
Dancing to a frenzied drum,
Out of the murderous innocence of the sea.*

—WILLIAM BUTLER YEATS, “A Prayer for My Daughter,” p. 303

stream of consciousness A technique in which prose follows the logic and flow of a character’s (or multiple characters’) thought processes—associations, tangents, seemingly strange transitions—rather than a more ordered narrative.

EXAMPLE:

“Bliss” by Katherine Mansfield, p. 646

structure The organization of a work.

style The way a literary work is written. Style is produced by an author's choices in diction, syntax, imagery, figurative language, and other literary elements.

suspense A literary device that uses tension to make the plot more exciting; the effect created by artful delays and selective dissemination of information.

EXAMPLE:

An excellent example of suspense in fiction is Joyce Carol Oates's "Where Are You Going, Where Have You Been?" (p. 467).

symbol A setting, object, or event in a story that carries more than literal meaning and therefore represents something significant to understanding the meaning of a work of literature.

EXAMPLE:

And for the first time, or so it seemed, I noticed the piece on the right-hand side. It was called "Perfectly Contented." I tried to play this one as well. It had a lighter melody but with the same flowing rhythm and turned out to be quite easy. "Pleading Child" was shorter but slower; "Perfectly Contented" was longer but faster. And after I had played them both a few times, I realized they were two halves of the same song.

—AMY TAN, "Two Kinds," p. 141

synecdoche A figure of speech in which part of something is used to represent the whole. Compare to metonymy.

EXAMPLE:

"They were called legs or grunts."

—TIM O'BRIEN, "The Things They Carried," p. 1372

syntax The arrangement of words into phrases, clauses, and sentences in a prose passage. This includes word order (subject-verb-object, for instance, or an inverted structure); the length and structure of sentences (simple, compound, or complex), phrases, and clauses; the chronology of passages; the preference of various parts of speech over others; the use of connectors between and within sentences; and more.

EXAMPLE:

Have you ever seen a lame animal, perhaps a dog run over by some careless person rich enough to own a car, sidle up to someone who is ignorant enough to be kind to him?<sup>1</sup> That is the way my Maggie walks.<sup>2</sup> She has been like this, chin on chest, eyes on ground, feet in shuffle, ever since the fire that burned the other house to the ground.<sup>3</sup>

—ALICE WALKER, "Everyday Use," p. 1227

1. complex sentence; also a question

2. OSV structure, a simple declarative sentence

3. complex sentence; repetition of three parallel modifying phrases creates rhythm and emphasis syntax, poetic Similar to syntax in prose, poetic syntax also includes the arrangement of words into lines—where they break or do not break, the use of enjambment or caesura, and line length/patterns.

EXAMPLE:

For this<sub>2</sub> for everything<sub>2</sub> we are out of tune; (caesura)

It moves us not,—Great God! I'd rather be (caesura)

A Pagan suckled in a creed outworn; (enjambment)

—WILLIAM WORDSWORTH, “The World Is Too Much with Us,” p. 498

tercet See stanza.

theatrical property Known more commonly as a prop, this is a term for any object used onstage by an actor in a play.

EXAMPLE:

During Hamlet's soliloquy in act V, scene I, of Shakespeare's Hamlet (p. 815), the actor makes use of Yorick's skull as a prop.

theme Underlying issues or ideas of a work.

EXAMPLE:

See the section on theme, p. 85. For a student paper about theme in Antigone, see page 1461.

thesis statement The chief claim that a writer makes in any argumentative piece of writing, usually stated in one sentence.

tone A speaker's attitude as exposed through stylistic choices. (Tone is often confused with another element of style, mood, which describes the feeling created by the work.) Along with mood, tone provides the emotional coloring of a work and is created by some combination of the other elements of style.

EXAMPLE:

In your text, treat Africa as if it were one country. It is hot and dusty with rolling grasslands and huge herds of animals and tall, thin people who are starving. Or it is hot and steamy with very short people who eat primates. Don't get bogged down with precise descriptions. Africa is big: fifty-four countries, nine hundred million people who are too busy starving and dying and warring and emigrating to read your book. The continent is full of deserts, jungles, highlands, savannahs and many other things, but your reader doesn't care about all that, so keep your descriptions romantic and evocative and unparticular.

—BINYAVANGA WAINAINA, “How to Write about Africa,” pp. 559–60

tragedy A serious dramatic work in which the protagonist experiences a series of unfortunate reversals due to some character trait, referred to as a tragic flaw. The most common tragic flaw is hubris, Greek for pride. Modern tragedies tend to depart from some of the genre's classical conventions, portraying average rather than noble characters and attributing the protagonist's downfall to something other than a flaw in character—for example, social circumstances.

EXAMPLE:

Antigone by Sophocles, p. 1327

tragic flaw See tragedy.

tragic hero A character who possesses a flaw or commits an error in judgment that leads to his or her downfall and a reversal of fortune.

EXAMPLE:

Hamlet in William Shakespeare's Hamlet (p. 720).

Transcendental Movement A reaction against both rationalism and empiricism in philosophy, as well as austere Calvinist doctrines about human nature, transcendentalism emphasized knowledge via mystical insight, the divine spark in each human being, and the immanence of God in nature. Beginning in Europe and drawing inspiration from European thinkers, among them Immanuel Kant and Samuel Taylor Coleridge, the transcendental movement flourished in the nineteenth-century United States, where it was linked with Christian Unitarianism. Key thinkers include Ralph Waldo Emerson and Henry David Thoreau.

EXAMPLE:

"The Apology" by Ralph Waldo Emerson, p. 499

trochee See meter.

understatement The presentation or framing of something as less important, urgent, awful, good, powerful, and so on, than it actually is, often for satiric or comical effect; the opposite of hyperbole, it is often used along with this technique, and for similar effect.

EXAMPLE:

*The grave's a fine and private place,
But none, I think, do there embrace.*

—ANDREW MARVELL, "To His Coy Mistress," p. 694

unreliable narrator See narrator.

verbal irony See irony, verbal.

verse A broad term, verse refers to a piece of writing that is metered and rhythmic. (Free verse is an exception to this, being a piece of writing grouped with verse rather than prose, even though it lacks a meter.) The term verse can also be used to refer to poetry in general. See also meter; rhyme; rhythm.

vignette A short narrative scene or description, often one in a series. If a story or novel is composed of a series of vignettes, it often relies on a thematic, rather than a plot-driven, structure.

EXAMPLE:

"If You Are What You Eat, Then What Am I?" by Geeta Kothari, p. 351, is composed of numerous vignettes.

villanelle A form of poetry in which five tercets (rhyme scheme aba) are followed by a quatrain (rhyme scheme abaa). At the end of tercets two and four, the first line of tercet one is repeated. At the end of tercets three and five, the last line of tercet one is repeated. These two repeated lines, called refrain lines, are again repeated to conclude the quatrain. Much of the power of this form lies in its repeated lines and their subtly shifting sense or meaning over the course of the poem.

EXAMPLE:

“Do not go gentle into that good night” by Dylan Thomas, p. 926

wordplay Techniques by which writers manipulate language for effect; examples include puns (the deliberate misuse of words that sound alike) or double entendres (expressions with two meanings).

EXAMPLE:

LADY BRACKNELL: Good afternoon, dear Algernon, I hope you are behaving very well.

ALGERNON: I’m feeling very well, Aunt Augusta.

LADY BRACKNELL: That’s not quite the same thing. In fact the two things rarely go together.

ALGERNON [to GWENDOLEN]: Dear me, you are smart!

GWENDOLEN: I am always smart! Aren’t I, Mr. Worthing?

JACK: You are quite perfect, Miss Fairfax.

GWENDOLEN: Oh! I hope I am not that. It would leave no room for developments, and I intend to develop in many directions.

—OSCAR WILDE, The Importance of Being Earnest, p. 580–81

zeugma Pronounced zoÿg-muh, a technique in which one verb is used with multiple (and often incongruous) objects, so that the definition of the verb is changed, complicated, or made both literal and figurative.

EXAMPLE:

They carried chess sets, basketballs, Vietnamese-English dictionaries, insignia of rank, Bronze Stars and Purple Hearts, plastic cards imprinted with the Code of Conduct. They carried diseases, among them malaria and dysentery. They carried lice and ringworm and leeches and paddy algae and various rots and molds. They carried the land itself—Vietnam, the place, the soil—a powdery orange-red dust that covered their boots and fatigues and faces.

Index of First Lines

- After the teacher asked if anyone had a sacred place, 2
A hook shot kisses the rim and, 49
All things within this fading world hath end, 298
Among twenty snowy mountains, 1108
And some time make the time to drive out west, 1152
anyone lived in a pretty how town, 922
Applauding youths laughed with young prostitutes, 1107
A rainbow of people rushing around,
1426
A simple Child, 300
As the guests arrive at my son's party, 313
A sweet disorder in the dress, 31
At first, I looked along the road, 935
At the factory I worked, 518

Bent double, like old beggars under sacks,
1424
Between my finger and my thumb, 1145
Bright Star, would I were stedfast as thou art —, 30

Clips from the battlefield, 1433
Crumbling is not an instant's Act, 1269

Dear Sirs, 131
Do not go gentle into that good night, 926
Dylan is about the Individual against the whole of creation, 934

Each day we go about our business, 4
Eight hours by bus, and night, 9

Farewell, thou child of my right hand, and joy, 297
Fast breaks. Lay ups. With Mercury's, 41, 42
For other fruits my father was indifferent, 337
From her window marshland stretched for miles, 1281
From my mother's sleep I fell into the State, 1427

Gassing the woodchucks didn't turn out right, 58
Gather ye rose-buds while ye may, 672
